Family, Christian Views of, in Asia. The family in Asia is a social unit based on blood or marital ties. Except in a few predominantly Christian communities (e.g. in Northeastern India), the Asian Christian family is usually part of a big clan whose members embrace different religions; thus it is often caught up in the cultural and religious practices of the prevalent religion, culture, or philosophy (e.g. indigenous religion, Confucianism*, Daoism*, Hinduism*, Buddhism*, Islam*). Such practices include filial piety, respect for (veneration* or worship of) ancestors*, general preference for boys, and privileging of boys. In the very few matrilineal communities found in some indigenous communities of Indonesia*, India* and Bangladesh*, some Christian families may accord certain privileges to girls and women, including ownership of property. Literal* use of Scriptures*, such as the biblical household* codes (e.g. Eph 5:22–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1), reinforces the patriarchal and hierarchical relations of Asian cultures, religions, and philosophies. Asian Feminist* theologians critique oppressive practices and interpretation of Scriptures, and call for the family to model a more egalitarian community with Christ (rather than the husband/father) as head of the whole Christian family. Owing to migration for economic or political reasons, more frequent occurrences of interracial and interreligious marriage and divorce or legal separation, and a decline in traditional marriages, the Christian family in Asia is changing rapidly. See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER: IN ASIA. HOPE S. Family, Christian Views of, in Australia.

In contrast to the nuclear family structures of nonindigenous people in Australia*, in Aboriginal* societies each person identifies every person in the group by a relationship term (classificatory system of kinship); e.g. a father's brothers are known as fathers and a mother's sisters are known as mothers. Although Aboriginal societies tend to be egalitarian, as an individual identifies all others in the society by a relationship term, a wide range of obligations and rights are established. Older men and women have authority in their kin group. In the past, women had a degree of autonomy in their sphere of food gathering and preparation and in rituals relating to fertility and nurturing. In traditional education, parents, older siblings, and other relatives passed on their knowledge through training in social relationships, which included defining eligible marriage partners. Polygamy* was common, with men often having two or three wives.

Early missionaries assumed that their mandate of "Christianizing and civilizing" involved imposing the model of monogamous nuclear families. Men were refused baptism until they restricted themselves to one wife. Some missions relaxed this rule when it was realized that women sent away by their husbands lacked support and protection. Yet the statement in the early 1900s of a Roman Catholic priest, later Bishop Gsell, was typical: "The nomadic family group is the antithesis of the Christian family." Many Aboriginal orphans and children of mixed descent were removed from their extended families and found nurture and support in mission homes (e.g. Colebrook, South Australia; Mount Margaret, Western Australia) as the home residents became their new family.

Some missions supported traditional family structures, as Aboriginal Christians found resonance with biblical family structures and marriage arrangements. As relationship (walytja) is a central concept in Aboriginal societies, references to God as “father” and Jesus as “elder brother” were soon absorbed into prayer and preaching. The Pitjantjatjara term for Christians is Jesuku walytja (relatives of Jesus). The church is God’s extended family in which previous barriers between different Aboriginal groups and between Aborigines and other Australians are broken down.

In contemporary society, many Aboriginal families experience problems as individuals face tensions between traditional kinship obligations and the demands of modern political and social roles. Some churches, having apologized for removing Aboriginal children from their families, seek to help Aboriginal families as they adjust to these changes and to contribute to the church’s understanding of family from their own tradition and experience. See also ANCESTOR VENERATION AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN ABORIGINAL AUSTRALIA; ANTHROPOLOGY CLUSTER: AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL THEOLOGICAL ISSUES. WILLIAM H. EDWARDS

Family, Christian Views of, in Latin America. The family is still viewed as an important institution in Latin American society, despite the multiplicity of contexts (from Argentina* and Chile* to Mexico* and from Brazil* to Ecuador*) and the repeated claims that it is in crisis. According to 2000 and 2008 surveys, “traditional families” as conceived of in the modern period – headed by married couples (a man and a woman) for whom having children and achieving financial stability are highly important – are still a majority. However, these surveys also show fundamental changes in the way family relations are envisioned.

For most Latin Americans, the family founded on a married couple should be the cornerstone of society. The state should adopt policies that promote family life as a solution to problems such as youth delinquency, addictions, and violence, and as a factor of social cohesion. Yet many acknowledge that the quality of family life has deteriorated in the late 20th and early 21st c. and expect further deterioration in the future.

Recent surveys show that marriage* has lost some of its attraction. The number of married people is decreasing. Contributing factors include fear of divorce* (which has increased), workplace demands, economic problems, changes in cultural values, women’s independence, and, above all, the sense that living together before getting married is acceptable. Cohabitation as the beginning of a first union has increased sharply since the beginning of the 21st c. For some this shows that the taboo associated with sex has given way to a fear of commitment and of love*. Work and personal aspirations, rather than love, are vital concerns in relationships.

Highly educated young people with good jobs tend to postpone marriage. Once men and women have reached a greater level of psychological and social development, building a stable and healthy relationship is nonetheless not without difficulties, because each partner has a complex life and must learn to adapt to that of the other.

The single-parent family (generally a mother and children, but also a father and children) has always existed; yet according to 2000 and 2008 surveys, this type of family has multiplied (especially among relatively well off people), mainly because of the number of breakups and divorces. One-person homes have also increased (about 8% of the inhabitants of big cities). Family units tend to fragment. There are also a growing number of unions of divorced men and women who include their children from previous marriage(s) in the new family. Simultaneously, the importance of the extended family (which upholds traditional values of solidarity for the protection and help of relatives) is declining, though it is still important in lower-class and low-middle-class segments of society.

The high level of poverty* in Latin America affects families; many poor people cannot afford to marry, and many couples cannot afford to have children and support a family. Relationships within Latin American families change. Compared with their parents' generation, men have assumed more responsibilities for child care and household chores, but most domestic work remains women's responsibility. Yet economic and work-related conditions often make it difficult for parents to assume their traditional responsibilities toward children, who have been described as "horizontal children" (because their parents see them only at bedtime) or "orphan children" (because the parents' working hours are so long). In addition, surveys show a decrease in the number of children and the postponement of the birth of the first child, especially in the middle and upper classes.

The churches respond in three ways to these cultural changes in the concept and sense of family, and especially to the discovery that there are "nontraditional" families and couples in the churches themselves.

1. Perplexity. The churches recognize the new realities, but without adopting a critical stance. Often this attitude simply leads to conformity to the new cultural realities, without providing church members any orientation in light of the Christian faith.
2. An Integrist or fundamentalist* attitude* that uses Christian values in a reactionary way, without taking social problems into account and without showing mercy, compassion, or empathy to those who are struggling in these situations. Some of the Christians who adopt this stance are associated with conservative political groups or movements that advocate discrimination or authoritarian rules.
3. Biblical and theological reflections taking on the challenges posed by these new social, family, and personal realities. These reflections lead to an enriched understanding of the family in terms of its cultural essence rather than of unchangeable principles and laws. The church discovers that its responsibility includes pastoral* care for the family, viewed as a space for the protection, growth, nurturing, and enrichment of life. The church as the family of a variety of families through its pastoral ministry provides family counseling for its members, both in good times and in periods of crisis. The church can then use its prophetic voice to challenge society to strengthen and enrich those intimate spaces where life takes place and is nurtured – the family in its many forms.

Family, Christian Views of, in North America: African American Traditions.

The family in African American Christian traditions is an elastic and highly diversified entity that includes nuclear two-parent families, extended families, single-parent families, and "fictive" families that often incorporate close friends from church or the community who do not have living or close relatives. The scholar W. E. B. DuBois* observed that the origins of the Black Church (see African American Cluster: African American Churches and Their Theologies) preceded the origin of the black family. This refers to the fact that during slavery*, when marriage between black men and women was illegal, the earliest Black churches were permitted. Churches became "extended families" to include and affirm every community member, especially those members who had been sold or otherwise separated from their biological kin.

With freedom, black families achieved high rates of marriage and family stability. This strength was manifest during the Civil* Rights Movement, when Dr. Martin Luther King*, Jr., led Black Church members, both adults and children, in desegregating US society.

Since then, there has been urgent concern about the future of black families as rates of marriage* decline, divorce* rates increase, rates of father absence are high, and the percentage of nonmarital births is above 65%. Although the vast majority of African American Christians are Protestant, there are a large number of black Catholics. Both Protestants and Catholics have focused on strengthening black families. Among the most contentious issues being actively debated are women's* ordination and the status of homosexuals* within churches and within the larger matrix of family life. Increasingly, with parental absence, black families are relying on grandmothers as surrogate parents. Black churches support family life through a variety of creative practices, such as the celebration of "Men's Day" and "Women's Day," as well as the cultural acknowledgment of Mother's* Day and Father's Day. See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER: IN WESTERN CHURCHES

Family, Christian Views of, in the United States. Different religious views and practices of family formation are reflected in the demographic patterns in the USA. Family relationships that developed among Protestants, Roman Catholics, and Native American and African practitioners of indigenous religions contributed to tensions among different forms of family structure and patterns of hierarchy and equality.

In settling Massachusetts, e.g., many families were Puritan* and Calvinist, sought freedom to practice their religion, and expected a patriarchal* form of family life that exemplified "subordination and equivalence" – a Christian convention established as early as Augustine*. As a practical, social matter, women were understood to be subordinate to men, though from a theological standpoint women were equal to men. "Subordination" reinforced a father's and husband's control over property and inheritance and offered women little recourse in situations of domestic violence*. "Equivalence" met practical concerns during the Revolutionary War when women ran farms, repelled enemies, and were rewarded for their defense of the colonies with control over families and property.

In California, Roman Catholic Spanish military explorers sought gold. Armies consisted of single men who intermarried with Native Americans. When, e.g., the Spanish intermarried with Pueblos, they encountered matrilineal kinship systems that placed economic power among women and immediate responsibility for offspring with a mother's male relatives, even though children lived with fathers. The power of women in Pueblo families intersected with the reverence for Mary* in Roman Catholic tradition, changing the balance of power between men and women in some Southwestern families.

In the southern states, family formation was influenced by slaveholding. Some slaveholders perceived their households as "my family, white and black." As in the Greek household, a slaveholder had life-and-death control over slaves. The stability of slave families depended on the benevolence, wealth, and age of the slaveholder; slave families were disrupted by punishment, sale, or death of owners. Biblical arguments both supported and denied such family formation, and slaveholding by prominent religious families contributed to denominational schism in the 19th c. (see Slavery and the Christian Churches in North America).

In Minnesota, Lutheran family formation was linked to that of community, as entire communities of Scandinavian families relocated together in the Upper Midwest.

Scholars continue to debate the effects of such historical patterns on the poverty* of Native American and African American families, the "liberal" and "conservative" mentality of regions of the North American continent, and the support or lack thereof for family public policy in contemporary times. See also MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER.

PAMELA COUTURE

Family, Christian Views of, in Western Europe. The "ethical landslide" of the 1960s (which culminated in the May 1968 youth revolt against all traditional values and literally paralyzed Europe for several weeks) shook up the status quo. Many people at the bottom of the hierarchical ladder in society and churches became conscious of their personhood and responsibility for their lives. A sense of freedom from traditional norms pervaded all of life, and especially views of family. Tradition as a source of true values lost its self-evidence for more and more people, especially the young, both in society at large and in the churches. There are still traditional Christian families in Western Europe, especially in traditional churches, where the father is the head of the family and the mother the general provider of care. But they are no longer a clear majority. Christian political parties, especially in Roman Catholic countries, as well as leaders of more traditional Protestant churches, have attempted to fight this trend, but without much success.

With increased mobility, children generally leave home in their late teens to be independent. Their point of reference becomes youth culture. The sense of belonging to a family dissolves and is replaced by a sense of belonging to a group of friends. When one thinks of "a family," one thinks of parents (often, one parent) with young children.

In this context, many young Christian people live together and do not marry; they have lost their trust in the institution of marriage. In Western Europe, about one-third of marriages end in divorce (Council of Europe statistics). These young people believe that it is better to live in love and responsibility for each other without a wedding than to have a sordid divorce. Commonly they marry, often in their 30s, when children are planned. Fertility manipulation, in order to either have or not have children, is generally practiced, even when a church prohibits it. Christians generally understand this as part of God's instruction to be responsible human beings.

Many women do not see themselves as first defined by family roles; their identity is framed by their work outside the home. Slowly, men are assuming half of the responsibility for child care and house-keeping. Many young children spend at least part of the week with other children in child care centers.

Christians on the whole no longer start to think about their lives and their identity in terms of the family, but in terms of their individual responsibility and accountability as persons, endowed by God with special gifts. In this individualistic culture, the churches give the opportunity to experience community. This community is not imaged as a family, but rather as a God-given group of friends. See also FRIENDSHIP; MARRIAGE, THEOLOGY AND PRACTICE OF, CLUSTER.

Family, Christian Views of, and Worldwide Issues: Feminist Theological Perspectives.

Second-wave 20th-c. European-American feminists, as distinct from feminist adherents of earlier movements, identified the family, not just society in general, as the source of women's oppression. Books such as Betty Friedan's The Feminist Mystique and Simone de Beauvoir's The Second Sex contested homemaking as exploitative, fought against domestic violence, and pushed for equality in jobs and salaries. Christian and Jewish feminists contributed to this development by challenging religious justification for male domination, edicts such as "Wives, be subject to your husbands" (Eph 5:22; Col 3:18), and views of the order of creation* that placed women and children under men and God.

Divergent understandings of the family, however, marked both secular and religious feminists from the beginning. Liberal, humanist, and individualist forms of feminism of the 1960s and 1970s criticized the family as an obstacle to women's fulfillment. In the 1980s, social, radical, gynocentric, and relational* feminism shifted the critique to the wider cultural constructions and suggested that denigration of the female body*, procreativity, and maternal thinking (see Motherhood*) was a more fundamental problem. For women of color, the feminist critique of family failed to take account of their desires for safe homes, viable jobs for men and women, and protection of children* in a racist* society.

Approaches to the family among religious feminists fall roughly into three groups, which correspond to developments in feminist secular theory. Early white Feminist* theologians joined the humanist critique of religious norms of male rule and female service. In the 1980s and 1990s, Womanist* theologians saw the dismissal of motherhood and family as problematic and promoted broader norms of community mothering. Evangelical* Protestant and Roman Catholic feminists accepted some secular feminist tenets, such as affirmation of women's worth or protest about abuse, while reclaiming more explicitly religious mandates about marriage*, responsibility for children*, and social justice*.

Despite these differences, feminist scholars in religion and theology have made several significant contributions on the family that secular feminists and the general public often overlook. They have critiqued and reconstructed Scriptures* and traditions and offered important arguments for radical mutuality and egalitarian relationships in the family, the creation of women and children in God's image*, and the integral connection between reconstructing the family and reforming society.

BONNIE J. MILLER-MCLEMORE

Family, Christian Views of, and World-wide Issues: Genocide and Modern Wars.

The modern phenomenon of genocide and the proliferation of wars that specifically or collaterally target noncombatant families challenge traditional conceptions of God's power and justice* as well as the notion of suffering as redemptive. Racial and ethnoreligious forms of genocide aim to destroy the family as the future of a community: mass rape and mutilation, abduction and enslavement of children as soldiers, and systematic killing and maiming characterize ideologically motivated wars. Such genocidal wars degrade and dehumanize the entire community through extravagantly cruel treatment of women as childbearers and -rearers. Traditional theodicy* explains such suffering as (1) a chastening for past transgressions, (2) a test that will ultimately strengthen faith, and (3) redemptive suffering in the larger scheme of sacred history while asserting God's omnipotence*, benevolence, and omniscience*. However, the logic of theodicy ascribes a higher meaning to senseless suffering and thereby justifies the perpetrators and encourages the submission of victims to degradation and atrocity. Instead, the biblical traditions of Lamentations* and of protest against God can serve as starting points to develop faithful responses that foster resistance to oppressive ideologies and state-sanctioned cruelty inflicted on entire communities.

KATHARINA VON KELLENBACH

Family, Christian Views of, and World-wide Issues: Nonheterosexual Two-Parent Families.

Christian conservatives are alarmed by the heightened visibility and cultural acceptance of families headed by same-sex couples, the legalization of civil marriage* for same-sex couples in several countries (Canada, Belgium, the Netherlands, Spain, parts of the USA), and the movement within various religious traditions to bless same-sex unions. Traditionalists insist that the practice of nonmarital sex, including homoerotic intimacy, is not biblically authorized and threatens personal and social well-being. Progressives welcome nonheterosexuals fully into the life and leadership of the church, support their civil and human rights, including the freedom to marry, and call for a reformation of Christian sexual ethics in light of the biblical mandate to seek justice for the marginalized.

Christian conflict about sexuality*, marriage, and family is nothing new. The Reformers* challenged the Catholic ban on married clergy and allowed divorce* with the possibility of remarriage, but without reversing the tradition's sex negativity and patriarchal bias. They elevated a male-dominant model of marriage, restricted sexual activity to procreative activity between married spouses, and expected all eligible adults to marry and form families.

Within contemporary Christianity, sharp divisions have surfaced about women's power and roles, the acceptability of diverse sexualities, including homosexuality, bisexuality, and transgenderism, and the authority and sources for revising Christian sexual and family ethics.

Opponents of same-sex marriage idealize a 19th-c. Western middle-class nuclear family as the Christian norm, arguing that marriage as an immutable God-given institution is heterosexual for the purpose of rearing children, moral and complete because it brings together two sexually differentiated persons into a complementary union of "opposites." In contrast, progressives view marriage and family as changing institutions. Seeking to transform the anti-sex and patriarchal biases of Christian traditions, they argue for a relational* ethic focused not on identity, but on moral conduct and the character of relationships. Emphasizing the unitive rather than procreative purpose of marriage, they conclude that same-sex couples can fulfill the requirements of committed love and mutual care that marriage promises, and they invoke Jesus' nonconventional attitude toward family and community as a warrant for their stance.

This debate poses questions about the respective role of church* and state in family life and whether the marital family should be privileged over other kinds of intimate associations. It challenges Christians to consider whether faithfulness requires standing in continuity or discontinuity with their tradition when it comes to sexuality and relational justice.

MARVIN M. ELLISON

Families, Christian Views of, and Worldwide Issues: Substitute Families in Squatter Camps. Substitute families comprise persons not necessarily related by blood who form a family system, by choice, for mutual protection and sustenance. Roles and structures within these families usually attempt to mirror local social and religious ideals. Unaccompanied children, the elderly, and women displaced by economic, natural, or political disaster and/or by violence especially benefit from these relationships.

Massive squatter camps, unsanctioned by local government or international agencies, are often located in Two-thirds World countries (Latin America, Africa) where notions of family are influenced by Roman Catholicism and/or Evangelical Protestantism, and are also found in Western Europe, the Pacific, and Asia. While reflecting the gospel imperative to protect the vulnerable (Jas 1:27; Matt 25:40), substitute families usually portray the Pauline tradition of male hierarchy (Eph 5:23). The autonomy of women as heads of households, though, is common and accepted in regions prone to war and political instability (Ruth 1).

Traditional Christian views of procreation as the central purpose of family (Gen 1:28) conflict with the need for economic sustainability and the control of health and disease through the limitation of offspring within substitute families. For unaccompanied children, adoption threatens links to blood kin, potentially violating the Christian ethic* of care for one's family (I Tim 5:8).

M. JAN HOLTON

Farel, Guillaume (1489–1565), founder of the Reformed* Church in French-speaking Europe. The son of a notary in Gap (Southern France), he pursued advanced education in Paris. First under the spell of moderate Reformers like Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples and Bishop Briçonnet of Meaux, he soon felt called to go all the way in becoming Protestant. He wrote several devotional works but was best known as an inflammatory preacher, capable of provoking riots with his sermons, with particularly strong attacks on Roman Catholic eucharistic* theology, using arguments parallel to Zwingli's*. He spent most of his career preaching in French-speaking areas along the border with Switzerland, sometimes with material support from Zwinglian Bern, as part of a campaign to spread its faith. His greatest success was in Geneva, where he persuaded local authorities to throw out their prince-bishop, to adopt laws outlawing the Mass and mandating Protestant worship (1535, 1536), and to hire Calvin* to assist him. Calvin, Farel, and others were thrown out of Geneva in 1538. Calvin alone returned in 1541 to consolidate the Reformation there. Farel spent most of the rest of his life directing the Reformation in and from Neuchâtel.

Fascism and Christianity. See GERMAN CHRISTIANS AND THEIR THEOLOGY; RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE.

Fast, Fasting. Abstention from food was practiced in Judaism and in early Christianity. Wednesdays and Fridays became the Christian fast days. Fasting became part of Lent* and, in the Eastern Church, several other seasons of the church year. In Protestantism, fast days have been called at times of crisis. Fasting is also an element of civil* disobedience.

Father, an honorific title for bishops, then confessors, and finally most priests, based on Paul's claim of spiritual fatherhood (1 Cor 4:14); a designation for one of the persons of the Trinity*.

Fátima. The apparitions at Fátima (1917), which gave rise to Portugal's premier pilgrimage center, are the subject of continuing controversy. Most non-Catholics have considered the veneration to be based on fraudulent claims. Although successive popes have affirmed the authenticity of the visions, many Catholics inside and outside Portugal remain unconvinced. Some skeptics interpret what happened as an example of popular religiosity imposing itself on the official church, as in medieval times (see Popular Christian Practices Cluster).

The Virgin appeared at the Cova da Iria, in the parish of Fátima, on the 13th day of each of the months of May to October 1917 to three young shepherds (although in August the date was actually the 19th because the children were held for questioning by a local republican official on the 13th). On October 13, thousands of witnesses at the Cova da Iria claimed to have seen the sun miraculously dance in the sky. Two of the children, Francisco and Jacinta Marto, died in an influenza epidemic (1919–20) and were beatified in 2000. Their older cousin, Lúcia de Jesus Santos (1907–2005), the principal visionary, became a Dorothean and later a Carmelite* nun living in seclusion in Coimbra. The local bishop declared the apparitions "worthy of credence" after canonical inquiry (1930). The visionary messages of 1917 were further elaborated by Lúcia in three "secrets." The first two were the reality of hell* and the need to consecrate Russia to the Immaculate Heart of Mary. The third secret, written down in 1944 and conveyed to the pope, was not revealed until 2000. The vision included the shooting, in an apocalyptic setting, of a "bishop dressed in white," which Cardinal Ratzinger (now Benedict XVI) interpreted as referring to the attempted assassination of John Paul II on May 13, 1981 (64th anniversary of the first vision).

RICHARD A. H. ROBINSON

Faustus of Riez (5th c.). Probably of British origin, he became a monk and abbot at Lérins, then bishop of Riez in Provence. Opposing predestination*, he wrote a treatise on grace* (472), insisting on the role of free choice as well as of grace (a semi-Pelagian* view). His views were condemned at the Second Council of Orange* (529).

Fear of God, in a negative sense, a feeling of impending danger from God's justice* and anger* ("servile" fear); in a positive sense, awe and reverence for God, as a child reveres a parent ("filial" fear), or in a mystical* experience.

Federal Council of Churches (FCC), an interdenominational North American organization founded in 1908. It had no authority over member churches and no creed*-making powers; its purpose was to express Christian unity and promote shared public action in evangelism*, education*, and social* justice. The founding assembly adopted the so-called Social Creed of the Churches (see Social Gospel Movement). The FCC became an indispensable means of interchurch cooperation during World War I, pioneered radio* broadcasts by leading preachers, and developed television* programs. The successor organization is the National* Council of Churches.

Felix of Urgel (d818), one leader of so-called Spanish Adoptianism*. Probably influenced by the language of an older approach to Christology* in the West, its proponents were attacked during the reign of Charlemagne* from the perspective of earlier doctrinal decisions, especially the Second Council of Constantinople* (553).

Fell, Margaret (1614–1702), English "mother of Quakerism*" (Religious Society of Friends*), leader, publisher, petitioner, prisoner of conscience. Daughter of a "gentleman" of Dalton (Furness, Lancashire), widow (1658) of judge Thomas Fell, she married (1669) George Fox*, founder of the Quaker Movement, whose preaching had convinced her to become a Quaker in 1652.

For 50 years, Fell promoted Quakerism's post-civil war radical Christian agenda: for Spirit*-led renewal*; a clergy-less church; social* justice*; refusal of oaths*, tithes*, militarism, and status-defining dress and politeness; and the spiritual equality and public ministry of women.

Despite hostility from the state and the Anglican Church, her home, Swarthmoor Hall (Ulverston), was Quakerism’s hub, an illegal meeting place for worshippers, as well as a respite center for traveling ministers. She corresponded with Fox, who was frequently absent; published epistles to Quaker groups; remonstrated with individuals, from magistrates to Quaker dissenters; wrote tracts to European Jews (translated into Hebrew); and supported controversial women’s meetings for Quaker governance. Some doctrinal publications (e.g. on Quakers’ marriage rites and peaceability) predated Fox’s on those subjects. Imprisoned for being a Quaker (1666–67), she wrote Women’s Speaking Justified, a spirited Bible-based defense of women’s* ministry.

Variously loved or loathed by factions in Quakerism, Margaret Fell was committed to the life of the Spirit, freedom of worship, and justice, as her writings make clear.

Feminist Theology in Africa. “The way forward is a ‘new community of men and women,’ not reversal; participation, not takeover or handover. Feminism in theology springs from a conviction that a theology of relationships might contribute to bring us closer to human life as God desires it.” These words, written by the “mother of African theology,” Mercy Amba Oduyoye, remain relevant to African Feminist theology today.

African women theologies and biblical hermeneutics are important not only because sub-Saharan Africa has become more Christian than Europe, but also because African women theologians have published much. An attempt to capture all African women’s theologies (theories and/or praxes) under the rubric “Feminist theologies” is problematic, because these women have not yet adopted a uniform designation for their work. The label “African women’s theologies” better captures what these women do and say in women-identified God-talk and in their theological efforts (theories and/or praxes) at the heart of their constant struggle to seek affirmation as human beings of equal worth despite patriarchal structures, be they social, religious, cultural, economic, or political. African women theologians, some of whom founded the Circle* of Concerned African Women Theologians (or the Circle), participated in the women’s Commission of the Ecumenical* Association of Third World Theologians (EATWOT) in the late 1970s. The Circle was formed (1989, Accra, Ghana) because of these women's painful observation that EATWOT theologies did not take African women's experiences seriously. Since its inception, the Circle has provided space to African women theologians for networking, mentoring, attending academic meetings, and writing. Established in the Anglophone, Lusophone, and Francophone African contexts, Circle members hold continental meetings every five years. Circle chapters in different regions cater to local needs. Since the publication of their first book, The Will to Arise: Women, Tradition and the Church in Africa (1992), Circle members have published more than 100 books. The various strands of African women's Feminist theology, i.e. Circle and non-Circle ones, written or oral, focus on the critique of patriarchy as manifested in the African culture and religion, in the church, and in the neocolonial imperial structures that continue to have a negative impact on women's lives. In addition, in aural African contexts, including many nonliterate women and female children, although not authored, African Feminist theology is either orally articulated in various churches and women's organizations or lived in women's daily lives in private and public spaces.

Although relatively recent compared with its Western counterpart, Feminist theology in Africa has matured, in relative terms, more quickly. However, as can be expected owing to the smaller number of African women theologians and biblical scholars available, in many parts of the continent Feminist theology is still taking root and sprouting. See also THEOLOGY AS HUMAN UNDERTAKING CLUSTER: AFRICAN WOMEN THEOLOGIANS DOING THEOLOGY BY MAKING CONNECTIONS.

Feminist Theology in Asia. Asian Feminist theology emerged in the late 1970s, as Christian women related the Bible and faith to Asian sociopolitical and religious-cultural realities after political independence. Associations of theologically trained women were formed in different parts of Asia, while ecumenical networks such as the Ecumenical* Association of Third World Theologians and the Asian Women's Resource Center for Theology and Culture facilitated exchange and dialogue.

The Bible occupies a pivotal place in church life, and Asian Feminist theologians emphasize the liberating heritage of the Bible by lifting up biblical women such as Ruth and Naomi, Hannah, Miriam, Deborah, and Mary, the mother of Jesus, as role models. Some have used Asian myths, stories, and legends to reinterpret biblical stories and the faith traditions. They have insisted that Western culture does not have a monopoly over Christianity, which must interact with different cultures of the world. Because Christians make up less than 3% of the Asian population, an important concern is interreligious dialogue and solidarity with other women working for justice*.

Asian Feminist theologians have presented different images of Jesus*. Filipino Feminist theologians stress Jesus as a fully liberated human being, whose prophetic ministry challenged the status quo and transgressed the religious and ethnic boundaries of his time. Korean feminists appropriated their Shamanistic* tradition and reinterpret Jesus as a priest of han, a feeling of hopelessness and indignation against unjustifiable suffering. Indian feminists speak of Jesus as the embodiment of Shakti, the creative Hindu feminine principle. Others have presented organic metaphors for Christ and postcolonial interpretations of Jesus.

Instead of a docile and obedient mother, Mary is seen as a co-redeemer for human salvation, a model of true discipleship, and a fully liberated human being. Mary challenges the cultural norms and partakes in God's mission with a profound historical sense of the destiny of her people. Asian Feminist theologians challenge the churches to recognize women as full members of the body of Christ and equal partners in ministry. They seek to develop an ecofeminist* spirituality that is life affirming, respects the sacredness of the earth, and empowers women to struggle against the exploitation of the global economic order, sex tourism, militarism, and gender oppression. In an age of globalization,

Asian Feminist theologians condemn the structural sin* of oppression* brought by the market economy and search for alternative orderings of the world that value women's sexuality* and dignity and justice for the marginalized*. KWOK PUI-LAN takes into account the historical context in which women live in this region and, above all, their poverty* and marginalization*, not only as women, but also as members of a society that has been historically marginalized by the imposition of colonialism* under the capitalist system. Therefore, Latin American Feminist theology focused, and still focuses, on the triad characterizing the domination inflicted on Latin American women (class, gender, and ethnicity) and on an ecumenical approach seeking to retrieve non-canonical and/or forgotten traditions of feminine wisdom*. Latin American Feminist theological reflections are also rooted in and nourished by pastoral work.

Feminist theologians Elsa Tamez, Ibone Gebara, María Pilar Aquino, and Mary Judith Ressa identify three phases of Latin American Feminist theology: (1) the 1970s, during which there was little differentiation from the issues and perspectives of Liberation* theology; (2) the 1980s, during which there was an increased focus on gender issues and problems affecting women as women (vs. those affecting them as, e.g., poor or as Latin American); and (c) the 1990s to the present, a period that has seen a full-fledged antipatriarchal stance and radical gender perspectives in language, theology, and biblical hermeneutics. This last phase includes holistic ecofeminism* (Ivone Gebara and Con-Spirando), queer* theory (Marcella Althaus-Reid), positions legitimizing heterodox views challenging traditional Christian anthropology* and cosmology, appreciation of insights coming from African and Amerindian spiritual and mythical traditions, and even some forms of post*-Christian spirituality.

Feminist theologians have created communal spaces of reflection and fellowship. Some of the prominent groups are Con-Spirando in Chile* (with a journal on Latin American ecofeminism), Talitha Cumi in Peru*, and Gaia in Venezuela*. One trend in Latin American Feminist theology reconceptualizes the fundamental themes of traditional theology from an ecofeminist* perspective; another trend is concerned with developing a feminist biblical hermeneutics (Carmina Navia Velasco, Alicia Winters, Tania Sampaio, Elsa Tamez, Irene Foulkes, and the biblical journal RIBLA of Costa Rica). Ecofeminism in Latin America by Mary Judith Ressa includes reflections by several of the women working on these issues: Agamdilza Sales de Oliveira, Marcia Moya, Coca Trillini, Sandra Duarte, Fanny Geymonat-Pantelís, Sandra Raquew, Graciela Pujol, Alcira Agreda, Clara Luz Ajo, Doris Muñoz, Gladys Perentelli, and Silvia Regina de Lima Silva. Teolgandas, a group of women theologians based in Buenos Aires, follows a more orthodox perspective. Each group has a surprisingly unique, beautiful theological voice, denoting the richness, strength, and depth of insight of the movement.

ANA MARÍA BIDEGAIN and JUAN SANCHEZ

Feminist Theology in North America, as a formal academic field, emerged in 1968 with the publication of Mary Daly's The Church and the Second Sex, a powerful critique of the second-class status of women in Roman Catholicism. Reflecting the broader movement of "second-wave" feminism of which they were a part, early Feminist theologians claimed women's experience as a primary authoritative source. From that ground, Daly and others unmasked the damage done to women by traditional theological ideas. As Daly put it in her second book, Beyond God the Father, "If God is male, then the male is God." Feminist theologians not only critiqued male dominance in church and society, but argued that masculinist bias also shaped gender roles and underwrote environmental exploitation. Understanding sin* as pride and salvation* as self-giving love* encouraged women to sacrifice their own ambitions and desires for others, as Valerie Saiving and Judith Plaskow argued. As a corrective, they claimed self-abnegation as a distinctively feminine form of sin. Meanwhile, other Feminist theologians drew on neglected sources in Western religious traditions (including neopaganism) to cultivate alternative images of God, a project carried forward by Sallie McFague and Elizabeth Johnson. Catherine Keller and Laurel Schneider have moved beyond reimagining God to reimagining the divine. Other loci taken up for critique and reconstruction over the years include Christology* and atonement* theory (Brock, Joh, and Ray).

Feminist theology continues to reflect larger trends in women's studies. In the 1980s and 1990s, Feminist theology, like other fields, came under fire for its own exclusive tendencies, grounded in the content given to "women's experience." Womanist* (African* American Feminist) and Mujerista* (Latina Feminist) theologians argued persuasively that Feminist theologians framed their understanding of women's oppression – and thus their agenda for liberation – in terms of white middle-class women's needs and ambitions (Williams and Isasi-Diaz). Living at the intersection of racism*, sexism*, and classism* means women of color face distinctive forms of oppression that white Feminist theologians failed to take into account. Another important trend in Feminist theology prompted largely by attempts to address more adequately women's diversity has been the turn to theory. In addition to theories of race, gender, and sexuality, Feminist theologians have found postcolonial* and poststructuralist* theories useful analytical and constructive tools (Armour, Fulkerson, Joh, Keller, Kwok, and Welch). Feminist theologians are also increasingly engaged in work that crosses the lines that separate religious traditions (Farley, Joh, and Kwok).

ELLEN T. ARMOUR

Feminist Theology in North America: African American. See LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER: WOMANIST; WOMANIST AND AFRICAN AMERICAN THEOLOGIES.

Feminist Theology in North America: Latina. Focusing on women who are poor, Feminist theology is a critical reflection of the religious experiences and thought of peoples and communities living in the USA whose shared values and understandings express Latin American cultural and religious traits. It seeks to contribute in feminist religious terms both to sustaining the struggles to change kyriarchal* silencing, marginalization, and domination, and to actualizing the Christian vision of justice* for a renewed creation (see New Creation). Comprising diverse approaches from particular theological fields, the conceptual framework of Latina Feminist theology articulates the following shared methodological features.

Critical Analysis. Meeting the aspirations of subordinated women for human dignity, self-worth, and freedom from poverty entails recovering the historical legacy of Latina women's initiatives against colonization* and dehumanization. It also entails empowering the voices and agency of women today through conscientization*, which identifies oppressive* situations caused by multidimensional, multiplicative, and interrelated systems of domination and discloses viable paths for transformative theological interpretation.

"Border Crosser" Hermeneutics. While fostering a consciousness of being historical subjects of change, Latinas move across symbolic and physical boundaries, becoming themselves "border bodies." As such, whether found in biblical narratives, in religious traditions, or in daily life, theological interpretation brings together plural forms of wisdom to affirm new ways of convivencia (living together).

Commitment to Transformation. Recognizing diversity and difference as characteristics of human beings, this theology values dialogue*, relationality*, and interdependence as crucial to overcoming social and religious hostilities. In shaping alternatives of justice* for humanity and the world, this theology affirms shared intellectual practices to provide helpful interpretations of the Christian faith and supports common religious, ethical, and political spaces to renew spirituality and hope. The critical adoption of interdisciplinary, interreligious, and intercultural approaches into theological elaboration is an asset of this theology, but other pressing issues remain insufficiently addressed, such as women's sexual health, sexuality* and power, and radically changing power structures of institutional churches and religions. See also LATINO/A THEOLOGIES.

MARÍA PILAR AQUINO

Feminist Theology in North America: Mujerista.

Mujerista theology is a liberative praxis* – a reflective action that contributes to the liberation of Latinas and their communities in the USA. Mujerista theology enables Latinas by helping them to develop strong moral agency, clarifying the importance of who they are and the value of what they think and do. It helps Latinas affirm God's presence and revelation in their communities and daily lives. It exposes the many oppressive societal structures that are offensive to God because they hide God's presence in the world. Mujerista theology emphasizes Latinas' preferred future, providing glimpses of the "kin-dom"* of God, the family of God, in the midst of present social, economic, and political realities. The source of Mujerista theology is Latinas' lived experience, viewing Christian theology as "faith seeking understanding," its age-old definition. Mujerista theology does not exclude church teachings, biblical traditions, or popular religions with their mixture of Christian, African, and Amerindian religions. It is a communal theology based on Latinas' reflection on their religious understandings and practices and the role these play in their daily struggle for fullness of life and liberation. Because of its recent development and the small number of Latina theologians, Mujerista theology is but a small daughter born of the hope* of Latina women for their liberation* and the liberation of all peoples. Yet as a small daughter, Mujerista theology participates in the family of liberation and women-centered theologies that have emerged around the world since 1960. By its serious critique of Latino culture* as well as of the U.S. dominant culture from the perspective of gender, race and ethnicity, and class, Mujerista theology seeks to have an impact on main-line theologies that implicitly or explicitly support what is normative in church and society without taking into consideration Latinas' faith traditions and practices.

Feminist Theology in Pacific Islands and Australia.

The Pacific region covers a broad area, stretching from Papua New Guinea in the north, to Hawaii in the east, to Australia* and New* Zealand in the south, and to New Caledonia in the west. European colonization began in the 1700s, and Christianity was a major force in introducing indigenous peoples to European culture, mainly through the establishment of church missions. There is widespread evidence that before European colonization, busy trade routes within the Pacific tied together strong, and highly varied, indigenous cultures.

Predictably, church mission* most often involved the degradation of local religions – often very violently – in the establishment of a European-style Christianity. Nevertheless, Christianity in the Pacific today reflects more often than not a blending of traditional rites and beliefs with various Christian theologies and church practices, and a high percentage of Pacific Islanders are Christian.

Feminist theology is relatively new in this region and is certainly characterized by a wide diversity of theologies, reflecting engagement with various Christian traditions and cultures. However, women across the Pacific have been involved in reevaluating their religious and theological traditions from a variety of cultural and feminist perspectives. There have been numerous forums and publications in which such feminist theologizing has been communicated. Two examples are the EATWOT (Ecumenical* Association of Third World Theologians) consultation "Pacific Women and Theology" and "Weaving Women and Theology," a second consultation of "Weavers," the women's subcommittee of the South Pacific Association of Theological Schools. A special issue on Pacific women was published in Vol. 15 of the Pacific Journal of Theology (1996), edited by Lisa Meo. The Weavers writer's workshop in April 2001 resulted in the 2003 publication of Weavings: Women Doing Theology in Oceania.

Feminist theology has been a dynamic discourse in Australia and New Zealand among nonindigenous women; there have been many publications, conferences, and organizations, which have resulted in changes to patriarchal church practices, such as the ordination* of women in Anglican and Uniting churches, changes in sexist liturgical language, and the participation of women in liturgies and church institutions. More recently, Women Scholars in Religion and Theology (WSRT) has been networking between nonindigenous and indigenous women in the Pacific to set up forums and publications around issues in Feminist theology. The WSRT publishes an online journal, Seachanges (wsrt.com.au/seachanges), and holds conferences every four years.

ELAINE M. WAINWRIGHT

Feminist Theology in Western Europe.

The Yearbook of the European Society of Women in Theological Research (from 1993) and its annual bibliographies provide a route into the spectrum of Feminist theology across linguistic, cultural, and ecclesiastical differences. Differences between countries, however, can be profound, depending on access to education in theology/religious studies. In, e.g., Ireland*, Feminist theology is in its infancy, whereas in Italy* researchers on women in the history of the church (e.g. Ricci) and theologians such as Cettina Militello (who have organized international colloquiums since 1985) have undertaken pioneering work. A European "new feminism," in constructive dialogue with Pope John* Paul II's insights in particular, discusses the positions that may advance a Christian case for the full human dignity of women (Schumacher). Writing as a Norwegian Roman Catholic, Kari-Elisabeth Børresen has since 1968 challenged some of the foundations of inherited Christian anthropology* and, in France*, Elisabeth Behr-Sigel voiced the profound concerns of Orthodox women about their ministry in the church, with inevitable implications for theology (Behr-Sigel) (see Women's Ordination Cluster: The Orthodox Church). Feminist theology in the Netherlands* has made inroads since the 1970s, and the Dutch research program on religion and gender (e.g. de Haardt) relates closely to a wider "women and faith" network across the denominations. In the Federal Republic of Germany*, Feminist theology has also developed since the 1970s, especially in connection with biblical studies in the Evangelical churches and faculties (Moltmann-Wendel), and major work has been achieved on the study of Christian origins (Schottroff, Schroer, and Wacker). Some of the best-known biblical interpreters now working in North America were originally from the Federal Republic. In the UK, some provocative new writers have emerged (Althaus Reid and Beattie) with no inhibitions about the re-evaluation of Christianity's core symbolism and doctrines. ANN LOADES

Fénelon, François de Salignac de la Mothe

(1651–1715), Catholic cleric, writer, proponent of Quietism*. Fénelon earned a reputation as tutor to Louis XIV's grandson (1689) and as author of Treatise on the Education of Girls (1687) and Telemachus (1699), a novel about how to rule wisely and create a productive society. The novel's classicism suggested a biblical frame of reference and an indictment of Louis's absolutism.

At the court, Fénelon met Jeanne Guyon*, a lay spiritual adviser and mystic*. As bishop of Cambray (1695), he defended Madame Guyon*, the subject of an official ecclesiastical inquiry into Quietism*. She advocated contemplative* prayer, abnegation of the self, union with the divine will, inner repose, acceptance of suffering and persecution*, and disinterested or pure love*. Fénelon engaged his former mentor Bossuet* in a public debate over this "new" mysticism*. Fénelon's treatise Explication of the Maxims of the Saints (1697) maintained that the doctrine of pure love belonged to a continuous tradition of church teaching. Madame Guyon was imprisoned in the Bastille, and Fénelon was exiled to his bishopric. The pope (following Louis XIV) condemned the Explication (1699); Fénelon submitted to papal authority. In exile, he achieved mythic status for his acts of charity. Posthumously, his letters of spiritual direction were influential. PATRICIA A. WARD

Feudal System, a form of social, political, and economic order based on mutual oaths between a lord and a vassal. The lord granted land and the people who labored on it (a fief) to a member of the warrior class (the vassal) in exchange for a promise of military service. The vassal then had a similar relation to his people. The system was regularized in the empire of Charlemagne* and continued for many centuries in Europe and its colonies (encomienda and hacienda in the Spanish colonies [see Reductions]). Feudalism did not prevail everywhere in Europe; there were always some areas in which there were farmers or city dwellers who developed institutions of self-government. To some extent, the feudal pattern of relationship (lord-vassal) became reflected in the Christian conception of the God-human relationship (e.g. Atonement #2).

Feuerbach, Ludwig (1804–72), atheistic critic of Christianity and father of projection theories of religion*. After studying theology in Heidelberg, he transferred to Berlin to study philosophy with Hegel*. He was fired from his first academic position at Erlangen for his book Thoughts on Death and Immortality (1830), which espoused a form of pantheism* and rejected a personal deity and personal immortality. He left academia to become an independent scholar. In the 1830s, he sided with the Young Hegelians for whom Hegel's idealism was incompatible with Christian doctrine. He became famous in the 1840s for The Essence of Christianity and writings calling for a "philosophy of the future" that repudiated idealism and embraced a naturalistic humanism founded on I-Thou relationships (see I-Thou Relation) and social solidarity. After 1859, bankruptcy forced him to live out his life with the financial aid of friends.

In The Essence of Christianity, Feuerbach argued that in religion the human being projects or objectifies his or her own image of the self and then turns this objectified image into a subject for whom human beings are objects. Deities are objectifications of human nature, the Christian deity being the objectification of the essential human attributes of reason*, will*, and love*. The imagination clings to this projection because it expresses the deepest human desire for recognition and immortality. But the idea of God* as a separate being is contradictory, and if one follows the inner logic of the Christian doctrine of the Incarnation*, one will be led to an atheistic* humanism because this doctrine states that God sacrificed God's own nature out of love for humankind.

Feuerbach continued to refine his theory of religion, increasingly stressing that the origins of religion lay in the feeling of dependency on nature and our desire to transcend its necessities (especially death) by humanizing it. See also ATHEISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY.

Fideism, emphasis on faith* at the expense of reasoning; the term usually has a negative connotation.

Fiji. The Christian experience in Fiji can be divided into two major phases. The first entailed the proselytization of the native Fijians by 19th-c. missionaries who came from the United* Kingdom, Australia*, and New* Zealand beginning in 1835. Under one of these missionaries, John Hunt, a Methodist theologian, Fijians converted from a polytheism that may have recognized the concept of a supreme being among many nature gods. Hunt's influence was instrumental in the "submission to Jehovah" of the Fijian chief Ratu Seru Epenisa Cakobau and subsequently, with the assistance of Tongan and Fijian teachers and other sympathetic chiefs, the conversion of all Fijians by 1900. Over these years, the Methodists* (65%) were joined in Fiji by Roman Catholics, Anglicans*, and Seventh*-day Adventists.

The second phase of Christianity in Fiji (20th–21st c.) was influenced by the arrival of the Indo-Fijian population (1879–1920), indentured through colonialism* to work in the sugar industry; their numbers eventually grew to 45% of the total population. Christian churches worked diligently among the Indians, yet have gained relatively few converts. Preserving community identity in a foreign and sometimes unwelcoming environment (without secure access to land resources) has been a rallying point for Hinduism* and Islam* in Fiji. Yet Indo-Fijians generally accept the education and welfare facilities, such as orphanages, that Christians provide.

Social and political change arising from urbanization also influenced modern Christianity in Fiji. Although today's Fijians still celebrate their faith with devotion and passion, they retain a predominantly exclusivist, Sabbatarian* heritage, averse to liberalizing influences and ecumenicism*, which is a weak and divided movement within Fiji. This conservative Christian expression applies equally to the newer Pentecostal*/Charismatic* religious groups that have proliferated especially among urban dwellers struggling to cope with Western modes of life. Meanwhile, the established churches – notably the influential Methodists – are slow to address social issues central to effective urban mission, such as the amelioration of poverty*. Fiji's four "coups" since 1987, provoked mainly by grievances expressed through a Fijian-dominated army, have intensified the image of Christianity as inimical to the interests of the Indo-Fijian minority and their religious beliefs. For this reason alone, interfaith dialogue* is critical to the future social stability of Fiji.

Statistics: Population (2000): 817,000. ANDREW THORNLEY

Filioque. The doctrine that the Spirit* proceeds from the Father and the Son (Lat Filioque) rather than from the Father alone (John 15:26 and the Niceno*-Constantinopolitan Creed).

The West, following Augustine*, held this doctrine and, at the Council of Braga (675), officially augmented the Nicene Creed with these words. This form of the Creed was widely disseminated in Charlemagne's* Frankish empire, but was condemned by the Eastern Orthodox* Church and by the pope. The Filioque was finally inserted into the Roman creed in 1014, at a time marked by tensions with the East.

The Filioque remains a major point of dissension. The Western churches insist that the giving of the Spirit through Christ is a manifestation of intradivine relations. The Eastern Church acknowledges that the Spirit is given through Christ (John 20:22), but only in connection with the Father's creation*, redemption*, and sanctification*. But saying that Christ gives the Spirit blurs the distinction between persons of the Trinity* and implicitly denies that in the Incarnation* the person of the Son was fully united to human nature. The Anglican bishops have permitted the removal of the Filioque from the Nicene Creed.

The Filioque implies that the Spirit comes with or through the Word* (Scripture, proclamation, sacraments) and thus through the church and its ministries. Is this the case? Or is the Spirit "free," poured out independently of an institutional church?

EUGENE TESELLE

Finland. In predominantly Lutheran Finland, Western and Eastern Christianity have met through history. Christianity in Finland has long been associated with two "folk* churches," the Lutheran Church and the Orthodox Church.

Christianity arrived in Finland from both the West (Roman Catholic) and the East (Orthodox) in the 11th c. In the 16th c., the primarily Catholic Finland became Lutheran with Finnish Michael Agricola* (1510–57) as its reformer. The arrival of small religious minorities (Jews, Muslim Tatars), new Christian influences (Methodism, Evangelical Free Church, Pentecostalism), and an increasing number of nonreligious persons changed the religious scene (late 19th–early 20th c.). National independence (1917) made it possible to pass the Freedom of Religion Act (1922), renewed in 2003 to take into account the increasingly multireligious scene. The official ties between the state and the Lutheran Church have been gradually severed. The state is neutral on religious questions.

Finnish spirituality has been marked by five revivals* within the established Lutheran Church. The four 19th-c. revivals had Pietist* roots – with one of them, Laestadianism, also spreading in Sweden and Norway. The Neo-Pietist Movement (which originated after World War II) has close links with the Anglo-Saxon Evangelical* revival. Since the 1970s, the Charismatic* Movement has gained a foothold in the Lutheran and other Protestant churches.

Although Lutherans are not frequent churchgoers, church-officiated life cycle rites (baptism, confirmation, wedding, burial) are highly regarded. New types of church services (Thomas* Mass) have become popular, along with the summer festivals of the revivalist movements, which tens of thousands attend.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church has nine dioceses (c500 parishes). Women have long played a central role in church social services. In 1986 women's ordination was accepted. The autonomous Orthodox Archbishopric of Finland (three dioceses) has belonged since 1923 to the Patriarchate of Constantinople. The clergy of both folk churches are trained at theological faculties of state universities (Helsinki, Åbo, Joensuu). Free churches have their own theological schools. Religious education in one's confession is provided in primary and secondary schools. The Finnish church religiosity serves as civil religion: church services are a part of the opening of Parliament and of Independence Day celebrations.

The Lutheran Church, an active defender of a "welfare society" and an advocate of solidarity with the poor of the world, has promoted cooperation between Lutheran and Anglican churches (Porvoo* Declaration).

Statistics: Population (2000): 5.2 million (M); Christians, 4.8 M, 86% (Lutherans, 4.35 M, 84.2%; Orthodox, 0.05 M, 1%; other Protestants and Roman Catholics, 0.04 M, 0.08%); nonreligious, 0.68 M, 13%; Muslims and Jews, 0.2%. (Source: 2000 census.)

Finney, Charles Grandison (1792–1875), revival leader; president (1851–66), professor of systematic theology (1835–58), and professor of pastoral theology (1835–75) at Oberlin College. The most famous 19th-c. revival* preacher, Finney developed beliefs and practices that still exert a powerful influence across multiple strands of Christianity.

Finney grew up with transformations in the wake of the American Revolution (see United States): westward migrations, the disestablishment of churches, democratic sentiments, an expanding industrial and consumer economy, and new anxieties concerning gender and race. Finney developed "new measures" for revival that complemented and deepened these shifts. He led mass revivals throughout the northeastern and mid-Atlantic states (notably in Rochester, New York, 1830–31) and in Great Britain (1849–50, 1859–60).

A descendant of old New England families, Finney radicalized the New* Haven theology's emphasis on free will (see Freedom, Free Will) and later blended it with Wesleyan* notions of perfection*. Converted in a revival, Finney adapted practices developed by itinerant and camp* meeting preachers – preachers who were lay and ordained, male and female, African American and European American. Trained as a lawyer, Finney cultivated an orderly but expressive style that appealed to an emerging white middle class. Finney made the ecstatic repeatable and the sensational respectable.

Finney's sense of holiness* required both personal conversion* and social transformation. He led movements for temperance*, educational* reform, new opportunities for women, and the abolition of slavery*. Finney's synthesis became the dominant form of Protestant Christianity in the USA. This synthesis began to break down (late 19th c.) into several movements. Finney's stress on second baptism and perfection informed the Pentecostal* Movement. His call for social reform flowed through the Social* Gospel Movement into mainline Protestantism. His demand for personal conversion and mass revival influenced Dwight Moody*, Billy Graham, and Evangelicalism* more broadly.

TED A. SMITH

Firmilian (d268), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia. An admirer of Origen* (perhaps through Gregory* Thaumaturgus), he went to Caesarea in Palestine to hear him. He corresponded with Cyprian* during the controversy over the lapsed*, supporting him against Rome. He presided over the first council that condemned Paul* of Samosata (264) and died on the way to the second (268).

Flacius, Matthias Illyricus (1520–75), a student of Luther* and Melanchthon*, first leader of the "Gnesio*-Lutheran Movement." Italo-Croatian by birth, Flacius came to Wittenberg (1541) in a spiritual crisis, from which Luther freed him. Instructor of Hebrew at Wittenberg (1544), he resigned in protest against what he perceived as Melanchthon's compromise with the papacy. Flacius's ongoing rancorous exchanges with Melanchthon and his radical interpretation of Luther's thought helped organize opponents of Melanchthon's policy into the "Gnesio-Lutheran group. He taught theology at Jena (1557–61) but otherwise remained a private scholar, pioneering Protestant hermeneutics (Clavis Scripturae Sacrae, 1567) and biblical studies (Glossa Novi Testamenti, 1570 texts) and experimenting with new forms of church history that critiqued papal claims (he composed Catalogus Testium Veritatis [1556] and planned though did not write the first Protestant church history, the Magdeburg Centuries [1559–74]). In Magdeburg he led the opposition to the "Interim*" of Charles V (1548). This led to Flacius's doctrine of status confessionis*: when indifferent matters are made essential, they are no longer indifferent and must be opposed. Flacius's assertion that original* sin was the “substance” of sinners and reshaped them in the “image of Satan” alienated most of his followers during the last 15 years of his life.

Flagellants, those who scourged themselves, often in public procession, in penance* for the sins of the world; first noticed in 1260, they were possibly influenced by the ideas of Joachim* of Flora.

Flavian (d449), patriarch of Constantinople, who aroused controversy in 448 when he secured the excommunication* of Eutyches* for his Monophysite* views about Christ. The Second Council of Ephesus* (449) was called under imperial pressure; Flavian died after a severe beating (apparently by three deacons from Alexandria) and was declared a heretic. He was vindicated by the Council of Chalcedon* (451).

Flavia Vitalia, a freeborn, married (matrona) presbyter*, was the agent of the church for the sale of a burial plot, according to the 425 CE inscription found in Salona, Dalmatia (present-day Solin, Croatia): “Under our Lord Theodosius, consul for the eleventh time, and Valentinian, most noble man of Caesar, I, Theodosius, bought [a tomb] from the matron Flavia Vitalia, the holy presbyter, for three golden solids.” Though “presbyter” can designate a presbyter’s wife, that is not likely here: “holy” is a common title for clergy, and she, not her husband, represents the church for the sale of property. It is impossible to say what other presbyteral functions, e.g. sacramental, she exercised. See also LETA.

Flesh, in the NT, a characterization of the person driven by human, earthly concerns of any kind or, in both the NT and theological tradition, the human body influenced by carnal lust, along with all disordered impulses, including “spiritual” sins of curiosity and pride.

Flood (the) is presented in Genesis as a divine act of punishment, destroying life on earth. Noah* and his family, along with animals, survive in the ark built according to God’s directions (Gen 6:11–8:19). Augustine* followed Philo* in allegorically linking the ark to one’s body, Noah to the righteous mind, and the waters to the cleansing of one’s soul. Medieval commentators noted the flood’s connection to baptism* (cf. 1 Pet 3:20–21). Contemporary scholars often parallel more than 200 ancient extrabiblical flood stories. The flood portrays the saving, judging, and patient character of God in redemptive history.

JEFFRY C. DAVIS

Florence, Council of (1438–45), also named Ferrara–Florence (it met one year in Ferrara). It was called by the pope as a continuation of, and substitute for, the Conciliarist* Council of Basel* (1431–49), held north of the Alps and controlled by the emperor Sigismund. The chief purpose was to consider reunion with the Greek Orthodox* Church at the request of the emperor John VIII Palaeologos, who attended the Council along with the patriarch of Constantinople and other bishops and scholars.

The chief doctrinal issues for the Greeks were the Filioque, unleavened bread, purgatory*, and papal supremacy. Eventually these issues were resolved, at least verbally. Differences of ritual and canon* law were more easily agreed upon, and the Decree of Union was signed July 5, 1539, under Brunelleschi’s dome in the Florence duomo. Mark Eugenikos* of Ephesus refused to sign and organized opposition to the reunion in the East, where the union was repudiated.

The Council adopted similar statements intended to achieve reunion with the Armenians* (1439) and the Syriac* Orthodox (polemically nicknamed “Jacobites*”), Copts*, and Ethiopians* (1442), leading to reunions with portions of the Armenian, Syriac, and Chaldaean churches. See also UNIATE CHURCHES.

EUGENE TESELLE

Florovsky, Georges (1893–1979), theologian, historian, Orthodox priest; pioneering ecumenist with the World* Council of Churches. Born in Kirovograd, raised in Odessa, Russia*, he studied philosophy (Odessa and Prague, 1911–23), fled to Bulgaria* (1920), and then taught in Europe (1923–48) and North America (1948–79). Reacting to Sergei Bulgakov’s* “sophiology,” Florovsky developed an Orthodox theology called “Christian Hellenism” or “neopatristic synthesis.”

Florovsky taught that the Orthodox Church providentially “baptized” Hellenism*, and this Byzantine* Greek heritage was expressed in the fathers* who witnessed to, and taught concerning, the Church’s experience of Christ. They are authoritative because they bear the “catholic mind” or identity of the Orthodox Church – Christ himself “in head and body.” This patristic mindset is the Church’s “living tradition” – scriptural*, eucharistic*, and charismatic* in character – embracing both continuity and growth (see Patristic Thought in Orthodox Christianity). The Orthodox Church is identified with the creedal Una sancta, but beyond its canonical limits exist separated Christians who are called to return to it.

Orthodox Theology, for Florovsky, is called to be patristic* because it follows the patristic spirit and vision; neo-patristic because the fathers help us face our current problems and queries; and a contemporary synthesis because we respond patristically to our age.

Florovsky's theological vision became normative in Eastern Orthodoxy* through such students as Alexander Schmemmann, John Meyendorff, John Romanides, and John Zizioulas. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES.

BRANDON GALLAHER

Florus of Lyon (d c860), deacon who served several archbishops of Lyon as a scholar. His excerpts from earlier commentaries on the epistles of Paul, especially from Augustine, were influential throughout the Middle Ages. During the controversy on predestination*, he defended Gottschalk* against John* Scotus Erigena.

Focolare (Italian, "hearth"), lay movement, primarily Roman Catholic, whose watchword is Christ's prayer "that they all be one" (John 17:21); thus it encourages a "spirituality of unity" and dialogue across religious and cultural lines. See also ITALY.

Folk Christian Practices. See POPULAR CHRISTIAN PRACTICES CLUSTER.

Folk Churches in the Nordic Countries are the former "Lutheran state* churches" that progressively adopted democratic church rules when democracy and freedom of religion were introduced (19th–20th c.). Despite their new freedom of choice, the majority of people in these countries have remained members of these churches, which have made considerable contributions to the cultural and political coherence of the Nordic countries.

The theology of the Folk Church in Denmark, Finland, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden was developed primarily for the people as an interpretation of this historical development rather than as a religious critique of institutionalized forms of Christian practice. Yet since affiliation, church buildings, and ceremonies are no longer connected with the specific theological belief of an institution, in each case there are tensions between the authority of the Folk Church and the people's experience. For example, social coherence demanded the Church's commitment to building and sustaining a welfare state, but implied the repression of different, more local religious expressions, especially among the Sami people (the Lapland people), an issue that is being addressed. Overall, women have supported the Church; but the Church has not supported women. Consequently, women had to "cross gender borders" in a variety of ways, among them by seeking international and ecumenical cooperation. As a result, more and more women are ordained as priests and bishops (see Women's Ordination Cluster: In Western Europe). Women have also created their own rituals.

The Folk Church in each of the Nordic countries came into conflict with religious freedom (implemented last in Sweden*, 1951) because it continues to have a privileged status. Both Finland* and Norway* substantially invest in the Christian upbringing of the youth. Sweden has chosen another path; the teaching for confirmation is officially regarded as a resource for young people in interpreting their lives and in their existential choices.

Folk Church practices are closely linked to life rituals: baptism, confirmation, weddings, and funerals. In each case, ritual and ordinary life merge, shaping most of the population's conception of what should take place at different stages of life. However, Folk Church rites are often interpreted quite freely by the individual. Yet the link between context and church is constantly reshaped. For example, women's full participation in the life of the Folk Church has highlighted issues such as violence against women, the global economical crisis from a gender perspective, and the consequences of racism for women.

A clear distinction between church practices and folk practices cannot be drawn in the Nordic countries. In each case, the Folk Church is increasingly looked upon as a supplier of services in response to people's needs and less as a hierarchical and doctrinal authority. However, issues concerning underprivileged groups tend to be neglected.

Fontevrault, Order of, a "double order" of monks and nuns founded by Robert of Arbrissel (d1116), with rigorous observance of the Benedictine* Rule. Its houses were principally in France*; the order was suppressed during the French* Revolution, but an order for women was revived in 1806.

Foot-Washing. Washing a guest's feet was a gesture of hospitality* (Luke 7:44). Jesus humbly washed the disciples'* feet at the Last* Supper (John 13:5). It became a practice for bishops* and the pope* to wash the feet of 12 persons under their care on Maundy* Thursday, reflecting the new commandment that the disciples love one another (John 13:34).

Foreigners. See REFUGEES AS A THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT AND AN ETHICAL ISSUE.

Foreknowledge, God's knowledge of things still to occur, considered to be "present knowledge" because God's knowledge is timeless.

Forgiveness. See PENANCE AND FORGIVENESS.

Forgiveness, Christian Discourses of. Christian discourses proclaiming the promise of God's unconditional forgiveness*, commonly viewed as the "good news" of the gospel, have several possible emphases. The message that every human being remains within God's loving care and concern is profoundly important for communities torn apart by interethnic strife, terrorist regimes, and atrocities. However God's forgiveness might be understood, it is for everyone, no matter how wicked or depraved (see Justification, Theological Views and Practices, Cluster: A Central Doctrine for Western Christianity; Lutheranism Cluster: Martin Luther).

But this promise of God's unconditional forgiveness turns to "cheap grace"* (Dietrich Bonhoeffer*) when practiced in political contexts that discount personal accountability and promote a culture of forgetfulness and premature closure. The Christian emphasis on forgiveness may have dubious side effects when designed to prevent confrontation with painful political and personal truths and to maintain stability during tumultuous regime changes (e.g. Germany*, South* Africa, Chile*, Rwanda*, Guatemala*, Argentina*). Furthermore, forgiveness as a supreme Christian virtue can lead to moral paralysis when used to silence victims' cries for justice* and restitution. Similarly, the gospel's numerous admonitions against judgment, intended to induce spiritual humility*, can be deployed to derail criminal prosecutions and to prevent historical truthfulness. Such a lopsided emphasis on forgiveness is rooted in theological anti-Judaism by (implicitly) contrasting the Christian belief in God's love* and mercy* with the Jewish belief in God's wrath and commandment to do justice, although the dialectic between God's love and wrath is fundamental to biblical God-language (see Anger or Wrath of God). Because of Christian calls for reconciliation* without restitution, most perpetrators of state-sanctioned crimes feel politically, legally, morally, and often religiously justified, and see no need for remorse or repentance* despite the frequently gruesome nature of their deeds. Such Christian discourses of forgiveness "demoralize" both victims and perpetrators.

Another kind of Christian discourse of forgiveness takes into account that the condemnation of evil* is a biblical commandment and not (always) attributable to hasty, haughty, or hypocritical attitudes. The biblical practice of justice* requires empathy, love, and sustained support for the perpetrators by insisting on treating them as moral* agents endowed with freedom* and the ability to choose between good and evil and to undergo change. Far from dehumanizing perpetrators, insistence on repentance and restitution as necessary parts of the reconciliation process encourages transformation and distancing from harmful ideologies such as racism*, anti-Semitism, sexism*, and heterosexism*. In this discourse, the establishment of justice and Jesus' call to repentance are central to the "good news" of forgiveness. KATHARINA VON KELLENBACH

Fornication, voluntary sexual intercourse between two unmarried persons. It is differentiated from adultery*, which involves at least one married person.

Forty-two Articles of Religion. Throughout the Reformation* period, statements of doctrine* were an important feature of the changes in religion (see Creeds, Symbols, and Confessions of Faith). In continental Europe, the Augsburg* Confession (1530) provided both an outstanding witness and compelling driving force of the Lutheran Reformation. In England, King Henry* VIII used articles of religion as instruments of policy – in 1536 opening the door to some Reformation possibilities and in 1539 slamming the door again.

King Edward VI imposed the Reformation on his kingdom by requiring Reformed Books of Common* Prayer (1549, 1552), along with homilies, orders in council, and new episcopal appointments. However, Archbishop Cranmer* preferred to reinforce the teaching of the Prayer Book by means of doctrinal articles to which the clergy would have to subscribe, resulting in the Forty-two Articles, signed by the king and published in May 1553. Their wording enforces a Reformed understanding of the faith*, especially with respect to the supremacy of Scripture*, justification* through faith, and a receptionist* doctrine of the sacraments* (e.g. in the Eucharist*, the Body and Blood of Christ are received not physically but through faith*, and thus are not received by unbelievers).

King Edward VI died within weeks of the completion of the Articles, and so they never achieved authority or even currency. In Queen Elizabeth's* reign, however, they provided most of the corpus of the Thirty-nine* Articles of 1571. BISHOP COLIN O. BUCHANAN Fosdick, Harry Emerson (1878–1969), Baptist author, preacher, educator; one of the chief spokespersons for liberal* Protestantism in the fundamentalist controversies (1920s) in the USA. Although not an outstanding scholar, Fosdick was a respected member of the faculty of the prestigious Union Theological Seminary in New York (1908–46). A great preacher, Fosdick was pastor of the interdenominational Riverside Church in New York (1926–46), a congregation that he created with the help of John D. Rockefeller, Jr. A gifted and prolific writer, Fosdick had a knack for producing accessible and compelling books such as The Secret of Victorious Living (1934), On Being a Real Person (1943), A Faith for Tough Times (1952), and Dear Mr. Brown: Letters to a Person Perplexed about Religion (1961). He was a courageous champion of unpopular causes; e.g. he advocated Christian pacifism* during World War II. Through his sermons and books, he made a strong case for the desirability of thinking men and women simultaneously embracing modernity and Evangelical* Christianity.

Fourth Ezra, Jewish apocalypse. Chapters 3–14, usually dated to c100 CE, were superficially Christianized during their transmission. Chapters 1–2 and 15–16 are later Christian additions. The theme of Fourth Ezra is theodicy* in the light of Jerusalem's destruction. The book is a major source of information concerning Jewish eschatology*, including descriptions of the awaited Messiah*. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.

JOHANNES TROMP

Fox, George (1624–91), founder of the Religious Society of Friends*. Born in England, he experienced Christ (1647), began itinerant preaching, authored numerous pamphlets and books, and married the widow Margaret Fell* (1669). Paralyzed by periods of depression and withdrawal, he died after defeating challenges and consolidating the movement.

Fox flourished during the chaotic English Revolution and hoped to draw the English people to his movement. He met Oliver Cromwell*, but their views diverged and he was frequently jailed. Convinced of the failures of other churches, whose services he occasionally interrupted, he believed Quakers* might recapture the primitive Christianity lost to apostasy, by stressing, without rituals or hierarchy, the inward leadings of God's Spirit, and he appealed to the democratic sentiments of the "lower and middling orders."

After the Stuart Restoration, Fox and 12 others issued the famous 1661 "Peace Testimony" eschewing warfare and political goals. The Quakers stressed the mystical* side of Christianity, with little emphasis on outward forms or reliance on Scriptures* without the guidance of God's Holy* Spirit. The group's government was a modified Presbyterian system with final authority culminating in the Yearly Meeting. The 1666 "Testimony from the Brethren" effectively gave authority to the central leadership. Over time, the Quakers were actively involved in women's rights, as well as opposition to slavery* and to war*. H. LARRY INGLE

Foxe, John (1517–87), martyrologist, minister, author of Acts and Monuments of the English Martyrs (the Book of Martyrs). After completing his studies as a fellow of (Roman Catholic) Magdalen College (1539–43), he should have been ordained a priest, but he became a Protestant and married.

In London (1547), while a tutor in a Protestant household, he was encouraged to write a church history in defense of the Reformation*. In danger after Mary's* accession, he escaped to Basel and converted his Reformation history into an English martyrology. After Elizabeth's* accession (1559), he returned to England as a tutor and published the Acts and Monuments (1563). Although much of it was patched together from the works of John Bale and the Magdeburg Centuries, this work was immediately recognized as important, burning with a passionate hatred of persecution and of the Roman Catholic clergy. Sensitive to criticism (of which there was plenty), Foxe revised his magnum opus three times (1570, 1576, 1583), changing the content and emphasis. He also published many sermons and other tracts, in both Latin and English. There were five posthumous editions and several abridgements of the Acts and Monuments before 1684, and several in the 18th and 19th c.

DAVID LOADES

France. The history of Christianity in France cannot easily be distinguished from that of Christianity in Western Europe as a whole (see History of Christianity Cluster: In Europe: Western Europe). To understand the place of Christianity in early-21st-c. France, it is necessary to review the 19th- and 20th-c. history.

Before the 19th c., the history of Christianity in France was predominantly a history of the Roman Catholic Church, which traces its origins to Irenaeus* (2nd-c. bishop of Lyon) and the baptism of the Merovingian barbarian Clovis* in Rheims (early 6th c.), and continues through the empire of Charlemagne* and the Carolingian* Renaissance, which reached its height during the reign of Louis* the Pious (9th c.) and his sons. The Benedictine* Rule was imposed on monastic* life, and there were important reforms exemplified by the establishment of Cluny* (10th c.) and by the creation of the Cistercian* (12th c.; see Bernard* of Clairvaux) and the Carthusian* (11th–12th c.) orders. Catharism* in Southern and Northern France (early 13th c.), was suppressed by the Inquisition*, led by Dominicans* who also played an important role in the university in Paris where Thomas Aquinas* taught.

Before the French Revolution, the link between the Roman Catholic Church and the state remained close, enshrined in the 1516 Concordat* (between King Francis I and Pope Leo X), although conflict between the spiritual and the temporal power – and between the Gallican* Church and Rome – was a constant feature of the relationship. During the Reformation* period, France was divided between Roman Catholics and Protestants (Huguenots*), who included Calvin*, Farel*, Beza*, as well as the sister of King Francis I, Marguerite* de Navarre, and the future Henry* IV. Henry converted to Catholicism in order to become king but proclaimed the Edict of Nantes* (1598) to end the wars between Catholics and Huguenots* (exemplified by the massacre of St. Bartholomew's* Day, 1572). The Jansenist* controversy (including Pascal*) with the Jesuits* and Bossuet* (17th c.) reflects the theological ferment of the period. Yet even as the Catholic* Renewal promoted the development of new religious orders during the 17th c. (e.g. by Francis* de Sales and Jane* Frances de Chantal), the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685) made Protestantism illegal and opened a period of persecution of the Huguenots, until the 1789 revolution.

The 1789 revolution produced a seismic rupture, and thereafter its legacy shaped the relationship between church, state, and nation. Whereas the clergé patriote of 1789 had looked to religion to bind the nation together, the Jacobins proclaimed the Republic one and indivisible, and their onslaught on Roman Catholic Christianity in effect turned France not into one nation, but into two. The 1801 Concordat (signed by Napoleon in 1802 and thus known in France as the 1802 Concordat) restored some order to the religious field and provided the legal basis for relations between church and state until 1905, but it did not of itself end all religious conflict. By the late 19th c., the French Protestant community, which was divided into the Reformed Church and the Augsburg Confession, numbered only around 600,000 (less than 2% of the population), although it had an influence on national life that was entirely disproportionate to its size.

The Religious Revival. The 1815–80 period witnessed a spectacular religious revival in France, as elsewhere in Europe. This reinvigorated and crusading Catholicism was not a French manifestation of a new, militant, and, above all, Roman Catholicism that developed especially under the papacy of Pius* IX (1846–78). Rather, out of the ruins of the Revolution, the Roman Catholic Church rebuilt itself: vocations to the priesthood rose, as did recruitment to religious orders and, in particular, to female religious orders. Between 1800 and 1880, almost 400 new female orders were founded and some 200,000 women took religious vows.

The Catholic revival owed much to the change in the intellectual climate produced by romanticism*. Yet it was by no means confined to an intellectual elite; it was evident also in the real, if uneven, re-Christianization of the French countryside. Mass attendance rose, as did the number of Easter communicants, although under the impact of the anticlerical policies of the Third Republic after 1879, there was some falling away again. In the 19th c., the Roman Catholic Church succeeded as never before in narrowing the gap between the religion of the people and the religion of the clergy, largely by embracing beliefs and practices that resonated powerfully with the religious impulses of the rural masses: the devotion to saints, the veneration of shrines, the organization of local pilgrimages, and enthusiasm for miracles.

Marianism (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster) was a notable feature of the new Ultramontanist* Catholicism and was fostered by frequent apparitions of the Virgin – in 1830 (Paris), 1846 (La Salette), 1858 (Lourdes*), and 1871 (Pontmain) – as well as by official pronouncements of the Church such as the doctrine of the immaculate* conception (1854). Marian visionaries came from humble backgrounds and were usually women or children – a reminder to arrogant, rationalist, male intellectuals that they had no monopoly on truth or wisdom. Another thing that was dear to Ultramontanists was devotion to the Sacred Heart. Centered on the visions of a 17th-c. nun, Marguerite-Marie Alacoque, the devotion was adopted in the 19th c. as the symbol of a Catholic vision of the nation and led to the building of the great Sacré Coeur basilica in Paris (late 19th c.) and the eventual canonization of Marguerite-Marie Alacoque (1920).

The French Culture War, 1879–1905. Fearful of the consequences of revolution, which recurred at frequent intervals (1830, 1848, 1871), the ruling classes generally subscribed to the view that religion was “good for the people,” if not necessarily for the educated bourgeoisie. Eventually, however, after 1879, under the Third Republic, a new generation of anticlerical republicans (see Anticlericalism) was ready to challenge the rise of aggressive Ultramontanist Catholicism, personified in France by the crusading journalist Louis Veuillot (1813–83) and his team at the newspaper L’Univers. In the ensuing culture war (1880s), republicans enacted legislation that took forward their agenda of realizing the idée laïque, laicization*, the creation of a completely secular polity and society. The key battle was in education*. Legislation in 1881 and 1882 made primary education free, compulsory, and nondenominational for both sexes. A further law (1886) provided for the progressive laicization of the teaching profession: around half of the nuns and brothers who taught in the nation’s primary schools were removed by the early 1890s. The education of girls was a particular target of the republicans, who were convinced that women’s greater allegiance to organized religion was both a source of division in families and a barrier to the spread of the republican ideal. Accordingly, legislation of 1879–80 established teacher training colleges for women teachers and a network of state secondary schools for girls. Other anticlerical measures included the reintroduction of divorce (1884) and a conscription law (1889) that obliged seminary students to do their military service like everyone else.

The 1880s legislative culture, however, stopped well short of a full-scale assault on religion. Only the extreme Left wanted to abolish the 1801 Concordat altogether. For a brief moment there were even signs of détente. In 1892 the new pope, Leo* XIII (1878–1903), initiated the movement known as the Ralliement, through which French Catholics were exhorted to rally to the Republic. At the same time, Leo issued his celebrated encyclical on social justice, Rerum Novarum (1891; see Social Encyclicals), which greatly boosted the burgeoning Catholic social movement and notably encouraged the emergence of a second generation of Christian Democrats (the first having been associated with the era of 1848). Some were priests, others laypersons like Marc Sangnier, founder of Le Sillon (the Furrow, 1899). All were concerned, above all, with the plight of the industrial working class.

The Ralliement failed to make much headway at the grassroots level, however, and it came to an end in the wake of the Dreyfus Affair, where once again Catholics were seen to be on the wrong side of the political divide, largely because of the high-profile role played by the Assumptionist order and its widely read, rabidly anti-Semitic* newspaper La Croix in the campaign against the Jewish army captain Alfred Dreyfus, falsely convicted of treason. Thus by 1900 the culture war moved into a new and decisive phase that led directly to the severing of the ties between church and state, which had endured for more than a century. Following the persecution of religious orders (especially those involved in teaching) and the rupture in 1904 of diplomatic relations with the Vatican – now under the new and more intransigent leadership of Pius* X (1903–14) – the French government, pushed by anticlerical parliamentarians, passed the Separation Law of December 9, 1905, aimed primarily at breaking the power of the Roman Catholic Church as a political force.

From the Separation of Church and State to the 21st Century. The influence of Rome continued to shape the French Church up to 1914 and beyond. Unrestrained by the French state, Pius X and his secretary of state, Merry del Val, took full advantage of their freedom to appoint bishops who shared their reactionary outlook, many of them sympathetic to the extreme right-wing nationalist organization Action Française. The Vatican also cracked down on intellectual tendencies within the French Church that it regarded with suspicion, condemning as heretical so-called Modernism*, a term of abuse applied to clerics such as Alfred Loisy* who were deemed to have maligned traditional church doctrine in a search to accommodate their scholarship to the findings of modern science.

World War I did something to heal the breach between French Catholics and the Republic. Catholics were loyal to the concept of the union sacrée, the political truce (1914) initiated by President Poincaré, and Catholic propagandists were not slow to point out how the exemplary war service of the 25,000 priests and seminarians mobilized at the front gave the lie to the Church's alleged lack of patriotism. French Catholics, committed to a fight to the finish, also spurned the peace initiatives of Pope Benedict* XV (1914–22). Reconciliation with Rome took place when full diplomatic relations were restored (1921). On the other hand, anticlericalism was far from dead and resurfaced after the election of a government of the Left (1924), though it was met with stubborn and successful resistance from the National Catholic Federation (from 1925). Rome's condemnation of Action Française (1926) also appeared to bode well for future relations between Catholics and the Republic.

The 1920s and 1930s were a period of renewal in the French Catholic Christianity. In the wake of the condemnation of Action Française, the episcopate underwent renewal, while the number of priests began to rise again. New lay Catholic elites – both men and women – emerged through the program of specialized Catholic* Action sponsored by Pope Pius* XI (1922–39) with the ambitious aim of re-Christianizing society. The prototype of the JOC (Young* Catholic Workers, Jocists) was emulated by the JAC (farmers) and the JEC (students), all of them complemented by separate female groups. Youth movements with a focus on sports and the outdoors likewise flourished, notably the Catholic Boy Scouts and Girl Guides. The Christian trade union (the Confédération Française des Travailleurs Chrétiens, known as the CFTC) recruited approximately a fifth of wage earners. The interwar period was also a golden age of Catholic thought, epitomized by the likes of Maritain* and Emmanuel Mounier, as well as a distinguished period in the history of Catholic literary culture (Paul Claudé, François Mauriac, Georges Bernanos) (see French Literature and Christianity). A small but vibrant group of Christian Democrats supported the Spanish Republicans. These, however, were denounced as traitors by the majority of Catholics, who retained many of their traditional anti-Republican sentiments, as the experience of war and defeat soon revealed.

Most Catholics, headed by the bishops, had no difficulty in rallying to the Vichy regime (1940–44) set up under Marshal Pétain as an antidote to the defeated and discredited Third Republic. It was the established power, recognized by the Vatican and Vichy's "National Revolution" in favor of "family, fatherland, and labor." It appealed to conservative Catholics, not least the parish clergy. Disenchantment set in only gradually, when the realities of occupation and Vichy's subservience to Nazism became apparent, although only a heroic minority engaged in active resistance. From the ranks of the Resistance, however, would come a new, more open, and, above all, more democratic and pluralist Catholic vision of politics in the postwar years. Despite its checkered record under Vichy, under the Liberation government of General de Gaulle, himself a practicing Catholic, the Church entered the postwar era with more political clout than it had enjoyed since the 1870s. Catholics, notably those of the new Christian Democratic Party, the MRP, would feature prominently in French governments throughout the life of the Fourth Republic (1946–58).

Yet by the 1940s, Catholics were aware that they lived in a country that in many respects was only nominally Christian. A book produced by two priests in 1943 called France a "missionary country" (H. Godin and Y. Daniel, La France pays de mission?). To meet the new challenge, some priests abandoned their parishes and became workers ("worker* priests"), but in 1953–54 the worker priest experiment was suppressed by the Vatican under Pius* XII (1939–58). In the climate of the cold war, "progressive" Christians were viewed with suspicion in Rome (and Washington) and Catholic peace activists were likewise condemned. Nevertheless, the reforming impetus of the 1930s was far from spent, and the French Catholic contribution to the aggiornamento of the Church launched by Vatican* II (1962–65) under Pope John* XXIII (1958–63) and Pope Paul* VI (1963–78) was considerable, not least in the area of theological expertise provided to the Council.

The Council profoundly transformed the entire Catholic world, but reactions to the new liturgy* in the vernacular and to the Council's other decrees were mixed. Traditionalists hated the innovations, while many enthusiasts of the Council thought that the reforms did not go far enough, particularly with regard to clerical celibacy* and artificial contraception (birth* control), the latter of which was condemned once more by Paul* VI's encyclical Humanae Vitae (1968). The price of upholding traditional teaching in the age of the sexual revolution was a steep decline in the Church's authority. By the early 1990s, polls revealed that even among women who still attended Mass, more than 80% ignored the papal teaching on contraception.

"À la carte" Catholicism had arrived, and the decline of traditional religious practice went on apace. From more than 20% of the adult population in 1972, weekly attendance at Mass had fallen to just 8% by the mid-1990s and to 4.5% in 2008. At the dawn of the new millennium, the secularizing trend was bucked only by Protestant Pentecostals/Charismatics*, who had made surprising gains in some of the toughest suburbs of Paris, and by a growing Muslim minority numbering at least 4 million, which made Islam* the second largest religion in France. Ironically, some French Catholics now regard the secularization* laws enacted against them in the culture war of 1879–1905 as the best defense against Islamic militancy. The long-cherished aim of a Christian reconquest of society has been definitively shelved, and Catholics now hope at best to foster respect for Christian values in a pluralist society. See also FRENCH LITERATURE AND CHRISTIANITY; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: FRANCE; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: FRANCE; SECULARISM AND SECULARIZATION.

JAMES F. MCMILLAN

Francis of Assisi (c1182–1226), penitent, charismatic preacher, founder of orders, deacon, mystic*, saint (canonized by Gregory IX, 1228); born and died in Assisi (Umbria, Italy).

Francis abandoned a worldly lifestyle (1205) and embraced an apostolic life of poverty* and preaching* (1207). With his first followers (eventually named "Friars Minor" or "Lesser Brothers"), Francis obtained from Pope Innocent* III (1209) a global commission to preach penance* and verbal confirmation of a gospel-based rule – later expanded (1221), codified, and confirmed in a papal bull by Pope Honorius III (1223) – which was called Francis's First Order. With Clare* of Assisi, he founded the Second Order (1212), for contemplative nuns, later known as "Poor* Clares." He attracted secular penitents into his Third* Order and, with Cardinal Hugolino (future Pope Gregory IX), gave them a rule (1221). Francis attempted to end the Fifth Crusade* by preaching to Al-Malik al-Kamil, sultan of Egypt (1219), who remained sympathetic but unconverted. He supported the Fourth Lateran* Council program (1215) with encyclical letters encouraging eucharistic devotion. After resigning from the office of minister general (c1221), Francis received stigmata* in a mystical experience of Christ's Passion at Monte della Verna in Tuscany (1224).

Francis decried the avarice of the Italian mercantile revolution (see Economy and Christianity Cluster: Economy and Christianity; Economy and Christianity Cluster: Economic Ethics and Christian Theology), violence* in society, and contemporary dissatisfaction with clergy perceived as worldly and silent. Francis's Rule challenged the friars to a life based on Jesus' "words and footprints," i.e. teaching and lifestyle. Embracing gospel terms (brother, minister), Francis minimized distinctions among friars except for ordination*. Poverty was radical, based on Matt 19:21 and Luke 9:3; it was characterized by giving everything to the poor and rejecting money and property*, both individual and corporate; friars were to support themselves by working and begging. They were to preach first by example; those who had been approved by the Roman Catholic Church would preach by word; those "inspired by God" would preach by example and by word to Saracens and other nonbelievers. Modifications of Francis's Rule in 1223 allowed preachers access to books, and in 1224 Francis authorized Anthony of Padua to lecture to the friars on theology.

In contrast to the Cathars*, Francis emphasized the humanity as well as the divinity of Christ. In contrast to the Waldenses*, he taught the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist and the authority of an ordained clergy – hence the early description of him as "a totally Catholic and apostolic man": vir catholicus et totus apostolicus. Friars were to be brothers to all. Indeed, in his Canticle of Creatures, Francis taught a brotherhood of all creation, inasmuch as all creatures come from God and reflect God. Pope John* Paul II named Francis "patron saint of ecology*" (1983). CONRAD L. HARKINS, OFM

Franciscans, Christians inspired by the religious experience and values of Francis* of Assisi (c1182–1226), including members of the Catholic religious* orders he founded and other communities within and outside the Roman Catholic Church. Common to all these groups is conversion to Jesus Christ and a gospel-centered life.

Francis founded two religious orders, giving both a rule of life: Friars Minor or Lesser Brothers (1209) and Poor Ladies of San Damiano (later known as Poor* Clares), founded with Clare* of Assisi for contemplative* sisters (1212). He also founded an order for secular people, clergy and laity, male and female, Brothers and Sisters of Penance (1221). Each of these Franciscan communities, the First, Second, and Third* Orders, lives gospel values according to the status of its members (men under vows, women under vows, or laypersons). Religious communities soon developed in the Third Order, with gradual separation into Third Order Regular (for those under vows) and Third Order Secular (for those not under vows). Among Friars Minor, zeal for gospel poverty worked against unity: the Franciscan Spirituals* broke with the community (1294), only to be suppressed; the leaders of the order were condemned by papal authority and replaced (1328). For the next two centuries, the dispute over poverty resulted in the formation of subordinate reform groups, until the 1517 division of the order into Friars Minor Conventual and Friars Minor of the Observance. Further fragmentation continued, one group, the Friars Minor Capuchin, obtaining separate status through papal approbation (1528). Fragmentation continued within the Friars of the Observance, Friars of the Strictest Observance, Reformed Friars, and Recollect Friars, until the suppression of these distinctions and the imposition of the simple term Friars Minor by Pope Leo XIII (1897).

Members of the First Order live according to the Rule of Francis finalized in 1223; divergent groups of Poor Clares live each according to one of several medieval rules. Modern members of the Third Order Secular live according to the Rule of Paul* VI (1978), and members of the Third Order Regular according to the Rule of John* Paul II (1982). Protestant Franciscan communities appeared in the 20th c., particularly in the Anglican and Lutheran churches, e.g. the Society of St. Francis and the Order of Ecumenical Franciscans. Since Vatican* II (1962–65), new Catholic Franciscan communities have been formed, among them Friars of the Renewal. Catholic Franciscan communities today exemplify, according to their specific norms, the gospel values lived by Francis: conversion to Christ, loyalty to the Roman Catholic Church, penance, prayer, evangelization, missionary activity, peace, justice for the poor and marginalized, and ecology*.

Francis de Sales (1567–1622), French-speaking Savoyard bishop (of Geneva, in exile in Annecy), Catholic saint, doctor of the church. De Sales devoted his clerical career and episcopacy (1602–22) to the renewal (especially spiritual) of the early modern Roman Catholic Church. An early mission took him to the Chablais region to reclaim it for the Catholic faith. A persuasive preacher, spiritual director, and influential devotional writer, he was most remembered as a promoter, especially through his Introduction to the Devout Life (1609), of a deep spirituality* adapted to the lives of lay Catholics. De Sales's Treatise on the Love of God (1616) presented his theological, spiritual, and pastoral vision of a world of interconnected divine and human hearts linked by the gentle, humble heart of the crucified Jesus (Matt 11:28–30). It emphasized the primacy of love* in the Christian life (see Anthropology Cluster: In Western Christian Theology). His "optimistic" vision, rooted in the Christian humanism of the era, conceived of human nature (most distilled in the heart) as essentially good and God directed – thus the importance of gentle, loving personal and pastoral practices, such as spiritual friendship, spousal love, individualized spiritual direction (see Discipline), and affective writing, preaching, and teaching, which can win the hearts of others. He was cofounder (1610, with Jane* de Chantal) of the religious* order known as the Visitation of Holy Mary. See also CATHOLIC RENEWAL. WENDY M. WRIGHT

Francke, August Hermann (1663–1727), educated in centers of Lutheran orthodoxy, developed a concern for "useful" rather than merely "pure" doctrine, under the influence of Spener*.

Personal living for God, in response to personal visitations of grace*, was the intended life-long outcome of repentance* and conversion*. As pastor in Glaucha and professor at the adjacent University of Halle, he instituted a program of Pietist* renewal that touched many facets of society, including the religious education of children and youth of all social classes, care for orphans, Bible distribution, and pioneering efforts in world mission that were ecumenical in nature.

Franklin, Benjamin (1706–90), printer, pragmatist, US founding father. Franklin's relationship to Christianity is paradoxical. A friend of George Whitefield*, he advanced the Evangelicalism of the Great* Awakening by printing works by Whitefield*, Gilbert Tennent, and other revivalists. Yet he himself was not an adherent of either the Calvinism* of his New England heritage or the dominant Quakerism* of his Philadelphia home. A Freemason*, he adopted a noncreedal Enlightenment* Deism* and looked to Christianity as a utilitarian means of cultivating virtuous living in society. His Deistic virtue-driven ethics informs much of the language about God in the first documents of the American Republic.

Fraternity, a group of men organized for a common purpose (especially spiritual discipline* and mutual support) who thereby become "brothers." Fraternities became a significant part of lay* piety during the Middle Ages and in subsequent centuries, in Western Europe as well as in the "colonies."

Fraticelli, a breakaway group of Spiritual* Franciscans, followers of either Angelo Clareno or Michael of Cesena.

Free Churches. See INDEPENDENT OR FREE CHURCHES.

Freedom, Free Will. Experience suggests that many of our actions are freely chosen; by this we usually mean that we could have carried out at least one alternative action and that the decision to act is our own. The adjective "free" is set in contrast to captivity, bondage, or necessity, a situation in which one is not free to choose or to do what one chooses. In the West, several issues related to the concept of free will arose:

1. Terms like "choosing" or "willing" may be more accurate than "having free will,"

since we do not know whether there is an entity called the "will" behind our acts. The Scholastics* came to differentiate three kinds of willing: liberty of exercise (whether to act or not act), liberty of specification (the choice of this or that good), and liberty of indifference (freedom for both good and evil).

2. Freedom may be defined by spontaneity (willing out of motives that seem good to oneself) rather than choice among alternatives. From this perspective, true "freedom," in contrast to "free choice," consists of love* for God without any consideration of alternatives; love for God is the fulfillment of free choice (a tendency in the Augustinian* tradition and in certain kinds of mysticism*; see HETERONOMY).
3. One may be free within a horizon narrower than what free choice in the abstract might suggest. Paul suggests (Rom 5:16–23) that those who are "free from sin*" are "slaves of righteousness," and those who are "free from righteousness" are "slaves of sin." Thus for Augustine*, Luther*, and Calvin*, the language of external slavery is internalized as a moral or subjective slavery: one becomes the slave of the one who is obeyed (Rom 6:16).
4. How do free agents become "slaves of sin"? Christian answers sometimes emphasize temptation by the devil* and sometimes by original* sin, or its contemporary version, structural* evil. These influence the process of willing by narrowing the range of viable possibilities, offering only limited suggestions, or rewarding some inclinations rather than others. Bondage in willing is usually explained as the outcome of free choice, either one's own or Adam's. For example, both Augustine and Calvin argued that even under the influence of original sin, sin occurs "willingly" or "not without willing."
5. How is the will liberated from bondage to sin? This is the classic problem of "free will and grace*." Some (e.g. Jansenists*) think of grace* as overpowering the will. Others (e.g. Augustine*, Jesuit* theologians, Edwards*) think of grace in terms of persuasion, offering motives that arouse new depths of willing.

Freemasonry and Christianity. In 1717 four old London lodges consolidated and formed a remarkable social organization, the Grand Lodge of London, an umbrella organization to which other lodges would give their affiliation. Within two decades, Benjamin Franklin* joined a Masonic lodge in Philadelphia; by 1750 the organization was steeped in controversy yet growing in popularity in both Europe and the USA.

Since the Middle Ages, masons, carpenters, bakers, bell makers, and barber-surgeons in many European countries had been protected and supervised by guilds, which safeguarded their wages and benefits and monitored the quality of their work; members identified themselves with secret words and handshakes. Only the masons' guilds survived the transition into modern market conditions by becoming "Freemasonry." Besides conviviality and fellowship, the Masonic lodges held other cultural attractions. Master masons were literate and known for their mathematical and architectural skills, particularly in the construction of military and urban fortifications. Myth and lore associated the masters' geometrical skills with ancient learning supposedly inherited from the legendary Egyptian priest Hermes Trismegistus, who allegedly taught Moses and transmitted to him a mystical understanding of the heavens related to mathematics. The mystical combined with the utilitarian to bond brothers who became increasingly interested in the first, while abandoning the second.

Freemasonry's development in the 18th c. has been difficult to investigate. Many grand lodges were secretive, ritualistic, and devoted to hierarchy. But the lodges also consistently spoke about civic virtue and merit, about men meeting as equals, about the need for brothers to become philosophers, about their being "enlightened." By the late 18th c., the egalitarian logic had spread, particularly in France, where women flocked to the new "lodges of adoption."

The Masonic ideology of rising by merit, which justified egalitarian fraternizing among men of property who were free to choose their governors, belonged first and foremost to the English republican tradition. The lodges had a tendency to become schools for government – more, rather than less, democratic government.

Freemasonry's relationship with Christianity is controversial; Freemasonry is rejected by most churches because of its ambivalence toward religion, although different lodges and individual Freemasons have various attitudes toward Christianity, since Freemasonry "excludes none on account of belief." Benjamin Franklin, who was a Freemason, serves as an example. A friend of George Whitefield*, he advanced Evangelicalism by printing works by Whitefield and other revivalists*. Yet he held to a noncreedal Enlightenment* Deism*, viewing Christianity as a means to cultivate virtuous living in society. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA: MEXICO.

Free Spirit, Brethren of, an antinomian* movement that flourished c1270–1350. Accusations about its beliefs tended to be stereotyped ("union with God frees a person from the moral law"; "fornication is not a mortal sin"), probably through misconstrual or malice. The Beguines* vernacular piety aroused suspicions of association with this movement. One Beguine, Marguerite Porete*, was burned at the stake in 1310, and theses drawn from her book were condemned (Council of Vienne, 1311–12). Yet her Mirror of Simple Souls became an anonymous classic of spirituality*, and similar language can be found in Eckhart* and other late medieval mystics*.

Free Will Baptists, the name given to the heirs of the Baptist congregation formed in Amsterdam in 1608/9 by a group of English Separatist Puritans who were Arminian* in theology and were known in England as General Baptists. They affirmed the role of free will* in salvation, the general atonement* of Christ (his death for all persons), and the possibility that Christians could fall from grace* (contrast with Particular Baptists). See also BAPTIST CHURCHES CLUSTER.

French Literature and Christianity. The first vernacular literary texts in France illustrate the cultural dominance of Catholic belief until the Renaissance. The Sequence of Saint Eulalia is a 9th-c. hagiography*. The Song of Roland, the earliest extant epic (c1100), depicts Charlemagne* as the ideal Christian ruler, his nephew Roland as a Christian tragic hero, and their conflict as a battle of Christian forces against "pagan" (Muslim) Saracens.

Religious drama in Latin began as an embellishment of the Mass*, evolving into dialogues about the Nativity and Resurrection; some vernacular refrains became part of this material. The earliest vernacular plays were the 12th-c. Holy Resurrection and Play of Adam. The latter dramatizes elements of the Mass, emphasizing the psychology of Adam* and Eve* in the story of creation, their temptation and fall*. Miracle plays, centering on the lives of saints and performed by the laity, dominated the 14th c. Mystery plays, often depicting the Passion of Christ, emerged in the 15th c., became huge communal productions, and were banned in the mid-16th c.

With the Renaissance, the first Catholic reformers, called Evangelicals*, were followed by Protestants, called Calvinists* or Huguenots*. Lefèvre* d'Étaples (c1450–1536) published French commentaries on Paul and the Gospels, as well as a translation of the Bible (1523–30). Opposed by the Sorbonne, he was protected by Marguerite* de Navarre. Calvin* himself is viewed as a major contributor to the development of French prose through his sermons and, especially, the Institutes.

François Rabelais, a contemporary of these figures, engaged in a comic indictment and satire of Catholic scholasticism and asceticism. Clément Marot, a Protestant poet and satirist, translated 49 psalms (1533–43), later completed by Théodore de Bèze (or Beza*, 1551–62); this poetry was sung in Huguenot worship services. Beza's revision of earlier Bible* translations became the official Geneva translation (1588) used by Huguenots. (The 1550 Louvain translation was the approved Catholic text.)

The Wars of Religion between Catholics and Protestants were formally ended by the Edict of Nantes* (1598), but conflict continued in the 17th and early 18th c. Les Tragiques by Agrippa d'Aubigné (1579) is a poetic account of the wars and a justification of the Protestant cause.

In the aftermath of the Counter* Reformation (in France often a more appropriate term than “Catholic* Renewal”), the 17th c. was marked by religious controversy and fervor. After the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685), Protestant influence on French literature was greatly diminished. With the rise of classicism, literature followed Greek and Latin models rather than those of the Bible. A notable exception was two plays based on the OT by Jean Racine, Esther (1689) and Athalie (1691). Yet the devotional* literature of figures such as François (Francis*) de Sales and Surin assumed great importance, as did the genre of spiritual biographies and autobiographies (influenced by translations of Teresa* of Ávila) and of sermons (already important in the 16th c.).

The Jansenist* and Quietist* controversies influenced French literature. Pascal's* Provincial Letters (1656–57) was a devastating series of 18 polemical letters condemning the Jesuits* and their attack against the Jansenists*. Devotional work such as Madame Guyon's* and great spiritual prose such as Fénelon's* and Bossuet's* reflected the Quietist debates.

The Enlightenment and the French Revolution (1789) brought skepticism and sweeping criticism of special revelation* and of the biblical text by figures like Voltaire. Anticlericalism* became a dominant theme in French culture after the nationalization of the holdings of the Roman Catholic Church and the institution of the worship of the Supreme Being during the Revolution.

Romantics tended to displace onto the poet and poetry the power once vested in the priest, the mystic, and the Bible. The most notable Catholic among early-19th-c. writers was Chateaubriand*, whose apology for Christianity, The Genius of Christianity (1802), emphasized its civilizing role and its beauties. Lamartine exemplified the romantics' faith crises and their unorthodox form of faith. The figure of Christ was an example of their religious anguish, as in Alfred Vigny's The Mount of Olives (1844).

Secularism* increasingly characterized French literature after the separation of church and state (1905). Nevertheless, an important renaissance of Catholic philosophical thinking occurred before World War II; (see Marcel, Gabriel; Maritain, Jacques). The most important writers were Charles Péguy, Paul Claudel, Georges Bernanos, and François Mauriac. The theoretical impulses of French intellectual life during the later 20th c. reduced the impact of Christianity on literature, although one finds rich echoes of Christian images and allusions, used in an ironic, secular context, in writers such as Samuel Beckett. See also FRANCE.

PATRICIA A. WARD

Friar (from Lat frater, “brother”), member of a mendicant* order. Friars are principally Franciscan*, Dominican*, Carmelite*, and Augustinian.

Friends, Religious Society of. The Religious Society of Friends, or “Quakers,” began in the 1640s during the English Revolution. Its leader, George Fox*, wanted to “revive primitive Christianity,” in contrast to the apostasy of contemporary groups. Hence Quakers dispensed with clergy, met in simple settings, and convened in silence, to await the leadings of the Holy* Spirit (see Quaker Worship). The group remained united and free of formal divisions until the 19th c.

Within the Society, the system of control was a modified Presbyterian* system, with the top decision-making body being the Yearly Meeting. (Quakers eschewed the word “church,” designating bodies as simply meetings.) After 1666, and the issuance of the Testimony from the Brethren in London, power gradually devolved to the Meeting for Sufferings, an executive committee, within each Yearly Meeting. Since women enjoyed equal rights to speak during worship, they organized bodies parallel to the men’s.

In 1661 a small group of Quaker men in London announced that Christ had commanded the Friends not to participate in war* or outward conflict, a hallmark of the movement that was more important than theological speculation. In 1675 Robert Barclay penned An Apology for the True Christian Divinity, which became the authoritative rendering of Quaker thought. For Quakers, Christian faith was based on two sources: Scriptures* and Quakers’ encounters with the Holy* Spirit. Differences could be resolved by recognizing that revelations* from the Spirit, whether biblical or experiential, did not contradict each other. Such recognition, however, did not forestall conflict.

By the 19th c., influenced by Methodism*, English Quakers had become more “Evangelical,” emphasizing the Bible and the atoning* blood of Christ, a development that also affected American Friends. In the USA, a formal division in 1827–28 spread to five Yearly Meetings, with the separatists known as “Hicksites,” after Elias Hicks*, and the Evangelicals dubbed “Orthodox.” Further splits ensued: by the 1840s, Wilburites were reacting to Evangelical inroads among the Orthodox, now called “Gurneyites.” By the late 1860s, Orthodox in the US Midwest had evangelists and, by the 1890s, pastors; soon their Yearly Meetings, including a holiness* emphasis with a quest for perfection, differed little from Methodist churches. In 1887, in Richmond, Indiana, a declaration defined Orthodox Quakerism in Evangelical terms.

Such developments had an impact beyond North America, as Orthodox missionaries took their faith to Africa, Latin America, and Asia. See also QUAKER WORSHIP. H. LARRY INGLE

Friendship, defined by Cicero as “a relationship of mutual affection, based on agreement about all human and divine matters, together with goodwill and affection.” Christians adopted ideas from classical antiquity to define spiritual friendship; they were also influenced by biblical references to the friendship of David and Jonathan, and Christ and the “beloved disciple” (possibly John*), to Christ’s commandment to love* one another, and to early community in Jerusalem, despite the difficulty of reconciling the ideal of mutual, exclusive friendship with love of neighbor. Augustine* and Basil* the Great transposed these classical ideals in the context of doctrines, such as the body of Christ; monastic* writers (e.g. Cassian*) described friendship as a key element in spiritual progress. Later writers also discussed questions of friendship with God and with the self.

Fruits of the Spirit. Paul lists these fruits (Gal 5: 22–23) as love*, joy, peace*, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, and self-control. The Vulgate* adds modesty, continence, and chastity, making a total of 12.

Frumentius (c300–c380), the first bishop and apostle of Ethiopia*. According to Rufinus* Tyrannius’s reliable account (4th c.), a philosophy teacher from Tyre, Meropius, and his students, Frumentius* and Aedesius, went to “India” (as Rufinus called Ethiopia). Their boat was attacked. Frumentius and Aedesius survived and were taken to the royal palace (c340), where the king held them as servants. Before his death, the king granted them freedom for years of faithful service as teachers and advisers. At the queen’s request, they stayed to help run the government until the crown prince could assume power. Frumentius used his good offices to found a Christian church in Aksum and gathered together Christians already in the kingdom, namely Roman merchants from Syria and the Byzantine world. After this regency, Aedesius returned to Tyre, becoming a parish priest. Frumentius went to Alexandria (c347) to plead with Archbishop Athanasius* to send a bishop to the new Christian community in Ethiopia. Instead Athanasius ordained Frumentius himself as the “first bishop” and apostle of Ethiopia. See also ETHIOPIA. GETACHEW HAILE

Fundamentalism is the label applied to aggressively conservative movements in many of the world’s religious faiths.

North American Fundamentalism. Fundamentalism (term first used in 1920) was originally a movement in US Protestant Christianity, both inside and outside the denominations, that defended traditional beliefs, biblical authority, and the uniqueness of human beings against the challenges of modernism, e.g.

historical criticism and evolutionary biology. This Protestant fundamentalism grew out of 19th-c. revivalist* and Premillennialist* movements, entrenched patriarchalism*, and the Bible Conference Movement. Yet fundamentalism is not simply another name for popular* religion, religious conservatism, traditionalism, or orthodoxy. It is a movement that seeks to resist, oppose, and defeat selected aspects of modernity both by self-isolation (in independent congregations, subcultures, or families) and by appropriating the power of the media or politics.

Interpretations and assessments of fundamentalism vary and tend to be matters of emphasis, yet certain themes in Protestant Christianity persist. These themes include the absolute and literal* authority of biblical verses and passages on whatever subject they proclaim; certain fundamentals of belief, such as miracles*, the virgin* birth, and the bodily resurrection* of Jesus; the scenario of the end of the world taken from the books of Daniel and Revelation; the patriarchal*, nuclear family* and the importance of male authority in both the family and the congregation; and the replacement of a secular and religiously pluralistic society with a Christian society modeled on colonial times. In the last decade of the 20th c., the Fundamentalist Movement took on a moral-political dimension with the rise of the New Christian Right, which focused on selected moral issues having to do with public schools, the family*, sexuality*, and the media*, e.g. school prayer, Christian symbols in government places, homosexuality*, abortion*, pornography, and creationism*.

The distinctive religious dimension of fundamentalism is the sense of threat from a secular and religious pluralistic culture to the life of faith. At the same time, the use of communication technologies, modern genres of music, and multiple types of ministry give fundamentalist congregations an ethos of enthusiasm, energy, and even fun. Fundamentalists find a way to exist in a secular culture by reclaiming aspects of traditional religion and creating a certain distance from culture by way of independent congregations, homeschooling, Bible colleges, independent television networks, and religious publishing. Sociologically speaking, the Fundamentalist Movement is centered on relatively affluent, middle-class young adults rather than on a disenfranchised social class. From the beginning, fundamentalism has tended to be a grassroots movement, a populism suspicious of official religion and hierarchical institutions and maintaining a supernatural worldview. As a movement, it has tended to embody a certain pessimism about the state of the world, a pessimism directed both toward other religious groups as either "pagan" or apostate and toward society as corrupt and under the rule of Satan. This is why Christian, Jewish, and Islamic forms of fundamentalism engender a rhetoric and strategy of opposition that identify specific enemies such as psychoanalysts, evolutionary biologists, liberals, feminists, gays and lesbians, and secular humanists. A social-political conservatism associated with fundamentalism has included opposition to the Social* Gospel and to movements for civil rights (including the rights of women and gays and lesbians), virulent anti-communism, and a militaristic stance in international relations.

Global Fundamentalism. Because fundamentalism pervades many world religions, we can speak of "fundamentalisms." Roman Catholic fundamentalism (Integrism*) and Episcopalian fundamentalism center less on the inerrant Scriptures* than on an unchangeable tradition* monitored by an authoritative institution. The reforms of Vatican II were the primary event that evoked a Roman Catholic integrism that opposes the vernacular Mass*, any diminishment of papal and episcopal authority, and any moderation of canon* law on issues of priestly celibacy*, the ordination* of women, or altered family* and sex ethics. Muslim fundamentalism was evoked by the long history of Western domination of the Middle East after the division of the Ottoman Empire. Because its primary conviction is that the practice of Islam* is not possible in a Western (secular, religiously pluralistic) nation-state political setting, it has been from the beginning a religiopolitical movement whose aim is to restore a Muslim state as the context for the practice of shari'a (religious law). Hindu fundamentalism likewise arose as an anticolonialist, anti-Western movement that hoped to create a Hindu nation-state based on the Dharma (piety, spirituality). Jewish fundamentalism in the form of Haredi and Hasidic Judaism is centered in the texts of the Torah and Talmud, as well as various handbooks and commentaries, as a way of ensuring Jewish survival in the modern age.

The one feature that all of these fundamentalisms share is the determined, even militant rejection of aspects of modernity on behalf of traditional forms of faith. Hindu, Muslim, and Jewish fundamentalisms all battle for a national or cultural setting sufficiently distant from Western influence to permit their practices of faith.

Gabon, named “Gabão” by Portuguese explorers (15th c.) who were the first Christian contacts for several Bantu groups that had immigrated there around the 13th c. A former French colony (1850, first as part of the French Congo, now Republic of Congo*, Congo-Brazzaville), independent since 1960, Gabon is the richest country in the Central West African region (owing to dense rainforests logged for precious tropical woods and to offshore oil), although most people do not benefit from this wealth. The capital, Libreville, was a settlement for former slaves who had been freed from slave ships (1849).

Christianity was introduced to Gabon (1841) by the Congregation of the Sacred Heart of Mary (a French nun order; see Jane Frances de Chantal). Father Jean Bessieux established St. Mary of Gabon (1844), the oldest Catholic church building in modern Africa. The first Protestant missionaries were sent by the Congregationalist American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions (1842); they were followed by Presbyterians (1870). When French became a requirement in mission schools (1889), these earlier Protestants were progressively replaced by French Protestant missionaries (including Albert Schweitzer*). After a slow beginning, the Protestant Church grew rapidly, resulting in the (autonomous) Evangelical Church of Gabon (Église Évangélique du Gabon, 1961). The traditional religion of the Banzie (Initiates), or Bwiti, originating with the Fang people, became increasingly Christian (from 1945), with an emphasis on Jesus as Savior, and emerged after independence (1960) as a vigorous African* Instituted Church, l'Église des Banzie.

The Roman Catholic Church in Gabon grew rapidly through mass conversions in the 1930s (from 16,000 in 1910 to 120,000 in 1940) and “second evangelization” efforts in the 1960s (c300,000 in 1972). The latter were significantly aided by the teaching and social activities of the Daughters of Mary (Ekwa Maria) and the Soeurs de Sainte-Marie de Gabon. Some studies have indicated that there was further growth of the Roman Catholic Church, although other studies have reported a slower growth – indeed a stagnation – owing to the lack of Gabonese priests, despite the effort of Gabonese Msgr. André Raponda-Walker (1871–1968), a linguist and scholar, who composed African hymns. The hierarchy of the Church (now four bishops) was under the authority of the archbishop of Brazzaville until 1961, when Msgr. François Ndong was appointed the first auxiliary bishop of Libreville.

The Evangelical Church of Gabon (weakened between 1970 and 1997 by a succession of internal divisions, mostly resolved in 1997) oversees almost 25% of all primary schools in Gabon, and runs seven secondary schools and a teacher training college. It has a theological school for the training of its pastors and lay leaders.

Gabriel, the angel who was sent to the prophet Daniel* (Dan 8:16–27, 9:21–27) and who announced to Zachariah* the birth of John* the Baptist (Luke 1:11–12) and to Mary* the coming of the Messiah* (Luke 1:26–38). Gadamer, Hans-Georg (1900–2003), born in Marburg, a student of Heidegger*, who supervised Gadamer’s Habilitationsschrift on Plato’s* ethics. Later professor of philosophy at the University of Heidelberg, he was one of the most important figures in the discussion of hermeneutics*, particularly after the publication of his major work, Wahrheit und Methode (1960; Truth and Method, 1975). Building on Heidegger’s work in ontology*, Gadamer’s book is broadly interdisciplinary, drawing on art criticism, literary criticism, theology, and jurisprudence. Hermeneutics move beyond all theoretical categories, and even beyond such historically defined ideas as “reason*” as understood by Enlightenment* thinkers, to an experience of the whole of life, practical wisdom being preferred to abstract theory. In his discussion of aesthetics* and art, Gadamer lays great emphasis on the concept of play, as an event with its own life within which disclosure may take place. Play, properly, is deeply serious, “absorbing the player into itself” and its world. By extension, any act of interpretation is not a mechanical process, but a creative event. Gadamer’s hermeneutics are an extension of the earlier work of Schleiermacher* and Dilthey. Like them he emphasizes the universality of the hermeneutical problem, but more than them he seeks a return to primordial experience, rejecting all claims to historical* objectivity on the grounds that modern hermeneutical scholars inevitably fail to take their own specific historical standpoint seriously. Gadamer’s insistence on the importance of language* in the final part of Truth and Method betrays the influence of Heidegger: as the medium of hermeneutical experience and all understanding, language allows “being” to reveal itself. Language is no “prisonhouse” but allows an experience of the world that opens the self to the other and entertains the universal possibility of attaining the truth. See also APOPHATISM; CONVICTION; HERMENEUTICS; METAPHOR; SYMBOLISM.

DAVID JASPER

Gaius (early 3rd c.), Roman presbyter who reported that Rome had the “trophies” (memorial monuments) of the apostles Peter* (on the Vatican hill) and Paul* (on the road to Ostia). He rejected the Apocalypse* (Revelation*) because of its materialism, ascribing it to Cerinthus. Eusebius* summarized his writings.

Galatians, Epistle to the, one of the oldest extant epistles of Paul* (c51–52) written from Corinth* to churches he recently founded in the Roman province of Galatia (Asia Minor). It reflects conflicting views on the full incorporation of Gentiles* into the new religious community. Should Gentiles be circumcised and follow dietary laws? This issue threatened church unity first in Jerusalem* and then in Antioch* (2:1–14). Paul had heard that other missionaries later sought to convince the Galatian churches to uphold Jewish rites to ensure their righteous status (1:6–7, 3:2–3).

To counter this teaching, Paul stresses the divine origin of his autonomous Gentile mission, authenticated by Christ’s revelation* and by charismatic* experiences (1:15–16, 3:1–5). Paul reinterprets salvation* history about Abraham*, Isaac*, and Moses* to emphasize the temporary nature of the Law/Torah* and the primacy of faith* (3:6–4:31). The Christ-believing churches, free of Torah obligations, are marked by “the law of Christ,” i.e. sacrificial love*, as demonstrated by the cross* (5:13–14, 6:2).

Paul soon modified his polemical way of defending the community identity as he faced the intricate reality of Jew–Gentile cohabitation (see 1 Corinthians* and Romans*). Ironically, Galatians, which intended to defend the marginalized Gentiles, was used in marginalizing rhetoric against Judaism* by the later church (e.g. John* Chrysostom and Luther*). The Reformers* used Galatians as a primary text for the doctrine of justification* by faith alone. Its polemical treatment of the Law/Torah also attracted Marcion* and other Gnostics*. The concern in Galatians for both universalism* and particularism provides a framework for various Liberation* theologies.

ATSUHIRO ASANO

Galileo Galilei (1564–1642), mathematician, natural philosopher, astronomer. Born in Pisa, taught in Pisa and Padua; as a mathematician-philosopher adorned the Medici court in Florence.

In 1609–12 Galileo made a series of telescopic discoveries, published in The Starry Messenger, that challenged the long-held earth-centered worldviews of Aristotle* and Ptolemy. They also seemed to conflict with the Bible, e.g. when one interprets literally the few texts that describe the sun as in motion or the earth as at rest. The ensuing controversy ended (1616) in Galileo’s being formally admonished to abandon the Copernican* view as “contrary to Scripture*.” The accession (1623) of a new pope, Urban VIII, encouraged Galileo to resume his work, leading to the publication of his Dialogue on Two Chief World Systems (1632). An angry pope ordered Galileo to be tried on suspicion of heresy*. Condemned for defending a view contrary to Scripture and for ignoring the personal admonition he had received in 1616, he was forced to abjure the Copernican worldview and sentenced to permanent house arrest. He returned to his early work on falling bodies, publishing the foundational work of modern mechanics, Two New Sciences (1638).

His (uncirculated) Letter to the Grand-Duchess Christina (1615) drew on Augustine’s De geni ad litteram to enunciate, in classical form, the principles that should govern apparent conflict between Scripture and natural knowledge. Had the Roman judges been guided by these principles, the Copernican view would never have been condemned, as finally conceded by the Vatican (1992). Later critics of the Roman Catholic Church would construe the condemnation of Copernicanism as an attack on science*. But in 1616, most natural philosophers and astronomers were entirely unpersuaded by the Copernican view. The scientific issue thus played little, if any, part in the theologians' discussions. The issue was the apparent challenge to Scripture; the bitter Reformation* debates of the day allowed that consideration to swamp all others.

ERNAN MCMULLIN

Galla Placidia (c390–450), Roman empress. Daughter of Theodosius* I, she was taken from Rome by Alaric the Goth (410) and married his brother, Ataulf. On his death, she was returned to the Roman court as part of a treaty between the Goths and Romans. Forced to marry the Roman general Constantius, she was named Augusta (empress) when he became co-emperor in the West. She served as regent for the first 12 years of her son Valentinian III's rule. She supported Augustine* during the Pelagian* controversy and Leo* during the Monophysite* controversy.

Gallicanism, a movement among French Catholics that defended the rights of the French Church to govern itself without papal control, a view also adopted by Catholics in other parts of the world (see, e.g., Brazil; Mexico). Ultramontanist* represented the opposite position. The decrees of the Council of Constance* (1418) and Basel* (1431–37) gave councils an authority independent of the pope and were cited by the French kings in defense of their special rights in the French Church. During Louis XIV's reign, the French bishops adopted the four "Gallican articles" (1682) affirming that kings are not subjects of the pope; general councils have an authority independent of the pope; the pope must respect the national churches' traditions and decrees; and papal statements in matters of faith are not binding without the whole church's consent. Louis XIV, in return for abandoning Gallican views, gained from Rome the right to appoint bishops and approve the publication of papal decrees and visits by papal legates. Gallicanism, promoted by the Jansenists*, was revived by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy (1790) and Napoleon's concordat with the pope (1801). The declaration of papal infallibility* at the First Vatican* Council excluded Gallicanism, but the Second Vatican* Council reaffirmed the role of national conferences of bishops. See also POPEs, ROMAN CATHOLIC, AND THE PAPACY.

EUGENE TESELLE

Gallican Rite, a liturgy widespread in the West after the 4th c. (Gaul, Spain*, Milan, and probably the Celtic* churches), more elaborate than the Roman Rite, with many features derived from Eastern liturgies, especially that of Antioch. Under Charlemagne*, the Roman Rite was adopted, but with Gallican features, which influenced the Roman liturgy in coming centuries. See also LITURGIES, HISTORY OF.

Gamaliel (d c50), a Pharisee*, member of the Sanhedrin*, and teacher of Paul* (Acts 22:3), who advised against persecuting the apostles (Acts 5:34–39).

Gangra, Synod of (c341), a regional synod in Asia Minor whose canons* were directed chiefly against the extreme asceticism* of Eustathius* of Sebaste for its negative view of marriage* and for its confusion of gender and class roles.

Garcés, Julián (c1452–1542), Dominican priest, first bishop in the Diocese of Tlaxcala, New Spain. His letter to Paul III describing the appalling treatment of the indigenous peoples helped to inspire the bull Sublimus Dei* (1537) on the dignity of these peoples. See also MEXICO. MARÍA ALICIA PUENTE LUTTEROTH and ELIZABETH JUDD

Garvey, Marcus (1887–1940), emigrated to the USA from Jamaica* (1915) and founded a black nationalist movement that thrived until his deportation (1940). Much of Garvey's activity centered on plans to establish political and commercial ties between Africa and the Americas. He also spoke of uniting, "civilizing," and Christianizing Africa in order to make it a modern military and industrial power. Garvey found support among numerous African American religious groups, including the Moorish Science Temple, a group of Black Hebrews who eventually migrated to Ethiopia*, and numerous Protestant ministers. The African Orthodox Church (with bishops legitimately claiming apostolic succession) adopted the Garveyite doctrine that Christ was the black man of sorrows. See also RASTAFARI MOVEMENT.

WILSON J. MOSES

Gay and Lesbian Theologies. During the era of "gay liberation" (1970s in North America and Western Europe), gay and lesbian people claimed the right to define themselves, wrestling that power from the legal and medical professions. Gay people began to construct themselves as a stable minority group and to make claims to equality under the law. Debates raged among gay and lesbian people as to whether sexual orientation was an objective, transcultural fact or a social construction. Lesbian feminists* challenged gay men to interrogate their investment in and collusion with the complex systems of patriarchy*. This social movement forced the churches to face the whole issue of homosexuality*. A body of gay liberal theology began to emerge. In these works, the authority of the gay or lesbian self was audaciously positioned as a challenge to the authority of Christian tradition and contemporary systems of Christian authority.

The concepts of a universal self and universal experiences were eventually challenged by Liberation* theologies, and the inherent goodness of gay culture came under scrutiny from feminist, black*, and lesbian sources. The specter of AIDS cast a terrifying cloud over gay liberation. Thus a much more self-critical body of gay and lesbian Liberation theology emerged (1980s). Influenced by Process* theology and the idea of God who suffers-with, the emergence of the Divine as erotic power is a persistent theme in sexual theology of this period. God was conceived as the power of right relationship, radically immanent, and experienced most intensely not in the patriarchal system of marriage* but in the fluid bonds of friendship*. But so radically immanent is this God that God often disappears into human experience, providing no critical horizon and no sense of mystery* or hope*.

In the 1990s, the work of queer* theorists began to have an impact on Christian reflection on sexuality* (see Bible Interpretation Cluster: In North America and Western Europe: Queer). Queer theory challenged the very concepts of sexuality, arguing that these are matters of performance, not hard, eternal reality. A new body of theology developed out of queer theory, characterized not by the perspective of a particular sexual orientation but rather by a belief that sexual orientation and gender are not stable enough concepts on which to build theologies. Queer theology claims that neither heterosexual nor homosexual experience can claim any kind of divine authority. Sexual ethics then has to be built on foundations other than gender.

Genesis, Book of, the first book of the Bible, reports traditions about the origins of the world and of Israel (primeval beginnings and ancestral sagas). The historical*-critical approach to Genesis distinguishes literary sources – J (Yahwist), E (Elohist; an expansion of J?), and P (Priestly) – and attributes to P the final edition. Some critics think of one original source, preceded by oral narratives and subsequently expanded to include other traditions reflecting Israel’s later experiences.

A “prologue” (Gen 1–11) shows a progressive corruption of the world that was originally created good. By contrast, Abraham* (12–25) inaugurates the history of salvation (of “all the families of the earth”; 12:3). The book ends with Joseph’s bones being carried from Egypt to the land of Israel. In between, Isaac* (26), Jacob* (27–35), and Joseph* (37–50) are presented without complacency as complex personalities on whom divine promises (of posterity, land, and bliss) are repeatedly bestowed. Structurally, Genesis’s framework is built around genealogical lists (“These are the generations of” occurs 10 times, starting with “heaven and earth” in 2:4a). They are attributed to P. They fill enormous chronological gaps and define Israel’s historical relationship with its neighbors (see 9, 10, 16, 19, 25) and within its own families and tribes (see 4, 12, 20, 26, 34, 38).

Parallels with ancient Near East myths* are abundant: sibling rivalries, universal degradation, a deluge (flood*) divinely sent, personal deities, various designations of the gods, impure divine-human commerce, and punished human hubris. Documents from Canaan, Mesopotamia, Egypt, Turkey, and Greece shed much light on a treasure trove of myths shared by Israel but often fundamentally reworked through “demythologization*.”

Genesis’s drafted picture is realistic, especially in terms of the problematic kinships that expand on the basic one between man and wife in

Gen 2–3. While a conservative viewpoint would read Genesis as history, critics consider it mostly legendary, i.e. meant to bear a faith* testimony rather than to belong to historiography. Actually, Genesis displays a “theological history” in which God is Lord in spite of the persistence of evil*, as the primeval narratives (3, 4, 6, 11) show in a paradigmatic way. These narratives are not paleographic; they state that God is creator* of all that is living, a message with its eschatological* apotheosis entrusted by God to Israel. Thus for believers through the centuries, Genesis as Scripture* binds past, present, and future in a historical complex marked by trust and meaningfulness. See also CREATION; IMAGE OF GOD; MYTH AND THE STUDY OF CHRISTIANITY.

ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Geneva Bible, English translation of the Bible (and Apocrypha*), published in Geneva in 1560, prepared by exiles from the England of “Bloody Mary.” Its notes promoted Calvinist theology and resistance to tyrannical heretical rulers. It was the Bible most widely used in England for a century and was purposefully replaced by the King James* Version.

Bible de Genève, a revision of Olivétan’s French translation by Beza* with pastors and professors of Geneva, published in 1588, was the official Bible of Geneva and French Huguenots.

Geneva (Calvin’s) and Its Theological Traditions. The Reformation* in Geneva had its roots from c1531 in political rebellion against the prince-bishop (the last one, Pierre de la Baume, left in 1533). Guillaume Farel’s*, Pierre Viret’s, and Antoine Froment’s preaching of Zwinglian* doctrine from 1534 led to the abolition of the Mass* (August 10, 1535) and the adoption of the Reformation (edict of May 21, 1536). The city was politically under the protection of Zwinglian Bern after separating from the Roman Catholic Diocese of Geneva. Calvin* arrived in July 1536 and was persuaded to stay and consolidate the religious changes. He and Farel were banished from Geneva (1538–41) for attempting to introduce church discipline (Communion* four times per year, moral censorship, excommunication*) that was judged too strict by the Zwinglian Church in Bern and the population of Geneva. Called back (1541), Calvin introduced a presbyterian* system of church government. The Church of Geneva was ruled by the Company of Pastors, headed by Calvin. The consistory, a mixed body of clergy and laypeople, shared with civil magistrates the task of policing morals and church discipline. Unlike civil courts, it could excommunicate but could not impose prison sentences. The powers conferred on the consistory curtailed civil authorities’ prerogatives in religious matters. Church discipline and its partial enforcement by the Church distinguished Geneva from the Zwinglian churches. To implement his system, Calvin relied on refugees from France and other countries. But the Calvinist Movement was not consolidated until 1555, because the original citizens remained favorable to the Zwinglian system. The movement also included a number of theological specificities, especially its emphasis on divine providence* and predestination* with the corresponding devaluation of human powers in the realm of salvation*. There were controversies, e.g. the Bolsec* affair, in which other Swiss churches showed a more reserved attitude. The movement gradually reinforced its image as anti-Catholic, rigorist, and biblicist. The execution of Michael Servetus (1553) for his heterodox views on the Trinity* prompted an outcry in favor of religious toleration and earned Calvin a reputation for cruelty, although not he but the Geneva Council imposed the death sentence. The Geneva Academy (founded 1559, with Beza* as its first rector) became the training ground for Protestant pastors from all over Europe. Most of Geneva’s theological traditions of the period were embodied in Calvin’s Institutes of Christian Religion and numerous sermons and biblical commentaries. Eventually the movement was to have an influence in many parts of the world, ranging from Northern Europe to North America and Asia. See also CALVIN, JEAN.

Gennadios II (George Scholarios) (c1405–c1473), the first patriarch of Ottoman Constantinople, a Byzantine theologian. As a layperson, George Scholarios served as a secretary, judge, and lay preacher at Emperor John VIII Palaiologos’s court in the final years of the Byzantine Empire. Scholarios participated, along with many other Byzantines, in the Council of Florence* (1447), supporting an agreement on church unity. But Scholarios soon opposed this agreement, as did many other participants. Following John VIII’s death (1449), Scholarios retired to the monastery of Pantocrator, Constantinople (1450), taking the name Gennadios. After the fall of Constantinople (1453), he was a prisoner of the Ottomans. The sultan Mehmed II turned to him to become patriarch, responsible politically for the Greek Orthodox population within the Ottoman Empire; the Greek Orthodox Church became a civil authority, according to the millet system. On two occasions, Gennadios was temporarily forced from this very difficult position. When he abdicated (c1463), he retired to the Prodromos monastery in Thessalonica, devoting himself to writing commentaries on Thomas Aquinas, apologies in support of Aristotle, and many other works on theology, ethics, and liturgy. Interestingly, he is the only Byzantine theologian known to use the term “transubstantiation*” to refer to the changing of bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ. See also MILLET. JAMES M. POWELL

Gentiles (Gk ethne; Lat gentiles), all the nations of the world (oikoumene), often in contrast to Israel (Rom 2–3, 9–11); according to the context, this distinction could be religious (Jews vs. non-Jews), ethnic (Israelites vs. non-Israelites), or political (an Israelite world vs. a Roman world). Because of Israel’s election*, the Gentiles/nations were often viewed as sinners and idolaters*; the Torah* placed restrictions on contacts with them. But Israel’s election was as “a light to the nations” (Isa 49:1–6). Paul is called as the apostle to the Gentiles/nations (Gal 1:16); the mission to the Gentiles/nations is approved by Peter and James (Gal 2; Acts 10, 15). In Christian usage, “Gentile” can also refer to a recalcitrant member of the church (Matt 18:17; cf. 21:31–32) or to a “pagan”* or idolater.

Genuflection, bending of the right knee to express reverence for the reserved sacrament or the name of Jesus (cf. Phil 2:10).

George of Cappadocia, Arian* bishop who replaced Athanasius* in 357; he was killed by a mob in 361 for an iconoclastic action, plundering a shrine.

George of Laodicea (4th c.), moderate Arian* bishop who opposed the Anomoian* views of Eudoxius* (for whom the Son is anomoios, or “unlike,” the Father in essence). With Basil* of Ancyra, he championed the Homoiousian* conception of the Trinity* (the Son is homoiousios, “like in essence,” with the Father, but not homoousios, “identical in essence”).

Georgia. National identity has always been closely associated with the Orthodox Church of Georgia: “Georgia is the country where church services are held in the Georgian language,” says The Life of St. Gregory of Khandzta (written 10th c.). Whether Christians, nonbelievers, or non-Christians, culturally all Georgians belong to the tradition preserved by the Orthodox Church of Georgia, although since 1991 this attitude has had ambivalent effects on the process of democratization and on church life.

According to tradition, the apostle Andrew was the first to preach Christianity in Georgia, and a Cappadocian woman, Nino*, converted the royal couple (King Mirian and Queen Nana); Christianity became the state religion of Iberia, the eastern part of present-day Georgia (c330). The kingdom of Colchis (Western Georgia) was Christianized shortly afterward (the two kingdoms unified in the early 11th c). Under Muslim rule, few Georgians ever converted to Islam*, even though after the fall of Constantinople (1453) the Church of Georgia was considerably weakened. Under Russian rule (from 1801), the Orthodox Church of Georgia was subordinated to the Russian* Orthodox Church (1811–1917). When the Soviet rule began (1921), the Orthodox Church of Georgia had 2,455 parishes, before being systematically silenced and suppressed.

Christian practice has dramatically increased since Ilya II became catholicos*-patriarch of Georgia (1977), encouraged a revival of daily devotion by writing a prayer book, and instituted reforms to enable the Georgian Orthodox Church to regain its role in social life and prestige in society. These reforms, which began with a confrontation with Soviet ideology, led to a revival of monastic life (in 1977, 4 monasteries with 20 monks and nuns; in 1988, 7 monasteries with 55 monks and nuns; in 2003, 65 monasteries with 250 monks and nuns). A great number of churches were reopened (in 1977, 25 parishes with 50 clergy; in 1988, 200 parishes with 180 clergy; in 2003, 550 parishes with 1,100 clergy).

The Constitution of 1995 affirms freedom of religion (for Roman Catholics, Baptists, Muslims, Jews, among others), yet mentions “the special role of the Orthodox Church of Georgia in the history of Georgia”; in a 2002 agreement between the Church and the state, the Orthodox Church of Georgia was granted the status of primus inter pares.

Statistics: Population (2007): 4.6 million. Christians, 89% (Orthodox, 83%; Armenian Non-Chalcedonian Orthodox, 5%; Roman Catholics, 1%; Baptists, 0.2%; Pentecostals, 0.1%); Muslims, 10%; Jews, 0.25%; nonreligious, 0.7%. (Source: 2002 census.)

German Christians. The German Christian Movement, founded in 1927, was one of many similar religious movements that, emerging from the spiritual crisis following Germany's defeat in World War I, sought to harmonize Lutheranism* with extreme German nationalism. "German Christians" became the most representative group and enthusiastically greeted the rise of Nazism (1932). They regarded Hitler as God's new revelation*, believed in the ideological* inseparability of Christianity and Nazism, and sought to unite German Protestants in one church under the control of the Nazi government. The Church* Struggle in Germany was based primarily on this issue. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRY.

MARK R. LINDSAY

German Literature and Christianity. Soon after the arrival of Christianity in Germany* (6th c.), early medieval vernacular literature provided Christian instruction and edification through texts such as paraphrases of the NT (Otfrid's Evangelienbuch, c870), depictions of Christ as liege lord in an old Saxon epic style (*Heliand, c830), poems on Christ's life by Ava (c1125), dramatic performances of Christ's Passion (Osterspiel von Muri, c1250), and mystical writings by Mechthild* von Magdeburg (1207–82) and Meister Eckhart* (1260–1329).

When clergy ceased to be the sole carriers of culture (12th c.), a courtly literature harmonized chivalric and Christian virtues. In his Parzifal, Wolfram von Eschenbach (1170–1220) presents an ideal Christian knight transcending his duties in the world by becoming the king of the Holy Grail*.

The most influential book for German language and literature was Luther's* Bible translation (1522–34). Its bold language has inspired writers and poets to the present day.

Throughout the Renaissance* and Reformation*, most prose literature was satirical and polemical, used in the controversies between the Reformers and their opponents. In the subsequent Catholic* Renewal (Counter Reformation), Jesuits* wrote plays with biblical subjects to be performed in schools. Meanwhile, the Protestant devotional book Six Books on True Christianity (1605–21) by Johann Arndt* edified Christians until the early 19th c. and inspired both sacred baroque poetry and early Pietism*.

Seventeenth-century German literature remained deeply religious. Protestant Boehme* and Catholic Angelus Silesius (1624–77) continued the mystical* literary tradition. During the devastating Thirty* Years' War in Germany, great Christian poetry was created, such as the still-popular church hymns by Paul Gerhardt (1607–76) and Protestant religious sonnets and heroic martyr tragedies by Gryphius (1616–64) that celebrated Christian stoicism. The Catholic convert Johannes Jacob Christoffel von Grimmelshausen (1621–76) in his picaresque novel Simplicissimus (1668–69) about the brutality of war portrayed a hero who withdraws from the world as a hermit.

German Pietism*, reacting to rigid Lutheran orthodoxy, had considerable influence on 18th-c. literature. With its introspective concerns, it shaped confessional and autobiographical writings. With its stress on the experience of God through feeling, Pietism inspired Friedrich Gotlieb Klopstock's Messias (1748–73), a series of cantos that form a biblical heroic epic in hexameter representing Christ's Passion and the Resurrection in an emotional, visionary manner.

Through the secularization* of the Enlightenment*, Christianity slowly lost its hold on German culture. Secular humanist authors such as Goethe (1749–1832) and Schiller (1759–1805) became the new prophets and spiritual leaders of the nation. In early romanticism, literature and art usurped the role of religion and became vehicles of spiritual revelation, as Novalis (Georg Philipp Friedrich Freiherr von Hardenberg, 1772–1801) emphasized. However, many later romantics, such as Joseph Karl Benedikt Freiherr von Eichendorff (1788–1822), Clemens Brentano (1778–1842), and Annette von Droste-Hülshoff (1797–1848), rediscovered the pre-Reformation Middle Ages and wrote with traditional Catholic sensitivities.

By the mid-19th c., as a result of the firmly established historical-critical method of biblical hermeneutics, the Bible understood as a historical document was nevertheless used as a storehouse of literary allusions, images, or story lines, often in an ironic vein, as in Thomas Mann's (1875–1955) tetralogy Joseph and His Brothers (1933–42), or for satire, as in Stefan Heym's (1913–2001) King David Report (1972). German expressionist writers around World War I voiced deep spiritual needs and experienced God as the inaccessible Other, somewhat akin to Barth's* early theology; the dramas of Ernst Barlach (1870–1938) are good examples. In the Third Reich, the Catholic writers Reinhold Schneider (1903–58) and Werner Bergengruen (1892–1964) were forbidden to publish, but their poems, clandestinely distributed, sustained many Germans. During the postwar 1950s and 1960s, the Christian novelist Heinrich Böll (1917–85) became the “conscience of the nation” through his attacks on the hypocrisy of the church and the new German affluence during German reconstruction. The use of biblical images in contemporary German poetry continues to be an intrinsic part of intertextual communication, as in the works of Paul Celan (1920–70), Peter Huchel (1903–81), Hans Magnus Enzensberger (b1929), and Ernst Jandl (1925–2000).

BARBARA CARVILL

Germany. Present-day German culture is Christian through and through. Half of the official monuments are churches and monasteries. After the Reformation*, the relationships among Roman Catholic, Lutheran, and Reformed churches were strained, yet the ecumenical movement finally dissolved these tensions. The state and the three large confessions are still interconnected. Religious socialization has declined, especially in Eastern Germany, but the need for spiritual support and transcendence is increasingly recognized. Loss of membership and shrinking financial resources in mainline churches have led to the closure and sale of church buildings (mostly built in the 1950s). Yet revivalist*, Evangelical*, and Charismatic* independent churches are growing.

History. Christianity spread within the boundaries of the present-day Federal Republic of Germany from the 6th to the 13th c. primarily through monastic missions, the sword, and monastic colonization (see Hospitallers; Military Orders; Teutonic Knights). The new religion was firmly rooted in all areas when the initial proclamation was followed by the building of churches and the establishment of dioceses and archdioceses. Parishes were often organized and supported by laypersons, the so-called proprietary churches (Eigenkirchenwesen), which still exist in the form of the patronage rights of influential people who determine parish appointments. In addition, when kings awarded land and legal sovereignty to bishops and archbishops (10th c.), they created independent ecclesiastical principalities. Although these divisions were officially erased by the secularization* of church properties (1803), they still influence confessional relationships. The religious authority of the imperial sovereign was acknowledged by the crowning in Rome of all the rulers of the Holy* Roman Empire of the German nation, from 800 (Charlemagne*) to 1530. Despite the limitation of power mutually agreed upon following the investiture* controversy (1122), medieval church history was a continual power struggle between pope (sacerdotium) and emperor (imperium). During the Crusades* (12th and 13th c.), both powers worked together to liberate Palestine from the “infidels.”

Indulgences* granted in connection with the Crusades introduced an indulgence-based piety (reinforcing the juridical view of sin* and atonement*), whose abuse provoked the protest of the monk Martin Luther*. Excommunication* drove Luther and his followers into final opposition. The Protestant Reformation* grew in many territories and cities under princely protection. Luther was concerned to guide the church, theology, and piety back to the gospel of a freely given personal justification* by faith* and to declare all pious practices to be ineffective for salvation*. In order to lend a solid basis to the changed understanding of faith, Luther translated the Bible into German, wrote hymns, developed liturgies (see Lutheranism Cluster: Lutheran Worship), and wrote catechisms*. He replaced church hierarchy and the pope with a pastoral ministry concentrated on the proclamation of the Word and the administration of the sacraments.

Zwingli* and Calvin* had similar concerns but could not achieve agreement with Luther regarding the Eucharist* and other issues, and the Reformed* churches took a separate course. Luther’s supporters gathered around the Augsburg* Confession of Faith (1530) and were acknowledged as a religious party at the Augsburg Reichstag (1555). The Reformed cited the Heidelberg* Catechism (1563) but remained unprotected until the Peace of Westphalia (1648). Anabaptists* and Spiritual* Reformers were granted tolerance only at specific locations and generally only much later. With the exception of the imperial cities, the Catholic and the Protestant state churches and territorial churches once again were monoconfessional.

In the Protestant sphere, city magistrates and princes, supported by consistories, took over the administrative functions of the bishops. This territorial church government existed until 1918 and continues to have an effect today, e.g. in the state’s levy of church taxes for the three major churches.

In the Catholic sphere, a phase of consolidation and definition followed the Reformation upheaval. Catholicism undertook a fundamental reorientation at the Council of Trent* (1545–1563), supported by the Jesuit* order and other monastic foundations. The Index Librorum Prohibitorum* (List of prohibited books) had an isolating effect (1559–1966).

After the development of the territorial churches, Protestantism concentrated on securing the legacy of the Reformation through dogmatic theology. In addition, during the Thirty* Years' War (1618–48) and afterward, pre-Reformation mysticism* took on new life in Pietism*.

The repeated efforts to achieve peaceful coexistence despite bitter polemics remained ineffective. Paul Gerhardt's hymns, however, overcame confessional barriers. With the foundation of the institutions at Halle, Francke* provided social-ethical and reformist-pedagogical influences. Von Zinzendorf* gave basic social relevance to the piety of individual conversion; the Moravian* Church that he founded, centered in Herrnhut, still serves a worldwide Bible-reading community through its publication of "Daily Watchwords [verses]" (Losungen).

The unease of all these churches regarding the constraints of dogma* and of the authoritarian state-church system favored the development of the Enlightenment*, which took a specifically German form under the influence of Gottfried Leibniz, Christian Wolff, Lessing*, and Kant*. Consequently, a biblically critical, moral, and tolerant Christianity within the limits of reason emerged. In reformist Catholic circles, even the idea of a national church independent of Rome began to germinate.

The most lasting effect on German Christianity until the late 20th c. was that of the French Revolution (1789), the Napoleonic expansionist wars of liberation (1792–1813), and the end of the old Holy* Roman Empire (1806). The integration of the lands of the abolished ecclesiastical territories into secular territories strengthened regional church structures even in Catholicism and made religious tolerance more urgent than ever. Despite the continued existence of territorial church governments, the democratic awakening in the German Federation and in the Bismarckian Empire (late 19th c.) led to a cautious "democratization" of Protestant Church administrations taking the form of church councils and synods. Of course, only men were eligible to vote and to be elected. Women obtained the ecclesiastical (and political) right to vote only in 1919. When unions between Lutherans and Reformed – administrative, liturgical (Prussia), and (occasionally) confessional unions – were ordered by political authorities, numerous union opponents (later tolerated as Free Church Old Lutherans) emigrated to North America (see Lutheran Cluster: In the United States: Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod) and Australia. The fossilized religion of the Enlightenment (early 19th c.) was enlivened by romanticism*, idealism, and a German revivalism* – a movement prolonging Pietism embraced by individual Protestants enthusiastically preaching the Kingdom* of God and its justice.

Representatives of all three confessions – the Catholics Johann Michael Sailer and Johann Adam Möhler, the Lutherans August Tholuck and Matthias Claudius, and the Reformed Friedrich Schleiermacher* – strove to overcome the undue influence of the Enlightenment in theology and piety. Regenerative forces arose in Catholicism through the highly motivated monastic orders, the new scholasticism*, and orders devoted to social work. Catholic Sisters of Mercy and Protestant deaconesses as well as diverse Catholic and Protestant associations worked with great commitment to improve social conditions (early 19th c.). Until Vatican* I (1869–70), there was very little tension between Catholics (liberal and often critical of the pope) and Protestants. The promulgation of the dogmas of the immaculate* conception of Mary (1854) and of the doctrinal infallibility* of the pope (1870) was resisted even among Catholics; in protest the Old* Catholic Church separated from the Roman Catholic Church (1870/71). Yet Catholics who opposed such movements against Rome were strengthened by resisting Bismarck's legislation against the Catholic Church (the Kulturkampf directed against Ultramontanist) and by the development of a political Catholicism (Center Party). Despite the peace laws (from 1886), civil marriage and state supervision of the schools remained in effect.

Long-term challenges for Christianity in the modern world arose from the social problems caused by industrialization; the socialism* promoted by Karl Marx* and Friedrich Engels; the atheistic movement initiated by Feuerbach* and Nietzsche*; various social movements of emancipation; World War I and the collapse of the monarchy; the Protestant churches' sudden independence from the state; the unloved Weimar Democracy; the National Socialist (Nazi) tyranny; the "Church* Struggle"; World War II; de-Nazification; the processing of the past and ecclesiastical reconstruction with ecumenical aid; the reshaping of the relationship between Christians and Jews after the Holocaust*; German political division; the churches of the German Democratic Republic (GDR) under socialist rule until 1989; the peace* movement at a time of rearmament and nuclear threat; the questions posed by ecumenical* Christianity, the Two-thirds World and colonialism*, ecology*, and ongoing technological* development; and the search for meaning and orientation in a global world becoming ever more secular (see Secularization and Desecularization in Europe and North America). These complex circumstances deeply shaped contemporary Christianity.

Churches in Contemporary Germany. Within the 16 federal states of the Federal Republic of Germany, there are 7 Roman Catholic archdioceses (and 27 dioceses), 23 Lutheran, Reformed, and United regional churches, and numerous free and independent churches.

The presiding bishop of the German Bishops' Conference represents the Roman Catholic Church in its relationship with the German state and with Rome. The Central Committee of German Catholics, a lay Catholic organization, has the responsibility of preparing the Katholikentag (Catholic Day, since 1848), a cultural gathering of Catholic Germans held every two years and also, more recently, the co-responsibility for organizing the ecumenical Kirchentag (Church Day).

The Protestant regional churches (Landeskirchen), each with its own administrative office (with three women as bishops, 2007), still reflect the earlier territorial organization. Yet since 1948, they have been united in a church federation, the Evangelische Kirche Deutschlands (EKD, led by the chair of its council), to deal with matters of common concern, including revising Bible translations, worship lectionaries, and hymnals, supervising theological education, issuing statements on current questions in church and public life, and especially representing more effectively the whole church in its relations with the state.

In 1969, the (East) German Democratic Republic demanded the dissolution of the Alliance of Protestant Churches (Bund der Evangelischen Kirchen) in the GDR. Yet Protestant churches strove to develop Christian life in a socialist context, promulgating courageous resolutions criticizing social conditions that contributed to the political "turning point" of 1989.

Since 1991 the Protestant church federations from Western and Eastern Germany have been united, and there is an ongoing movement toward church union among Protestant churches. Protestantism has also developed a Deutscher Evangelischer Kirchentag (German Protestant Day), held every two years and led by laypeople (like the Katholikentag). The Protestant Day promotes discussion forums on current issues, musical performances, liturgical and worship innovations.

The Evangelische Kirche Deutschlands also encompasses three confessional alliances (reflecting the movement toward church unions): The United Protestant churches (Union Evangelischer Kirchen, 2003; earlier under other names); the Vereinigte Evangelisch-Lutherische Kirche Deutschlands, which unites eight Lutheran churches (since 1948); and the Reformed Alliance (Reformierter Bund), which unites two Reformed regional churches and numerous Reformed congregations (progressively since 1884). Most Protestant free or independent churches (with the exception of the Mennonites*) are gathered in a union (the Vereinigung Evangelischer Freikirchen, since 1926) that includes those churches that originated from German revivalism* and the rejection of liberalism, as well as the Baptists.

Certain churches are not included in any of these alliances, namely conservative Lutheran churches (the Selbständige Evangelisch-lutherische Kirche), which separated themselves in 1972, rejecting both the ordination* of women and the *Leuenberg Agreement (1973, a theological consensus establishing full communion among the majority of Lutheran, Reformed, and United churches in Germany). Nevertheless, these conservative Lutheran churches remain in contact with other churches and are members of the broader and more informal association of churches, the Arbeitsgemeinschaft christlicher Kirchen (since 1974), which includes the Catholic German Bishops' Conference and three Orthodox churches, and sponsors the yearly "Week of Prayer for Christian Unity."

Although the three major churches (Catholic, Lutheran, Reformed) continue to experience a declining membership (owing to loss of members and low birthrate), they still have relatively stable "folk* church" structures remaining from their former roles as state* churches, providing for rites of passage (baptism, confirmation, marriage, funeral services) with a growing emphasis on the pastoral counseling associated with these rites. Celebrating the Sabbath and devoting long weekends to the main Christian feasts are affirmed as rights. There are, of course, differences between city and countryside, and between East and West Germany. In the former GDR, 40 years of socialist government and the opening of the state security files have left deep wounds in the churches.

Catholic Masses, celebrated in the German language since Vatican* II, are generally better attended than the liturgically simpler Protestant services. But even those dissociated from the church still fill the pews for concerts of sacred music (by, e.g., Bach* and Handel*). Thematic worship services with modern music and special presentations find increased favor. Despite what some view as obstacles – priestly celibacy and gender inclusiveness for pastors in the Protestant churches (see Women's Christian Practices and Theologies Cluster: In Western Europe: Germany), the priestly or pastoral ministry is highly esteemed and centered on mission, preaching, and counseling. Church work with children, youth, and women's and men's groups, as well as social work, are performed by lay co-workers and volunteers. Protestant and Catholic schools and institutions, with challenging educational and social programs, also reach people on the periphery of the church.

Piety in Germany. Piety, religious life devoted to the gospel, has taken many forms through the centuries in Germany. The medieval church made a clear distinction between the piety of laypeople (focused on doing God's will in secular life; see Laity Cluster) and those of religious* orders observing the evangelical counsels* of perfection (through asceticism*, prayer, and praise of God behind cloister walls). When Luther emphasized salvation* through faith* active in love and the priesthood* of all believers, and when, consequently, Protestantism abandoned cloisters, Protestantism also lost havens of intensive discipleship* that nurtured specific charisms* as well as art. Except for a few surviving Protestant religious foundations for women (Damenstifte), it was only after 1945 that men and women, deeply moved by traumatic war experiences, but also by Pietistic, High Church, or Charismatic religious experiences, gathered together in Protestant Kommunitäten. The members of these Protestant religious monastic communities renounce marriage and private property in order to lead a common spiritual life in communities financially supported by their own work and by donations. In 2004 more than 1,300 persons followed this way of life in 40 Protestant Kommunitäten and approximately 5,000 men and 25,000 women in Catholic religious* orders lived in cloisters with ordered prayer and binding vows.

The common form of Christian piety today is expressed in active church participation (including volunteer church work). Exaggerated forms of Christian piety (cult of the saints*, abuse of indulgences*) belong to the past. But the common quest for a modern form of spirituality* (as in Taizé*) connects all Christians with one another. Family devotions and private Bible reading are exceptional. Only a few still have a personal (theistic*) conception of God*. Yet pious Evangelicals are found everywhere, e.g. in the Gnadau Communal Movement, which sees itself as a provider of religious revivals* for the Protestant regional churches. Extreme conservatives are more prominent in Catholicism (Opus Dei) than in Protestantism.

Theology. The relationship between theology, piety, and the church was and is not always harmonious. Pietism and revivalism were considered for a time to be theologically heterodox. The papal Syllabus* of Errors (1864) condemned 80 religious, ethical, and political "modern errors"; from 1910 to 1965–67, Catholic clergy were required to pledge themselves to the condemnation of Modernism*. Vatican* II brought an opening not only in liturgy and administrative structures, but also in theology. In 1966 the prohibition of Protestant books was lifted. Romano Guardini (1885–1968, who taught in Berlin, Tübingen, and Munich and had a major influence on the Liturgical* Movement in Germany) and Rahner* took up ideas from Aquinas* while in dialogue with modern philosophy (Heidegger*) and the natural sciences. Rahner's prognosis that the pious person of the future would be a mystic* applies to all denominations. Toward the end of World War I, Protestant liberal theology (Ritschl*) collapsed together with the optimism expressed in Culture* Protestantism with its quest for a present-day Kingdom* of God (Harnack*). The Religious Socialists sought to combine the concerns of communism and the workers' movement with the gospel. Through his proclamation of the infinite distinction between God and the world, Barth* rejected every form of hyphenated Christianity.

Encouraged by the Reformation jubilees (1883 and 1917), neo-Lutheranism took up concerns (expressed in the reinterpreted Lutheran doctrine of the two* kingdoms and in the theology of the orders of creation*) that accommodated the German* Christians and National Socialists (Nazis). The national sense of having been deeply hurt by the Treaty of Versailles at the end of World War I was mitigated by the religiously charged concept of Volkstum (nationalism). The Confessing* Church, influenced by Barth's* theology, was just as unsuccessful after 1933 as was faithful Lutheranism in resisting the cult of the Führer, the dictatorship of Gleichschaltung (coordination), and the inhumane racial ideology* of Nazism (as Bonhoeffer* noted). Nevertheless, the Barmen* Theological Declaration (1934) and the Confessing* Church's ideologically critical memorandum addressed to Hitler (1936) motivated individuals to resist in words and deeds. German Roman Catholics, fearful of Russian Communism, accepted an ambivalent concordat* with Hitler (1933). Bishop Clemens August Graf von Galen and the encyclical Mit brennender Sorge (With deep anxiety, 1937) strengthened the Catholic opposition, which was more pronounced than that of the Protestant camp. Yet clergy and laity in all the churches fell victim to the regime, opposing Nazism in only a limited way.

After 1945 German theology was dominated by Barth and other Church* Struggle theologians (including Niemöller* and Helmut Gollwitzer), as well as Erlangen Lutherans (who did not participate in the Church Struggle because of their views of the relationship of faith* to history*; Paul Althaus, Werner Elert) and Tillich*, who exerted an influence from exile in the USA. Bultmann's* demythologization program progressively reached church members. In the 1960s, the death* of God debate questioned theology after the Holocaust*. Bonhoeffer's views, developed in prison, about "the nonreligious interpretation of biblical concepts," the "this-worldliness of Christianity," and the danger of a "cheap grace*" influenced a generation of young theologians. Gerhard Ebeling fruitfully reinterpreted Reformation theology for the present. Jürgen Moltmann's "theology of hope*" (1964) not only invigorated eschatology*, but also showed the church the way into an ecumenical future. The youth and students' movement of 1968 with its systematic critique of society did not leave church and theology untouched.

Diaconal and Social Engagement. In pre-Reformation times, cloisters and monastic foundations (Hospitallers*) took care of the poor and sick. In addition, the giving of alms, which was considered meritorious, mitigated acute distress. The Reformers organized public welfare in the congregations with the aid of church assets and freewill donations. But since these "good works" were no longer of use in achieving salvation*, the churches' contributions to welfare shrank so much that communal care of the poor had to be increasingly supplemented by the city or principality.

To combat more effectively the social misery caused by 19th-c. population growth, loss of farmworkers' jobs, and industrialization, Wichern* called the Protestant churches to address the "social question" in a historic speech at the Wittenberg Kirchentag (1848). In 1849 he founded the Central Committee for Inner* Mission, which would coordinate private and church initiatives. For Wichern lack of faith and moral decline were the major causes of the social crisis; he thus combined social assistance and mission. A complete network of social relief institutions was established all over Germany.

During the Third Reich, the Inner Mission was forced to compete with the Nazi people's welfare organization; the employment of the Nazis' euthanasia policies (outside the facilities of the Inner Mission) could be prevented in only a few cases. In 1975 the Inner Mission (within the diaconal work of the Evangelische Kirche Deutschlands) and other professional associations regained their economic independence as "public corporations," shifting from care for the sick, handicapped, and old people to counseling as well as integration of refugees*, foreigners, the poor, and the oppressed* in Germany and abroad (including the Two-thirds World).

Since 1897 the Caritasverband, the association of Catholic relief and social service agencies, has worked side by side with the Protestant welfare agencies in Germany and abroad. Together they make a vital contribution to welfare in Germany and the humanization of society. The fund-raising drives conducted by the relief organizations benefit projects in the Two-thirds World for the most part. The declaration "For a Future in Solidarity and Justice" (1997), jointly issued by the Council of the EKD and the German Bishops' Conference, reminds those who are becoming ever richer of their responsibility for the growing number of poor people (see Poverty Cluster). Not to be forgotten here is the Christian-motivated peace movement led by the historic “peace* churches” (Mennonites*, Quakers*, Brethren*), who speak out for nonviolence*, justice*, the preservation of creation*, and an effective education* for peace.

Religious Education. According to the constitution of the Federal Republic, there is no state church. Nevertheless, Protestant and Catholic religious instruction is a required subject in public schools, taught under state supervision “in agreement with the principles of the religious denominations.” Yet the parents or legal guardians of students can elect to replace it by courses on, e.g., ethics or comparative religion.

At state universities, there are Catholic and Protestant theological faculties (see Theological Education Cluster: In Western Europe: Germany) in accordance with the still-valid 1933 Reich Concordat and regional concordats with Rome, and similar conventions between Protestant churches and states – a situation that sometimes gives rise to conflict between academic freedom and church commitment. Chaplaincy in hospitals and the military follows a similar pattern of church and state relations.

Christians and Jews in Germany. For centuries, Jews were required to pay for the limited protection granted to them by the emperor and regional princes. In times of crisis (Crusades*, plagues, epidemics, crop failure), they fell victim to scapegoating, being persecuted as “Christ murderers” and deniers of the Messiah. Initially, Luther* had hoped for the conversion of many Jews to Christianity. Later, he recommended and approved severe measures against them.

The Enlightenment* mitigated Christian anti*-Judaism. Astonishing rapprochements took place between Christianity and Reform Judaism, from which many baptisms resulted. In 1871 Jews gained equal rights in the Second German Empire. Yet this success engendered new resentments that grew into a racist* anti*-Semitism after World War I. The German* Christians made anti-Semitism a part of their basic policy and therewith played into the hands of Nazi policy (Nuremberg racial laws, 1935). Although individual Christians interceded on behalf of Jews and Jewish Christians and, in return, were imprisoned or killed, as a result of the Nazi policy of Gleichschaltung (bringing under Nazi control all aspects of society, including religion), the Christian churches could not prevent the genocide of 6 million European Jews beginning in 1941 (see Church Struggle).

The Stuttgart Declaration of Guilt, issued by Protestant theologians in October 1945, laments the “infinite suffering” that was brought “upon many peoples and countries,” but does not mention the Holocaust*. Only in 1950 did the Synod of the EKD confess a partial Christian responsibility, a confession that opened the process of Jewish-Christian dialogue. Official declarations by Protestant churches on the church and Israel followed. Similarly, Vatican II paved the way for a transformed relationship with the Jews. Now a broad consensus affirms the inseparable connection of the Christian faith with Judaism*, the enduring election of Israel, the need to stop the mission to the Jews, and the need to recognize the state of Israel. The canonization (1998) of the Carmelite nun of Jewish origin, Edith Stein, murdered at Auschwitz in 1942, was viewed in different ways by Jews and Christians. Since 1973 the academic year of study at the Benedictine abbey Dormitio in Jerusalem for Catholic and Protestant German-speaking students of theology also contributes to the understanding among Christians, Jews, and Muslims (see Judaism and Christianity Cluster).

Ecumenism and Interreligious Relations. The streams of refugees from the East during and after World War II caused the largest confessional shifts since 1803. In this situation, the willingness to live in tolerant, peaceful coexistence was more than ever put to the test. All previous attempts to overcome divisions among Christians, including among the churches of the Reformation, had been unsuccessful. But after years of doctrinal discussion, reconciliation between Lutherans and Reformed was achieved in the Leuenberg Concord (1973). The 105 Protestant churches (including small groups like the Bohemian Brethren*, Waldenses*, and Methodists*) gathered together in the Community of Protestant Churches in Europe (2003), allowing pulpit exchange and intercommunion (joint participation in the Eucharist). The churches of the EKD have agreed on intercommunion with the Mennonites, and conversations with the Anglican Church progress.

The Catholic Church is not a member of the World* Council of Churches but is represented in its Faith* and Order Commission. In 1985 the Ecumenical Working Group of Protestant and Catholic Theologians produced a study on the repeal of the central doctrinal condemnations of the 16th century (so far accepted only by the Protestants). In 1999 representatives of the Lutheran* World Federation and the Roman Catholic Council on Unity signed the "Official Finding on the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification*." On the Catholic side, the acceptance of the Protestants as a church, the recognition of Protestant pastoral offices, and the permission to hold joint celebrations of the Eucharist (especially in mixed marriages) are still open questions. Nevertheless, all of these are often simply practiced by Christians at the grassroots level. The recent removal of the wall that for more than 450 years separated the Protestant nave in St. Michael's Church at Hildesheim from the Catholic crypt is a sign of reconciliation. As the claims to possess absolute truth are abandoned, the negative images of other Christians fade; the dialogue between Christianity and other religions not only is possible, but is in full swing.

Conclusion. Although the role of Christianity in society and the financial powers of the churches will continue to decline, the Christian origins of German art, architecture, music, and literature endure. Although the state* church structures have faded away, the gospel continues to be experienced as a force that preserves values and provides meaning, orientation, and hope in the peaceful contest among religions. See also MISSION CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE: GERMANY; THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE: GERMANY; WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN PRACTICES AND THEOLOGIES CLUSTER: IN WESTERN EUROPE: GERMANY.

INGE MAGER

Gerson, Jean Charlier de (1363–1429), a highly influential French theologian, who was and remains an extremely controversial figure. Born into a peasant family, he became the chancellor of Paris University, royal adviser, ecclesiastical leader, humanist poet, pedagogue, and outstanding preacher. Holding a perplexing combination of traditional and innovative attitudes, simultaneously referred to as Ockhamist* (see Ockham [Occam], William) and Scotist (see Duns Scotus), Gerson was also called "the most Christian and consoling doctor" for his genuine piety and ability to lead others from desperation to hope. A mystic*, but also rational* and practical, he longed for a compromise between love and reason*, advocating a Christ-centered faith* over theoretical learning. Gerson played a crucial role in the revival of affective Pastoral* theology expressed in his famous motto, "Do penance and believe the gospel." Influenced by Dionysius* the Pseudo-Aeropagite, the school of Richard* of Saint Victor, Bernard* of Clairvaux, and Bonaventure*, he reveals remarkable knowledge of human psychology and strong democratic tendencies. Seeking to open contemplative life to laity* and particularly to women, Gerson laid down the conditions and methods preparatory to contemplation*. His dialectic "theology of seeking" or "covenantal causality" (M. S. Borrows) represents a compromise between active and passive approaches, Quietism* and theology of merits*, safeguarding both divine sovereignty and human freedom. This mystical quest of God, which aimed at solving the dilemma of grace* by finding a via media between fideism and voluntarism, influenced such 15th- and 16th-c. theologians as Nicolas* of Cusa and Lefèvre* d'Etaples. Without being anti-sacramental, Gerson developed his Christology with Christ as the medium of grace. One of the most eminent orators of his time, strongly influenced by Petrarch*, whom he imitated, Gerson encouraged the study of the classics. A linguistic innovator, he preached and wrote in Latin or French, according to his audience. A conservative Catholic, he promoted devotion* to the Blessed Virgin Mary* and St. Joseph but severely criticized the Roman Catholic Church for corruption and abuses. He admitted, for the sake of emerging from the Great* Schism (1378–1417) and returning to unity, the superiority of the ecumenical council over the pope in extreme cases. Because of his French patriotism and Conciliar* views, he has been traditionally associated with Gallicanism*. Gerson's lifelong concern being that of preserving the unity of Christendom, he was a leader in condemning John Hus* during the Council of Constance*. His influence can be traced up to Francis* de Sales and Cardinal Bossuet*.

YELENA MAZOUR-MATUSEVICH

Gertrude the Great (1256–1302), mystic*, nun, writer, proponent of devotion to the Sacred Heart; background, parentage unknown; member of the Saxon monastery of Helfta from the age of four until her death; often confused with Gertrude of Hackeborn, Abbess* of Helfta (1251–91).

The monastery of Helfta employed Benedictine* and Cistercian* traditions and was under the spiritual direction of Dominican* friars. Helfta provided Gertrude with a solid education and companions such as the mystics* Mechthilde* of Magdeberg and Mechthilde of Hackeborn, whose mystical experiences she helped record in Latin. Gertrude, influenced by Augustine*, Gregory* the Great, the Victorines*, and Bernard* of Clairvaux, produced works in German and Latin. The former (letters, commentaries, prayers, etc.) are lost. She is remembered for the Latin pieces, Spiritual Exercises and The Herald of Divine Love (Legatus memorialis abundantiae divinae pietatis). Herald was completed by fellow nuns shortly after her death, incorporating autobiographical material, including her experiences since her first vision at the age of 25.

Her Dominican advisers approved her works and later recommended them to Teresa* of Ávila. Gertrude was designated “the Great” by Cardinal Lambertini (Pope Benedict XIV). Recent studies concern her focus on female monastic communities and their spirituality*.

SABINA FLANAGAN

Gertrude of Nivelles (626–59), abbess of a monastery in Nivelles (Belgium), known for her hospitality* to pilgrims and her generous benefactions to Irish monks.

Ghana (former British colony, “Gold Coast,” 1874–1957). Vibrant Christianity in Ghana is culturally marked, contextualized, and inculturated* both in ritual practices and in community and social practices, reflecting the roles of women and of the popular majority. These inculturated features are apparent in the interactions of Christianity with African* Traditional Religion and Islam*.

Historical Survey. Christianity in Ghana can be traced back to the arrival of Augustinian*, Capuchin*, and Dominican* friars, Roman Catholic missionaries from Portugal*, first in Shama, a coastal village (1482). They were displaced by the Dutch (1637) but reentered the Gold Coast in 1880 (at Elmina) through the Society of African Missions. By 1906 Roman Catholicism had been introduced to Northern Ghana, where it greatly expanded between 1914 and 1917.

Protestantism was introduced in Ghana (primarily in the coastal region) by missionaries of the Moravian United Brethren (c1618), the Netherlands Reformed Dutch (c1742), and the Church of England Society for Propagation of the Gospel (1751). But the Presbyterian and Methodist churches (including the African Methodist Episcopal Zionist and Christian Methodist) were established primarily on the foundation laid by missionaries from the Basel mission (Christiansborg, 1828), Bremen mission (1847) (both replaced by missionaries from the United Free Church of Scotland, 1917), and Wesleyan Methodist Mission (1835). Other Protestant denominations were also established in Ghana, including the Anglican, Mennonite, Evangelical Lutheran, Baptist, and Society of Friends*. These major Protestant churches are now members of the Christian Council of Ghana and are affiliated with the World* Council of Churches and other ecumenical bodies. All these “mission churches” resulted from efforts by missionaries not only to evangelize, convert people, and build churches, but also to establish schools for training members of the African elite to assume important positions in the church and political government.

Apart from the mission churches, Pentecostalism* (from the early 20th c.), led by William Wadé Harris (1860–1929), John Swatson (1855–1925), and Kwame Sarpong Oppong (1884–1965), played an important role in Ghanaian Christianity. Pentecostalism and, following it, the Charismatic* Movement gave birth to African* Instituted Churches (AICs), which broke away from the mission churches by emphasizing revivalism* that, through the “African worldview,” seeks to address Africans’ authentic need for deep spirituality and religiosity. Pentecostalism and the Charismatic Movement made room for women’s active participation in Christianity. For example, the first and largest AIC in Ghana (the Twelve Apostle Church, a 1914 offshoot of Harris’s work) was jointly founded and led by John Nackabah and the prophetess Grace Tani.

The most recent development in Ghanaian Christianity is the New Religious (or neo-Charismatic*) Movement within the mission churches; it purposefully remains within the mission churches but brings about revivalism* by incorporating “Spirit-filled” charismatic tendencies into worship, focusing on the vibrancy of the work of the Holy* Spirit (speaking in tongues*, loud praying, healing*/deliverance, animated Bible study, use of incense and candles), as do Pentecostal and Charismatic churches.

Throughout the country, these various Christian denominations are often characterized by cultural and linguistic affinities. Thus there are two Presbyterian churches: the Evangelical Presbyterian Church, found mainly in the southeast (Volta region), with mainly Ewe-speaking members; and the Presbyterian Church of Ghana, found mainly in Accra among Akwapim-speaking peoples. The Ashanti and central region Christians are mainly Roman Catholic. The Fante-speaking peoples are mainly Methodists.

Christianity is pervasive but is found mainly in Southern Ghana, while the north is largely Muslim (since the 15th c., before the arrival of Christianity). Islam's great appeal is that it fosters continuity with African Religion (especially polygamy*) rather than propagating Western ideals. Although Christianity, Islam, and African Religion tend to coexist amicably, they nevertheless compete.

Distinctive Features of Christianity in Ghana.

Several important features mark the diversity in religion in Ghana. In the mission churches (e.g. Roman Catholic, Presbyterian, Methodist, Anglican, Baptist), traditional worship is serene and calm, whereas in the AICs and Charismatic churches, the atmosphere is robust, lively, and body and soul moving. In addition, the mission churches tend to follow Western/Eurocentric literary liturgical practices, while the AICs and Charismatic churches tend to blend "received" Western traditions with practical African socio-cultural and contextual elements that cater to believers' everyday needs. The outcome of this "hermeneutic* of grafting" (Akoto) is neither one nor the other but a unique flavor of both. For example, whereas the mission churches see salvation* as repentance* from sin* (personal and "original" sin), the AICs and other "Spirit-filled" or Charismatic churches see salvation as directed toward well-being and success in earthly life now (see Prosperity Gospel Cluster: In Africa). Although the idea of God* seems similar to that of mission churches and Western mainline churches, for the AICs and Charismatic churches God, "the Supreme Being," is construed not only as transcendent, but also as in control of the universe, including daily life. This conception of the Supreme Being (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster: In Africa) is manifested in the names and attributes accorded to the Supreme Being and to individuals at birth. As in the mission churches, where God is accessible through Jesus (and saints), in the AICs the Supreme Being is ultimate and cannot be directly approached; hence in addition to Jesus, intermediary-like divinities ("lesser" gods), consulted through local priests/priestesses or prophets/prophetesses, are employed to reach the Supreme Being for material and spiritual success. Furthermore, whereas Western mission churches are infused with the Cartesian philosophy and theology of rationalism and empiricism (cogito, sum; "I think, I am"; see Descartes, René) of the 17th- and 18th-c. Enlightenment*, which is skeptical of the impingement of the supernatural on the material realm, Ghanaian Christianity of the 21st-c. AICs and Charismatic churches sees life as populated by both benevolent and malevolent spirits, which influence the course of human life for good or for evil. Equilibrium is, therefore, maintained by "propitiation*, expiation* and reconciliation*" (Bediako).

Ghetto (Italian, contraction of borghetto, "little borough"), section of a city to which Jews were restricted; often walled, with gates closed at a definite hour. Legally required segregation began in Portugal* and Spain* (late 14th c.); the practice spread to Italy and involved the greatest number of Jews in Germany. See also ANTI-SEMITISM; HOLOCAUST, JEWISH (OR SHOAH).

Gibbon, Edward (1737–94), historian of the later Roman Empire. He read widely in classical literature, and on a visit to Rome in 1764, he conceived his Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, published in three volumes (1776–81). Building on several centuries of work by Catholic and Protestant scholars, it set a new standard for comprehensiveness, detailed analysis, and stylistic subtlety. Gibbon's discussion of Christianity tends to be vitriolic ("triumph of barbarism and religion," "monks, eunuchs, and women"), but he accurately highlighted many issues and is still profitably read.

Gideon, one of the "judges*," whose call was confirmed by the miracle of the fleece (Judg 6:36–40). With a force intentionally reduced to 300, he routed the Midianites (Judg 7).

Gideon Bibles, Bibles placed in hotel rooms and other places of accommodation by an organization of Christian business people. The Gideons were founded by a small group of traveling salesmen in Janesville, Wisconsin (1899), taking their name from Gideon*. The organization now operates widely in the English-speaking world.

Gifts of the Spirit. This phrase is not found in the NT, which merely refers to the Holy* Spirit as a "gift" (of God) (Acts 2:38, 8:20, 10:45, 11:17; possibly John 4:10). In Roman Catholicism, "gifts of the Spirit" are those listed in Isa 11:2 (the spirit of wisdom, understanding, counsel, strength, knowledge, and fear of the Lord). In Protestantism and the Charismatic* Movement, this phrase designates the plurality of "graces" (charismata*; often translated "gifts") given by the Spirit* to perform particular tasks or vocations* for the good of others (cf. 1 Cor 12:4–11). Paul includes the utterance of messages of wisdom* and of knowledge, faith*, healing*, the working of miracles*, prophecy, discernment of the spirits, and tongues, or glossolalia*.

Gilbert de la Porrée, or Gilbertus Porretanus (1070–1154), an early scholastic theologian who taught in Chartres and Paris, then became bishop of his native city of Poitiers. He is known chiefly for his "realist"view of the Trinity, holding that the essence* of God is distinct from and prior to the three persons*. He was condemned (1148) for teaching, in effect, a "quaternity."

Gilbert of Sempringham (c1083–1189), monastic reformer and founder of the Gilbertines. Born in Lincolnshire, he studied in France before becoming a priest at Sempringham. About 1131 he became spiritual director of a small group of anchoresses*, from which developed the nunnery of Sempringham. Failing to persuade the Cistercians* to assume their oversight (1147), with the aid of Bernard* of Clairvaux he subsequently drew up a rule derived from both Benedictine* and Augustinian* models for his communities, which typically comprised nuns, canons*, lay brothers, and lay sisters. Toward the end of his life, he relinquished their direct control. He was canonized in 1202.

Gilead, territory east of the Jordan (inhabited by the tribes Gad and Manasseh), where a famous balm grew (Gen 37:25) – hence Jeremiah's yearning cry, "Is there no balm in Gilead?" (Jer 8:22).

Giles of Rome, or Aegidius Romanus (c1245–1316). Philosopher and theologian, possibly born in Rome, he became an Augustinian* hermit, studied in Paris with Thomas Aquinas*, was elected general of the Augustinians (1292), and founded many convents. Perhaps the greatest impact of his many treatises was in the political sphere. His treatise on papal authority was the basis of Boniface* VIII's notorious bull Unam sanctam (there is no salvation outside the Roman Catholic Church; to reject the pope's authority is to exclude oneself from the Church); his work on the duties of princes was written for the future King Philip the Fair, Boniface's opponent.

Gladden, Washington. See SOCIAL GOSPEL MOVEMENT.

Gladstone, William Ewart (1809–98). Raised an Evangelical Anglican, Gladstone moved to Old High Church principles by his 1832 election as a Conservative member of the English Commons. He served in both Conservative and Whig cabinets, most influentially as minister of the exchequer, and was the Liberal prime minister four times (until 1894). An active lay theologian, he defended the Anglican Church establishment in The State in Its Relations to the Church (1838, 1841): "The state is a person, having a conscience, cognizant of matter of religion, and bound...to advance it." In 1845 he resigned from the cabinet to remain consistent with the position. He supported the Oxford* Movement's concerns, but not its "Romewards" aspects. Gladstone's political shift to Liberalism marked his opposition to the Ecclesiastical Titles Act against Roman Catholicism (1851) and his support of Jewish emancipation and a number of Nonconformist* concerns, including an atheist's right to sit in Parliament, as well as Irish* political and religious rights. He nevertheless remained a theological traditionalist: defending Anglo-Catholic interests, arguing against antiritualist legislation (1874), writing against papal infallibility* in a 1874 pamphlet, The Vatican Decrees, and publicly debating with Darwin's* defender, Huxley*, on the origins of religion and biblical interpretation (1885–90).

Global Ethics, the range of ethical or theological positions about the necessity of, possibility of, and practical strategies to address the need for minimal standards of ethical conduct between and within nations in an increasingly interdependent world. (1) Given pluralism and conflicting ideals, is it possible to envision a common morality based on universal values? (2) Could the values of the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights serve as a common morality? Or is it, itself, controversially “Western”? (3) Should we seek universal ethical consensus based on the minimal ethical consensus shared by all the world’s religions? Or should we mainly expand our own tradition-dependent theory of global ethics?

Kantians* point to a common morality. The natural law tradition, appealing to common human needs, aspirations, and potentialities, suggests universally binding moral codes. But the commonalities of human nature can be consistent with substantially different moral codes and thus underdetermine morality.

The theologian Hans Küng envisions a common global ethic based on the minimal ethical consensus shared by all the world’s religions. Küng argues that there can be “no new global order without a new global ethics.” He parses his major premise, “every human being must be treated humanely,” into four major commitments: (1) to nonviolence* and respect for life; (2) to solidarity* and a just economic* order; (3) to tolerance and truthfulness; and (4) to equal rights and partnership between men and women.” Critics argue that such universal principles, if they are to cohere and receive a general assent, are so vague as to be virtually empty.

Other authors espouse human* rights theory as the foundation of a global ethic. Yet for many, any transcultural or foundational bases for a global ethic of rights should be avoided. Thus, reflecting on the UN Declaration, Jacques Maritain* says, “We can agree about rights on condition that no one asks why.” The why is rooted primarily in practical reason*, with global principles as guides to action. Universal global ethics must, perforce, return to tradition-bound theories to find resonating resources.

Perhaps the wisest approach admits the tradition dependence of all ethical schemes (philosophical or theological) but works toward establishing transcultural claims through a process of reflection on the commonalities and overlap of different traditions and invites a richer probe by the various religious traditions into their account of global oughts. A global ethic is less some given bestowed by a preexisting universal morality than a project for an urgent, hoped-for, real possibility.

Globalization: Christian Responses. Protestant denominations associated with the World* Council of Churches, Roman Catholicism, and Orthodoxy tend toward a partially critical, yet positive view of globalization. In a series of addresses, Pope John* Paul II asserted that “globalization, in itself, is neither good nor bad. It will be what people make of it.” His encyclical Centessimus Annus set out some guidelines for a humane globalization: a new world order must not be reductively economic but must also pay attention to politics*, culture*, the state (see Church and State Relations Cluster), and the environment (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster). While he endorsed market economies*, the pope noted that markets remain blind to collective and spiritual needs and, without regulation, may not serve the common good: “It is necessary to globalize solidarity*, too.” Although expressing fear that globalization might increase poverty* and inequality or erode local cultures, on balance, he asserted, “For all its risks it offers exceptional and promising opportunities, precisely with a view to enabling humanity to become a single family, build on the values of justice*, equity and solidarity.” “Globalization without marginalization*” was another papal slogan.

The World Council of Churches has registered some of its fears of a globalization based on neo-liberal economic models: a loss of cultural identity; greater concentration of power in corporations and in states; unequal distribution of power and wealth; and the erosion of the state and of safety nets. Drawing on a suggestion of Orthodox Patriarch Bartholomew, the World Council of Churches proposes that the older Christian notion of “ecumenicity” (i.e. the whole world as interconnected, in God’s care, rooted in cooperation) replace the term “globalization.” Theologians from the Reformed tradition tend to emphasize the covenant* and God’s orders for creation* to address a new world order.

Evangelicals vary greatly in their response to globalization (a phenomenon that greatly facilitates the growth of their movement). Some groups, such as those who sponsor the magazine

Sojourners, endorse globalization for its positive possibilities (one world in consciousness) while remaining critical of its failure to address global poverty and aware of its incomplete human governance structures. Others stress the unique Evangelical opportunities that result from globalization and are likely to assert that a free market, in the long run, benefits everyone. They remain wary of criticism of presently constituted capitalism. Christian voices are found at the global forums at Davos and the World Social Forum. Most would agree with the former that there is a need for reform of current globalization and with the latter that “another world – another kind of globalization – is possible.” See also ECONOMY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Gloria in Excelsis (Lat “glory in the highest”), the first words of the angels’ song narrated in Luke 2:14, often used as a canticle* in worship. An expanded Greek version has been incorporated into the worship of various traditions since the 4th c.

Gloria Patri, a song of praise to the Trinity* that follows the singing of any psalm; added to the worship service in Western churches in the 4th c.).

Glossa Ordinaria, the marginal glosses on the Bible that originated in patristic times as comments on difficult or confusing passages and later included quotes from patristic commentaries (added by Eugippius, Bede*, and Florus* of Lyon). In the 11th c. a more formalized, Talmud-like version developed, with the text in the center of the page and the commentary in the margins or between the lines. Major contributions were made by Anselm of Laon, Gilbert* de la Porrée, and Peter* Lombard.

Glossolalia, “speaking in tongues” under the inspiration of the Holy* Spirit (1 Cor 14), emphasized in the Pentecostal* and Charismatic* movements. One of the gifts* of the Spirit.

Gnesio-Lutherans, modern label for a group of Luther’s students (1549–77) whose interpretation of Luther’s* break with the medieval church was a radical departure from medieval soteriology*. Against Melanchthon* and his followers (the “Philippists”), their bold, explicit confession included their views of the Law* and good works in Christian life, original* sin, the role of the will* in conversion, and definitions of “repentance*” and “gospel*.” They argued for a strict limitation of the power of secular government within ecclesiastical affairs and favored more drastic departures from medieval ceremonies and ecclesiastical polity*. The Formula of Concord* offered a solution to these disputed issues.

Gnosticism. The term “Gnosticism” seems to have been coined in the 17th c. to denote certain religious movements dating from the first few centuries CE. The Greek adjective gnostikos (“leading/pertaining to knowledge”) was used by Plato to designate the intellectual dimension of learning as opposed to the practical. By the 2nd c. CE, the word appears as a self-designation by certain Christians, who were attacked as presumptuous by their critics (see Irenaeus). However, the modern category “Gnosticism” is most commonly applied to a much wider assortment of teachers and groups than the tiny number for whom the self-designation gnostikos is actually attested. Therefore, “Gnostics” are best understood not as members of a single sect or movement, but rather as believers who introduced diverse religious innovations that were linked to various degrees by notable overlapping doctrines or themes.

One usual feature is that the transcendent God or order of being is distinguished from one or more inferior creators of the material world. Another frequently shared view is some variation on the theme of humanity’s preincarnational origin in a transcendent realm, subsequent descent to the material cosmos, and eventual salvation and return, effected by revelation that reawakens the knowledge (Gk gnosis) of one’s kinship with the Divine.

Relatively few of the original writings of such circles survive, but several important examples are included among the tractates in the Nag* Hammadi Codices and a few other Coptic manuscripts. Important evidence is also found in polemics attacking these groups, such as the heresiology by Irenaeus* (c180), “Exposure and Refutation of Knowledge (gnosis) Falsely So-Called” (conventionally known by the title Adversus haereses, “Against the Sects”) – a catalog that also includes teachers or groups who are virtually never classified as “Gnostic” in modern research (e.g. the Ebionites*) or for whom the appropriateness of this label has been disputed (e.g. Marcion*, Tatian*). Irenaeus’s work was expanded upon by numerous later writers, e.g. Clement* of Alexandria (c160–215), Tertullian* (c160–225), Hippolytus* (c170–235), Origen* (c185–251), and Epiphanius* (c315–403).

Several Nag Hammadi texts contain myths of origin, as in the important Apocryphon of John*. Often in the form of “rewritten scripture,” they refashion the Genesis creation stories so that the creator God is an entity inferior to the transcendent Divinity. Such speculations are interesting instances of theodicy*: explanations that protect the true God from responsibility for imperfection or evil* in the cosmos. Earlier cosmologies giving some role to intermediate agents can be found in Platonic, neo-Pythagorean, Jewish, and other ancient sources. “Gnostic” myths of origin emerged within this wider tradition of theodicean speculations, although they are often considered the most radical examples, and “Gnosticism” is frequently defined in terms of an alleged negative attitude toward the material cosmos and its creator(s). However, in fact there is remarkable variety in how negatively the creator and cosmos are portrayed in “Gnostic” sources, ranging from demonization* of the creator as a willful, animal-like figure, ignorant of the Divinity that transcends him and malevolently intent on the domination of his realm, including humanity, to the creator as merely intermediate and imperfect rather than a hateful adversary.

The distinction between “spiritual” humanity and nonspiritual persons typical in “Gnostic” soteriologies* has often been labeled deterministic, although in very many cases this is an incorrect characterization. For example, according to some texts, the reception of spiritual identity is available ritually, e.g. by baptism* or chrism*. Spirituality can be depicted as a potential for all humans, though realized only in individuals who respond to revelation.

Social behavior, communal organization, or ritual practices in such groups were apparently quite diverse, but the details are not extensively or reliably documented. Although “Gnostics” are commonly portrayed as rejecters of the world, the activities of some of them suggest less social deviance and greater social conformity than that in more “orthodox” circles (e.g. fewer dietary scruples, social interaction at civic religious celebrations or public entertainment, aversion to radical social resistance such as martyrdom*). The spectrum of sexual mores was probably not so unlike that in the rest of the Christian population. Ascetic* renunciation of sexuality* was certainly the ideal in several groups, although marriage* and procreation were condoned in others. The heresiolo-gists accused some groups of sexual excess or uses of sex in ritual, but these polemical charges are highly suspect.

In the early centuries of Christianity, before the standardization brought about by creeds, canons, and organizations, these often elaborate myths of origin and eschatology* constituted some of the earliest attempts at a systematic articulation of Christian doctrine in relation to Jewish tradition and Greco-Roman philosophy. Controversy over such experiments played a role in shaping fundamental features of what became Christian “orthodoxy.” See also VALENTINIANS; VALENTINUS.

God, Christian Views of: In Eastern Orthodoxy. God is Trinity. As Trinity, God is the coexistence of the full divinity of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. An affirmation about Jesus that involves less than full divinity cannot lead to an understanding of God as Trinity. Trinity is thus more than a way of understanding God’s relation to the world. It is a way of understanding God. See also TRINITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

God, Christian Views of: A Historical Overview.

In Christian belief, "God" is the name (but not a proper name; see the present cluster: Names for God in the Bible and Church Traditions) for the sole reality deserving of human worship*. This idea that there is only one real deity reflects Christianity's historic derivation from monotheistic* Judaism* and accounts for the ancient church's polemic against polytheistic* modes of worship as an idolatrous* offense against the one true God. According to biblical tradition, God is the ultimate power that created* the world and continues to sustain and rule over it by ordering the relationships among all creatures. Of special concern to God is humankind, which, created in God's own image*, has the possibility of serving God with the distinctive human capacities of heart, mind, and will*. Since the failure of humanity to conform to the divine ordering (sin*) is the central problem to which the gospel* is addressed, God is also the judge* of human failings as well as the redeemer* realigning persons to the divine purposes for them. Hence God is creator, sustainer, providential governor, judge, and redeemer or savior*. While God intends what is good for human beings, all of God's creatures exist ultimately for the sake of glorifying their maker.

Through their appropriation of Greek philosophy (see Inculturation Cluster: Of Christianity in the Greco-Roman World), Christians availed themselves of sophisticated conceptual tools to clarify their theological convictions both to themselves and to non-Christians. Against Christian dualists* (Gnostics* and Marcionites*) who called into question the identification of the redeemer known through Christ with the creator-judge of Israel, it was necessary to reaffirm the monotheistic premise of the teachings of Jesus and of his earliest Jewish followers. Against "pagans*" it was important to stress the basic difference between monotheism and Greco-Roman polytheism, as well as to argue for the rational superiority of the former. By building a bridge between gospel and philosophy (see Gospel and Culture Cluster: Introductory Entry), Christians integrated the Greek quest for a rational understanding of the world with their biblical heritage. Nevertheless, this adaptation of philosophy also occasioned difficulties for classical Christian theology, since the anthropomorphic*, or person-like, depictions of God in the biblical narratives were now seen to be in tension with the metaphysical* attributes assumed to be self-evident as descriptions of the divine nature, such as impassibility*, timelessness, and absolute simplicity. An enduring question is: Can the personal deity of the Bible truly be accounted for in Greek philosophical thought? (see Philosophy and Christian Theology).

Christianity departs from Judaism by affirming that Jesus is not only Israel's long-awaited Messiah* (Christ) but also the incarnate Son* (Word*, Logos*) of God through whom all things have been created. The full explication of this confession culminated in the trinitarian and christological doctrines of the 4th and 5th c.; accordingly, God is "one divine essence in three persons" (Father, Son, and Spirit) and Jesus Christ (the second person of the Trinity*) is both "fully divine" and "fully human." Whether this trinitarian Christology* results in a doctrine of God that is no longer legitimately a species of monotheism is a question raised by both Jews (see Judaism and Christianity Cluster: Jewish Views of Christianity) and Muslims (see Islam and Christianity Cluster: Muslim Views of Christianity) as well as by Christian Unitarians*. Nonetheless, Christian orthodoxy* has insisted that its doctrine is not tritheistic*; how God is both one and three remains a mystery* of faith that cannot be rationally grasped by the finite mind.

Before the Enlightenment*, it was assumed that knowledge of God comes primarily through the Bible's supernatural revelation* as authoritatively taught by the church's tradition*. This did not preclude a limited knowledge of God based on natural reason or general illumination (natural* theology), although it was insufficient to guarantee the revealed truths of Christian faith (e.g. the Trinity). In the modern period, when the maturation of natural science* suggested the possibility of explaining the world's operation on immanent grounds alone, apart from recourse to God as a causal factor, the philosophical basis of natural theology was severely called into question. The loss of the inherited philosophical assumption that all rational persons naturally believe in the existence of one God opened the door to the increasing influence of agnosticism* and even atheism* in the post-Christian West and required theologians to explore alternative ways of making Christian religious convictions intelligible to the wider culture. One prominent route has been to argue that belief in God is important for sustaining moral* agency and existential* meaning even if it bears little relation to scientific explanations of the non-human world. Furthermore, historical-critical study of biblical and other religious traditions has impressed on contemporary theologians the essential role of human creativity in generating ideas about God throughout history. As a result there has arisen a new awareness that traditional beliefs about God are subject to critique and revision in the light of new questions arising in different cultural and religious contexts. Still, the crucial issues remain the nature of God and the bases for believing in God. See also THE PRESENT CLUSTER: NAMES FOR GOD IN THE BIBLE AND CHURCH TRADITIONS; TRINITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY; TRINITY IN THE WESTERN TRADITION. PAUL E. CAPETZ

God, Christian Views of: Names for God in the Bible and Church Traditions. The noun "God" is not a proper name; thus it is not transliterated, but translated from one language to another.

The Hebrew El and Greek Theos are translated in Syriac as Alaha (closely related to the Arabic Allah, a name commonly used by Christians in Arabic-speaking countries) and, by Ephrem* the Syrian (4th c.), as Alahutha, an abstract name meaning "Deity" or "Divinity," grammatically feminine, when he wants to stress the maternal characteristics of God. El and Theos are translated by the English "God," Swedish Gud (on Runic stones from c1000), German Gott (originally neuter, became masculine when adopted by Christianity) – terms that might be derived from the Indo-European root ghut- (the one invoked or the one sacrificed to). The Latin Deus is reflected in the Romance languages (Dieu, Dios, Dio, Deus). The Romanian Dumnezeu is derived from the Latin Dominus Deus (Lord God). In Chichewa (Malawi), the terms Mlengi, Mulungu, and Mphambe refer to God as the creator of all things, while Chauta and Leza refer to the presence of God as creator: Chauta, like rainfall; Leza, like a mother nurturing her children. Other examples are the many traditional names of God used by Christians of different ethnolinguistic groups in Angola* (as well as parts of the Republic of Congo* [Congo-Brazzaville] and the Democratic Republic of Congo*), e.g. Nzambi (in the Kikongo, Kimbundu, and Chokwe languages), Suku (in Umbundu), Kalunga (in Ambo), Nzambi-Kalunga (in Herero), and Huku (in Nyaneka-Humbe). Through such inculturated* naming, the conception of God is linked with each religious worldview.

A generic, indefinite term, "God" can be used in the plural. The Hebrew term Elohim, designating the one God of Israel, is grammatically plural. Most biblical books assume that there are other gods (Exod 20:3, Deut 5:7; 1 Cor 8:5; 2 Cor 4:4). The angels are addressed as "gods" (Ps 82:6; John 10:33–34). "God" is sometimes used as a qualifier (e.g. of the Logos* in John 1:1, meaning that the Logos is "a god," or "divine," or "God"). Yet "God" is primarily an indefinite term, an "x" requiring further specification and a name.

God can be named by description, e.g. "the God who appeared at the burning bush," "the God who raised Jesus from the dead." People speak of "my God" (see Jer 7:23, 31:33) or of "the God of Abraham and Sarah." When people reject "the God of Calvin" or "the God of Islam," they imply that the other party worships a different, erroneous or fictitious, God.

"God" is also named by reference to God's function or activity in relation to the world. For Gregory* of Nyssa, “God” refers to God’s activity rather than God’s essence; for John* of Damascus, it describes God’s providential care. Tillich* and Schleiermacher* speak of a generic function – respectively, the “dimension of ultimacy” or “ultimate dependence” – that gains specificity in each religion.

For Paul, these descriptive ways of naming God can become idolatrous: although God’s “eternal power and deity” are understood through the things God made, God’s truth can be changed into a lie when the powers that impinge on human life are addressed as deities (Rom 1:20–25). Conversely, designating God through function titles, such as “Creator” and “Lord,” might raise questions regarding the view of God as everlasting. Could God be Creator and Lord before there was a world? Or must creation be everlasting (as Origen* thought), since God could never not be Creator? The traditional answer has been that these function-titles refer to the everlasting God, who decides whether and when to create (thus these titles are always appropriate), rather than to the created temporal world.

The Question of God’s Proper Name. For both Jews and Christians, God’s “proper name” is expressed by the so-called tetragrammaton*, YHWH. Knowing the name of the supreme deity might enable one to compel lesser deities or demons to obey. During the postexilic period, the divine name ceased to be pronounced (as is still the case for most Jews); its consonants continued to be written, but the term Adonai (my Lord) was substituted in reading. The Massoretes* added the vowels for this reading. Then, Calvin* and others in the Reformed* tradition combined these consonants and vowels and pronounced the divine name “Jehovah.”

While YHWH functions as a name, it may have originated as some kind of description. When Moses asks God’s name, the answer is “Ehyeh asher ehyeh” (Exod 3:14). Because the Hebrew verb can mean “to be” or “to become,” this name can be translated in two ways:

1. “I am who I am” – a tautology, or a refusal to give a name, or, according to many ancient commentators, “I am the one who is,” “being itself,” the source of all other beings.

2. “I will be who I will be,” emphasizing either the sense of “becoming” and God’s freedom rather than God’s permanence or the sense “I cause what I cause.”

God is often called YHWH Sebaoth, “Lord of hosts,” as though to give definiteness to the name. Yet the “hosts” are rather indefinite. Are they the armies of Israel, heavenly bodies, powers of nature, or angels?

Christian “Proper” Designations for God. Names (those that apply directly to God and not merely in relation to the world) include trinitarian terms and absolute perfections.

1. The Trinity. For some the trinitarian names are “function terms” based on three different modes of divine action: God is called Father because of creation, Son because of redemption*, and Spirit because of sanctification*. Against this modalism*, others declared the Trinity to be eternal and affirmed that Father, Son, and Spirit intrinsically apply to God’s essence (see Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy; Trinity in Western Traditions). Since the Syriac designation for God, Ruha (Spirit), is grammatically feminine, it acquired female symbolism in the earliest (pre-4th-c.) form of Syriac Christianity. Recent theology, aware that the use of masculine terms “makes God male,” tends to use gender-free or feminine terms as a corrective.
2. The perfections, such as “being,” “truth,” “wisdom,” “good,” and “benevolence” in their absolute sense, might refer properly to God’s divine essence, shared by the three persons. Yet the theory of analogy* acknowledges that we do not understand the “mode of signification” of these terms when they are applied to God and thus are outside their usual contexts.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views

God, Christian Views of, in Africa.

African Christian concepts of God have developed from both African* Religion and the Bible. The worldview of the HB is strikingly similar to African worldviews; Africans feel at home within the Bible. Thus instead of inventing names to describe God, African Christians simply use existing local names.

For Africans, as for the Bible, a name denotes the character or personality of the person designated by this name. Thus to get a sense of African concepts of God, we must consider a few appellations and "praise names" that African Christians use for God. When, like their ancestors, the Akan Christians of Ghana* call God Onyame, they affirm that God is "the Provider of All Things" and that those who know and worship God-Onyame have everything they could ever need. To describe the omniscience of God, the Barundi of Burundi* call God Indaavyi, "the Watcher of Everything." Traditionalist and Christian Yoruba of Nigeria* call God Olodumare, "the Almighty." To ascribe creation to God, the Ngonis of Malawi* call God Uluhlanga, "the Original Source." For the Akans, God's reliability is expressed in the name Twereduampong, "The tree that does not bend when leaned upon." God is seen not only as Father but also as Mother. The Krobos from Ghana call God Mau Kpetekplenye, "Mother of All Big or Wonderful Things." The Gas from Ghana balance the parenthood of God by calling God Ataa Naa Nyonmo, "Father-Mother God" (also see Angola).

These traditional concepts were incorporated into Christian views of God because traditional understandings of who God is and of God's role in daily life are remarkably similar to those of the biblical God. The African cultural context is such that even though Christianity cannot be said to be an "African religion," it is very clearly an "African's religion."

For African Christians, God is not a distant or absentee landlord but a very present help in times of joy and sorrow, and in the day-to-day drudgery of living. God is in charge of all and over all. Life begins and ends with God; God is the One, to be feared and obeyed above all. Thus the Akans say, "Gye Nyame," meaning that without the blessing of God, human efforts are bound to fail in any endeavor. For African Christians, God is the creator of all, above all, and in all. ROSE TETEKI ABBEY

God, Christian Views of, in Asia. The Christian views of God in Asia are in a process of transformation that can be characterized by four parallel, yet independent trends.

The initial and most predominant is the biblical/classical view of God that Protestant and Roman Catholic missions brought with them to Asia. Most missionaries, looking on the Hindu* tradition as polytheistic and the Buddhist* as devoid of God, challenged Asian peoples to abandon their religions and cultures and adopt the Western Christian trinitarian understanding of God. At the center of this teaching was Christology, which proclaimed Jesus as the Son of God who by his death and resurrection brought about salvation*. To this day, this theology informs the preaching and teaching ministry of the mainline churches, their worship, and their missionary endeavor.

A second trend was present from the beginning. Some missionaries and native theologians were dissatisfied with the total rejection of the Asian religious heritage. They attempted to interpret or to augment the classical Christian understanding of God with Hindu, Confucian*, and other Asian cultural symbols, myths, and images. Asian religious terminologies and concepts like Dharma, Tien, Chu, and Dao have been employed to speak about God. But much of this remains at the level of theological and philosophical exploration, including attempts to relate the Christian notions of the Ultimate with the Hindu Advaitic teaching of Brahman and Buddhist notions of, e.g., nirvana and shunyata. Interfaith dialogue* and discussions of the theology of religions have also challenged traditional views of God, although without significant impact on the Asian Church's understanding of God.

The third trend, which has had a much greater impact, is found in the theological reflections related to the subaltern cultures of Asia, e.g. the Minjung* theology in Korea and the Dalit* theology in India. These begin with the Bible, but interpret the biblical understanding of God and Jesus Christ from the experience of the suppressed, excluded, and marginalized* peoples of Asia.

The fourth trend, which is gathering increasing momentum, is the Asian feminist* critique and reflections on God, especially in the Philippines, India, Korea, and Hong Kong. These not only offer a critique of the patriarchal character of God in Christian traditions and in dominant Asian religious traditions, but also seek to revive the liberative elements of some Asian forms of spirituality* that have been suppressed or undermined in Christian teaching. God, Christian Views of, in Australia.

Christian views of God have been shaped by changing contexts in Australia. Although until the 1970s almost all Australians identified with Christianity, practical help for the needy has been and still is seen as more significant than religious belief, ritual*, or experience – much as in the biblical prophetic tradition. Amid a strongly secular culture, traditional Christian views of God prevail within the churches.

Christianity arrived in Australia in 1788 with the “First Fleet” of convicts, soldiers, and one Church* of England chaplain, the Evangelical Richard Johnston. He preached and lived a Christ-centered faith, but his ministry was tolerated rather than welcomed. Enlightenment* views of God as “moral governor” predominated to maintain order in “the most godless place under heaven” (as the saying went). “Killjoy” remains a common view of the Christian God.

Penal colonies evolved into women-scarce agricultural settlements where fire, flood, and drought decimated crops, sheep, and cattle. Within Christian religious forms, men placed their faith in fate* (often feminized) and one another (“mateship,” with God as the “mate upstairs”). Sayings like “She’ll be right, mate”, “Just cop it sweet,” and “When your number’s up” reflect this fatalistic streak, evidenced in the prevalence of gambling. God’s sovereignty* and rationality* were correspondingly emphasized in the churches, and much of Christian piety* was feminized.

The gold rushes of the 1850s saw the population treble, and life became less capricious. Christianity spread and prospered, displacing and evangelizing Australian* Aboriginal peoples but bringing coherence to Torres Strait Islanders. Sectarian* rivalries among Protestants (British), Catholics (Irish), members of the Church of England, and members of “free” churches strengthened the belief that “deeds, not creeds,” are what matters. “Mateship” was reinforced by hardship during the two world wars; sacrificial dying, “in remembrance,” and “greater love hath no man” became the focus, softening fatalism but offering “Christ substitutes.”

Since 1960, Australia has been a multicultural, multi-faith country: the Buddhist* and Islamic* presence, and a growing appreciation of indigenous perspectives, are blunting secularism*. Spirituality* and God as “spirituality sponsor” are accepted, but “consumer religion” is common. Protestant and Catholic tribalism may have ended, but Pentecostalism* and new forms of conservatism* have sharpened the contrasts between church and society, notably in Sydney. Conversely, Christendom’s* demise, the leavening presence of the Orthodox* Church, Charismatic* revivals, and feminist* insights, as well as the ongoing orthodox teachings have seen trinitarian* faith permeate the churches’ life in a more evident way.

Diverse views of God are tolerated in Australia today, as religion and spirituality are viewed as private matters. Christ-centered, Spirit-enlivened faith generally predominates in the churches: how this translates into public life is an issue for the future. CHARLES SHERLOCK

God, Christian views of, in the Caribbean Islands. Caribbean peoples have always expressed belief in God. For Amerindians in the Caribbean, the Supreme Being “was immortal, invisible, omnipotent but not uncreated, because he had a mother who presided either in the Sun or Moon. He was called by several names, chiefly that of Jocahuna, and lived in the skies” (W. J. Gardner). While animists at heart, Amerindians blended their views about God with Roman Catholic beliefs. “Many Indians resented having been practically forced to become Christians. . . . Most of them were able to accommodate the beliefs and practices of the new religion by understanding them in terms of their native beliefs. God the father, of Catholic belief, they identified with the creator-god, Wamurreti-Kwonci, whom they otherwise knew as the benign Jocahuna. Sometimes they identified Jesus Christ with Jocahuna; at other times they believed him to be the son of Jocahuna or Wamurreti-kwonci and the Virgin Mary, whom they confused with Atabei, a goddess of Arawak belief” (Dale Bisnauth).

The African presence in the Caribbean islands led to a fusing of African beliefs in God with Christian language and beliefs. These fused beliefs have been variously expressed as Vodou* in Haiti*, Shango in Trinidad*, Santeria in Cuba*, and the Rastafari* Movement in Jamaica*. In each case, certain African beliefs are preserved and blended with Christian categories. For instance, the Rastafaris assert the existence of a creator God who is responsible for the governance of the world and who rules over the affairs of humankind. But while using the Christian Scriptures* to make their case, they change the language and adapt Christian categories to fit their existential situation. The creator God is black and called Jah.

Caribbean conceptions of God are often formulated in reaction to the colonial* theology articulated by the Christian Church. The genius of the indigenous expressions of God is that, in such a context, Caribbean people began to make a connection between God and freedom*. God is the source of healing*, the one who will overthrow the unjust order and help them hold body and soul together in the midst of oppression*. In colonial theology, while the soul belonged to God, the body belonged to the master. In Santeria, Vodou*, Shango, and Rastafari, the body is the site of freedom, as these religions assert that their participants are witnesses of God’s freedom in the midst of an unjust world.

NOEL LEO ERSKINE

God, Christian views of, in Latin America.

God – the experience of God and reflection about God – is at the very heart of theology (Gk theos, “God”). The key question is not about God the “transcendent mystery,” but about the God of the “underside of history.” How are God’s grace* and God’s love* to be proclaimed to the millions of human beings who are marginalized*, excluded, condemned to being nobodies, and denied identities as persons?

God, the eternally unchangeable mystery, is set against injustice and oppression*, and thus escapes transcendence and takes sides. God is the mystery paradoxically revealed where life is destroyed, on all the Golgothas* of the world. For Latin American theology, it is not enough to say that God is revealed in history*. On the basis of this central truth of the Christian faith, Latin American theology also affirms God’s suffering for life and justice* and God’s loving solidarity* with those deprived of their rights. Thus Latin American theology proclaims the God of life, the God of the poor, the liberating* God, who is present in the midst of history on the side of the excluded, listening and freeing people through the divine victorious power that conquers death and re-creates life.

The words of the old story of the Exodus are still valid in the present context: “I have seen the affliction of my people. . . . I have heard their cry because of their oppressors; I know their sufferings; I have come down to deliver them [my people]. . . . So come, I will send you to Pharaoh to free my people” (Exod 3:1–10). In the NT, God’s option for love* takes the form of the incarnation* of Jesus and of his proclamation of the Reign* of God and of God’s justice, good news for all, including all who are oppressed.

For the Latin American theology of liberation, faith* in the liberating God requires discernment and struggle against the idols* of oppression and death. The opposite of faith* in God is not atheism*; it is idolatry* – the adoration of the false god: power, capital, consumerism, and the market taken as absolute, as a god in whose name the life of millions of human beings and nature are destroyed. Such idolatry is the most serious betrayal of the will of the God of life.

From this perspective, the life of faith in the mystery of God is ultimately a matter not of understanding the idea of God, but of experiencing God's reality. It is a matter of entering into and sharing God's very life, in a "praxis according to God" (G. Gutiérrez), a praxis of justice and of love that corresponds to God's practice of justice and love through Jesus and the manifestation of the Reign of God. Love and the practice of justice are the primary means of gaining access to God.

VICTORIO ARAYA GUILLÉN

God, Christian Views of, Latino/a.

Latino/a theology and thus its view of God is at the intersection of academic concerns and the faith* and struggles of Latino/a communities, because Latino/a theologians address at once the theological academy, the ecclesial realm, and broader Latino/a communities. The concept of God found in this theology is intimately shaped by the faith life of Latinos/as. The starting point of theological reflection is the popular expressions by Latinos/as of God's presence in their lives.

Within Latino/a popular religiosity, God is understood as the one who accompanies* Latino/a peoples in their everyday struggles. The crucified Christ of Good* Friday points toward a God who suffers for and with marginalized* peoples. For Roman Catholic Latinos/as, the importance of the saints* and Mary* is a further expression of God's presence in everyday life. This God of everyday life who encounters us in the mundane is at the center of Latino/a views of God. This is expressed in all aspects of Latino/a culture*, from idiomatic phrases of Latin American Spanish to the rituals celebrated in the streets and homes of Latino/a communities. This cultural expression of the significance of everyday life reveals a God who is present in all moments and aspects of one's life.

The prominence of Marian devotions (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Devotion in Latin America), a fundamental aspect of Latino/a religiosity, offers a window into Latino/a understandings of the divine. Whether it is a Mexican American devotion to Our Lady of Guadalupe (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Of Guadalupe) or a Cuban American devotion to Our Lady of Charity, the different Marian apparition stories depict the Mother of God as being in solidarity* with the oppressed*. This Mariology informs an understanding of God who has a preferential* option for those who are marginalized*.

Latino/a peoples are at the curious intersection of Spanish, Indigenous, African, and US cultures. The hybridity of Latino/as, expressed most often in the categories of mestizaje and mulatez, contributes yet another feature to Latino/a views of God. The divine is often depicted as non-white, and these representations have sociological, political, and theological value. This is a manner of expressing the image* of God (imago Dei) present in Latino/a peoples. For Latinos/as, the Christian God is present in their everyday lives, accompanies them in their suffering, and is revealed within and through their culture and religiosity.

MICHELLE A. GONZALEZ

God, Christian Views of, in North America.

Despite rampant secularism and materialism, US society is vociferous in its claim to believe in God (see United States). A 2006 survey affirms that "the U.S. is overwhelmingly a nation of believers," 85% of whom follow the Christian faith; only 5% admit to believing in "nothing beyond the physical world." By contrast, in Canada*, 16% of the population indicated no religious affiliation in the national census of 2001, and there is an intentional-verging-on-legal rejection of "God-talk" in the Canadian political and professional landscape.

While people in the USA are extraordinarily united in their (largely "Christian"- inspired) claim to believe in God, they are divided with respect to God's nature and purposes. According to the 2006 poll, 31% believe in an "authoritarian" God, "deeply involved in daily life" and "angry at sin"; for 23% God is "benevolent" and involved as a "positive force"; 16% believe in a "critical" God who does not interact with the world but is "unhappy with its current state"; and 24% think of God as "distant" and not interactive – a "cosmic force."

Despite its lack of theological sophistication, this sociological breakdown indicates a great deal about the function of theistic belief. The kind of conviction*, i.e. religious "certitude," especially represented in the first ("authoritarian") and also somewhat in the second ("benevolent") categories, explains the political and moral self-confidence of recent US administrations. The theism of "the Christian Right" leaves no room for doubt*, whether religious, ethical, or political; and the "benevolent" God of the middle classes prefers harmony over probing thought that may disturb. The third ("critical") and fourth ("distant") categories, which assume a continuing struggle with a God whose nature and intentions are still a mystery*, are views that would fit those of deeply engaged classical theological reflection and contemporary Liberation*, Feminist*, African* American, and Process* theologies*.

The social and religious climate in North America, and particularly the USA., presents a profound challenge to theologians, both Protestant and Catholic, whose primary assumption is God's "otherness" or transcendence. The God of the Judeo-Christian traditions remains both sovereign and, even in self-revelation, hidden – Deus absconditus. Such a God cannot be equated with any nation, race, gender, political ideology, or way of life. Thus while North American culture is permeated by God-talk at the popular level, serious Christian theology in this context manifests a continuing need to distinguish God from the most prevalent popular assumptions about the deity at work in our midst. Hence the most important scholarly attempts to comprehend and honor God are likely to seem strange or even a-theistic or agnostic. See also DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY; THEOLOGY AS HUMAN UNDERTAKING CLUSTER: NORTH ATLANTIC THEOLOGIANS DOING THEOLOGY: A DIALOGUE BETWEEN TEXT AND CONTEXT. DOUGLAS JOHN HALL

God, Christian Views of, in North America: Feminist Understandings.

Theology teaches that God is Spirit beyond gender identification and that speech about God is analogical*, not literal. However, traditional images of God, such as Father, Lord, and King, communicate that God is male or at least more fittingly addressed in male than in female terms. In response to this exclusively male imagery, feminist critics contend that exclusive speech for God is idolatrous*, making a graven image of divine mystery*. Moreover, they point out how the symbol* of God functions. Exclusively patriarchal naming of God degrades women and privileges men in church and society. In so doing, it distorts relationships within the community and sanctions structures of dominance and subordination.

Feminist theology proposes that using female symbols of God effectively challenges idolatrous patriarchal understandings of God. This language for God in female images emerges from women's encounter with God present in the depths of themselves. These encounters inspire varieties of metaphors* and models drawn from women's experiences of bodiliness (see Body), passion, cognition, and relationality*. The Scriptures enrich this variety with dynamic images of God such as midwife and mother*, nursing and protecting her offspring. These metaphors point to God's maternal relation to the world, often eclipsed by paternal metaphors. Reclaiming the female symbol of Divine Wisdom* (Prov 3:19–20, 8:22–31; Wis 6:22), creating, ordering, and redeeming the cosmos, provides a viable interpretative framework for God's presence and action in Christ* and in the Spirit*. In the Gospels, Jesus images God as a baker-woman (Matt 13:13 par.) and as a woman searching for a lost coin (Luke 15:8–10). Female images of the Divine enable women to claim the fullness of their identity as created in God's image, redeemed by Christ, and graced by the Spirit. Such imagery effects an experience of God as beneficent toward the female and as an ally of women's flourishing. Moreover, it gives rise to a community characterized not by domination and submission, but by mutuality and reciprocity, one that values and calls forth the gifts of a discipleship* of equals for the sake of mission. Recognizing women's humanity and ways of being in the world as imago Dei (God's image) offers diverse options for naming God, who is nonetheless beyond all names (see the present cluster: Names for God in the Bible and Church Traditions). Diverse symbolism recovers the richness of God's self-revelation throughout salvation history and restores right relationships in church and society.

GLORIA L. SCHAAB

God, Christian Views of, in Western Europe. Since Augustine, no century has been as challenged as the 20th by a radical reappraisal of the doctrine of God or has failed so dramatically. The pinnacle of Christendom*, this "Christian century" presided over the inculturation* of faith but was bound to collapse when the secular* was severed from its religious twin.

Disqualified by scientific* imperialism, God soon becomes useless, a superfluous hypothesis. Nature*, no longer God's handiwork, goes by laws that point to no extraneous power, as does history* in the aftermath of genocidal apocalypses. Nevertheless, Nietzsche*'s diagnosis (we have killed God) is downplayed, if heard. Under the Christian aegis, faith* no longer prods reason*. Nor is the religious enchanting the secular. The world is disenchanted, not with religion, but with Christianity. Theology tries to rescue a doctrine that has collapsed instead of coming to grips with God by first asking not whether God is this or that, but whether there is a Christian doctrine of God and at what cost, especially if Jesus can be no surrogate God.

Inklings abound of apophatic* theology, of speculations about the names or namelessness of God (see the present cluster: Names for God in the Bible and Church Traditions), the unknown or hidden God. "No object besides objects," writes Buber*, who adds, "God is not to be found by subtraction and not to be loved by reduction." Nor (with Bultmann*) is God "the cause (aitia) to which thought refers the world, or the source (arche) in terms of which the happenings in the world can be grasped in their unity and lawfulness." Otherwise, God is reduced to an idol*, a god that is not quite God (Maritain*).

What matters is not what, but that, God is, a question nowhere raised except through language where "the inevitable elusiveness of the divine name is the logical safeguard against universal idolatry" (Ramsey).

Neither Barth*'s Wholly Other God (christological concentration notwithstanding) nor Tillich*'s God as being-itself (unconditioned and yet, as ground of being, somehow contingent on that which is) and as the power of being go quite beyond the traditional dualism* of natural vs. supernatural, literal* vs. symbolic*, Word* of God vs. word of man, real vs. virtual language. The field of faith* lies neither in nature nor in history, but in covenant* and in Incarnation* – "worlding the Word."

By retrieving Marcion*, who drastically pitted law* against gospel*, history against theology, Harnack switched faith to a language so native to the believer that God never can be hostage to any idea of being (Macquarrie) nor faith to dogma (Kittel). Indeed, "that Jesus spoke of God not in dogmas but in poems should be the starting point of all our efforts to speak of God" (Theissen). See also ATHEISM AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; DEATH OF GOD THEOLOGY. GABRIEL VAHANIAN

Good Friday, the Friday before Easter, on which the anniversary of the crucifixion of Christ is observed. Originally the church had a single celebration on the Pasch, the Christian Passover (see Easter); separate observance on each of the days of "Holy Week" began during the 4th c. in Jerusalem, then was progressively adopted elsewhere. For the Roman Catholic Church, Good Friday is a day of fasting, abstinence, and penance*; the Mass* is not celebrated. In the Eastern Orthodox Church, after extended celebrations of the Divine* Office, the day ends with a symbolic burial of Christ. A three-hour devotion on Good Friday, from noon to 3 PM, was developed in Lima, Peru, by Fr. Alphonsia Messia, SJ (1687) and quickly spread through Latin America and then Europe. It often used the seven* last words of Christ on the cross, set to music by Haydn, Dubois, and others. Protestant churches have adopted this custom, with readings, sermons, and prayers commemorating the events of the Crucifixion and celebration of the Lord's* Supper.

Goods, Community of. In Acts 2:44–45, 4:32–35, members of the early church in Jerusalem sold their possessions, held all things in common, and distributed food and other material things to those in need. After the community of goods was adopted as a monastic ideal, debates persisted regarding possessions because of the understanding of poverty* (Matt 10:9–10) espoused by Franciscans* and Nil* Sorsky, in Russia.

Gospel and Culture in North America

1) Introductory Entry

Gospel and Culture. Gospel (Gk euan-gelion; Old English, godspell, "good news") is the good news about Jesus Christ, the central message of Christian proclamation. The cognate verb is used in the LXX* (Isa 52:7, quoted in Rom 10:15; Matt 11:5 = Luke 7:22). An inscription in Priene (9 BCE) speaks of the "good news" of Augustus Caesar; the proclamation of Jesus as Lord thus competed with the imperial cult, especially in the East.

The title of Mark*, "The Gospel of Jesus Christ" (Mark 1:1), was used as a model to designate other written narratives about Jesus (or collections of his sayings) that began to be called "Gospels," or rather the one gospel "according to" Matthew*, Mark*, Luke*, and John*.

In addition, there were many other “apocryphal” Gospels (1st–2nd c.), including those “according to” or “of” the Ebionites*, Hebrews*, Judas*, Mary* (Magdalene), the Nazarenes*, Peter*, Philip*, and Thomas*. Each gospel (including the canonical ones) presents the central message of the Christian proclamation (“the gospel”) in its own way, related to a specific cultural and religious context. This message was summed up (2nd c.) as the “apostolic proclamation,” summarized by the Apostles* Creed. Yet the gospel (as message) continued to be expressed in new ways in different cultural contexts, as illustrated in the entries in this cluster. See also CULTURE CLUSTER: CULTURE AND CHRISTIANITY.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Gospel and Culture in Africa are inter-related in three ways. At first, the gospel was viewed as a revelation coming from outside of Africa and was proposed to be the new path of truth that should replace the “pagan*,” “savage,” “barbaric” African culture in its entirety. This view, which dominated colonial* Christianity from the 16th to the 19th c., but is still present, demanded that African populations abandon their ways of thinking, feeling, and acting, their sense of humanity, and the norms, values, and customs governing their life in society, and enter the new life promised by the Christian God. The primary theologies called for Africans to become a tabula rasa, to forget completely their own culture; the missionaries spoke of “planting the church.” Conversion was in the image of colonialism; “savage,” “barbaric” Africans were “born again” by accepting Western dogmas and social norms that were viewed as the only possible and true understanding of the gospel.

Gospel and African culture are related in a second way when the gospel as the Word* of God is viewed as revealing, and allowing to flourish, deep spiritual, ethical, and theological insights already present, though hidden, in the African culture. The gospel does not come “to abolish” the African culture, but rather “to fulfill” it by incorporating it into God’s sublime project for humanity (as Jesus did not come “to abolish” the law or the prophets but “to fulfill” them; Matt 5:17). The African culture, like any culture, is a womb to be impregnated by the gospel, a field where wheat must be separated from weeds (cf. Matt 13:24–30), or a battleground in which the forces of good and evil must be distinguished (cf. Matt 13:37–43). Two theological trends developed this vision in Africa: the theologies of the “hidden treasure” (Matt 13:44) and of “indigenization”; they inaugurated a positive attitude toward African culture, although keeping a distance between gospel and a culture that prevents resistance to neo-colonialism.

Gospel and African culture are related in a third way, namely through the contemporary theologies of inculturation*, reconstruction*, and invention. These theologies do not locate the gospel outside the dynamics of cultural creativity. Inculturation theologies recognize that African Christians interpret the gospel as Scripture* and as the Word* of God from the perspective of their direct encounter with God in their own cultural experience, without mediation by Western culture and its hermeneutical blinders. Africans encounter God at the African “initiatory bush” (a bush that is not consumed by fire, according to Bimwenyi-Kweshi) to engage in a dialogue where the gospel offers a vantage point for seeing the African culture in a meaningful way. For Reconstruction* theology, the gospel empowers the African culture as an agent of rebirth and resurrection through which the whole of society can be transformed on the basis of spiritual values. For Invention theology, the gospel inspires and nourishes human creativity for building the future and winning future battles against cultural oppression*.

KÄ MANA

Gospel and Culture in Asia. The good news of God’s self-gift in the Word* made flesh resonates with various Asian cultures and is the foundation for the Christian affirmation of cultural pluralism. In spite of negative attitudes toward Asian cultures (e.g. condemnation of Chinese ancestor* rites and of Malabar rites in India), there have been efforts to translate and adapt the gospel to Asian ways of thinking, customs, and traditions (e.g. the May Fourth Movement in China and the “Rethinking Christianity” group in India; see Church, Concepts and Life, Cluster: In Asia; Indian Christian Theologies). This positive trend has found spokespersons in missionaries such as de Nobili* and Ziegenbalg in India and Ricci* in China. The traditions of Thomas Christians (Malankara* Orthodox Syrian Church) in India and the Sian-fu stele inscription in China bear witness to Christian communities living harmoniously with their respective cultural worlds from quite early times.

Besides this “incarnational” approach to the relationship between gospel and culture, there has also been a “prophetic” engagement in which the gospel is an effective prophetic critique of cultures. Yet history and experience demonstrate the importance of being rooted incarnationally in cultures in order to offer an effective prophetic critique. The absence of such prophetic engagement easily leads to an uncritical conformity to cultures.

A challenge that Asia faces is to blend the incarnational and prophetic approaches in the relationship between gospel and culture. Another major challenge (yet to be undertaken) is to relate the gospel to a “reconstructed understanding of culture,” not as an essentialized and closed system divorced from history and social realities, but as a reality continuously constructed by a given community that takes into account the differences within a culture. See also CULTURE CLUSTER: CULTURAL STUDIES and CULTURE and CHRISTIANITY. FELIX WILFRED

Gospel and Culture in Australia. The gospel has been preached in Australia* since the “First Fleet,” but popular understanding has varied. Protestant chaplains were government employees, and some, as magistrates, sentenced men to flogging; consequently, the gospel’s demands were heard as punitive moralism. Roman Catholic clergy shared their flocks’ trials, but their ministry was restricted. English Anglicans, Scottish Presbyterians, and Irish Catholics each assumed that theirs was “the” church. Sectarianism* strengthened secularism*, with doctrine minimized in favor of “deed, not creed” religion. Thus the gospel was commonly identified with self-serving establishment religion, life-denying Protestant moralism, guilt-inducing “pie-in-the-sky” Catholicism, or sheer irrationalism.

In outback communities, the gospel was commended by ministers willing to serve sacrificially; in the cities, churches in which laity and clergy worked together, especially in public evangelism, grew. The Depression and world wars saw more holistic gospel ministries emerge; the years since have seen cooperation in evangelism* and growing ecumenical openness (contested by some conservative Protestants) but a decline in church attendance.

In today’s multicultural Australia, reconciliation* in Christ, the grace-giving work of the Spirit, and the importance of living out the gospel are viewed as crucial for believable proclamation in a society open to the spiritual but suspicious of religious institutions. See also GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER: IN AUSTRALIA; JUSTIFICATION, THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES, CLUSTER: IN AUSTRALIA. CHARLES SHERLOCK

Gospel and Culture in the Caribbean Islands. Caribbean peoples, despite centuries of colonialism and mismanagement, are most inventive, creative, and committed to struggle to make a better world. Despite differences in language, religion, and ethnicities, they share a history; a vocabulary (e.g., colonialism, underdevelopment, production of sugarcane and bananas, racism, and tourism), and a central problem, poverty*. Thus the gospel is the gospel of Christ only insofar as it proclaims justice* for the poor.

Poverty – entailing a lack of health care, homelessness, and the AIDS epidemic – cuts across the Caribbean cultures. The Christian Church also cuts across cultures.

Thus it is in the best position to speak the word of justice, especially when the gap between rich and poor widens, and to adopt a Liberation* theology that will make a material difference in people's living conditions. In the past, the church was content to walk beside those condemned to a harsh life of poverty, offering spiritual encouragement and a home in heaven after their death, and thus reinforcing a culture that makes people powerless. Becoming a "justice church" involves leading Caribbean people to abandon cultural traditions that render them voiceless and economically and socially dependent. For this the gospel of Christ must be translated into social praxis.

Gospel and Culture in Mexico. Theology* interrelates gospel and culture* as it seeks to conceive of the relationship between believers' faith* in spiritual, transcendent realities and the individual and collective religious experience in the cultural reality of daily life. Theology has existed in Mexico since the time of the Mesoamericans, who expressed their religious wisdom in myths*, rites, religious practices, and beliefs in the Anáhuac region and throughout Mesoamerica.

Two kinds of Western theology arrived with Christian evangelization (see Mexico). One was mystical* and was lived out in convents with their own European cultures. The second kind of theology was missionary, which aimed at communicating the gospel in two ways: either by demanding a tabula rasa (a total abandonment of previous beliefs and practices) or by recognizing the voice of the Spirit* in Mesoamerican peoples and their cultures. At first Christian and Mesoamerican theologies collided; eventually, however, they began to interact: Christians allowed native theologies to contribute to the life of the church, and Mesoamericans endorsed popular expressions of Christian faith (see Popular Christian Practices Cluster: In Latin America: Mexico).

After the colonial period, the institutional church in Mexico framed its life around diverse European theologies, thus defining itself as against Mesoamerican cultures. But following the Liberals' political triumph (1856), the Mexican government abolished the state church status of the Roman Catholic Church; thus Protestant churches arrived in Mexico with their own theological perspectives. In addition, since 1940, North American religious organizations have contributed to a broader theological and religious diversity.

After the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65) and especially after the Latin American Episcopal Conference in Medellín* (1968), the Liberation* Theology Movement paid attention (from a Marxist perspective) to the structure of production of authoritative teaching. Who was empowered to produce theology? Liberation theologians removed "theological production" from the hands of clergy in the sanctuaries and entrusted it to laypersons in public places; theological production became associated with the struggle of the poor for a more human and just world. Then new producers of Christian theology emerged: Mesoamericans, African Americans, rural people, youth, women, and others, each group having specific theological proposals, distinguished by their contents and methodologies, but with similar ways of relating gospel and particular cultures and life conditions.

Latin American and Feminist theologies, developed elsewhere in Latin America, have found a unique Mexican voice, shaped by their reflection on life experiences in Mexico. Professional theologians, social activists, and pastors of churches seek to correlate fidelity to the received faith and commitment to addressing the new challenges of life in the world.

ELEAZAR LÓPEZ

Gospel and Culture in North America.

There are two basic North American views of "gospel." With the definite article ("the gospel") and without the definite article, as "good news."

"Gospel" (Gk euangelion) means "good news." The source of this good news, for Christians, is the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus, the Christ – the normative biblical and theological bases of the Christian message. But the articulation of the Christian message as gospel depends on the context in which it is proclaimed. This “news” can be thought “good” only insofar as it engages, illumines, and “answers” the problems (the “bad news”) of a given culture. Gospel for one time and place is thus not necessarily gospel for another. Hence for many in North America, ranging from members of mainline churches to members of Charismatic churches, the quest for “gospel” is an ongoing task of the disciple* community, involving it in a continuous attempt to “discern the signs of the times” in which it finds itself and in ever new proclamation (*kerygma) responsive to the cultural reality for which it is intended.

By contrast, with the definite article, “the gospel” is associated with supracontextual doctrinal claims as though it were fixed and unaffected by historical actuality – a fundamentalist*, biblicist view. Ironically, “the gospel” that is upheld by the most determined users of the term in the USA is in fact highly determined by the presuppositions, anxieties, and conflicts of the contemporary religious situation in which it was fashioned and is perpetuated.

DOUGLAS JOHN HALL

Gospel Music. The term has informally come to mean all modern, composed religious music and is thus differentiated from hymns*, classical sacred music. It has also been loosely applied to US Southern religious music (close-harmony, country-influenced quartets) and contemporary Christian music (pop melodies with religious lyrics).

However, the term “gospel music” is most commonly applied to a genre that emerged from the early African American sacred music tradition (see Spirituals). Also called black gospel music, it is a composed sacred music form created from the melding of spirituals, jubilee, and blues (and, later, rhythm and blues) with the emotionalism and instrumentation of Pentecostal* worship services. It is characterized by overtly religious lyrics, a love of improvisation, call-and-response choruses and performances, and a pronounced beat.

Gospel music is particularly identified with African Americans, and the term was first popularized by composer Thomas Dorsey (1899–1993) in Chicago (in the 1930s, although the term had been in use since the early 1900s). Gospels were originally performed either a cappella or with a piano or organ, but gospel artists eventually added other instruments, including guitars and drums. Singer Mahalia Jackson (1911–72) was the most influential gospel artist, the first to “cross over” into mainstream white North America.

Gospel music has traditionally been performed by large choirs, usually fronted by a soloist (as in the Mississippi Mass Choir), mostly male quartets (e.g. the Dixie Hummingbirds), or soloists (Shirley Caesar). Although first popularized in black churches, not all black denominations welcome gospel music performances in their services.

During the “golden age” of gospel music in the USA (1945–late 1960s), gospel artists played an important role in the Civil* Rights Movement. A more “urban” version of the music (incorporating elements of funk, rock, and/or rap music) became more popular in the early 21st c. Still, traditional gospel music remains a potent force in contemporary black culture. Gospel songs like “Precious Lord, Take My Hand,” “O Happy Day,” and “Peace in the Valley” remain staples in black and white church services, revivals*, and funeral services alike. See also MEDIA AND CHRISTIANITY; MEDIA AND CHRISTIAN WORSHIP; MEGA-CHURCHES REMAKING RELIGIOUS TRADITION IN NORTH AMERICA; PRAISE AND WORSHIP.

ROBERT DARDEN

Gospel Reading, during worship the reading of a selection from one of the Gospels after all other biblical readings, traditionally with the congregation standing to show reverence in “high liturgy” churches.

Gospel of Truth. The untitled third treatise in the first codex of Nag* Hammadi begins with the words “The gospel of truth,” which became the modern title of this writing, although it seems more like a homily or meditation on the topic of “truth.” Irenaeus* knew of a “Gospel of Truth” used by the Gnostic* Valentinian* school. That gospel, about which Irenaeus says that it “agrees in nothing with the Gospels of the apostles,” might be identical with the surviving (middle to late 2nd c.) text of the codex of Nag Hammadi. Some scholars’ assumption that it was composed by Valentinus* himself cannot be substantiated.

The Gospel of Truth consists of a nearly unbroken stream of associations and displays considerable poetic vigor, though its underlying structure is not easily discerned. Some biblical concepts (truth* and error, knowledge and ignorance, the anointing, the cross), metaphors (the living book, the good shepherd, sleep, and blindness), and literary forms (parables* and beatitudes*) can nevertheless be identified. The beautiful passage on Jesus' activity as a teacher is probably a reminiscence of Luke 2:46–49. The underlying theme of this enigmatic text progresses from "searching" and "finding" to "rest." "Rest" is a shorthand for ultimate salvation*, which the preacher of this discourse has at least partially already found. HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Goths, a Germanic people whose two branches, the Ostrogoths and the Visigoths, embraced Arian* Christianity (c364–78), the moderate "homoian" Arianism (asserting that the Son is "like," homoios, the Father, but refusing to say that they are of the same essence). Under the influence of Ulfila*, the "apostle to the Goths," and other Arian missionaries, the Goths converted to Christianity while they and other Germanic people were fleeing from the Huns and first settled in the Danube region (including Romania* and Hungary*), before migrating to and occupying the entire western Mediterranean region.

Arian Christian Visigoths ruled Spain* and (Southern) Gaul (415–587); the Arian Church saw itself as the "Catholic" Church (denying this title to the Roman Church). The Spanish Church became Catholic in the Nicene sense once again when King Reccared* converted from Arian Christianity to Latin Christianity (587). The Visigothic monarchy lasted until it was swept away by the Muslim invasion (711–19).

Similarly, Arian Christian Ostrogoths ruled Italy* (493–552); Arian and Roman churches coexisted, although there was much tension between them. Because the Ostrogoths preserved much of the Roman mode of governing – Christian dioceses continued to correspond to the municipia (cities with their own local governments according to Roman law) – Arian rulers maintained close control of the local churches; the bishops were in most instances Arians (a situation that changed with the Arian Lombards*, who succeeded the Ostrogoths in Northern Italy). See also ARIANISM; ITALY; SPAIN.

Gottschalk, or Codescalc (c804–69), German monk and theologian; was dedicated to monastic life, was tonsured, and took vows while still a child at the Abbey of Fulda. He sought release on the grounds that he had been made a monk against his will. A council gave him his liberty (829), but he continued to reside in several monasteries. He developed an extreme doctrine of predestination* ("double predestination," with respect to both salvation* and damnation*), based on Augustine's* last writings, which he preached in Italy and the Balkans. (His own fate as a child, having been "drawn into salvation" against his will, may have reinforced this theology.) He returned to Germany (848), where he engaged in a new and sophisticated discussion of predestination, one of the high points of the Carolingian* Renaissance, which included all the notable theologians and church politicians of the time. Several regional councils formulated complex statements denying double predestination and ascribing salvation to grace* and damnation to human guilt. Gottschalk died in confinement (869), holding to his theory of predestination until death. Many of his writings have been retrieved and studied only in recent decades.

Grace of God in the Eastern Orthodox Tradition is understood as the experience of God's presence as a step toward the realization of the ultimate goal of Christian life: divine-human communion (theosis*, divinization). Absent in Eastern Orthodox theology are distinctions between different kinds of grace, such as prevenient grace and sanctifying grace. According to most contemporary Orthodox theologians, the Greek patristic tradition developed an understanding of grace as a communication of the divine energies, in which one participates to a greater or lesser degree.

This notion of grace as a self-communication of God is rooted in the Incarnation*, in which humanity is saved from death and corruption through union with the Divine (see Atonement #1). Grace is communicated sacramentally and iconically. Sacrament* within the Orthodox tradition is an event of the divine presence made possible through the iconic* structure of a particular medium. In addition to the formal sacraments in the Orthodox Church, such as Eucharist* and baptism*, the Orthodox theologian Alexander Schmemmann affirms that all of creation is potentially sacramental. Grace is a gift received through synergy, i.e. the performance of ascetic* practices, such as liturgical worship, prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. Such practices do not make demands on God's grace, but make one available to receive the presence of God that permeates all of creation. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES.

ARISTOTLE PAPANIKOLAOU

Grace of God in the Western Tradition.

Grace is God's favor to human beings. In the OT, grace encompasses creation*, Israel's redemption* from Egypt and its election*, the covenant*, the gift of the Law*, sending prophets*, and other acts of divine favor. According to the divine self-revelation of Exod 33:19–34:9, God's grace is threefold: God acts with "faithful love" (Heb root hesed), is "merciful" (Heb root rhym), and is "gracious" (Heb root hnn). First, God's "faithful love" presupposes an existing relationship (specifically the covenant) to which God is faithful and underscores that grace is an action by God (rather than simply an attitude) that fulfills an essential need that humans cannot meet by themselves, e.g. an action of deliverance, healing, and overcoming barrenness (such as that of Sarah). Second, God's "mercy" expresses the benevolence of a superior toward a weak or needy inferior. Third, "graciousness" as applied to God refers to a type of relationship that God has with humans and that humans can also have with others; grace is the action of freely and unilaterally offering an undeserved gift or favor; although it can be requested or withheld, it cannot be coerced.

In the NT, the Greek charis is the central term for God's grace; according to the NT passages, this term refers to God's acts of faithful love, God's mercifulness, or God's graciousness (expressed by different terms in the OT). Charis is found especially in the Pauline letters and Luke and Acts, but also in 1 and 2 Peter, as well as in John 1:14–17, Hebrews, and James.

Charis thus has three connotations, comparable to the OT connotations:

1. Grace may refer to lovingly giving aid to someone who needs help (2 Cor 8:6, 7, 19, about Titus's gracious work) and especially to God's loving help and empowerment of people in need – a sense of "grace" found in the Pauline letters, as well as in Jas 4:6 and 1 and 2 Peter. This view of grace as intervention on behalf of someone in need is closely related to salvation* as the redemption* of humans who are powerless to free themselves from bondage – physical bondage or any other bondage that separates them from God – or are powerless to achieve sanctification*. Here, grace designates a divine intervention through Christ and empowerment through Christ and the Spirit that effects salvation and/or sanctification*.
2. Grace may refer to God's saving benevolence in Christ; what is emphasized is not so much God's action but God's inclination. Here charis evokes the image of a loving father or a forgiving judge. "God's grace" is especially manifested through Christ's death, which saves sinners from the condemnation they justly deserve – according to (especially Protestant) interpretations of Paul's letters, e.g. Rom 3:24–25a: "They are now justified by his grace as a gift, through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus whom God put forward as a sacrifice of atonement by his blood."

3. As God's "graciousness," grace is the action of freely and unilaterally endowing persons with specific tasks or ministries by offering them an undeserved gift, "charisma," or favor. Luke often uses charis in this sense (e.g. about Mary, Luke 1:10; about Jesus, 2:20, 52, 4:22; about the apostles, Acts 4:33, 6:8), whereas Paul often uses "charisma" in this sense (e.g. 1 Cor 11).

These multivalent understandings of God's grace in Scriptures have given rise to different interpretations through the centuries. While all three connotations (which parallel in some ways the three understandings of atonement*, of salvation*, and of sin*) are found in all traditions, in each instance one or another is given primary emphasis.

Following the Greek fathers, Eastern Orthodoxy* primarily emphasizes grace as God's "faithful love" (connotation 1), the experience of God's presence as a step toward the realization of the ultimate goal of Christian life, divine-human communion. From a Western perspective, this Orthodox view of grace is envisioned as the divine helping humans by healing them of sin as a disease of the soul and freeing them for cooperation and union with God. Thus the Virgin* Mary, the Theotokos*, is the paragon of fallen humanity renewed by divine grace (but see The Present Clutter: In the Eastern Orthodox Tradition).

In a similar vein, Augustine begins his Confessions, "You have made us for yourself, and our hearts are restless until they rest in you." On this basis, he raises questions concerning the relation between reason and revelation (as grace), the earthly city and the city of God (as God's gracious gift), as well as liberation* and salvation*.

As they have confronted these issues, Western Christian theologians have adopted the biblical term "good pleasure" (eudokia, beneplacitum) to describe God's willing (see Revelation) (connotation 2). While this might mean that God acts arbitrarily, it usually carries the connotation of generosity and favor. Medieval thinkers often quoted the Neoplatonist* dictum that goodness extends or spreads itself (bonum est diffusivum sui); to avoid the implication that this happens by necessity, they added that God acts freely, but always in accordance with the goodness of God's nature. God's good pleasure confers benefits that go beyond anything that created things deserve or are able to accomplish. It is usual to emphasize three successive ways in which God acts graciously: creating things that did not exist, inviting human beings into a communion with God that is beyond their intrinsic capabilities, and offering salvation after they fall into sin.

Grace in a narrower sense applies not to creation but to the invitation to communion with God. In Scholastic* discussions, the term was seen to have at least three applications. In its origins, grace is an attitude and decision on God's part to turn toward human beings. Grace does not merely remain within God but is communicated through action (the "actual grace" of the Scholastics), mediated through Word and sacraments or immediately through divine influence. And when grace takes full effect, there is a change in human beings (the "sanctifying grace" of the Scholastics). The latter is understood to be a "new being" and a new mode of acting, animated by faith*, hope*, and love* (1 Cor 13:13).

Roman Catholic theologians focus on the relationship between divine grace and nature. Nature is associated with human capabilities, and grace is associated with divine influence beyond those capabilities. Thomas Aquinas* asserts that grace presupposes and perfects human nature and acknowledges human achievements in work, culture, science and technology, and politics; yet humanity is satisfied only through God's self-communication in grace.

By contrast Protestants tend to discuss grace* as a resolution of sin*, considering how God's grace in Jesus Christ overcomes human sin, which separates human from God.

The Charismatic* Movement, while emphasizing grace as God's "faithful loving" interventions (e.g. in healings*) (see connotation 1) give greater weight to God's "gracious" gifts, charismata, that empower believers for specific ministries.

Grace of God: Asian Perspective. Grace as anchored in the person of Jesus Christ, the Word of God, "full of grace and truth," is in tension with the universality of grace so important in the pluralistic context of Asia. This is the recurring problem of the relation between the saving event in Jesus Christ and God's unbounded and effective love for all peoples and God's universal saving action. In the Asian context, grace is therefore understood as that divine wisdom* which enables human beings to recognize and acknowledge God and to transcend difference. Grace enables us to attain the fullness of our humanity and to build a community of equals. Grace empowers us to challenge and change dominant systems and structures and to promote social relations most beneficial to people. For this, God's grace bestows on us the gifts* of the Spirit, as well as justice*, love*, joy, and peace*. Hence grace is a community-building force that frees human beings from all ghetto attitudes.

MONICA JYOTSNA MELANCHTHON

Grace of God: Latin American Perspective. Reflecting on grace from a Latin American perspective involves taking as a starting point the economic, social, and cultural hardships experienced by poor* people, the majority of the population. Social inequality, lack of dignity, and other signs of structural* sin* challenge the traditional ahistorical conception of grace.

According to Liberation* theology, grace empowers people by reminding them that as children of God, created in God's image, they have a place in the world. In a mercantile society in which everything is bought and sold, the excluded, the marginalized*, the invisible non-persons experience grace as that through which they are included and made visible in society. This gift from God that they receive is an invitation to radiate grace in their daily life, carrying within their soul, mind, and body the message of God's love* in a world that knows no mercy. Conversely, grace reminds the powerful, the wealthy, and those with authority of their complicity in structural sins that create inequality, even as grace affirms that they are themselves children* of God. The affirmation that here and now by grace all humans are God's kin can lead to mutual respect and to the suppression of inequalities and discriminations in society and the church.

ELSA TAMEZ

Grace of God: North American Feminist Perspective.

Traditionally, grace is the unmerited acceptance and ever-present love of God that forgives and restores sinners through Jesus Christ. Christian feminists readily affirm grace as the antithesis of sin*, suffering*, and death* that are met by God's mysterious, redemptive* power. Feminists also have different understandings of grace. A critical assessment of power in divine-human-cosmic relations is key to naming and explicating grace. Amid systematically disordered and violent relations of domination and subordination, grace is the power of the Holy Spirit – the unexpected gift of sustenance, empowerment, and redemption for freedom* and dignity – that transforms people into persons respectful of self and others. Divine grace is thus the transformative, surprising, and uncontrollable wellspring in which one can seek healing*, justice*, and love*, and find strength to resist evil*, to build dynamic communities of peace and compassion, and to support the flourishing of all creation. Images of graced experiences include the exodus of liberation*, the rainbow of covenant*, the jubilee of new beginnings, the power of people to bring one another into well-being, the Christic identification with the discarded and downtrodden, and the breaking of bread – “the welcome table” – where hospitality* to strangers* and outcasts and the promise of life abundant are shared.

Grail Legend. In medieval romances, starting in the 12th c., the Holy Grail is a vessel with unique powers, sometimes identified as the cup used by Christ at the Last Supper, transmitted to Joseph* of Arimathea, and producing effects like those often attributed to the Eucharist*.

Gratian (12th c.), teacher of canon* law in Bologna, Italy, author of the Concordia discordantium canonum (known as Decretum), a comprehensive collection of laws relating to most aspects of church governance and discipline. Gratian created the foundation for medieval and modern canon law and possibly served as an adviser to a papal judge (Venice, 1143). There is very little evidence that he was a monk or a bishop, as has been suggested.

Gratian collected legal statements deriving from general and provincial councils, papal decretals*, patristic writings, the Pseudo-Isidorian forgeries (False Decretals*), penitentials*, and secular law. As sources, he used recent legal collections and contemporary theology. Gratian's innovation was to include his own brief comments (dicta), which apply the methods of early Scholasticism* to reconcile the seemingly contradictory statements passed down by tradition.

The Decretum is preserved in two recensions, perhaps from different authors. The first, finished shortly after 1139, contains most of the dicta and 1,860 chapters. The second is more juristic. It was already in use by 1150 and contains 3,945 chapters. Some 200 excerpts were taken directly from the sources of Roman law. The Decretum remained foundational for Catholic Church courts and the teaching of canon law until 1918.

Great Awakening, a name applied to Evangelical* revivals* that took place in Great Britain, Ireland, and the American colonies from the mid-1730s to the mid-1740s. It involved hundreds of ministers and churches, with Whitefield*, then Edwards* and the Wesleys* as iconic figures.

The thousands of conversions that took place during the revivals were unified by the religious experience of the “new birth,” an intensely personal, often emotional form of Christian conversion that places primary importance on the direct operation of the Holy* Spirit on a person.

People turned out by the thousands to participate in or evaluate the revival gatherings. Many, referred to as the “New Lights,” embraced the Great Awakening as God's work, and many others, the “Old Lights,” rejected it as overenthusiastic and irrational.

The revivals had a socially democratizing effect. The spiritual experience of the common person was often prioritized over the minister's hierarchical authority; women and ethnic minorities had a personalized voice in the once-restricted public square. Subjective understanding began to challenge doctrine* in the pursuit of truth.

This dramatic turn toward “heart religion” among 18th-c. Enlightenment Protestants led some to consider the Great Awakening as the archetypal mass media* event in the dawning age of Evangelicalism*. CALEB J. D. MASKELL

Great Schism, a term that refers to two different schisms: the schism of 1054 and the schism of 1378–1417.

“The Great Schism of 1054” refers to the break between the Eastern* and Western* churches, usually said to have occurred when Pope Leo IX and Patriarch Michael Cerularius excommunicated each other. Many factors contributed to the growing alienation between the two groups: divergent theological understandings and liturgical practices, but also cultural gaps and political rivalries. The heated disputes in 1054 over the ecclesiastical calendar, the use of leavened or unleavened bread, or additions of the Filioque clause to the Nicene Creed, although liturgical and theological, reflect a fundamental split in the conception of the church and of the ecclesiastical structure (see Filioque; cf. Orthodox Churches, Eastern, Cluster: Introductory Entries; Roman Catholicism Cluster: The Roman Catholic Church and Its Theology). The schism of 1054 was not regarded as final; in fact, the Crusades* were mounted at the request of, and for the benefit of, Christians in the East. But the sack of Constantinople (1204) increased Greek resentment toward the Latins, and this was a major factor in the failure of the reunion negotiated at the Council of Florence* (1439).

"The Great Schism of 1378–1417" refers to the period in the Western Church following the Babylonian* Captivity, when rival popes sat in Avignon and Rome and a third pope was elected at the Council of Pisa* (1409). The impasse was resolved at the Council of Constance* with the removal or resignation of the rival popes (1415) and the election of a new pope (1417). See also CONCILIARISM. EUGENE TESELLE

Greece. For most of its history, Christianity in Greece has been comparatively homogeneous and united despite historical vagaries.

Paul* brought Christianity to Greece (mid-1st c.), establishing communities in Philippi, Thessaloniki, and Corinth. Little is known of pre-Constantinian Christianity in Greece. Eusebius* preserves 2nd- to 3rd-c. correspondence between Corinthian church leaders and Rome and attests to the existence of communities in Athens and Crete. The 4th c. and following centuries provide evidence for the vibrancy and spread of Christianity. At the Council of Chalcedon* (451), 42 bishops from the provinces of Macedonia, Epirus Nova, Epirus Veta, Thessaly, Achaia, Crete, and the Greek islands were in attendance or represented. Important pilgrimage sites at Philippi, Corinth, and Thessaloniki attracted faithful from around the Mediterranean. The closing of the academy of Athens by Justinian (529) marks the final demise of the polytheistic Greek lifestyle. Non-Christian Slavs overran much of Greece (end of the 6th c.), although their cultural impact was limited to the north. Eighth-century Iconoclasm* resulted in the realignment of the Roman vicariate of Thessaloniki from its historical jurisdiction under Rome to the ecclesiastical authority of Constantinople. Thessaloniki produced the two missionary brothers Cyril* (Constantine) and Methodios (9th c.).

During the medieval period, Greece remained part of the Byzantine Empire. Important ecclesiastical and monastic buildings survive from this period: the church of Hagia Sophia (Thessaloniki), Hosios Loukas (Stiris), and the monastery of Daphne (outside Athens). The period from the 9th to the 11th c. witnessed a marked increase in monastic foundations, Mount Athos* being the most significant and lasting. The Great* Schism of 1054 between Rome and Constantinople along with the Crusades* provided Western rulers an opportunity for eastward expansion. The Fourth Crusade (1204) brought further western expansion and Roman Catholicism. The late medieval Byzantine city of Mistra (near the site of ancient Sparta) was a hub of political and ecclesiastical activity; Mistra's artistic and religious vibrancy is attested to by several churches along with their frescos.

By 1460, with the exception of a few islands, Greece was under Ottoman control, resulting in four centuries of stagnation and decline. Local Ottoman authorities extracted fees for many of the activities of the Christian community, especially for appointment to high ecclesiastical offices. The training and education of clergy were limited. A new category of martyrs* emerged, the "new martyrs," referring usually to Christians who had converted willingly or forcibly to Islam* but were martyred for returning to Christianity. The Orthodox hierarchy of Greece continued to be under the jurisdiction of the Ecumenical* Patriarchate of Constantinople, and absenteeism among local Greek bishops, who sought advancement in Constantinople, was common. The Orthodox Church remained the only viable institution among Greeks; through its daily, weekly, and yearly liturgical and festal cycle, it preserved religious, ethnic, and later national identity.

Greece's independence from the Ottomans (1821), opened a new chapter for Christianity. Calls for a church independent of the Ecumenical Patriarchate of Constantinople, the latter still under Ottoman authority, were realized, though not universally welcomed.

The Orthodox Church of Greece became closely tied to the nascent state. Early constitutions identified all Greek citizens as Orthodox Christian; today the constitution guarantees religious freedom but acknowledges the Orthodox Church as the “prevailing religion.” During much of the 19th c., Roman Catholic communities flourished on many Greek islands. A sizable Muslim minority of Turkish ancestry resides in Thrace. The 1923 adoption of the Gregorian calendar* by the Church of Greece proved controversial. Resistance was strong and brutally repressed by the state. Initially, the Old Calendarists in Greece numbered perhaps 1 million. Today they constitute about 5% of those who identify themselves as Greek Orthodox.

Greek identity and Orthodox Christianity continued to be closely linked throughout Greece’s modern history. In the last quarter of the 20th c., secular reforms (e.g. civil marriage and divorce by consent) reflected a shift away from this monolithic identification. Nonetheless, the Orthodox Church remains a strong force in the cultural, religious, and political life of Greece. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER: IN GREECE.

Greene, (Henry) Graham (1904–91), British novelist, essayist, playwright, and scriptwriter, who converted to Roman Catholicism (1925) and became one of the great 20th-c. Roman Catholic literary authors. A brilliant writer of political thrillers throughout his long career, he is most celebrated for his series of “Catholic” novels, Brighton Rock (1938), The Power and the Glory (1940), The Heart of the Matter (1948), and The End of the Affair (1951). These novels portray characters in extreme situations in which faith* and belief, doubt* and betrayal are set in the political and social upheavals of his time.

Major theological themes in his novels include the idea of “the sinner at the heart of Christianity” and God as the “Hound of Heaven” pursuing the errant soul. Greene focuses on the spiritual life of failed and sinful characters who eventually gain the privileged status of experiencing the “appalling strangeness of the mercy* of God.”

Greene was deeply influenced by Newman*, and he was an astute reader of Catholic theology before, during, and after the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65). Critics often assume that Greene’s late novels eschew Christian themes for political ones, but there is much evidence to suggest otherwise, especially in two novels, The Honorary Consul (1973) and Monsignor Quixote (1982), which reveal his full engagement with issues vital to Vatican II Catholicism and liberation theology.

Gregorian Sacramentary, the name given to several sacramentaries* (liturgical books) attributed to Pope Gregory* I (590–604). The oldest was sent by Pope Hadrian I to Charlemagne* (c790); only a copy (811/12) survives. Because it did not have services for parts of the church* year, it was augmented from French copies of the Gelasian* Sacramentary, possibly by Alcuin*. This compilation became the basis for the later Roman Missal.

Gregory I, Pope (c540–604), “Gregory the Great,” theologian. Born into a wealthy senatorial family, he became prefect of Rome (573). He sold his estates, spent his wealth helping the poor, and founded six monasteries in Sicily and one in Rome, where he became a monk (c574). The pope made him one of the seven deacons of Rome, then apocrisarius at the emperor’s court in Constantinople (c578); he returned to Rome (c585) as abbot of his monastery. He reluctantly became pope (590) when the Roman Church was largely responsible for public order during the fall of the Roman Empire. He made peace with the Lombard* invaders (592–93) and sent Augustine* of Canterbury as a missionary to England (597). By refusing to recognize the claim of the patriarch of Constantinople to the title of ecumenical* patriarch, he asserted papal primacy.

Gregory was the first to establish the norm of exegesis* according to the four senses: literal (or historical), allegorical, moral (or tropological), prophetic (or anagogical) – probably derived from John Cassian* (c360–435).

Gregory wrote On Pastoral Care to guide popes and bishops in keeping a balance between practical duties and spiritual lives. He preached several series of exegetical sermons in the Western patristic tradition. His Moralia in Job, a moral interpretation of Job, emerged from conversations with his fellow monks. In his Dialogues (authorship disputed), Gregory provided a biography of Benedict* of Nursia and a series of exemplary stories and apothegms from the tradition of monastic asceticism*, which he eagerly promoted. GILLIAN R. EVANS

Gregory the Illuminator (c260–c326/8). King Tiridates IV of Armenia* (298–330), like his benefactor, Emperor Diocletian*, persecuted the Christians. According to his “life” (by Agathangelos, c455), Gregory, a preacher of Parthian origin, was tortured and thrown into a deep pit for his refusal to worship the goddess Anahit. After a long confinement, to the amazement of all he was discovered alive; the king, hoping to be healed by the saintly man, released him. Gregory converted the king, urging him to destroy the idols*. Gregory, “the Illuminator of Armenia,” was ordained a bishop in Caesarea (Cappadocia), baptized the king and his court, and evangelized the country, which became the first official Christian state (c314).

IGOR DORFMANN-LAZAREV

Gregory Nazianzen (c330–c390), one of the Cappadocians*. Son of the bishop of Nazianzus, he studied in Athens together with Basil* of Caesarea (and Julian* the Apostate). He and Basil compiled the Philocalia, excerpts from Origen’s* writings.

His father ordained him against his will as a priest; Basil, as part of his anti-Arian* campaign, appointed him bishop of the small town of Sasima, but he refused to live there. He went to Constantinople (379) as a champion of the Nicene* doctrine, preaching in the church building of the Anastasis (a converted house), since the court of Valens had given all the basilicas to the Arians. He participated in the Council of Constantinople* but soon resigned and spent his time writing poetry and orations in an ornate Greek style. He is called “the Theologian” because of his five “theological orations” on the doctrine of the Trinity*; they are important for their emphasis on the crucial role of relation in the Trinity and their insistence on the full divinity of each person. Gregory’s letters against Apollinarianism* were decisive in changing the course of thinking about Christology*; like Origen, he saw the humanity of Christ as linked to the Word through acts of mind, i.e. knowledge and love. EUGENE TESELLE rina* and Basil* of Caesarea, Gregory was attracted by the revival of classical culture in Athens under Libanius; he married and became a teacher of rhetoric. As bishop of Caesarea, Basil appointed Gregory to the See of Nyssa to counter Valens’s Arian* policies.

When Basil died (379), Gregory inherited his brother’s role. On the Making of Man demonstrates his interest in setting forth the consistency (akolouthia) of the biblical message, and develops his four-stage theory of the creation of human beings and their restoration through the Incarnation*, Redemption*, and Resurrection*. After Macrina’s* death (380), he wrote her Life; he also placed in Macrina’s mouth his work On the Soul and Resurrection. A leading figure at the Council of Constantinople* (381), Gregory issued his massive Against Eunomius to refute Arianism. His Catechetical Oration seeks to help catechists answer philosophical objections to the Incarnation.

After retreating from ecclesiastical politics (387–94), he produced spiritual writings, including 15 homilies on the Song* of Songs and the Life of Moses, which allegorizes the Exodus narrative (as Philo* and Origen* had done) as the ascent of the soul*, growing in virtue and rising to the “perfection” that consists in unending progress toward God, “straining ahead” (epektasis; Phil 3:13). EUGENE TESELLE

Gregory Palamas (c1296–1359), Greek monk, archbishop, theologian, defender of hesychasm*. Born in Constantinople, Palamas became a monk, went to Mount Athos* (c1318), fled to Thessaloniki to escape the Turks, but soon returned to Athos. He was consecrated archbishop of Thessaloniki (1347, during a civil war), was a captive of the Turks for one year (1354), and engaged in a dispute with a mullah. More than 60 sermons survive from this period.

Living in the Byzantine Empire, caught between the Turks’ advance and increasing interest in the brilliant theological edifice of Western Scholasticism, Palamas was involved in a controversy with Barlaam*, a Greek monk from Calabria, initially over the Filioque (1337), then over the hesychasts’ claim to behold the uncreated light of the Godhead through their practice of the Jesus Prayer. The controversy divided Byzantine intellectual society. Palamas, opposed by Gregory Akindynos and others, was vindicated by the 1341, 1347, and 1351 synods in Constantinople. Palamas’s defense of the hesychasts (Apodeictic Treatises on the Procession of the Spirit; Triads in Defense of the Hesychasts) was based on the distinction between God's unknowable essence and God's energies, through which God is known. Such Palamism characterized the liveliest traditions of Orthodox theology in the 20th c. ANDREW LOUTH

Gregory VII, Pope (1073–85). Hildebrand, possibly an offspring of Jewish converts in the Pierleone family, a monk in Rome, became chaplain to Pope Gregory VI and went to Germany (1046), becoming acquainted with the “northern” or “imperial” reform movement. Upon returning to Rome (1049) he was a key adviser to reformer Leo IX and several other popes, who changed the reform from a lay to a clerical movement.

After Hildebrand became Pope Gregory, decrees were issued against simony* and Nicolaitism*, and against lay appointment and the investiture* of clerics. In Germany, Henry IV persuaded two synods of compliant bishops to declare Gregory not the pope; Gregory deposed Henry and freed his subjects from their oath of allegiance. Gregory called for a council in Augsburg in February 1077, and in January Henry stood dressed as a penitent before the gate of Matilda of Canossa's fortress, where Gregory was staying. Gregory, in releasing Henry from excommunication*, acted too quickly and mercifully. A counter-emperor was elected, and a three-year civil war devastated Germany. Henry besieged Rome; Gregory called on the Normans for aid, but they sacked the city and he died a few months later.

While some see Gregory as a power-mad despot, others appreciate his efforts to differentiate between church and state. His example taught people to criticize both clergy and monarchs, paving the way for revolutionary movements. The independence of the church was greatly enhanced by the universal requirement of clerical celibacy*, which loosened the ties between the church and the feudal* system and encouraged the clergy to devote their energies to the church rather than to offspring.

EUGENE TESELLE

Gregory Thaumaturgus (c213–c270). Born in Neocaesarea in Pontus, he studied with Origen*. He returned to his native city, was made bishop, and is said to have converted the entire city and region. The many legends about his miracles are the reason for his title “Wonderworker.” He perhaps exerted his most notable influence on Macrina*, Basil* of Caesarea, and Gregory* of Nyssa through their grandmother, also named Macrina.

Gregory of Tours (538–94), bishop of Tours, author of History of the Franks, a compilation of earlier traditions and a detailed account of Gregory's own times. He also wrote a number of accounts of the miracles wrought by martyrs* and saints* (e.g. Life of Saint Andrew), enhancing the authority of the church and warning about the consequences of heresy* and immorality. The content of his writings vividly exhibits the differences between his day and that of classical Rome; his “late Latin” style is perhaps the manifestation of this dramatically changed setting.

Grimké, Sarah Moore, and Angelina Emily Grimké (later Weld), noted Quaker abolitionists and women's rights advocates, born into a prominent Charleston, South Carolina, slaveholding family. After moving to Philadelphia in 1821, Sarah (1792–1873) joined the Religious Society of Friends*; her more assertive sister, Angelina (1805–79), followed in 1828.

Having reacted against slavery* and the overly formal Presbyterian religion, the Grimké sisters were attracted to Quakerism, with its emphasis on equality. Sarah found especially appealing Quaker John Woolman's testimonies against slavery and his travels devoted to this cause. She lectured against slavery and wrote some of the first feminist* articles to appear in North America (1837). Angelina also addressed Southern women, speaking out against the evils of slavery. In 1838, Angelina testified before a legislative committee (in Massachusetts), becoming the first woman to do so; she won renown and much notoriety as an orator. Both sisters allied themselves with the most radical abolitionists.

Disowned by their meeting when Angelina married Theodore Dwight Weld (1838) in a non-Quaker wedding, they became itinerant speakers (addressing mixed race and gendered audiences) and writers. Retiring into private life, they played behind-the-scenes roles in the movement for women's rights. Their influence gave Quakerism further impetus to push social reform.

H. LARRY INGLE

Groote, Geert (1340–84), Dutch reformer, founder of the Brethren* of the Common Life, or Devotio* Moderna. Born in Deventer, he studied in Paris and became a professor in Cologne. Turning away from worldliness (1374), he retired to a Carthusian* monastery and was influenced by Jan van Ruusbroeck*. Ordained a deacon but never a priest, he preached in the Diocese of Utrecht, gathering groups committed to the “common life,” but also arousing discontent. Thomas* à Kempis wrote about Groote's life and compiled The Imitation of Christ*, possibly using materials from Groote.

Grosseteste, Robert (c1170–1253), bishop of Lincoln; a prominent figure in 13th-c. English intellectual life. Probably educated at Oxford and Paris, he wrote on astronomy and Aristotelian logic, and lectured on theology at Oxford (c1225–30). In 1230 he resigned in order to teach the new community of Franciscans* outside Oxford; this began a long association with leaders of both the Dominicans* and the Franciscans. In 1235 he became bishop of Lincoln, where he worked vigorously in the spheres of administration, reform, and preaching. With his knowledge of Greek, he translated a number of works in philosophy and theology (including the epistles of Ignatius*); he also continued his reflections on natural science. In the church*-and-state disputes of his time, Grosseteste opposed the efforts of Henry III to control ecclesiastical appointments, but he also rebuked the abuses of the curia in a direct address to Pope Innocent IV (1250). His influence was multifaceted: his pupils Adam Marsh and Bacon* continued in his spirit at Oxford; his translations from Greek stimulated scholastic* theology more broadly; and his writings, preserved at Oxford, encouraged Wyclif* in his later efforts to reform the church.

Grotius, Hugo (1583–1645), Dutch lawyer, historian, theologian, politician, diplomat; studied at Leiden (1594–97) and received an honorary doctorate of law from the University of Orléans (1598). He was imprisoned for participating in the Remonstrance* (1618), but escaped to Paris (c1621), where he remained in exile throughout his life and served as Queen Christina of Sweden's ambassador. Often called the "father of international law," Grotius is most famous for the legal work De Jure Belli ac Pacis (1625) and the theological work De Veritate Religionis Christianae (1627). An adherent of Arminianism*, Grotius argued against the Calvinist view that the church ought not to be subject to the authority of the state and the Calvinist doctrine of predestination* to salvation*, arguing instead that salvation, while predestined, was conditional on faith*. A tireless advocate of religious toleration and doctrinal unity in a time of religious conflict, Grotius argued that Scripture* should not be used as a divisive instrument in sectarian polemics, petitioned King James I of England to reunify the Christian churches under his headship, and called for the reconciliation of the Roman Catholic and Reformed Christian churches. Grotius's Annotations (to the OT and NT, 1641–50) were believed by many, including Spinoza*, to constitute a new form of Biblical criticism.

RENÉE JEFFERY

Grundtvig, Nicolai Frederik Severin (1783–1872), a pastor, historian, poet, and politician, who became a modern father of church and nation when Denmark* was transformed from a feudal* society to a democracy. Five hundred of his songs and hymns are still used. Strongly trinitarian* he emphasized a creation* theology influential in Scandinavia. Partly influenced by romanticism*, he emphasized the importance for Christians of politics*, culture*, myths*, and local history. He initiated the Folk High School, a boarding school for adults; although it did not grant degrees, it promoted cultural consciousness, contextual* theology, and peoples' participation in local society building, and was emulated around the world. HANS RAUN IVERSEN

Guadeloupe. In his account of religious life in the 17th-c. Caribbean, Father Jean-Baptiste Labat (1663–1738) noted that blacks enthusiastically received Christianity, baptism, confessions, and Communion, while remaining attached "to the sorcery of their African countries." Morning and evening prayers, led by elders or taskmasters, were integral parts of the slaves' lives on sugar plantations or in factories. Evangelization was a fundamental part of the slavery* system, which was further regulated by the 1685 Black Code (see Haiti).

In the 18th c., Roman Catholic missionaries often complained that colonial masters did not see to the slaves' religious instruction. Indeed, the masters' primary concern was to hold onto their absolute power over slaves. Thus they resisted missionaries, especially Jesuits, whom they deemed too close to the slaves, possibly inciting them to revolt. Official regulations (sent by Louis XVI, 1777) emphasized that missionaries should be exclusively concerned with "public order, the masters' interest, and the salvation of souls*" (and thus not with the slaves' physical, social, and economic needs). In fact, the slaves themselves organized revolts, especially in Grande Terre (Eastern Guadeloupe) and sometimes attacked plantations. In 1794 they gained liberty for all, as proclaimed by the French Convention. But Napoleon reestablished slavery (1802) and the racial hierarchy prescribed by the Black Code.

Before the official abolition of slavery (1848), slaves often deserted plantations and factories. Fr. Dugoujon, despite the traditionally prudent position of the Roman Catholic Church, supported slaves' revolts and followed the abolitionist Victor Schoelcher (1804–1893) and his republican call for the equality of all citizens, including blacks in the Caribbean. By the end of the 19th c., defying the Church, blacks and mulattos embraced the republican ideals and secularization* (strict separation of state and religion), including the secularization of public education; religious orders were barred from public schools. Yet in the 1970s, some priests (including Fr. Céleste) associated with farmworkers called for a greater involvement of the Church in social problems.

Many Guadeloupians feel uneasy in a church culturally tied to the metropolis. Thus some participate in Hindu* worship (transplanted in Guadeloupe by laborers brought from India in the mid-19th c.); others are turning to new religious movements – Jehovah's* Witnesses, Mahikari (from Japan), Mormons*, Seventh*-day Adventists, and Charismatic* groups. Roman Catholic Guadeloupians reappropriate or critically reread their African religious inheritance in their devotions to the saints* in religious Catholic associations (see Ancestor Veneration and Christianity Cluster: In Latin America and the Caribbean), e.g. receiving "gifts" from the saints through the intermediary of a gadèdzafè (a holy person in the African tradition).

Statistics: Population (2000): 456,000 (90% black or mulatto). Christians, 95.3% (Roman Catholics, 95%; Protestants, 4.9%; marginal Christians, 4.3%; independents, 0.3% [doubly affiliated, 9.2%]); nonreligious, 3.1%; Hindus, 0.5%; other religionists, 1.1%. Guadalupe, Virgin of. See MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER: OF GUADALUPE.

Guatemala is the most populous and ethnically diverse of the Central America republics. The Maya, comprising more than 20 linguistic groups, make up more than half of the population. Almost all Guatemalans consider themselves Christians. The ways they live their faith have resulted from complex processes of translation and adaptation during more than 500 years.

After the Spanish* conquistadors arrived (1524), Franciscans* and Dominicans* settled the Maya in "Indian towns." Confraternities (cofradías) of Maya organized day-to-day religious life, incorporating what they understood of Roman Catholicism into their worldview. The cofradías venerated the saints*, sacred figures that took on complicated identities as histories and legends brought from Europe were blended with local ideas. Visiting priests offered access to the sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church. Traditional Mayan ritual leaders, both men and women, also continued their own practices, often in secret. Catholic elements were incorporated into these rituals. This process produced the Mayan Catholic beliefs and practices known in Guatemala as costumbre and still observed in many highland villages.

Guatemala's independence from Spain (1821) weakened the institutional structure of the Roman Catholic Church. Freedom of worship was first sanctioned in anticlerical legislation (1824). The Liberal government seized power (1871) and implemented measures to greatly restrict the influence of the Church. This government permitted the presence of organized Protestantism*. Presbyterians* from the USA arrived first (1882), immediately opening a school at the government's request and initiating efforts to attract converts.

The Central American Mission (CAM), a conservative Evangelical faith mission (claiming inerrancy* of Scripture, Dispensationalism*, and fundamentalism*) founded by Cyrus Scofield, arrived in 1899, soon followed by Nazarenes* (1901), Quakers* (1902), and the Primitive Methodists* (1914). Almost immediately Guatemalan preachers broke away from missionary tutelage and established independent churches. Yet in the early 20th c., it was the Dispensationalist theology of the CAM that set the tone for Guatemalan Protestantism.

Pentecostalism* appeared in Guatemala in the 1910s. The largest classical Pentecostal denominations are the Church* of God (Cleveland, Tennessee) and the Assemblies* of God (1930s). Guatemalans soon started their own Pentecostal churches; the Church of God of Prophecy (1941) and the Prince of Peace Church (1955) are the most prominent.

In the 1940s, Catholic* Action was promoted by the bishops as a way of purifying and modernizing the Roman Catholicism of the Maya. Catholic Action relied on the training of lay catechists, who often clashed with the traditional leadership of the cofradías. With the influx of foreign priests and women religious (from the 1950s), Catholic Action also became a vehicle for community organizing among the Maya.

Guatemala's brief experiment with democracy, beginning in 1944, was brought to an abrupt end by a CIA-sponsored coup (1954). The ensuing military governments became more and more repressive. By the late 1970s, Mayan communities and Catholic Action activists were especially targeted by the army. The Roman Catholic bishops began to speak out in defense of human* rights. During this time, the Protestant groups grew (peaking c1980). A new form of Protestantism emerged; several Guatemalan preachers founded independent Charismatic* (neo-Pentecostal) churches, calling on adherents to embrace a gospel of prosperity*. Four of the largest independent Charismatic megachurches in Guatemala City are the Fraternidad de Dios (1978), El Shaddai (1983), Familia de Dios (1990), and Casa de Dios (1994). With their control of Evangelical telebroadcasting and media*, these groups set the tone for Protestant practice and understanding in the cities and beyond.

The peace accords that brought an end to the internal conflict were signed in 1996 in the context of increasing self-assertion by many Maya of their cultural rights. Mayan religious practice emerged in the public sphere, and many began asking openly how ancient Mayan spirituality and Christianity can be related to one another.

Christian belief and practice in Guatemala continue to diversify. Approximately 25% of Guatemalans identify themselves as Protestants or Evangelicals, a percentage that has remained stable since the early 1980s. Most participate in charismatic forms of worship. Some groups, particularly the independent Charismatic churches, reject Mayan spirituality as demonic*. Other groups provide space for believers to affirm their Mayan cultural identity as they worship Jesus Christ. While 70% of Guatemalans identify themselves as Roman Catholic, a much smaller number participate actively in one of the several options now available to Roman Catholic believers. Catholic Action remains a force in some Mayan communities. The Charismatic* renewal (from 1970s) allows those with charismatic experiences to remain within the Roman Catholic Church. In the early 21st c., many pastoral agents have embraced models of inculturation*, incorporating elements of Mayan culture into the liturgy and encouraging Mayan men and women to enter religious vocations.

Statistics: Population (2000): 11.4 million (M). Christians, 11.1 M, 97.7% (Roman Catholics, 9.6 M; mainline and independent Protestants, 2.5 M). Practitioners of Mayan traditional religions might also be members of a church. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

Gutenberg, Johann (c1396–1468), first European to print with movable type (separate letters cast in molds). The first book he printed was the Bible, although the dates are uncertain and he never listed himself as the publisher. He lived in Strasbourg for some years, but his famous work was done in Mainz, beginning with a Psalter (1457) and then the entire Bible (before 1461).

Guyana. Berbice and the United Colony of Demerara and Essequibo were unified as British Guiana (1831), which later became the independent Republic of Guyana (1966). The population became very mixed as a result of the turbulent early history of the Guiana colonization. Native Americans are only 7% of the population. Early settlers included Dutch, English, French, Germans, and Sephardic Jews; later, slaves from different African regions were imported for the plantation economy. During the 19th c., following the abolition of slavery (1834), a large number of East Indians (from India; today 50% of the population) were brought to replace slaves (today, 36% are of African origin).

The mission of the Moravian* Church (1738) was followed by Congregationalist* (1808), Anglican (1826), Presbyterian (1818), and Roman Catholic (Apostolic Vicariate, 1837) missions. The churches regularly denounced human rights violations. Thus a slave uprising in 1823 led to the imprisonment of Rev. J. Smith, the Congregationalist minister of Demerara, who died in jail (and became known as the Demerara martyr). Father Dark, a Jesuit priest, was murdered by the Guyanese dictator F. Burnham (ruled 1964–87). In the 1970s–1980s, the ecumenical Guyanese Council of Churches played an active role in denouncing the violation of human* rights by this repressive government.

Hinduism* took firm roots in Guyana through the Indian immigrants, of whom a small percentage were Muslims and established Islamic communities. Presbyterians were successful in converting East Indians to Christianity, their mission becoming like an Indian church. The White-Robed Army (Jordanite) Movement originated in 1895 in Guyana; predominantly Afro-Guyanese, it is a Millennialist* movement characterized by its anticipation of the Last Day, "possession" by the Holy* Spirit, and "African" ideas and practices.

Statistics: Population (2000): 861,000. Christians, 440,000, 51.0% (Protestants, 170,000; Roman Catholics, 87,000; Anglicans, 77,000; independents, 27,000); Hindus, 280,000, 32.5%; Muslims, 70,000, 8.1%; native religionists, 39,000, 4.5%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ARMANDO LAMPE

Guyard, Marie (1599–1672), a founder of New France, was a mystic known as Marie de l'Incarnation. She joined the order of the Ursulines after being widowed in France and went to Canada* in 1639. Her spiritual works included her lectures given to nurses under her authority and her correspondence, particularly with her son, a Cistercian* monk. Combining contemplation* with action, her spirituality is filled with confidence and trust in the love of the Lord, contributing to her personal liberty, since as a lover, "He seeks to do the will of the one he loves."

RAYMOND LEMIEUX

Guyon, Jeanne Bouvier de la Mothe (1648–1717), French mystic and lay teacher. She experienced apophatic* mysticism* (contemplative* prayer to the highest form of divine union). Influenced by Francis* de Sales and Jane* de Chantal, John* of the Cross and Teresa* of Ávila, Madame Guyon emphasized both interior prayer and absorption of the individual will into the divine will, with ensuing peace, plenitude, and pure love. In Short and Easy Method of Prayer (Moyen Court) (1685), she taught that interior prayer is available to all, that reliance on the intellect inhibits spirituality, and that clergy should preach the way of simplicity of the Gospels. With a sense of apostolic mission, she was in Savoy, Piedmont, and Grenoble, and then in Paris as a spiritual guide to a devout court aristocrat. She influenced Fénelon* and the school at Saint Cyr, founded by Madame de Maintenon, wife of Louis XIV, who, together with Bossuet*, eventually opposed her. When the pope condemned Molinos* for Quietism*, Madame Guyon was examined by clergy (1694) and signed an act of submission. Meanwhile, Fénelon and Bossuet engaged in their famous public debate about pure love and "passive" mysticism (Quietism). Madame Guyon was interned (1696), imprisoned in the Bastille (1698), and eventually released (1703, after Bossuet's death). She lived under house arrest, teaching devotees, including Protestants. Her 40-volume collected works include a spiritual commentary on the Bible.

PATRICIA A. WARD

Gypsies, Charismatic Movement among.

The history of Gypsy populations has been a history of discrimination and rejection. The worldwide Charismatic Movement among Gypsies is most unusual. With more than 600,000 members, it traces its roots to the ministry of the French Pentecostal gadjo (non-Gypsy) pastor Clément Le Cossec (1921–2001), founder of the Evangelical Gypsy Mission of France (or "Life and Light Mission"). Started in the early 1950s in Brittany, this mission was part of the French Assemblies* of God until 1968. Many of its doctrines and practices remain classical Pentecostal*. In 1975, for sociological and ecumenical reasons, it became a member of the French Protestant Federation. Rapid growth brought Pentecostal/Charismatic spirituality among Gypsies throughout Europe, North America, and Asia. An International Gypsy Committee (formed in 1965) convened a first world congress with delegates from 14 countries in 1971. With a strong emphasis on conversion* and healing*, evangelism, church planting, leadership training, musical discourse, and social justice (more than 30 children's homes in India), the Charismatic Movement among Gypsies gives a new sense of personal belonging and acceptance to people who have been and continue to be treated as second-class citizens because of a lifestyle that conflicts with the habitus of sedentary life.

Habakkuk, Book of, one of the Minor Prophets, opens with a dialogue between God and the prophet about God's apparent indifference to the evil* inflicted on righteous people, a charge that God denies (1:2–2:5). The book continues with a series of woes pronounced on those who do evil (2:6–20) and concludes with a lament, invoking God to save God's people again, as God had in the past (3:1–19).

Habakkuk was a prophet in Judah, perhaps even Jerusalem, who flourished during the early days of the neo-Babylonian period, from c608 (before the fall of Assyria to Babylon in 605) to 598 (when Babylon first attacked Jerusalem).

The book employs three main traditions: (1) justice*, which requires fair and even generous treatment of the poor; (2) the Day of the Lord (YHWH), the day God (YHWH) will punish God's enemies, in particular those who did not treat the poor* mercifully; and (3) the hymnic tradition, which in this case praises God for the past deliverance of faithful believers and implores another deliverance.

Habakkuk uses the tradition concerning the Day of the Lord to predict God's judgment* and punishment of sinners, especially the Babylonians. At the same time, Habakkuk promises salvation* to the righteous among the Judeans.

Habakkuk extols God as holy, in this case not simply as the One who is majestically above sin and condemns it, but as the One who promises to deliver and vindicate innocent sufferers and those steadfast in their trust of God. The justice of God demands God's protection of the innocent.

Hades (Gk for the place of the departed; used in LXX* as a translation of the Heb Sheol), in the NT and the Apostles' Creed, the abode or state of the dead before the Last Judgment*, sometimes a hell*-like place of punishment.

Hadewijch is a woman's name associated with a mid-13th-c. collection of mystic* texts probably written near Brussels or Antwerp. Both the Flemish mystics Jan van Ruusbroec* and Jan van Leeuwen knew these texts and thought highly of a woman they referred to as Hade-wijch. Nothing is known for certain about her life, but it is thought that she may have been a Beguine*. Hadewijch's writing focuses on the relationship between the soul* and God. Her chosen name for God is Minne, "Love," a feminine noun in Dutch, so she refers to God using feminine pronouns and adjectives. Using the conventions of courtly love poetry, she speaks of herself as the humble lover-knight and God as the demanding, fickle lady. Her writing appears to be intensely personal, but it has didactic rather than cathartic intent. The five Hade-wijch manuscripts are closely related and contain some or all of the following texts: 45 poems in stanzas, 32 letters, 14 visions, 16 poems in mixed forms (or epistolary poems), 8 other poems, and a short prose text. The authorship of some of these texts has been debated, but as a collection they provide us with a vivid picture of a particular form of mystic* spirituality. See also BEGUINE SPIRITUALITY.

Hagar, the Egyptian maid of Sarah, herself the barren wife of Abraham. Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham to bear a child. When rivalry developed between the women, Hagar fled to the wilderness, only to return at God's command. Later Sarah, having become a mother, expelled Hagar and her child (Gen 16, 21). Judaism* vacillates between denouncing Hagar and claiming her as a prototype of the Hebrew slaves. The Christian Paul allegorizes her as Mount Sinai "bearing children for slavery" (Gal 4:21–26). The Islamic* tradition exalts her as the mother of the Arabs and the matriarch of monotheism.

PHYLLIS TRIBLE

Haggadah (Heb "narrative"), in rabbinic Judaism, sermon-like interpretations of biblical texts and story-like illustrations and expansions in a moralizing or edifying (at times mystical or apocalyptic) mode, found especially in midrash* (as contrasted with halakhah*, especially in Mishnah and Talmud). Much use of Scripture in the NT is haggadah-like. The Passover haggadah are the readings that accompany the Passover* meal.

Haggai, Book of, one of the Minor Prophets, blames drought and deprivation on the people's failure to rebuild the Temple after their return from exile, urges the reconstruction of God's house, the seat of YHWH's life-giving presence (1:4–11), and anticipates both renewed prosperity (2:6–9) and the restoration of Davidic (messianic*) kingship (2:23).

Haggai's prophecy is divided into five precisely dated sections (1:1–11; 1:12–15a; 1:15b–2:9; 2:10–19; 2:20–23). He was active for four months during the reign of the Persian king Darius I in 520 BCE, when Zerubbabel was governor and Joshua was high priest (Ezra 5:1–2).

Like other prophets*, Haggai addresses the connection between sin* and judgment*, and emphasizes that a responsive turning to God elicits God's turning to the community with blessing (2:16–19) rather than curse. For Haggai, the repercussions of the restoration of the Temple echo beyond Israel (2:19) to affect world events, as seen in God's "shaking" heaven and earth and overturning "the throne of kingdoms" (2:21–22). The prophet's vision suggests that Judah will be independent once again, ruled by Zerubbabel, not just the current governor, but YHWH's chosen one, a descendant of King David (2:23). Indeed, he is the "signet," the medium through which God's authority will be exercised.

Early church fathers emphasized typological* connections with Zerubbabel, e.g. pointing to Christ and his signet, reflecting Christ's authority and power as king. More generally, however, Haggai reminds both Jews and Christians of the transformative power of God's presence, not just in the eschatological future, but in the contemporary life of both communities.

Hail Mary (Lat Ave Maria), a prayer to Mary* based on the salutations of Gabriel and Elizabeth (Luke 1:28, 42): "Hail Mary, full of grace, the Lord is with thee. Blessed art thou amongst women and blessed is the fruit of thy womb, Jesus. Holy Mary, Mother of God, pray for us sinners, now and at the hour of our death. Amen."

Haiti. On December 5, 1492, Columbus believed he had discovered India. In fact, he was in the presence of Tainos, Amerindians who had divided the island into five regions called caciquats, following their own well-developed political system and their own customs and religion. Their entire way of life was destroyed by the conquistadores, who carried out their own project: finding gold, enslaving the Tainos, and forcing them to convert to Christianity. Of about 1.5 million inhabitants in 1492, only 10,000 remained on the island in 1530; the Tainos had died not only from their inhumane treatment as slaves, but also because of epidemics brought from Europe.

A voice cried out in the wilderness, that of the Dominican* Antonio de Montesinos, followed by Bartolomé de las* Casas, who espoused the cause of the inhabitants of Hispaniola, becoming their defender. From the early 17th c., Jews and Protestants fleeing persecution in Europe brought a new wave of colonization to the island. As early as 1635, Cardinal Richelieu (King Louis XIII's prime minister) created the Compagnie des Cent-Associés (which became in 1664 Compagnie des Indes Occidentales), a colonizing trading company that brought slaves* from Africa to the island under the pretext that they would be baptized. In 1697, the island was divided into two countries; a French colony, Saint Domingue (which would become Haiti in 1804), and a Spanish colony (now the Dominican* Republic). Christianity presents itself, then, as an ideology that justifies the slavery of blacks. There were no official protests against slavery by the popes. In 1685, as a prolongation of the revocation of the Edict of Nantes*, the "Black Code" was enacted; for two centuries, it regulated slavery as an institution on a racist basis, proclaiming Roman Catholicism the only authorized religion in the island; Protestants and Jews had to either leave the island or hide. As for the slaves, they were not allowed to have a religion of their own; their "assemblies" were declared "illicit and rebellious" (Black Code, 3).

A general insurrection of the slaves on the night of August 22, 1791, in the northern part of the country was probably preceded by clandestine Vodou* meetings. A majority of the missionary clergy supported the rebels. Toussaint-Louverture became the leader, who organized and consolidated the final liberation of the slaves. He sent for a dozen priests authorized under the Civil Constitution of the Clergy, but Napoleon sent 30,000 troops to reestablish colonial status and slavery. Following a two-year revolutionary war, in which the slaves battled slavery and racism*, Haiti became the first independent state in the Americas after the United States. Nevertheless, the political leaders retained Roman Catholicism as the official religion; a concordat* was signed in 1860 between the Vatican and the Haitian state to promote the official recognition of Haiti's independence and its place among civilized nations.

With this goal in mind, the Catholic clergy who came from Brittany (France) worked intensely to eliminate Vodou, which they considered barbaric. The Catholic Church provided for all the education* and social services in the country. Yet there were conflicts between the Church and the state (1860–1900), as political leaders sought to use the Church for administrative (official record keeping, e.g. registry of baptisms, marriages, and deaths) and political purposes. In 1915 the clergy supported the US occupation because it helped them in their fight against Vodou*. Under the dictatorship of Duvalier (1957–1986), many priests and bishops and two entire congregations (those of the Spiritains of France and Jesuits* of Canada) were expelled. But in 1966, Duvalier signed an agreement with the Vatican aimed at establishing an “indigenous” episcopate; several Haitians were consecrated as bishops. The dictator hoped that, as a result, the clergy would be totally dedicated to his service. But inspired by Vatican* II, the Roman Catholic Church led the fight for human* rights. Furthermore, liturgical texts and hymns were translated into the Creole language; the language spoken by the entire population, which had so far been treated as inferior to the French language, was now recognized as a sacred language.

Following a free election (1991), Jean-Bertrand Aristide, a priest (formerly a Salesian) was elected president. However, the Roman Catholic Church was weakened by this direct involvement of one of its priests in a political role in a government, which was viewed by most as extremely disappointing. Since then there has been a sizable expansion of Protestantism in Haiti; the Charismatic* and Pentecostal* movements seem particularly apt at addressing the needs of numerous believers among the Haitian poor. Religious pluralism is now a fact of life. Thus the 1860 Concordat will have to be revised, and the separation of church and state normalized so as to guarantee tolerance and religious freedom.

Halfway Covenant, a form of partial church membership created by Puritans* in New England (late 17th c.) for people (usually offspring of members) who agreed to follow the creed and the rules of the church (the covenant) without claiming a spiritual experience of conversion. They could participate in the Lord's Supper, on the grounds that it was a “converting ordinance.”

Hallel, psalms* of praise (Ps 113–18) recited as a unit at major Jewish festivals and at the Passover* meal.

Halloween (shortened form of “All Hallows Eve”), evening vigil (October 31) before All* Saints' Day. Often associated with tales of the dead and masquerading, it has assimilated local customs: lighting bonfires and preparing for the Celtic New Year, November 1.

Ham, youngest son of Noah*. Because he saw his father's nakedness, he incurred a curse on his own son Canaan* (to be “a slave of slaves,” Gen 9:22–27) and, by implication, on all of his descendants, including Cush, Egypt, and Put (Gen 10:6). The so-called curse of Ham was used to justify the enslavement of Africans, first in the Islamic world, then among Europeans (from the 17th c.). In fact, the text (Gen 9:25–27) speaks of Canaan rather than Ham, and the original function of the curse was to justify the conquest of the land of Canaan.

Handel, George Frideric (1685–1759), German-English composer, organist. Although he never held a permanent appointment as a church musician, he wrote much sacred music for Reformed* worship (in Halle, c1702–4, though the music is now lost), Roman Catholic worship (in Rome, 1707–8), and Anglican worship (from c1711). During the 1730s, he developed the English oratorio*, the genre of *Messiah and Judas Maccabaeus, which gained him lasting fame. His choral writing continued to inspire English church music until well into the 19th c. His sacred works include about 20 oratorios*, 1 passion*, 25 anthems*, 5 Te Deums*, 2 jubilates, cantatas*, motets*, and vesper* psalms. See also MESSIAH, HANDEL'S. TASSILO ERHARDT

Harnack, Adolf von (1851–1930), one of the most important German theologians between the time of Schleiermacher* and that of Barth*. Born in Dorpat, appointed professor of church history at the University of Berlin (1888), he was also significant in his role as the first president of the Kaiser Wilhelm Society for the Advancement of the Sciences, today's Max Planck Society.

Raised in a strict confessional Lutheran environment, Harnack specialized in the history of early Christianity, where he saw prefigured the main problems in the entire history of Christianity. Convinced early on that the Christian faith stood in need of systematic theological reformulation in the modern age, he strove to render Christianity historically plausible. His History of Dogma (1886–90) served this program by tracing the hellenization of Christianity since the 2nd c. and thus making the historically conditioned character of emerging Christian doctrine transparent (see Hellenistic Religious Traditions and Christianity's Self-Definition; Inculturation Cluster: Of Christianity in the Greco-Roman World). As a result, Harnack became one of the most controversial theologians of his time, as well as one of the most important international figures promoting a liberal and enlightened Protestantism (see Liberal Theology).

His popular Essence of Christianity (1900) offers a concise summary of his theology. Part 1 identifies three main characteristics of Jesus' proclamation against which Harnack gauges the subsequent development of Christianity: Jesus' preaching of the immanent Kingdom* of God; his message concerning the fatherhood of God* and the infinite value of the human soul*; and his demand for a higher righteousness* epitomized by the love command. He then relates this threefold gospel to the social, political, cultural, and legal orders as well as to the soon to emerge christological question. Part 2 pursues the development of the gospel through history, condensing the essential developments into three types: Greek Catholicism, Roman Catholicism, and Protestantism. Because it is based on Jesus' message of the unconditional worth of each person as a child of God, Protestantism is the religion of individual freedom*.

Harnack's multifaceted engagement with university, educational, social, and political questions served the aim of introducing these Protestant ideas and values into modern culture. After 1918 he supported the Weimar Republic politically and theologically because he believed it best capable of guaranteeing individual as well as Christian freedom.

Hartshorne, Charles (1897–2000), inspired much Process* theology. He worked with Alfred North Whitehead at Harvard University, finding clarification of his own intuitions. Whereas Whitehead's major interests were mathematics and physics, Hartshorne focused on philosophy of religion and metaphysics. Much of Whitehead's influence on theology was mediated by its systematization and development in Hartshorne's teaching at the University of Chicago.

Hartshorne thought that traditional arguments for the existence of God could regain their cogency if the idea of God was reformulated in a process way. The traditional ontological argument fails because its idea of perfection is incoherent. Process theology clarifies how God is absolute and immutable, but also how God is affected by events in the world. It presents divine power as persuasive rather than coercive in a way that avoids divine responsibility for unnecessary evil*. It satisfies the human need to believe that our efforts are ultimately meaningful whatever their outcome in the course of time.

Hartshorne developed a Buddhist-Christian doctrine of the nonsubstantial self, which exists only in successive moments. Pure selfishness is impossible, because each occasion cares at least for its successor. Since each momentary self feels the feelings of previous selves, compassion (feeling with) is fundamental to the nature of things.

Haynes, Lemuel (1753–1833), African American minister (ordained 1785), Puritan* controversialist, resident of Connecticut, Massachusetts, Vermont, and New York. Abandoned at birth, reared by white Presbyterians, Haynes became a staunch defender, against free-will Evangelicalism, of New Divinity theology, the “consistent Calvinism” of Jonathan Edwards’s students. Haynes’s important contribution was his argument that Calvin’s* and Edwards’s theological tradition was most fully, even most biblically, understood as anti-slavery and pro-black (in advance of the abolitionist era inspired by free*-will Evangelicalism). For Haynes, Edwards’s benevolentist ethics, predestinarian and providentialist theology, and emphases on biblical covenants* and the beauty of God’s design revealed their incommensurability with the slave trade and slavery*. Contemporary Western Theologies.

Philosophers and theologians have been debating the meaning of “health” ever since 1946, when the World Health Organization promulgated its definition of health as a state of “complete physical, mental, and social well-being.” This definition was immediately criticized for being too broad, almost equivalent to notions of human happiness. As such, there could be no comparing the value of health with other values, no weighing of policy options if health includes everything from lack of illness to justice* and peace*, and no taking responsibility for ill health (since health had become an impossible ideal).

The core insight of the World Health Organization definition, however, is that health is not just the absence of injury, disease, or disability. It has something to do with the whole of ourselves. We do not just have bodies; we are embodied. Yet we are more than embodied. A Christian theological anthropology* understands human persons to be embodied spirits, inspirited bodies. Hence health of mind* (or soul*) and health of body* are not separate matters; each influences the other. Each has to do with the health of our “selves.”

The Christian understanding of what it means to be a person includes a capacity for free* choice and a capacity for relationship. Because of these capacities, persons are transcendent – capable of self-determination, of introducing the “new” into the meaning of their lives and destinies, and of coming into relation with all that can be known and loved, reaching for relationships ultimately of communion with God and all persons in God (see Person, the Trinity, and the Self). Moreover, Christians understand a call to all persons to become what they are called to be (see Vocation), to live in solidarity with one another, and to heal and be healed by one another. Our histories, cultures, institutions, and education are all of concern.

An example of the relationship between bodily health and other dimensions of health can be found in the 20th- to 21st-c. AIDS pandemic, concentrated in the global South. The problem is not only one of clinical infection and disease. It is intertwined with issues of worldwide justice*: intractable poverty*, colonial* and post-colonial* confusion of cultures*, stigmatization of persons based on gender inequality, and coerced sexual* behavior. The development of contextual Christian theologies of health and healing has therefore required not only theological anthropologies* and theories of Christian love*, but also careful and comprehensive social analysis. See also HOSPITALS AND HEALING PROGRAMS AS CHRISTIAN MINISTRY. MARGARET A. FARLEY

Health, Healing, and Christianity in Eastern Orthodoxy. Orthodox Christian anthropology* teaches that the human being is a psychosomatic whole and emphasizes the importance of synergy and interdependence in the healing disciplines. Derived from the Hebraic tradition, the custom of holistic healing, or attending to emotional, spiritual, and physical needs, began with early Christians. In the 4th c., Byzantine institutions began to focus on curing the sick, integrating religious rituals with medical treatment. Byzantine hospitals were often built near churches: they were founded on the Byzantine belief that patients would regain full health when connected to God and the church community.

The ancient Greeks described medicine as “the most philanthropic of the sciences” (philanthropotaton epistemon); faith expressed the instinctive quest of humans for wholeness through the divine. The importance of scientific engagement in Byzantine culture reflected the belief that reason* is a God-given faculty that empowers humans to develop innovative methods for holistic healing.

The practice of Byzantine healing stems from the understanding of Christ’s mission as a healing ministry, delivering people from physical, mental, and spiritual suffering. Inextricably connected to experiences of the mystical*, Eastern Orthodox* theology requires openness to God’s participation, or the God vision (theoptia), in one’s life. See also HOSPITALS AND HEALING PROGRAMS AS CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

JOHN T. CHIRBAN

Health, Healing, and Christianity in North American and European Pentecostal/Charismatic Movements. Healing in Pentecostalism implies that salvation* is not just a juridical solution to the guilt of sin* (see Atonement #2), but also deliverance from physical oppression (see Atonement #1). The spiritual gift of healing through prayer is thus regarded as having been won by Christ in his death and resurrection, and thus as part of the “apostolic faith*,” along with conversion*, Spirit baptism*, and Christ’s return to establish the Kingdom* of God on earth.

The relevance today of healing stories in the Bible is accepted without question. Pentecostal healing was anticipated in North American Holiness* and European Holiness/Pietist movements (e.g. Johann Blumhardt*, Dorothea Trudel, Charles Cullis, A. B. Simpson). Healing began to wane in both Europe and North America near the dawn of Pentecostalism (c1900), implying that Pentecostalism* grew initially as a haven for those who valued healing. The Pentecostal founder, William J. Seymour*, with his background in African* holistic spirituality and the Holiness* Movement, was predisposed to advocate healing as part of the gospel, calling it the “sanctification of the body.” Healing became popular among all Pentecostal groups, although African Americans tended to set it within a broader vision of God’s authoritative claim on the entire creation. After World War II, popular healers (e.g. Oral Roberts and T. L. Osborne) emerged in the USA, conducting mass healing campaigns internationally and building organizations comparable to US Pentecostal denominations in terms of resources, a legacy continued after 2000 by Benny Hinn (born in Israel) and the German evangelist Reinhard Bonnke. These ministries represented one of the major inspirations for the spread of Pentecostalism and the Charismatic Movement globally.

Tensions did arise over healing. German Protestants were condemned in the "Berlin Declaration" (1909) by the Evangelical Church for "many manifestations in common with spiritism*." Pentecostals in Italy and Spain considered Catholic healing stories involving saints or relics as superstitious*. German Lutheran Charismatic Arnold Bittlinger interpreted healing as an enhancement of natural healing processes rather than the typically Pentecostal supernatural intervention. Many Pentecostals in the USA reject the popular "health and wealth gospel" and the idea among "deliverance" ministries that genuine Christians can be demonically possessed.

The future challenge for North American and European Pentecostals will be to speak of extraordinary healing while also including God's healing hand within natural processes and human efforts to alleviate suffering.

Health, Healing, and Christianity in Africa: African Traditional Practices.

Health, wholeness, and holiness are fundamental values in traditional and Christian Africa. Influenced by the world-affirming and therapeutic African* Religion, and rooted in Jesus' practice during his ministry, African* Instituted Churches (AICS), the Charismatic* Movement, and priest-healers of mainline churches pay close attention to everyday human needs. In contemporary Africa, health and healing practices demonstrate the resilience of the African Religion's view of the universe.

A person in community, a composite of visible and invisible elements, lives in dynamic relationship with the visible and invisible worlds. Health implies the happy maintenance of a web of relationships with humans, spirits, and God, while sickness, particularly psychosomatic and serious illnesses, could result from a flaw in those relationships.

Sickness threatens life, the highest good. Healing reestablishes harmony through a process that discerns the cause(s) and prescribes holistic cures. Experts (dibia, nganga, babalawo, African traditional medical practitioners), empowered by tutelary spirits to penetrate the forces of the night, wrestle from nature hidden curative potential and mystically assail all enemies of life. They integrate cosmic, social, psychological, religious, and pharmaceutical aspects of African life and world (the Lebenswelt of phenomenology) into integral health care.

With the declining number of practitioners of African Religion, Christian prophets, visionaries, and pastors or priest-healers of AICs, and of African Charismatic, Pentecostal, and mainline churches, have a commanding influence. As Jesus' disciples, they heal by prayer, discern causes of illnesses, impose the confession of sins and fasting, and recommend rituals or prayers. Empowered by the Holy Spirit, they struggle against all human and spiritual enemies of life; thus they exorcise* evil spirits and assail witchcraft* and sorcery. Holy water*, holy oil*, and candles replace medicinal herbs. Although medication is not totally excluded, ultimately God is the healer. Healing is never limited to the physical; in both African Religion and Christian practices, the ailment is cured, the evil cause is contained, and harmonious relationships in the community are reestablished.

ELOCHUKWU EUGENE UZUKWU, CSSP.

Health, Healing, and Christianity in Africa: Dealing with AIDS.

In the African worldview, health is understood to entail harmonious relationships between the physical and spiritual worlds, among the living, and between the living and the environment. God*, ancestors*, and evil people are believed to be the source of harm and misfortunes that befall people and animals and the environment. Diviners are consulted to identify the cause of sickness or misfortunes and prescribe the best way of restoring harmony. Healing rituals are performed to restore the damaged relationships.

When mission* Christianity came to Africa, the majority of the missionaries prohibited their members from seeking out African healing methods and promoted the use of hospitals and clinics. Unfortunately, these institutions concentrate on physical healing without connecting sickness to spiritual causes, as in African and biblical healing. The rapid growth of most African* Instituted Churches and Charismatic* ministries can be attributed to the fact that they have sought to address the absence of spiritual healing in the mission churches. Fortunately, some mission churches now include healing in their services.

The high rate of HIV/AIDS in sub-Saharan Africa has been a challenge to all churches. The churches have come a long way in changing their attitude toward people living with HIV/AIDS. The Ecumenical HIV/AIDS Initiative in the Africa 2001 Action Plan is a positive example of an attempt to help the churches develop the competence they need to care for people with HIV/AIDS. The 2003 All* Africa Conference of Churches General Assembly HIV/AIDS Covenant is another example of churches pledging to deal with HIV/AIDS.

Health, Healing, and Christianity in Africa: Spiritual Healing. Spiritual healing, the practice of casting out evil spirits (through “dry fasting,” prayers, and the therapeutic reading of psalms) is practiced by African* traditional medicine men and women with spiritual powers that can deliver the afflicted from demonic* attacks.

In traditional West African society, people seek deliverance and wholeness by going to the homes of reputed medicine men or women and participating in pilgrimages to oracles. Diagnosis and the procurement of remedies were the central preoccupation of traditional health care deliverers. In African anthropology*, a person is considered to be both a visible and an invisible entity, experienced in physical, psychic, and mystical ways; illnesses can enter the person through the actions of sorcerers, witches*, and evil spirits*. Psychosomatic problems are usually given mystical, supernatural interpretations. Even today people are usually dissatisfied with Western medical explanations and patronize healing centers and redemption camps.

Spiritual healing as attested to by the earliest NT witnesses (e.g. Mark 1:27, 34; Acts 2:22) was inseparable from the proclamation of the gospel. Christ remains the model for all African Christian faith healers. They engage negative supernatural powers with potent words, psalms, holy water or oil, and the burning of colored candles. Ebullient Pentecostal*, Charismatic*, and Evangelical preachers, as well as lay “brothers” and “sisters” of the Roman Catholic Renewal Movement, are leading prophet-healers, performing their healing ministry when there is a demonstration of faith* in Jesus as Lord. Women leaders, prophetesses, and evangelists affirm Christ as “the only husband who conquers all principalities and powers.”

Mainline Christian missions built hospitals and clinics for converts and healed the sick with ritual prayers and unction. But spiritual healings, especially as “deliverance,” “Holy Ghost fire,” and “spiritual warfare” against “territorial demons,” came in the wake of the African* Instituted Churches (AICs) and the Pentecostal, Charismatic and Evangelical movements. Hundreds of prophet-healers, priest-healers, and exorcists* active in prayer houses, redemption camps, and crusade grounds see themselves as heirs of the gift of spiritual healing given by the Holy* Spirit. UKACHUKWU CHRIS MANUS Health, Healing, and Christianity in Asia. Christians constitute c8% of Asia’s 3.6 billion people. Amid poverty* and religious diversity, Christians understand health as multidimensional, addressing physical, mental, social, spiritual, and ecological needs.

For Asians the source of illness may be the body, the mind, the psyche, or the spirit; illness may be caused by persons, the environment, or an evil spirit*. Sickness could come from malnutrition as well as from social, economic, political systemic injustice. Capitalist globalization brings untold suffering to many.

Healing is diversely attributed to divine grace*, the patient's receptivity, a healer's spiritual development, and justice-based relations. Western colonization* reintroduced Christianity (15th–16th c.; see History of Christianity Cluster: In Asia) and condemned indigenous spirituality and its healing practices as "pagan*."

For Asian Christians, Jesus is the Christ*, God incarnate*, who saves and heals. He is a divine healer, as the great prophets proclaimed (Isa 65:17–23; Mic 6:8), ministering to all, especially the poor. He came so that all will have abundant life (John 10:10). Christian churches today provide healing ministries, such as prayer healing, counseling, visiting of the sick, anointing*, as well as hospitals and health clinics, and relief aid to tsunami survivors and to refugees*. Through interfaith dialogue*, religious violence is addressed.

Christians adopt healing practices like tai chi, aromatherapy, acupuncture, yoga, herbal cleansing, ayurvedic medicine (India), and healing by means of prana, or subtle energy. Pranic healing, popularized by Filipino-Chinese Master Choa Kok Sui and his books, makes use of the principle that "energy follows thought." This practice is based on both Asian traditions and biblical healing.

Filipino churchwomen combine tai chi with praying in order to relieve stress. They honor babaylans (indigenous priestesses or healers). Nuns practice pranic healing with the poor. Some Korean Christian feminists combine prayers with Shamanism*. Chinese house* churches offer prayers for healing and herbal remedies. Pentecostal*/Charismatic* churches offer healing through divine invocation and healing touch.

The National Council of Churches in the Philippines established community-based health programs, as well as shelters for abused women and migrant workers. In the 1990s, faith-based groups, such as those in Hong* Kong, Thailand*, and India*, undertook HIV/AIDS ministries. Indigenous peoples of Asia had an impact on Christian consciousness of "earth care" and ecojustice (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster).

Because health care is unavailable to millions, health becomes a justice* issue. Erlinda Senturias, a Christian medical doctor from the Philippines*, writes, "Health can be achieved by changing structural injustice, promoting community involvement in health, and personal knowledge and practices that will contribute to health and healing." Healing ministry is participating in God's mission in a fragile world. Asian Christianity today promotes health and healing for all creation.

ELIZABETH S. TAPIA

Health, Healing, and Christianity in Australian Aboriginal Societies.

To many Australian Aborigines, the biblical healing stories are still relevant; Aborigines consider prayer* to be an important component of the healing process, even if they call on the powers of traditional healers (ngangkari, mabarn, or galka). Traditionally, they attribute illness to a variety of causes: extreme heat or cold, spirit beings (mamu), humans (who cast spells or insert objects into the body), and the breaking of taboos. The healers' methods include massage, binding, rubbing with red ochre or other minerals, administering plant medicines, sucking, cauterizing, and enveloping with smoke.

Colonial settlement introduced new diseases, such as smallpox, measles, and tuberculosis, with devastating consequences. Recently, changes in diet and lifestyle (including substance abuse) have contributed to an increased incidence of diabetes, hypertension, cancers, and physical and mental disorders. Primary health care, once provided mostly by missions, is now accessed through community or general health services. While Aboriginal people utilize these services, they still seek assurance that the basic spiritual causes of their illnesses will be dealt with, seeing prayer as an important component of the healing process. As their traditional worldview (see Australian Aboriginal Traditions and Christianity) provided no precedents for dealing with the effects of introduced diseases and substances, they look to modern medical services and prayer to mediate healing in these situations.

WILLIAM H. EDWARDS

Health, Healing, and Christianity in Latin America.

The impoverishment and marginalization of Latin American countries are major factors in the proliferation of sick people. Pentecostal* and Charismatic* churches, whose members are primarily from the poorest social classes, conceive of illness as a direct assault on people as children of God. Consequently, Pentecostals/Charismatics often seek explanations and solutions from the spiritual realm rather than from medical services – to which, at any rate, they have very limited access. In their quest, the Bible plays a central role. Generally, they interpret Jesus' healings as victories of life over death, of faith* over disbelief, of the Kingdom* of God over the kingdom of Satan*. They are signs of the coming Kingdom. Thus Pentecostals/Charismatics live their faith in an eschatological dimension.

Pentecostals/Charismatics closely associate health and salvation*. Health is a concrete manifestation of the coming final salvation, a proof that God accepts and loves them, and thus forgives their sins, blesses them by the presence of the Holy Spirit, and empower them for a renewed life.

A large part of the social and religious force of the Charismatic Movement resides in its therapeutic dimension, in its ability to provide a religious answer to health problems in social and economic situations that produce illness, and thus to offer a concrete and tangible salvation. The conviction that drives the Charismatics' quest for health is the certainty of God's faithfulness* and God's promise of health for all nations.

DANIEL CHIQUETE

Health, Healing, and Christianity in North America: African American Perspectives.

Health pertains to the multiple, dynamic ways that African Americans relate to their bodies, minds, and emotions, and to God, as well as to their fitness and balance, for the sake of survival. For Emilie Townes, health, as a cultural production, relies on sociocultural constructs, biology, and environment. Healing involves curative, restorative, transformative processes that move one from illness to wholeness. In the African American Christian context, health is a gift, and people are the stewards. People are to care for themselves with proper diet and exercise, be conscious of systemic (political, social, and economic) oppression*, and live so that their awareness of evil* does not make them sick. The systemic oppression of African Americans has worn down their bodies, minds, and spirits with words and deeds that thwart health and deny wholeness. Personal and communal health and healing concern the social justice* ministry of Jesus Christ. Thus believers, under covenant* obedience, are to model and support the health and healing of others: to feed the hungry, give drink to the thirsty, and clothe the naked; help the blind see, the lame walk, and the deaf hear; raise the dead; and preach the good news to the poor (Matt 9:35, 11:5).

Health, Healing, and Christianity in North America: Feminist Perspectives.

Feminist* theorists have for a long time been concerned about approaches to ethics, particularly medical* ethics, that are dominated by a concern only for principles. Especially if principles are wielded primarily as a part of deductive patterns of reasoning, they can obscure the actual persons and their situations whose needs and possibilities must be respected. Hence among many feminists, including Christian feminist theorists, a strong interest has arisen in what has come to be called an "ethic of care" as contrasted with an "ethic of justice*." While an ethic of justice is judged to be concerned primarily with the logic of ethical principles, an ethic of care is concerned with people and relationships.

Nevertheless, many feminists are reluctant to eliminate principled analysis and argument altogether. Moreover, they see that "care," like love*, can be mistakenly focused and susceptible to distortion. Hence some Christian feminists advocate an ethical method that makes justice a normative measure of good and right caring. This approach ("principled care") is especially consonant with a Christian articulation of the command of love for one's neighbor. It offers the possibility of aiding responses to human needs across cultures and time, for it requires that the concrete reality of persons be the primary focus of ethical concern and active caring.

Health, Healing, and Christianity in the Western World.

Jesus' ministry uniquely combined the proclamation of the gospel with healing, as a sign of the Kingdom* of God; Jesus mandated his disciples to do likewise so that all might have "life, and have it abundantly" (John 10:10). Until the 19th c., however, the Christian ministry (except for charismatic* individuals) was shaped less by actual "healing" than by caritas, "caring" in Christ's name, supporting an unprecedented range of institutions for people in need, the sick in body and mind among others. While these institutions laid the foundation for the modern welfare state in the Western world, their various health care programs and social activities, it was only after medicine began to cure fatal diseases that Christians came to appreciate the healing mandate anew, this time generally stressing not so much the miraculous aspect of divine intervention as the divine provision for adequate medical care, proper nursing, and sensible counseling. Nonetheless, the church does not endorse the "wellness craze" so typical of affluent societies, but the quest for genuine life.

Spiritual healing – either healing by nonmaterial means or healing of things not physical (the spirit) – became of special interest only in the context of post-Enlightenment* rationalism* (late 16th c.) and has received increasing attention ever since. While distinct from "faith healing" in that it does not explicitly focus on faith, spiritual healing developed into something unique in Western Europe either by complementing established ways of healing with prayerful counseling or by competing with these established ways of healing for the sake of manifesting spiritual power, the power of the Holy* Spirit in particular. The advent of scientific medicine (19th c.) and of psychology and psychotherapy (20th c.), along with the growing realization of the limits of medicine's capacity to heal, made the church reconsider its healing ministry. The Church* of England took the lead in 1953 by appointing a commission to study the subject; other churches followed. However, there is still no unanimity regarding what spiritual healing is all about. Some hold it to be exclusivistic and not reconcilable with any other way of healing, while others maintain that it consists in consoling a troubled mind by bringing about inner peace, even if the physical ailment cannot be cured.

CHRISTOFFER H. GRUNDMANN

Heathen (from Old English), "not Christian or Jewish," equivalent to NT Greek ethne (nations, Gentiles*), a term used by Christians (as well as Jews and Muslims) for adherents of nonmonotheistic religions. See also PAGAN, PAGANISM.

Heaven, in the OT, the visible sky and the realms beyond it; the dwelling place of God*, the "most high" (Gen 14:20; Isa 57:15), who, however, cannot be contained even by the "heaven of heavens," to say nothing of any temple built by human beings (1 Kgs 8:27). In the NT, Jesus speaks of heaven as the throne of God (Matt 5:34) and lifts his eyes to heaven in prayer (Mark 6:41); he ascends into heaven (Acts 1:9–11), and from there he is to return (Matt 24:30). Consequently, the capitalized term "Heaven" is used as a metonymy for God – a way of referring to God without using God's name according to Jewish practices, e.g. Matthew's "Kingdom of Heaven" as equivalent to "Kingdom of God." Yet God is not spatial; worship is to be "in spirit and truth" (John 4:24; cf. Rom 12:1; John 4:24; Col 3:1–3). Thus, for many Christian traditions, God's dwelling is in the faithful (John 6:56, 14:17; Rom 8:9; 2 Cor 6:16; 1 John 4:14–16); Origen* and Augustine* interpreted heaven metaphorically as all those created spirits in whom God dwells.

In Christian eschatology*, heaven is understood to be the place (or the state) of the souls* of the faithful after death and of their bodies after their resurrection*. The emphasis is not on physical characteristics but on the beatitude* or happiness that comes from communion with God as “all in all” (1 Cor 15:28).

Hebrew Bible, an inclusive designation (although it also contains Aramaic) for what Jews call the Tanakh* and Christians call the Old* Testament.

Hebrews, Gospel According to the, a Jewish-Christian gospel, mentioned by Papias* and Hegesippus* and quoted by the Alexandrian theologians Clement*, Origen*, and Didymus*, then more liberally by Jerome* (although at times he confuses it with the Gospel of the Nazarenes*). The text may have been written in Greek in Alexandria (early 2nd c.). It was respected because of the legend (cf. Eusebius*) that the Alexandrian teacher Pantaenus brought it from India* as the original Hebrew version of the Gospel of Matthew*. Among the fragments, we find mention of the Holy* Spirit as the mother of Jesus (reflecting Semitic thinking, where the word for “spirit” is feminine) and an independent version of the story of the woman caught in adultery (John 8:3–11). Jesus’ saying on “seeking and finding” has been expanded by recourse to wisdom traditions (Sir 6: 27–31) and by allusions to Platonic philosophy. Jesus’ baptism still contains some traces of a prophetic Christology when the voice of the Spirit declares, “My Son, in all the prophets I was waiting for you....” James, the Lord’s brother, plays a key role alongside Jesus. The first appearance of the risen Lord is to James (modifying 1 Cor 15:7), thus legitimating him as head of the post-Easter (Jewish) community. See also APOCRYPHA CLUSTER: APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS; EBIONITES, GOSPEL OF THE.

HANS-JOSEF KLAUCK

Hebrews, Letter to the, the longest argument in the NT*; self-identified as a “word of exhortation” (13:22). As a “letter,” Hebrews presents a riddle. The author, destination, and background are unknown. The riddle vanishes if Hebrews’ essential literary character – as a persuasive text (more sermon than letter), written by a gifted individual (60–100 CE) and directed to a general Christian audience – is taken seriously.

The author affirms the old covenant* as a valid revelation* of God, but one pointing forward to its fulfillment, now emerging in the new covenant (see Typology). Four scriptural arguments are constructed. Psalm 8 (2:5–18) asserts that humanity, though humbled for a season, is destined by God for glory, honor, and universal authority in its attachment to Jesus. Psalm 95 (4:1–13) reminds readers to seize now the opportunity to enter God’s rest. Psalm 110 (7:11–25) shows that the Messiah* is of a prior priesthood (Melchizedek*, not Aaron*) and thus the legitimate prototype of the new order. Jeremiah 31 (8:1–13, 10:11–18) promises that a new covenant will deal more effectively with sin’s* power, opening access to God for all through Jesus’ sacrifice*. Hebrews also rehearses exemplary models of faith* and exhorts pilgrims to persevere in the journey of faith. Its central aim is pastoral*. While there may be reasons for spiritual sluggishness or drooping morale, God’s people are summoned to a life of constant engagement, striving toward maturity as demanded and made possible by Jesus, “the pioneer and perfecter” of faith (12:2). JON ISAAC

Hecker, Isaac (1819–88), a member of the Brook Farm Community (Massachusetts) and a participant in the Transcendental* Movement (1843), Hecker converted to Roman Catholicism (1844), became a Redemptorist priest (1849–57), then founded and became the religious superior (1858–88) of the Congregation of Missionary Priests of St. Paul the Apostle (the Paulists). As a Paulist, Hecker became a theological consultant and adviser to the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore (1866) and Vatican* I (1869–70). He tried to deepen Catholic spiritual life and win Protestants to Catholicism by publishing the Catholic World (starting in 1865) and establishing the Catholic Publication Society (1866).

PATRICK W. CAREY

Hegel, Georg Wilhelm Friedrich (1770–1831), completed theological studies in Tübingen (1793); served as a lecturer in Jena (1801), a professor of philosophy in Heidelberg (1816), and a professor of philosophy in Berlin (1818), where he lectured on all the major topics of philosophy, including the philosophy of religion, until his death.

A product of two movements of the Enlightenment*, romanticism* and rationalism*, Hegel sought to reestablish a comprehensive knowledge of God, world, and humanity in light of the Kantian critique of the limits of theoretical reason. He did so by arguing that the structure and process of thinking itself connect the thinker with objective and ultimate reality. He described his position as one of absolute idealism, in contrast to Kant’s* subjective idealism. Ideality is not something that is given outside of and apart from reality; rather ideality is the *truth of the finite, of reality. “Absolute” connotes that which encompasses all relations within itself, including relations with the finite and empirical. God as the absolute idea releases or “absolves” the other to be other. Nature and finite spirit constitute the otherness of God, and they are necessary for the actualization of God as absolute spirit. Hegel’s system is holistic, not monistic or dualistic.

Hegel’s Lectures on the Philosophy of Religion (critical English ed., 1984–87) offers a speculative redescription of the Christian meta-narrative, which is that of the Triune God unfolding. Narrative applies to the immanent as well as the economic or worldly Trinity;* thus process* and movement are introduced into divinity. The inward dialectic of the divine life (identity, difference, mediation; or Father, Son, Spirit) is outwardly reenacted in the creation, fall, redemption, and consummation of the world. God creates the world by a primordial judgment or “release” of otherness. Conflict and estrangement are a tragic by-product of a world of finite forces. But God redeems the world by making manifest the implicit unity of divinity and humanity; reconciliation appears in and as a concrete human being, Jesus Christ, through whose life and teaching the divine idea courses. The death of Christ is also the death* of God, and thereby death itself is overcome, absorbed into the divine life as a negated moment. Spirit* is the power to overcome evil* and death, and God’s Spirit manifests itself in the formation of the community of faith, whose destiny is to serve not only itself but the world as the latter moves toward its consummation in freedom. Christianity is regarded as the “consummate religion,” in contrast to the “determinate religions” that form the history of religion – a topic to which Hegel gave unprecedented attention in his lectures. This reconstruction of the main themes of Christian theology owes much to a heterodox trajectory that can be traced to Gnosticism*, Neoplatonism*, and German mysticism*, but it is set forth in a distinctly modern framework.

Controversy over Hegel’s philosophy, and his philosophy of religion in particular, erupted after his death and continues to this day. His immediate followers split into left, right, and center parties. The left wing (David Friedrich Strauss*, Ludwig Feuerbach*, Bruno Bauer, and Karl Marx*) read his thought as implicitly pantheistic or atheistic, and Marx in particular converted it into a dialectical materialism that became the basis for an economic interpretation of history. The right wing (I. H. Fichte, C. H. Weisse, and Friedrich Schelling* in his late writings) sought to establish a pan-logistic theism or a “positive” philosophy of mythology. The middle Hegelians (Karl Daub, Philipp Marheineke, Karl Rosenkranz, and Ferdinand Christian Baur*) carried forward the agenda of a demythologizing* theology that affirms the Hegelian mediation of God, nature, and humanity in such a way that each retains its integrity.

Hegel has had an enormous impact in the realms of logic, ethics, politics, aesthetics, and philosophy of history* as well as the philosophy of religion*. Many recent philosophers (Emmanuel Levinas*, Jacques Derrida, Michel Foucault, Jürgen Habermas, and Paul Ricoeur*) imbibe deeply of Hegel even as they criticize his totalizing tendencies. Whether Hegel’s social ontology, which is rooted in his unique conception of “spirit” (Geist), and his dialectical method, which is based on the principle of negation, deserve the epithet of “totalizing” is one of the contested issues in the ongoing controversy over his thought. Hegel’s philosophy of religion provides resources for a critically liberal revisioning of Christian theology*, in contrast to the philosophical skepticism and religious fundamentalism* that often prevail today.

PETER C. HODGSON

Hegesippus (2nd c.), church historian, who drew up the “apostolic” succession lists” of the early bishops of Rome and other apostolic churches.

Hegesippus (Pseudo-), the spurious name of the author of a five-volume Latin history of Jerusalem’s fall (70 CE), erroneously attributed to Hegesippus*, but composed c370 (possibly by Ambrose* of Milan or Evagrius* of Antioch). Perhaps inspired by Emperor Julian’s failure to rebuild the Temple (363), “Hegesippus” sought the Christian truth in Jerusalem’s fall: as divine punishment for the rejection and death of Jesus. Though acknowledging and borrowing much from Josephus’s* Judean War, he dismissed that “partner in the treachery of the Jews” and removed much military and political detail, major speeches, and tragic and prophetic ethos. Competing with Josephus’s War (in Latin translation), “Hegesippus’s” influence appears in Christian theology and art.

STEVE MASON

Heidegger, Martin (1889–1976), was raised a Roman Catholic, studied briefly for the Catholic priesthood (1909–11), and unsuccessfully sought a Catholic chair of philosophy (1915). He abandoned scholastic-dogmatic Catholicism in 1917.

As a young scholar, he read Schleiermacher*, Luther*, Kierkegaard*, and Barth*, but rejected dialectical* theology (Gesamtausgabe, 9, 162n). In the early 1920s at the University of Marburg, he taught courses on Paul* and Augustine*, and he delivered a lecture “Luther and Sin” at Bultmann’s* Pauline seminar. His lecture “Phenomenology and Theology” (1927) mandated a strict separation between faith* and philosophy and between God* and being – a Lutheran position that he maintained throughout his career. In 1929 he declared that his book Being and Time (1927) made no argument for or against God’s existence (Gesamtausgabe, 9, 159n), although privately he wrote that human existence “must remain open to divine grace” (Briefwechsel Blochmann, 32).

In the 1930s, Heidegger attacked Christian theology for being based on an untenable metaphysics*/ontotheology. Insofar as metaphysical Christianity relegated God to the status of highest entity, Heidegger saw it as a major source of contemporary nihilism (Gesamtausgabe, 65, 139–40). Before the God of the philosophers, he wrote, “one cannot fall to one’s knees in awe.” He claimed that his “god-less thinking, which abandons the philosophical God . . . is perhaps closer to the divine God. That means it is more open to Him than onto-theo-logy would like to admit” (Gesamtausgabe, 11, 77; see also Death of God Theology).

In a 1966 Spiegel interview, Heidegger declared, “At this point only a god can save us” (Gesamtausgabe, 15, 671). He made it clear, however, that this “god” was not the Jewish-Christian divinity but only the god of the poet: being as “the holy” in Hölderlin’s nonmetaphysical sense (Anstöße, I [1954] 33). Heidegger’s work has nothing to do with preparing for Christian revelation* and grace*. The “god” that Heidegger’s philosophy awaits is simply “the possible arrival of world” (Gesamtausgabe, 79, 73–77), wherein world as the source of all meaning is at last recognized in its utter groundlessness. The arrival of such a world within the lives of human beings would constitute “the turn from the forgottenness of being to the protection of its presence.” That event would also be the arrival of the “last god” (Gesamtausgabe, 65, 288–93), i.e. world as such, and with it the possibility of secular-philosophical salvation.

THOMAS SHEEHAN

Heidelberg Catechism, the Reformed* catechism* prepared at the command of the elector Frederick III by Zacharias Ursinus and Caspar

Olevianus (1562). It is notable for its personal tone. The three parts deal with (1) human violation of the “law of God,” i.e. the great* commandment of love*; (2) redemption* through Christ*, justification*, and sanctification*, and the sacraments*; and (3) gratitude, expressed by obeying the Ten* Commandments, understood as guidance (the “third use” of the Law*), as well as by prayer modeled on the Lord’s* Prayer. Question 80 (“What difference is there between the Lord’s supper and the popish mass?”) was added by command of the elector in response to the final decrees of the Council of Trent* (1564). Long used by the Reformed churches in Germany* and the Netherlands*, it has also been added to the Book of Confessions of the Presbyterian Church in the USA (1967).

EUGENE TESELLE

Helena, (248–328), mother of Emperor Constantine*. Born in Drepanium, in Bithinium, Asia Minor, she married Constantius Chlorus in 270. He became Roman emperor of the West in 270 and abandoned her for dynastic reasons. When her son, Constantine (born 272), became emperor in 306 and was converted to Christianity (312), he restored her fortunes. She zealously supported Christians, and in old age she traveled extensively, visiting Jerusalem and eastern provinces of the Empire. She discovered the so-called true cross on what she claimed was the site of Golgotha and built the Church of the Holy Sepulchre in Jerusalem.

LAVINIA BYRNE

Heliand, Old Saxon epic, commissioned by Louis* the Pious (c830); an example of inculturation*, depicting Christ as hero and liege lord, and the apostles as his courageous vassals. Despite its imperial commission, its point of view is Saxon, implicitly linking the Frankish Empire with Rome. See also FEUDAL SYSTEM.

Hell, place of eternal punishment for opponents of God*. Hell presupposes the judgment* of the dead, which preexisted Christianity in the Egyptian Book of the Dead, Plato’s dialogues, the Eleusynian mysteries, Zoroastrianism, and, according to Josephus, among the Pharisees* and Essenes*. Infernal torments mentioned in the Bible include fire (Matt 25:41), fire and brimstone (Rev 20:10), worm and fire (Mark 9:43–49), and darkness (Matt 8:12; 2 Pet 2:4). The Apocalypse of Peter* (2nd c.) introduced punishments far more vivid than the biblical ones.

Opposition to an eternal, unchanging hell began early. Origen* claimed that divine punishment must be curative, and so could be neither physical nor eternal. The Vision of Paul retains the tortures in the Apocalypse of Peter*, but includes a descent of the heavenly* court into the pit of hell, where Christ* suspends torments on Sundays. Some medieval visions also mitigated hell's tortures so that, for centuries, purgatory* and hell overlapped. Scholastics* like William of Auxerre (1220s) debated whether one should pray for the damned. Caesarius of Heisterbach (c1225) claimed that angels* punish in purgatory* and demons* in hell. Dante* combined the physical and emotional reality of hell by saying, "Each one swathes himself in that which makes him burn" (Inferno, 26:48).

Though rejected in the West and condemned twice by Justinian*, Origen's* allegorical interpretation, "The fire by which each person is punished is proper to oneself" (First Principles 2. 10.4, cf. Isa 50:11), remained influential in the East. While skirting Origen's* belief in apokatastasis (restoration) and its corollary, reincarnation, the Greek* fathers also allegorized hell's torments. The Greek and Latin Bibles refer to both Tartarus (2 Pet 2:4) and Gehenna*, whereas the translation in the Old* Latin version and the Vulgate* of Hades as infernus (or "hell," rather than as the inferi, or "underworld") colored the afterlife differently in the West than the East. For example, Byzantine* iconography presents not the "descent into hell," but the anastasis, or "resurrection." Luther* compared the inner torment of a confused soul* (Anfechtung) to hell. In the Psychopannychia of the Soul (1534), Calvin* considered hell and its exile not a place, but a condition (p. 224b). This interpretation dramatizes the distinction between hell and damnation*. In 1999 Pope John* Paul II pronounced hell "the ultimate consequence of sin*," not a place, but a source of suffering* for the sinner. See also DEATH, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER; ETERNITY; JUDGMENT.

ALAN E. BERNSTEIN

Hellenistic Religious Traditions and Christianity's Self-Definition. "Christianity" (to use the word anachronistically) began as another 1st-c. Judaism, embroiled in many of the same controversies that preoccupied other forms of Judaism of the period (including those of the Pharisees*, Sadducees*, and Essenes*), e.g. the reimagination of Torah and Temple, kingship and sacrifice, the importance of circumcision, diet, calendar, and ethnicity. Christianity's self-definition over against Judaism and the wider Hellenistic world emerged as a question in different periods, locations, and circumstances, for individuals and groups far removed from the time, place, and issues that preoccupied Jesus or Paul. Those who struggled with self-definition were confronted with an astonishing variety of texts and traditions (see Apocrypha Cluster: Of the New Testament), a diversity that was a problem, not an answer, for defining "Christianity." They had to look elsewhere for arguments to forge a new sense of identity. Christian self-definition was and is an ongoing process of improvised differentiation and innovative negotiation. The categories "Christian," "Jewish," and "pagan" (as non-Christian and non-Jew) are neither stable nor essentially known entities, but social formations continuously engaged in self-re-creation.

In some of his letters (c50–60), Paul* warns new Gentile* recruits against the persistent dangers of their former religions. Drawing on existing Jewish polemics against "idolatry*" (e.g. Wis 13–15), Paul criticizes all religions other than his own as a "lie" (Rom 1:25), the debased worship of "images" resembling human beings and animals (Rom 1:23). Like other Hellenistic Jews, Paul linked the spiraling descent into immorality directly to idolatry (Rom 1:29–31). The line of demarcation still seems to be the simplistic "Israel vs. the nations" (read: "us vs. them"). Elsewhere Paul exhorts his recruits to "shun the worship of idols," because this is in fact the worship of demons*, not of God (1 Cor 10:14, 20–21). The belief that the gods of Greek religion and myth were demons likewise derives from Jewish polemic (1 Enoch 15:8–12, 19:1, 99:7; Jubilees 1:11, 22:17), but is also found in the contemporary philosophical critiques of popular religion (e.g. by Plutarch).

Paul* as envisioned by Luke in Acts* (c100–20) takes a more conciliatory approach in his speech on the Areopagus in Athens. Claiming to have seen an altar dedicated "to an unknown god," Paul declares, "What you worship as unknown, this I proclaim . . . , the God who made the world and everything in it does not live in shrines made by human hands" (Acts 17:23–24). All people have an obligation to seek this God, "for he is not far from each one of us" (17:27). Then Paul quotes the well-known line from the Stoic Aratus's poem Phainomena: "For we are indeed his [according to Aratus, Zeus's] offspring" (17:28). Rather than condemning people for willfully believing a lie (Rom 1:25), Paul in Acts declares that "God has overlooked past times of human ignorance, [and] now commands all people everywhere to repent" (17:30). A definition of "Christianity" emerges, constructed not in terms of inner-group polemics, but with a wider view of the 2nd-c. political, social, and religious world.

These few passages by their paucity underscore how little the NT is really interested in the question of Christian self-definition vis-à-vis Greek and Roman religion. But Justin* Martyr (mid-2nd c.) offered a more developed “history of religion.” Drawing on the Greek philosophical critique of popular religion, Justin declares all religions apart from Christianity to be the invention of evil demons (daimones) who have masked themselves as “gods” in order to mislead and enslave humans. In their effort to counterfeit the “true religion,” these demons are responsible for the apparent similarities that exist between Christianity and certain aspects of Greek cult and myth. But in the very anxious attempt to mark out boundaries and to envision a Christian virtual identity, Justin began laying the groundwork for the very categories of “Christianity” and “paganism” and for defining the divide that separates them. His immediate point is as much political as it is religious: Christians are indeed “atheists*,” as they are accused of being, but only insofar as they refuse to participate in the cultic worship of demons. In this sense, they are like Socrates, who was similarly accused of “atheism” for trying to deliver humankind from the power of the demons by means of “true reason.”

A more sophisticated attempt at Christian self-definition is found in the Exhortation to the Greeks of Clement* of Alexandria (c150–215), who presents a concise account of the origin and history of religion in seven stages, from primitive simplicity to present-day corruption. Clement’s distinctive achievement is his attempt to explain religion* as a human phenomenon. The trope is one of decline and fall (“error”), set in sharp relief against the “true religion,” Christianity; yet Clement acknowledges that the original natural affinity between humans and the divine has never been completely lost. Like Justin, Clement recognizes that a handful of Greeks (most notably Plato*) laid hold of the truth*, but they derived their knowledge from the Hebrews. Some of Clement’s arguments appear in writers both before and after him, but none present as comprehensive and philosophically informed an account of the history of religion, until Eusebius.

Eusebius* of Caesarea’s monumental Preparation for the Gospel (c314–18) is much more than a refutation of Porphyry’s* Against the Christians; it attempts to provide a fully developed history of religion and a definitive statement about the place of Christianity in it (indeed, apart from it). The first five books lay out the history of religion under three main headings: the natural, the mythical, and the political. Again, it is a story of decline and fall, aided and abetted in its final phase by the increasing power of the demons. Eusebius even fixes a precise date for the “death of paganism”: “in the time of [the emperor] Tiberius, when our savior [was] making his sojourn among men.” Eusebius constructs both a different origin and a separate history for Christianity, tracing it back in an unbroken lineage to the “original” and “true” religion of the Hebrew patriarchs.

With the conversion of Constantine*, Eusebius’s constructed history came to enjoy the status of imperial history and exercised its influence down to the modern period. Yet the artifice and artificiality of these projects of self-definition and social formation should be kept in mind. For grassroots Christianity, there was much more convergence of religious and cultural identities than would otherwise seem the case. For example, the Christian historian Sozomen reports that late-4th-c. Jews, Christians, and pagans were participating in a common religious festival at Mamre, the Palestinian site of the Abrahamic theophany*, until Constantine instructed the bishops to shut it down. See also INCULTURATION CLUSTER: OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE GRECO-ROMAN WORLD; POVERTY CLUSTER: AND THE EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCH. A. Hellenists, in Acts 6, Jews from the Diaspora*, a minority (among the “Hebrews,” Aramaic-speaking Jews) in Jerusalem and probably in the early Christian community. One of them, Stephen, became the first martyr of the Christian movement, not because he followed Jesus but because of his radically “Hellenist” teachings, against the Temple, the Law, and the customs (the Oral Torah*) given by Moses. The Hellenists possibly were the pre-Pauline source of central motifs in Paul’s teaching.

Helvetic Confession, First, adopted (1536) by the Reformed* churches in Switzerland*, but not by Constance or Strasbourg.

Helvetic Confession, Second, adopted (1566) at the request of Elector Frederick III of the Palatinate when called to defend himself before the Reichstag of the German Empire. To meet this emergency, Bullinger’s* personal statement of faith (1561) was quickly revised and adopted by many Reformed churches. Moderate in tone, it emphasizes the authority of Scripture* in the church's government and reformation; predestination,* emphasizing trust in God's free and gracious election*; and the practical life of the church, worship*, church order, ministry, the sacraments, and marriage.

Helvidius (late 4th c.), Italian theologian known as a result of Jerome's* attack on him for denying the perpetual virginity of Mary* and saying that the "brothers" of Jesus were the natural sons of Joseph and Mary. This incident reflects the 4th-c. conflict between those who exalted virginity* and those who defended marriage*.

Hemmingsen, Niels (1513–1600), the leading Danish theologian of the late Reformation and early Lutheran orthodoxy. He was influenced by the Aristotelian and humanistic ideas of Melancthon* during his studies in Wittenberg. He lost his official positions in 1579 because of the crypto-Calvinist* element in his teaching about the Eucharist*. He gained international renown from more than 100 books in Latin, dealing with issues concerning dogmatics, ethics* and nature, pastoral* theology, preaching*, and good morals of citizens. Outstanding among his works are Enchiridion theologicum (1557), Syntagma institutionum (1574), and De lege naturae (1562). See also DENMARK.

Henoticon (Act of Union; 482), the doctrinal declaration, written by Patriarch Acacius of Constantinople, issued by the emperor Zeno in an attempt to reunite the Miaphysites*/ Monophysites* with the Church of Constantinople. While it condemned Eutyches* as well as Nestorius*, it interpreted the Council of Chalcedon* as purely disciplinary, making no reference to the question of the "natures" of Christ, anathematizing anyone who set forth a creed other than the Nicene* Creed (in fact, the Niceno*-Constantinopolitan Creed), "whether at Chalcedon or at any other synod." The Henoticon led to the Acacian* schism (482–519) between the Eastern and Western churches.

Henry IV (1050–1106), German king (1056–1105) and emperor of the Holy* Roman Empire (1084–1105), central figure in the investiture* controversy. Caught between the reforming zeal of Pope Gregory* VII aimed at separating church* and state and the desire of German bishops and nobles to continue traditional patterns according to which the bishops were appointed by the king, King Henry declared Gregory deposed (1076). The latter excommunicated Henry and released Henry's subjects from their oath of fealty. When Henry made a private peace with the pope at Canossa (1077), a counter-emperor was elected. Ultimately Henry was elected emperor (1084). Yet Henry's last years were plagued by rebellion, even by two of his sons, and he was forced to resign the year before his death. See also INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY.

Henry IV (1553–1610), king of France (1589–1610) and of Navarre (1572–1610). As a Huguenot*, he was involved in the wars of religion before becoming king of France (changing his faith to Roman Catholicism "to better serve the country"). He enacted the Edict of Nantes (1598) to end the civil war, guaranteeing religious liberties to the Protestants. A very popular king, showing great care for the welfare of his subjects and an unusual religious tolerance for the time, he was murdered by a fanatical Catholic, François Ravaillac. See also NANTES, EDICT OF.

Henry VIII (1491–1547), king of England and Ireland (1509–47). Heir to Henry VII when his elder brother, Arthur, died (1502), he married Arthur's widow, Catherine of Aragon. He allowed Cardinal Thomas Wolsey to dominate day-to-day government for nearly two decades. He claimed that the first of several wars with France (1512–13) were "in defense of the papacy." Horrified by Luther*, he commissioned Assertio Septem Sacramentorum (Defense of the seven sacraments), for which he was rewarded (1521) with a papal title still used by English monarchs: "Defender of the Faith."

Henry's marriage to Catherine was soured by his obsession with fathering a male heir; the couple had only one surviving daughter, Mary* (Tudor). From 1527, the king's love for Anne Boleyn spurred his quest to have his marriage* declared null, made especially difficult by his insistence that the pope acknowledge that the papacy had erred in granting a dispensation for this marriage. The resulting deadlock destroyed Wolsey's power (1529); Henry abandoned papal loyalty for his long-standing conviction of his God-given headship of the English Church. Academics, including Cranmer*, formalized this conviction into a claim of royal supremacy, and Cromwell* rose to political power by steering legislation through Parliament to recognize it and repudiate papal obedience. Henry delegated his new power to Cromwell as “vicegerent in spirituals.” Cromwell dissolved all monasteries, nunneries, and friaries (1536–1540), and worked to authorize the publication of an official English Bible (the Great* Bible, 1539).

Anne Boleyn’s enemies convinced Henry of her (almost certainly imaginary) adultery; after her execution (1536), his marriage to Jane Seymour at last provided him with a son, Edward, but she died as a result (1537). Heart-broken, Henry nevertheless pursued matrimonial adventures: an embarrassing mismatch with Anne of Cleves (1540) was disentangled so that Henry could marry Catherine Howard, the marriage ending in her undoubted adultery and execution (1542). Only with the Evangelical Catherine Parr (1543) did Henry find contented partnership.

Many across the religious spectrum died for not conforming to his idiosyncratic religious agenda. He lost any strong sense of purgatory*, remained proud of the English Bible and suspicious of clerical power, curbed cults of images, and destroyed shrines; he entrusted the education of his son Edward and his daughter Elizabeth* to Evangelical scholars. Nevertheless, he never accepted the Protestant emphasis on justification* by faith alone and maintained the Latin Mass*, compulsory clerical celibacy, and other doctrinal provisions of the self-consciously traditionalist Act of Six Articles (1539).

Heresy. While the term has come to mean erroneous, deviant, or misleading versions of Christian teaching, originally the Greek word haire-sis had no negative connotations; neutral and descriptive, it referred to a school of thought “chosen” by members of a group (etymologically, “a choice”). The corresponding Latin term, secta, was similarly neutral (deriving not from seco, a “cutting off,” but from sequor, voluntarily “following” opinions or a way of life).

In Acts (5:17, 15:5, 26:5) hairesis refers to the Pharisees and Sadducees as Jewish parties. For later interpreters, Acts 24:5, 24:14, 28:22 (describing Jews as rejecting the Christian haire-sis) and 1 Cor 11:18–19 (in which Paul regrets that there are haireseis, “factions” among the Corinthians) reflect a more negative use of the term. Accordingly, Paul would have assumed that difference or plurality of belief was a danger sign, since unanimity (homonoia) was the “normal” expectation in “Hellenistic culture” (just as Ignatius*, a generation later, rejoiced over the lack of division in the churches to which he wrote; Eph 6:2, cf. Trall 6:1). Yet the neutrality of the term remained intact, because Luke and Paul needed to add negative terms to condemn the problematic interactions among factions. It is possible that Paul and Ignatius simply condemned factions for opposing and excluding each other, and not for holding different views (a plausible interpretation of 1 Cor 11:18–19). In fact, Christianity began with a diversity of doctrine, practice, and authority.

Nonetheless, hairesis was clearly used negatively by Justin* and Irenaeus*, who condemned Gnostics* and Marcionites* for denying that the Creator is the Father of Jesus Christ and for rejecting the authority of the OT.

In the history of Christian doctrine, various themes have been the focus of intense controversy, and some views held by one’s opponents have been pronounced heretical (conflicting groups have often declared each other heretical). After the Gnostic controversy (2nd c.), noteworthy conflicts concerned the Trinity*, Christology*, original* sin and the need for grace*, the Filioque, the Eucharist, the unity of the church, the Protestant doctrine of justification*, and Modernism*. Manuals listing and refuting various heresies, written during the 3rd and 4th c., were expanded during the Middle Ages and with the division between the Western and Eastern churches and between Catholics and Protestants.

The political enforcement of doctrine began with Constantine* and especially with Theodosius*, whose decree of uniform belief in the Trinity* (Cunctos populos, 380) became part of Roman law until the Reformation* and the Enlightenment*. Medieval rulers punished heresy as a counterfeit version of Christianity, since religious uniformity was politically valuable. The Inquisition* developed out of concern for the Albigenian* and other heresies. The role of inquisitors was to seek out information and gain confessions of heresy, then to hold hearings under the procedures for the sacrament of penance*. Persons who refused to recant were handed over to the “secular* arm” for burning.

Theories about the development of dogma* recognize that doctrines come to be formulated only gradually, usually in opposition to emergent formulations. Even when doctrines are clarified in this oppositional way, they are susceptible to further interpretation. Beyond the tragedies of persecution, exclusion, or religious war, there is always the danger that “heresy-hunting” will stifle open discussion of doctrinal issues and lead to an “external orthodoxy” that fosters “internal sterility of faith,” as Karl Rahner* warned.

At the height of a controversy over a doctrine or a practice, feelings are intense and lines are drawn very closely, because both sides of the controversy perceive the central relevance of the issue to their own lives or proclamations. This is what later generations often recognize in retrospect, eventually moving toward improved relations, or even reunion.

Hermas, Shepherd of, sometimes considered canonical (e.g. by Clement* of Alexandria, Origen*, Irenaeus*, and Codex* Sinaiticus); the most popular noncanonical text in the first five centuries of the church. The Muratorian* canon (late 2nd c.) relegates the work to secondary helpfulness because it lacks apostolic authorship.

The author, Hermas, a threptos (an abandoned baby raised in slavery) and eventually a freedman, had a family and household in (or near) Rome in the late 1st or early 2nd c. Clement* of Rome, a church leader of the time, might be the Clement mentioned in Vis. 2.4.3. Hermas writes of visions received, in three sections probably written over a period of time and intended as notes for oral proclamation: the “Visions,” “Mandates” (or “Commandments”), and “Similitudes” (or “Parables”). The revelatory figure of the “Visions” is a woman (the church) who grows progressively younger. The revelatory agent in the “Mandates” and “Similitudes” is an angel dressed as a “shepherd,” from whom the text takes its name.

The visionary message is communicated by both apocalyptic* images and allegory*: the female church, the building of a tower with stones brought from various places, trees, mountains, etc., form the basis for moral instruction until the tower is completed at the end of the age.

The conversion of church members who were instructed to share their wealth suggests a relatively wealthy community. The text contains the earliest Christian treatment of the discernment of spirits*, based on Hellenistic Jewish teaching.

The Shepherd had great popular appeal because its ethical teaching was the right combination of intriguing imagery and practical instruction.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Hermeneutics is the theory or science of interpretation, relating especially to the Bible and to be distinguished from exegesis* and from practical exposition. The word comes from Hermes in Greek mythology, whose task as messenger of the gods was to explain divine decisions to humans.

Christian hermeneutics has its origins in the Bible itself; the NT is, in large part, an interpretation of the HB, e.g., through typological* readings whereby figures or typical events in the OT are seen as prefigurements of figures and typical events in the NT. The early church quickly established two major hermeneutical “schools” in Antioch* and Alexandria*. The school in Antioch emphasized literal* readings of Scripture. The school in Alexandria emphasized allegorical* interpretations, following Clement* (c150–215) and Origen* (c185–c254), both deeply influenced by Greek philosophy. The greatest hermeneutical scholar of the West, Augustine* of Hippo (354–430), was trained in classical thought and developed, in On Christian Doctrine, a semiotics*, or theory of signs, distinguishing between “natural” signs and “given” signs, i.e. divinely revealed signs in the words of Scripture* and requiring careful interpretation. Looking back to earlier Christian interpreters like Irenaeus* and Tertullian*, Augustine finally depends on the judgment of the rule* of faith within the church; this later ensured that the medieval church maintained an iron grip on the interpretation of Scripture, which remained essentially unchanged in principle until the Reformation of Luther* and Calvin*. As in the early Christian interpreters, medieval hermeneutics pursued multiple levels of meaning, such as the literal, allegorical, moral, and anagogical meanings of Nicholas* of Lyra (c1270–1349).

Luther’s (1483–1536) hermeneutical revolution was made possible in part by the new technology of the printing press; for the first time, a standard text free from the vagaries of hand copying was available to a relatively large readership. Furthermore, the availability of vernacular Bibles in a growing number of languages encouraged both the spread of literacy and the freedom of the individual reader to interpret Scripture apart from the authoritative and dogmatic demands of the church. But above all, it was Luther’s principle of sola scriptura (Scripture alone) that firmly shifted attention to the text of the Bible (and no other book), free from the interpretative strategies of the church. The sola scriptura principle (Scripture* principle) together with an emphasis on the literal meaning alone turned hermeneutics toward its modern forms. In many ways, the Reformers anticipated the hermeneutics of the Enlightenment*, the “Age of Reason*.” Descartes’s* (1596–1650) cogito, sum (I think, I am) heralded the Enlightenment by distinguishing clearly between the realms of the sacred and the secular, and confirming reason as the interpreter's primary tool. The interpretation of Scripture no longer begins with prayer, but is based on an exercise of cool reason and even doubt* with the aspiration to achieve a complete understanding.

Schleiermacher* (1768–1834), the “father of modern hermeneutics,” set down principles that have guided biblical interpretation to this day. For him, hermeneutics is an art, an endlessly renewed task born of a wish to understand (the reader) and to be understood (author and text) in a never completed circular movement. Interpretation has two parts: the psychological, concerned with the interplay between the reader and the text, and the grammatical, requiring precise knowledge of the text's grammar and syntax. With Schleiermacher, hermeneutics is subject to universal principles; the Bible must be read with the same critical attention as any other texts. Wilhelm Dilthey (1833–1911) extended Schleiermacher's approach by placing hermeneutics within the broad context of the human sciences. In reaction the first major hermeneutical figure of the 20th c., Barth* (1886–1968), like Luther, regarded the reading of Scripture as essentially a “listening” to the Word* of God, an opening to God's revelation to prompt the words of the preacher. In distinction to Barth, Bultmann* (1884–1976) was deeply influenced by contemporary existential* thinking, and for him the task was to demythologize* the ancient cultural assumptions of the Bible and renew its message in the idiom of modern thought. Perhaps the greatest evaluation of hermeneutics in the second half of the 20th c. is Gadamer's* Truth and Method (1960), which explores the dialogue between the claims of truth and the processes of method – a hermeneutics of faith* (see Conviction) against a hermeneutics* of suspicion (Ricoeur's* term).

In the wake of postmodernity*, it is not easy to anticipate the future of the hermeneutical task of scriptural interpretation. Varieties of “liberation*” hermeneutics (feminist*, postcolonial*), the shift from the verbal to the visual, and the advent of texts in “cyberspace” are having an effect on interpretation, just as the technology of the printing press affected the hermeneutics of Luther's time. See also APOPHATISM; BIBLE INTERPRETATION CLUSTER; CONVICTION; METAPHOR; SCRIPTURAL CRITICISM; SYMBOLISM.

DAVID JASPER

Hermeneutics of Suspicion, term coined by Paul Ricoeur* (referring to Marx*, Nietzsche*, and Freud*, in Freud and Philosophy, French original, 1965; English, 1970) for a method of interpretation which assumes that the surface-level meaning of a text (including the Bible) conceals the political interests it serves (see Ideological Studies of Christianity; Ideology). Hermeneutics of suspicion became an important methodological tool in feminist* studies to unmask the patriarchal* and androcentric* perspectives of (biblical) texts.

Hermetic Writings, texts attributed to the Hellenized Egyptian god of wisdom, Thoth-Hermes (1st–3rd c. CE), divided into “technical” works (astrology, alchemy, and magic) and “philosophical” treatises (the Byzantine collection Corpus Hermeticum, the Latin Asclepius, the Armenian Hermetic Definitions, and three Coptic texts from the Nag Hammadi “library”).

Hermetic writings originated in the sophisticated multicultural milieu of Alexandria, notorious for the blending of Greek philosophical ideas with “Oriental” traditions, especially Egyptian wisdom literature and the biblical creation story (Genesis). Affinities with Christian–Gnostic systems stem from this shared intertextual network.

Hermetic texts combine cosmological speculation with a desire to attain salvation* through a noetic experience (gnosis) of God. They resolve the theological problem of God's transcendence vs. immanence by the intercession of intermediary divine powers. Contrary to Gnostic* attitudes, they praise the physical world as God's beautiful creation. Their anthropology* derives from a modified Platonic soul–body dualism*: the goal of Hermetic experience is the soul's deliverance from the body, but bodily sensation remains an essential preliminary to spiritual enlightenment.

Ancient Christian attitudes toward Hermetism range from polemical rejection to the appropriation of “Hermes” as a herald of Christianity. Hermetic writings have influenced various esoteric currents, including the New Age Movement.

Herod Family. The tangled family tree of the Herods begins with Herod I, also known as Herod the Great (73–4 BCE), who ruled (from 37 BCE) over much of Palestine in collusion with the Roman Empire. King Herod slaughters males under the age of two in Matthew's infancy narrative (Matt 2:1–18), an indication that some saw him as an enemy of the Jewish people. Upon Herod I's death, his kingdom was divided among his three sons, Archaeus (the south, including Judea), Philip (the north-east), and Herod Antipas (the north, including Galilee). Antipas, whom Jesus calls "that fox" (Luke 13:32), ruled until 39 CE, presiding, according to Josephus* and the Synoptic Gospels, over the execution of John* the Baptist. Antipas lost public support when he divorced his first wife and married Herodias*, the wife of his half-brother, Philip. According to Luke, since Jesus was from Galilee, Pilate initially sent him to Antipas for trial. The fact that Mark's Gospel calls Antipas a king (6:14–30) does not reflect history (Matt 14:1) as much as it does Mark's presentation of Antipas as a type of foolish foreign king, familiar from Hebrew narrative. Acts also mentions Herod Agrippa I, a favorite of Josephus for his skillful cooperation with the Romans (Antiquities XVIII, v–viii; Acts 12:3–11), and records that Herod Agrippa II tried the apostle Paul (25:13–26:32).

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Herodians, twice mentioned in the NT; in each instance, the group conspires with the Pharisees* against Jesus (Mark 3:6, 12:13; Matt 22:16). Historically, the pairing is unlikely, because the Pharisees were members of a reform movement with no investment in Rome, whereas the Herodians presumably supported the secondhand Roman rule of the Herods*.

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Herodias, initially married to her uncle, Philip, until another uncle, Herod Antipas, divorced his first wife and married her (Josephus, Antiquities XVIII, v). In Mark, Herodias is conniving and murderous, using her daughter's appeal and her husband's weakness to kill John* the Baptist, who criticized her marriage to Herod (6:14–30).

Hesychasm (from the Gk for "silence" or "stillness"), a method and theory of prayer and contemplation* in the monastic* tradition of the Eastern Church; closely identified with the 13th- to 14th-c. spiritual* revival in the Byzantine Empire as defended by Gregory* Palamas and centering on Mount Athos*. As a spiritual practice, its roots are much earlier. A noted feature of hesychasm is the use of the Jesus* Prayer, often in conjunction with psychosomatic techniques and under the experienced guidance of an elder. The hesychastic tradition is reflected in the Philokalia, a collection of ascetic* and spiritual writings (between the 4th and 15th c.; first published, 1793).

JAMES C. SKEDROS

Heteronomy, as an ethical or theological concept or as a mode of existence, is often viewed negatively by Christian theologians. However, it also carries positive connotations, which can be cautiously appropriated, with full awareness of its oppressive potential.

1. As an ethical concept, heteronomy (Gk hetero, "another"; nomos, "law") literally refers to ethical norms and values that are externally imposed on the subject. These norms and values can be regarded either as a threat to the autonomy* of the individual, who should instead make her or his own moral choices (Kant*), or as a necessary guide for the individual, who would otherwise go astray (Barth*). Thus in Christian dogmatics, heteronomy is to autonomy as law* is to gospel*, as creation* is to salvation*, or as government is to the church (the Lutheran doctrine of the two realms [or kingdoms*]).
2. As a mode of existence, heteronomy is closely related to the two other modes of existence: autonomy* (its opposite) and relationality*. According to Tillich*, heteronomy is autonomy gone astray; the individual has given up the search for true faith* (ultimate concern) and has passively accepted traditional norms and values. He proposes "theonomy," a harmonious synthesis of autonomy and heteronomy. In that heteronomy implies a lack of control, it has negative connotations. Nevertheless, it also has the connotation of "vulnerability," which, when regarded as a life condition, is related not only to exposure and oppression*, but also to love* and empowerment.
3. The heteronomous character of Christian faith, submitting to divine revelation, has been a target of the Enlightenment* critique of religious institutions and also of post-Christian feminist critique (Hampson), because it may contribute to resistance to the emancipation from oppression of women or of any humans. However, heteronomy can also be seen as a fundamental dimension of Christian faith, kenosis*, exemplified by the empowering experience of contemplative* prayer (Coakley) and corresponding to breaking through in psychodynamic therapy (Heyward).

4. Beyond Christianity and its institutions, there are heteronomous risks in contemporary society arising from institutions beyond the control of the individual, such as mass media, multinational companies, and large bureaucracies, none of which promote mutual relations.

Heteronomy is necessarily interrelated and in tension with autonomy and relationality. Each of these three modes of existence is ambivalent, becoming oppressive when it denies the other two modes. Heteronomy is oppressive when it smothers mutual relations and fails to respect the individual. However, heteronomy is also the positive empowering that occurs when one ultimately abandons control of oneself, trusting God (rather than relying on oneself or human [relational] institutions) or receiving the gift of love*.

CRISTINA GRENHOLM

Heterosexuality denotes a person's sexual* feelings and fantasies about and sometimes sexual activities with (a) person(s) of the other sex. Until the late 20th c. (at least in Western cultures), all humans were assumed to be heterosexual unless sick, abnormal, or immoral. For the majority of Western Christians, heterosexuality is morally superior to homosexuality*, although some have modified their views in the light of scientific research and Western gay and lesbian Christian movements.

Heterosexuality as an Embodiment of Patriarchal Power. This most distinctly religious understanding is steeped in a patriarchal* worldview in which a male God creates the human male above the female, sexually and otherwise. This view is frequently shared by Judaism* and Islam*. Since Scripture portrays Adam* and Eve* as suitable partners, figuratively joined by God and commanded to procreate, Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, and Protestant Christians have commended heterosexual marriage* as the only moral context for sexual activity, child-bearing (pregnancy*), and family*. The traditional image of Christ and the church as bridegroom and bride, the basis for much Christian prayer, liturgy, and hymnody, makes heterosexuality sacred; the bridegroom-bride image is a "hetero-fetish," as the feminist ethicist Beverly

W. Harrison pointed out. Contemporary Christians tend either to accept the church's basic teachings about heterosexuality as morally normative or to challenge these teachings as oppressive, discriminatory, and generating violence* against women and persons perceived as non-heterosexual.

Heterosexuality as Morally Neutral. In the late 20th and early 21st c., Feminist*, Womanist*, Queer*, and various other Liberation* theologians have argued for more inclusive Christian understandings of scriptural* authority, tradition, sexual morality, marriage, and family. They hold that heterosexuality is one of several morally neutral ways of experiencing and expressing one's sexuality*.

Like homosexual behavior, heterosexual activity can be destructive or creative, coercive or cooperative, abusive or healthy; thus heterosexuality can be moral or immoral. See also ABUSE AS PASTORAL CARE ISSUE.

Hexaemeron (Gk "six days' work" of creation*; Gen 1) was the subject of many early Christian commentaries.

Hexapla, edition of the OT produced by Origen*, with six columns (Hebrew, Hebrew transliterated into Greek, and four translations by Aquila*, Symmachus, the Septuagint*, and Theodotion*). Further columns were added when other versions became available. It was begun in Alexandria and completed in Caesarea, where the original remained. The "Hexaplaric" text of the LXX was widely copied; other selective copies were also made, especially of the four Greek translations.

Hicks, Elias (1748–1830), Quaker* farmer, minister, reformer. Born on Long Island, New York, he traveled widely among Quakers, voicing his opposition to slavery. His preaching and support for continuing revelation* led to a major split among Quakers. Hicks reacted to the amassing of wealth* and integration of Quakers within the larger society. He bluntly attacked Friends* who differed with him, many who embraced Evangelical theological views. He emphasized inward seeking and less reliance on the Scriptures. His mostly rural followers challenged Quakers' urban leaders in Yearly Meetings, especially in Philadelphia, New York, and Baltimore, bringing about long-lasting splits.

Hierotopy, the Creation of Christian Sacred Spaces. The term “hierotopy” consists of two Greek roots: hieros (sacred) and topos (place, space, notion); it refers to the creation of sacred spaces as a special form of human creativity, as well as to a field of study analyzing particular instances of the creation of sacred spaces as “hierotopical projects.” Hierotopy, as a recently established theoretical concept, relates to a specific and neglected research field that spans art history, anthropology, and religious studies and how they are interrelated so as to form a space that reflects believers’ previous experiences of the sacred and invites new encounters with the mystery of the holy.

Hierotopy as a Field of Study accounts for artistic images and the symbolic* world they form (see Aesthetics and Theology; Arts and Theology), but also investigates the combination of material objects that occupy and organize a sacred space, the rituals and social mechanisms that take place in them, and the theological and liturgical aspects through which a sacred space is created in a “hierotopical project.” A created sacred space cannot be interpreted as the synthesis of arts, as the age of baroque, and later art nouveau, seem to suggest. Hierotopy deals with a different subject matter, created sacred space, which cannot be described simply as a combination of artifacts and of various ephemeral effects. On the contrary, a created sacred space embodies specific images (visions) of sacred space that subordinates a realm of stable architectural forms (e.g. basilica*, cathedral*, monastery*) and various pictures (e.g. icons*, stained glass windows) to changeable liturgical clothes and vessels, lighting effects and ritual gestures, invisible fragrance, and prayers. In fact, almost all objects of Christian art were originally conceived of as elements of a hierotopical project that sought to construct an immaterial but real space as the center of the universe around which the world of objects, sounds, perfumes, lights, and other effects revolved.

Such research fields as lighting and fragrance find their proper context within an overall hierotopical framework. Several written sources (including Byzantine monastic ceremonials) provide a detailed description of the practice of changing lighting during worship services according to a sophisticated scenario. At times light accentuates certain images or holy objects, organizing a perception of the entire space of the church and providing a logic for “reading” its most significant elements. Similarly, the realm of fragrance presents ever new combinations of incense, wax candles, and aromatic oils in lamps (see Incense and Olfactory Experience in Worship) that mark and organize the sacred space of worship in the church; this had deep roots in the OT Temple, and also in ancient Near East and Roman imperial cults.

Hierotopy as the Making of Sacred Space in the Bible. In earlier studies, sacred space, associated with God’s actual presence and the holy, was the subject of a phenomenological* interpretation reflected in Mircea Eliade’s notion of hierophany as “an irruption of the sacred that detaches a territory from the surrounding cosmic milieu.” Eliade used the well-known biblical story of Jacob’s dream (Gen 28:12–22) as a characteristic illustration of hierophany. However, in this phenomenon, one can isolate a hierotopical part. In the biblical story, the hierotopy starts with Jacob’s awakening. Inspired by his dream-vision (hierophany), he creates a sacred space (making a pillar with the stone, pouring oil on it, calling the place Bethel, house of God), presenting a model to all of his successors – creators of innumerable churches and shrines. The permanent relation and intensive interaction between hierophany (mystical* appearance) and hierotopy (the creation of an environment conceived of by minds and made by hands) determines the specificity of the making of sacred spaces as a form of human creativity.

The making of the Tabernacle provides another biblical model. According to Exod 25–40, the Lord himself conveyed to Moses on Mount Horeb the entire project of the Tabernacle, from the general structure of the space to details of the sacred vestment production. God chose the master Bezalel (Exod 31:2) to implement the plan, positing a model relationship between creators of sacred space and creators of objects.

Creators of Sacred Spaces. The most powerful paradigm for creators of sacred spaces has been inherited from King Solomon, who was inspired by God to build the Temple in Jerusalem. He established for centuries an iconic* behavior of earthly rulers in relation to the Ruler of the Universe. In the Byzantine tradition, emperors were often creators of sacred space, following the model of the holy emperor Justinian* as the builder of the Hagia Sophia. According to a popular Byzantine story, Justinian did his best to surpass Solomon in his project of building the great church of the Empire.

A representative figure of such creators of sacred space in the West is Abbot Suger, who conceived of the first Gothic space in the abbey church of St. Denis (1140–44). His roles included endowing the project and casting masters, but it also entailed the development of a theological vision (possibly influenced by the theology of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite), as well as the elaboration of new rituals and artistic modeling (as he explains in his extensive writings). This multifunctional activity, comparable to the role of future film directors, integrated various arts into the creation of a single sacred space.

The Creation of “Holy Land Sacred Spaces.” A key element of the medieval hierotopy was the re-creation of the Holy Land or some of its parts. For instance, the Pharos chapel in Constantinople functioned not merely as an imperial storage place for the main Passion relics, but also as the Byzantine “Holy Sepulchre” – the sacred center of the Empire. In the West, the most striking examples are Santa Croce in Gerusalemme in Rome and Campo Santo in Pisa, for which the “holy earth” from Golgotha was brought by ships in the 4th and 13th c., respectively. The 17th-c. New Jerusalem complex near Moscow, representing the largest re-creation of the Holy Land in world history (about 50 square kilometers), combined an iconic image and a narrative illustration, presenting both Byzantine and Western hierotopical traditions. The creation of such spatial images as sacred spaces did not mean that the locus “Holy Land” disappeared. Actually, the topographical, material concreteness of the Holy Land conveyed power and religious efficacy to the sacred spaces re-creating the Holy Land.

Similarly, one large sacred space can imbue smaller sacred spaces with religious power and efficacy. This is the case in many Romanesque and Gothic cathedrals, yet the most striking example is the overall environment of Hagia Sophia in Constantinople, which provided the framework in which several hierotopical projects belonging to different periods could coexist. Thus Hagia Sophia was filled with installations that created particular sacred spaces: around the altar table; at the Samaritan’s well in the southeast section; around the icon reliquary with the chains of St. Peter in the northern aisle; and near the northwest pillar, which included relics of St. Gregory the Wonderworker. The latter was covered by gilded brass plates and adorned by a venerated icon of this saint. On particular days, a movable altar table was installed in front of the pillar and special services took place. Deliberately modeled micro-sacred spaces were activated in particular moments of the daily or annual liturgical services.

The creation of sacred spaces is a dynamic matter. Hierotopical projects were usually presented in permanent movement. Performativity, dramatic changes, and flexibility were connected with the Byzantine notions of chora (metaphysical, divine space) and choros (circular movement in space), which were sometimes reflected in iconography, e.g. in the early-14th-c. mosaics of the Kariye Camii (in the Chora Monastery, Constantinople) conceived by Theodore Metochites. This donor and creator of the sacred space clearly pointed out the origins of his imagery, symbolically presenting different images of the Virgin with the Child inscribed with the same words – Chora tou achoretou (space of the uncontainable) – and two images of Christ above the entrances to the narthex and to the naos (where the liturgy is performed) inscribed as Chora ton zonton (space of the living). The entire church building and all its images were intended to represent this “divine space.”

In Byzantine minds, the icon* (of Jesus* Christ or of Mary* the Theotokos) was not merely an object and a flat picture on a panel or wall, but a spatial vision emanating from the image into the environment in front of it, creating a sacred space between the picture and its beholder in which various other media (lighting, smells, sounds) were interacting. This can be illustrated by the medieval Holy Tuesday performance with the icon of the Hodegetria of Constantinople, which happened each week in the Byzantine capital from the 12th c. The image on the panel icon of the Hodegetria was perceived as animated and as an inseparable part of the iconic spatial milieu. The holy icon was actively participating and interacting with the beholders, who became an integral part of the sacred space created by the image, together with the other images, lights, smells, gestures, and sounds. In a way, the beholders, with their collective and individual memory, spiritual experience, and knowledge, participated in the creation of the sacred space.

The Palm Sunday ceremony, or the "procession on a donkey," in 16th- to 17th-c. Moscow provides another striking example. The czar led the patriarch, seated on a donkey in remembrance of Christ's entrance into Jerusalem, from the Kremlin to St. Basil's Cathedral on Red Square. The space of evangelical Jerusalem was reproduced in the center of Moscow and became a "living picture," a dynamic and spatial reenactment of what was also a popular iconographic theme.

A comparative approach reveals different religious and national models of Christian hierotopy. In Byzantium a dominant iconic vision of sacred space breaks down the barrier between the material body of the church and the external milieu. The inner space of the church could be displayed and re-created in squares and streets, in fields and mountains, which were, at least temporarily, transformed into an icon of the sacred universe, created by God. Furthermore, the church building itself is considered a transparent structure and a moving spiritual substance: indeed, relics* were sometimes inlaid in walls, pillars, and cupolas of Byzantine churches. In post-Byzantine churches in Romania*, the altar iconography is reproduced on the facades of the church building; in this way, the hidden space of the "holy of holiest" is open to the external world, in turn conceived of as a cosmic sacred space, a church-cosmos.

Byzantine models were adopted and transformed in different countries according to their national characteristics and even climatic conditions. The architecture of ice that framed Russian hierotopical projects for the Epiphany* and other winter festivals simply could not exist in the Balkans. The sublime Constantinopolitan patterns were being reworked in the folk milieu: the well-established "academic" hierotopy was combined with spontaneous sacralization of the human environment.

As a living entity, a hierotopical project could change over time: the original framing vision was subject to developments and additions. Cathedrals of the Moscow Kremlin provide a good example: their sacred space considerably changed over the centuries. Liturgical textiles covered icons and great parts of walls until the late 17th c., when most were removed from the cathedrals. This created a very different image of sacred space.

Sacred Space in Minor Arts and Written Texts. The hierotopical approach relates not merely to the sacred spaces of churches, cities, or landscapes, but to spatial imagery in minor art forms and in written texts.

Byzantine manuscripts provide characteristic examples. Their first pages sometimes looked like a solemn gate to the sacred space of the book, e.g. representing the heavenly city made up of churches (as in the manuscripts of the 12th-c. homilies of James of Kokkinobaphos and the sermons of St. Gregory* Nazianzen from Sinai).

Liturgical vestments provide another example of hierotopical imagery. The 14th- to 15th-c. embroidered Byzantine episcopal liturgical robes, sakkoi, of the Moscow Metropolitan Photios, e.g., with their sophisticated system of images, created a microcosm of the church space, which was incorporated into the sacred milieu of the actual cathedral; they revealed their true meaning in the liturgical movements and gestures.

The same is true of liturgical vessels and numerous reliquaries. The 10th-c. Constantinopolitan stone chalice from San Marco in Venice (the Chalice of the Patriarchs), adorned by a gold medallion with an enamel image of Christ Pantocrator on the bottom, reflected the sacred space imagery of Byzantine cupolas, also bearing the Pantocrator image. In the Communion rite, both images had to be perceived as interrelated parts of the same sacred space (see Jesus, Images of, Cluster).

The so-called Limburg Staurothek (968–85), consisting of a piece of the true cross framed by 10 other relics, mostly kept in the church of the Virgin of the Pharos, created a sacred space out of this reliquary chapel, which had belonged to the Byzantine emperors. Some Byzantine reliquaries of St. Demetrios reproduced not merely the iconography of the saint, but the arrangement of his shrine in Thessaloniki, which is represented by a sequence of flat and volume images, gradually appearing in the process of the opening of a reliquary. Thus the reliquary created an image of venerated sacred space – or re-created this sacred space – widely known for the miracles that were said to have regularly happened there.

Finally, the descriptions of a sacred milieu (e.g. the dwelling place of a saint) are a regular topic of medieval writings. Characteristically, the realistic features of landscapes (such as distances) are obliterated in these texts, which present a recognizable but iconic image of the sacred place. The modeling of sacred space by word images entails not merely direct descriptions of paradise, a monastery, or a church, but also some attempts to present an image of a specific milieu, becoming “sacred” beyond commonly recognized characteristics, as in some of the novels of Tolstoy and Dostoevsky.

In large spaces (church and city), in minor arts, and in literary texts, there is one and the same type of creativity, shaped by the idea of sacred space imagery and by an iconic perception of the world. See also ICONOGRAPHY.

High Christologies emphasize that Jesus manifests a preexisting divine being, sometimes different from the Father (as in Arianism*), sometimes of the same essence as the Father (as in Nicene* orthodoxy). The endemic question for Christology has been how to acknowledge Christ’s full humanity (emphasized in low* Christologies) while also affirming his divinity, as high Christologies emphasize. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER: INTRODUCTION ENTRIES.

High Church Party (the) comprises members of the Church of England (see Anglicanism Cluster) who emphasize its continuity with the Roman Catholic Church and the centrality of the sacraments*. During the 19th c., they were often associated with the Oxford* Movement, but condemned its divisiveness.

Higumen or Hegumen (from Gk), title for the head of a monastery of the Eastern Orthodox Church, comparable to abbot* in the Western Church. See also MONASTICISM CLUSTER: IN THE BYZANTINE EMPIRE.

Hilary of Poitiers (c315–c367), convert to Western Christianity from paganism (and not from Arianism), bishop of Poitiers (from c350), chief supporter of Nicaea* and Athanasius* in the West. In 356 he was exiled to the East and defended the Nicene doctrine at the Council of Seleucia* (359). Like Athanasius he encouraged an alliance between the Homoiousians* and the Homoousians*, since both were opposed to the Arians*; this was achieved at the Council of Alexandria* (362). His work On the Trinity (359) influenced Augustine* and others; On the Synods (359) informs the West about the Eastern councils and their creeds; after the Council of Constantinople* (360), which made Arianism the official doctrine, he wrote several polemical works. Because of his eagerness for debate, he was sent back to the West (360), where he continued to attack Arianism. He introduced into the West the practice of writing hymns, a practice already used in the East by both the Arians and their opponents to promote their doctrines.

Hildegard of Bingen (1098–1179), abbess*, visionary, writer on natural history and medicine, hagiography*, cosmology, and theology*; composed a song cycle and musical drama; maintained a voluminous correspondence with religious and secular figures, exalted and humble; made several journeys within Germany preaching before clergy and laity. Understanding herself as a prophet*, privy to the secrets of God, she gained acceptance for her writings, initially from the monks* of Disibodenberg and later at the Synod of Trier (1147–48) from Pope Eugenius III, who encouraged her to record and circulate whatever she learned from the Holy* Spirit through her visions.

Born the 10th and last child of a noble family from Bermersheim in Rheinhessen, early on she showed signs of her unusual gifts. Dedicated to God by her parents at the age of eight, she joined the anchoress* Jutta of Spanheim in a cell at the Benedictine* monastery of Disibodenberg, either at that time or somewhat later. When Jutta died (1136), Hildegard was elected head of the small convent, which had grown from the original anchorage. In 1141 Hildegard experienced a vision that changed the course of her life. In it she not only was granted the ability to understand the inner meaning of the texts of her religion (which she describes as “the Psalter*, the evangelists* and other catholic books of the Old and New Testament”) but also was commanded to say and write what she had understood for the edification of others, despite the fact that she was a woman and lacking all but a rudimentary education. After some hesitation, compelled by an illness that she took to be a divine chastisement, she started to write Know the Ways [of God] (Scivias), which took 10 years to complete. This was followed by the Book of Life’s Merits (Liber vitae meritorum) (1158–63). The Book of Divine Works (Liber divinorum operum) (1163–73/74) completed her visionary trilogy.

While writing Scivias and amid opposition from the abbot* and monks, Hildegard moved her convent from Disibodenberg to Rupertsberg, a divinely indicated location, near Bingen on the Rhine (1150). After some initial difficulties, the convent flourished and she established a second (1165) at Eibingen on the opposite side of the Rhine. However, as a Benedictine*, she remained technically subject to the abbot of Disibodenberg and, beyond him, to the archbishop of Mainz. Her other works (some lacking the explicit claim of a divine source), including her musical, medico-scientific (Physica and Causes and Cures), and hagiographical writings (Life of St. Disibod and Life of St. Rupert) can all be related to her activities as abbess and founder of convents.

Hildegard corresponded with a range of important people of her day, including Frederick Barbarossa, who also consulted her in person, Henry II of England and Eleanor of Aquitaine, several popes, and spiritual luminaries such as Bernard* of Clairvaux. Various bishops, priests, monks, and nuns were the recipients of her letters, which often chided them for laxity in their role as teachers and defenders of the faith. This was in the context of the high expectations for renewal of the faith* that had been raised by the reforms of Gregory* VII, the alarm over the spread of non-Catholic movements such as that of the Cathars*, and the fact that the church in Germany was riven by a papal schism* (1159–77).

Hildegard saw herself principally as a teacher, interpreting by her writings, counsel, and preaching “the ways of God” to humanity. Given this broad task, her writings are truly encyclopedic, encompassing biblical and salvation* history from its beginnings to the end of the world. She expected the end to occur sooner rather than later, although she was careful never to predict a date (unlike her younger contemporary and fellow visionary, Elisabeth of Schoenau). Because of her early papal recognition as a conduit for God’s words, the usual strictures against teaching by women were waived for her. Her writings were also acceptable because what she said, although strikingly original in form and expression, remained well within the bounds of 12th-c. Catholic orthodoxy; nor did they challenge the role of the male hierarchy in the Roman Catholic Church.

Although Hildegard’s works were never completely lost sight of, in the last decades of the 20th c. her life and works were extensively studied, making her, if not a household name, recognizable to a wide range of people. She is claimed to be a female role model and inspiration not only by Christians of various confessions (there have been efforts to have her declared a “doctor* of the church”), but also by New* Age practitioners, followers of alternative medicine and “creation spirituality,” ecologists* and feminists*, and musicians, both traditional and contemporary. SABINA FLANAGAN

Hincmar (806–82), Frankish churchman, educated at the abbey of St. Denis, he joined the court of Louis* the Pious, then supported his son, Charles the Bald. Appointed archbishop of Reims (845), he became the focus of several controversies over his rights as a metropolitan*. The False Decretals* (which he ironically quoted) were forged around 850 to strengthen the bishops’ hand against their metropolitans, enabling them to appeal directly to the pope. He played a major role in the rejection of Gottschalk’s* view of “double predestination*” (for both salvation* and eternal reprobation); his own position (God wills the salvation of all, but the human will remains free; God predestined a few to be saved out of mercy, yet Christ died for all) was confirmed at the Synod of Quiercy (853) but was opposed at Valence (855).

HINDUISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER

Hinduism and Christianity Hinduism and Christianity: Interreligious Dialogue Hindu Scriptures and the Bible

Hinduism and Christianity. Conversion* has been the bone of contention between the two religions. The built-in missionary* stance of Christianity (Matt 28:16–10; see Mission Cluster) and the intractable loyalty to the hierarchical caste* order of Hinduism (Manu’s Code of Law, Manava-Dharmasastra, c2nd c. CE) have led to an uneasy relationship.

Christians take human activity in history* as central; Hindus presuppose the interdependence of all happenings. Christian beliefs stress uniqueness (“outside the Church there is no salvation*”; the uniqueness* of Christ), while Hindu beliefs include interconnectedness and harmony (dharma). There are differences in their perception of the goal of life (death* and resurrection* for Christians; rebirth and liberation for Hindus) and of truth and reality (historical approaches for Christians; ontological approaches for Hindus).

Missionaries like Francis Xavier* perceived Brahmins and their teaching negatively. Roberto de Nobili* (15th c.) refuted beliefs like rebirth. However, Thomas Stephens (1549–1619), a Jesuit missionary and poet, proficient in Marathi, Konkani, Sanskrit, English, and Portuguese, wrote a salvation-history “inculturation*” epic, Kristapurana, on the life of Jesus Christ, employing Vaishnava terminology (from one of the main Hindu traditions) but eschewing apologetics and exclusive Hindu language as Veda and Shruti texts do.

Bartolomaeus Ziegenbalg’s papers (1719) contain both Christian views on polytheism* and the “immorality” of the Hindu deities and the rejoinder by the “Malabarian Brahmins” concerning the illogicality of eternal punishment*, the impossibility of Jesus being savior* of the world owing to his mean parentage, and the impossibility of belief in a God who suffered and died.

In the Bombay controversy, John Carey (1810–82) ridiculed inconsistencies in the Puranas. Conversely, Narayana Rao (1832), interpreting the Bible literally, pointed out its inconsistencies. Wilhelm H. Mill (1792–1853) and John Muir (from 1837) refuted Hindu doctrines in order to present the truth of Christianity. Subaji Bapu disdained the idea of a 6,000-year-old creation* but conceded that salvation in non-Hindu religions was possible because it is the universal Atman that is honored as Buddha, Jina, Christ, Allah, and all other deities. Haracandra Tarkapañcanana heaped contempt on those who converted to Christianity out of a desire for liquor and meat. He argued that the Veda, unlike the Bible, is eternally pre-existent and coeval with creation. Nilakantha Goreh refuted doctrines like Christ’s salvific suffering and death.

K. C. Sen (1838–84) criticized the Christian churches but believed in the Trinity* and the omnipresent and universal Christ*. Swami Vivekananda* and M. K. Gandhi* revered Jesus but were critical of missionaries who belittled and undermined Hinduism.

Since Vatican* II (Nostra Aetate, also known as The Declaration on the Relation of the Church and Non-Christian Religions, by Pope Paul VI, 1965), Catholics view other religions sympathetically. Raimon Panikkar (b1918) speaks of the universe of faith* and the “pluriverse” of beliefs wherein the complementarity of religions and the polarity and distinctiveness of religions are maintained (see the present cluster: Interreligious Dialogue).

Christians (Wilkinson, 1839) have drawn attention to the inhumanities of caste* structures. Today the Christian churches are becoming acutely aware of problem of the oppression of Dalits*, many of whom have become Christians. The Viswa Hindu Parishad accuses Christians of enticing the poor* to convert to Christianity. Others question the value of service that aims at conversion but not all agree with this (e.g. Mani Shankar Aiyar, as Shourie notes).

Mutual interaction has led some Christians (Brahmabandhav Upadhyaya) to inculturate* their beliefs employing Hindu symbols and metaphors* and Hindus to become missionaries (Ramakrishna Mission) and more conscious of the relevance of Hinduism to all (Vivekananda), but some lament its overall lack of social spirituality. FRANCIS X. D’Sa, SJ

Hinduism and Christianity: Interreligious Dialogue. Raimon Panikkar’s work illustrates one of the possible relationships between Christianity and Hinduism: interreligious dialogue*. His contributions center on the theme of interculturality. His translation of the Vedic hymns made these Hindu texts intelligible to readers of other traditions. His interpretation of Indian myths* invites readers to discover the mystery* of reality that is cross-cultural. From Unknown Christ of Hinduism (1964) to The Fullness of Man, A Christophany (2006), Panikkar attempts to discover the Christic mystery hidden in Hinduism and elsewhere.

For Panikkar this is possible because reality is trinitarian. This awareness shapes the primordial form of human consciousness; every culture has envisioned reality in terms of three primordial worlds: the world of gods, that of humans, and the material world; heaven, earth, and the underworld; sky, earth, and in between; a transcendent aspect, a noetic factor, and an empirical element. Reality is characterized by interrelations and in this interrelationship one observes a trinitarian principle. "Every real existence is a unique knot in this threefold net." The root cause of present-day malaise is the fragmentation of reality into the dichotomy between spirit and matter, science* and religion*, reason* and revelation*, and, above all, God, world, and human beings. This truncated outlook manifests itself in such problems as colonization, consumerism, ecological imbalance, religious persecution, and economic and social injustices. Healing comes through the cosmotheandric vision – the vision of the interrelatedness of cosmos, human, and the divine.

For Panikkar, interreligious dialogue begins with a clear distinction between faith* and belief. Faith is not the monopoly of believers; it is the constitutive dimension of every human being. Beliefs are shaped by cultures, and yet they have a constitutive claim to transcend those very cultures. The ideal aspired to by interreligious dialogue* is to foster communication between diverse religious traditions – and first, for him, between Hinduism and Christianity – in order to bridge the gulf of mutual ignorance, in order for each tradition to speak the other's mythical language while sharing the other's faith experience. This ideal may be reached at certain moments, but it does not imply a reduction of rich religious experience into a single system. ANAND AMALADASS

Hindu Scriptures and the Bible. "Bible*" refers to the written narrative of the Judeo-Christian revelation* (Vatican* II). It begins with the creation of the world and culminates in Jesus* and his movement and leads to a new heaven* and a new earth (new* creation). The expression "Hindu scriptures" (a misnomer employed mostly by Christians) refers generally to authoritative (pramanam) oral traditions like the Vedas, and the Agamas of the Shaivas, the Samhitas of the Vaishnavas, and the Tantras of the Shaktas. Their common concern is liberation from samsara, the world of rebirth.

"Bible as God's written word" (Scripture*) and Shruti (listening to the eternally revealing Veda) of the Hindus are specific designations that refer to their historical and transhistorical belief worlds. The personal character of biblical religion has often been argued by Christians to be the one true understanding of the Divine (Martin Kähler) and is sometimes used indirectly as an argument against religions like Hinduism (de Nobili*).

In contrast the eternal Veda excludes human and divine authorship (apaurusheya) and consequently is free of error (Mimamsa, Vedanta). But the "theistic" non-Vedic Pancaratra tradition (Yamuna) attributes the exclusion of error to Vishnu's omniscience*. Others believe that Vishnu is only the revealer, not the source of the revelation (Nyaya). The authority of the Veda with respect to the non-Vedic traditions has not remained unchallenged.

At home in a culture of reading, writing, analyzing, objectifying, and interpreting (biblical hermeneutics*), the Bible (the OT and NT) is believed to be God's Word* in human language. To understand the Bible, one has to be aware of the literary genres it employs to tell the story of salvation*. Its purpose is to make us familiar with the way God works in history and particularly in Jesus of Nazareth. Jesus' story, the centerpiece of the Christian Bible, highlights the presence of God in the neighbor and illustrates and actualizes love of God in and through love* of the neighbor (as Soares-Prabhu repeatedly emphasized). Jesus' total self-emptying (kenosis*) enabled him to be filled with the Spirit. It is this Spirit that renews the face of the earth (Ps 104:30) and will ultimately lead to a new heaven and a new earth (Rev 21:1–27).

Revelation in the Hindu world has generally to do with a culture of hearing and listening (shruti), and meditating on and discerning the forces that have introduced a state of blindness (moha) into the world (as explained in the Upanishads). These make us see that the world is a projection of our desires and dislikes, which renders us incapable of perceiving the world as it is. The dynamic of desire holds us captive to the inexorable world of karma and rebirth (as explained in the Bhagavadgita). Awareness of the active effects of desire* leads to moksha, liberation from the process of rebirth. To come to such awareness, the Hindu traditions have proposed different paths (margas), like meditation (shankara), loving devotion for Vishnu, and detached engagement in the world (Bal Gangadhar Tilak, Gandhi). Still others (including the Hindu teacher and Vaishnava monk A. C. Bhaktivedanta, founder of the International Society of Krishna Consciousness) advocate the recitation of names of the Divine (mantra) to obtain release from samsara.

As Soares-Prabhu stresses while interpreting Scripture* with the poor, the Bible places stress on love and service of the neighbor; this brings one in touch with the Christ who is present in all persons, especially the needy (Matt 25:31–46). Human persons constitute the center of biblical concern because they are the primary locus of God's presence in the world.

The different Hindu revelatory traditions concentrate on liberation from the inexorability of rebirth. This is their common goal. Thus the only content of Hindu revelation refers to escape from samsara, the cycle of rebirth. Interestingly, however, Hindus at the grassroots level are speaking today of the whole world as God's family, which perhaps goes back to the all-embracing theophany in the 12th chapter of the Bhagavadgita.

Hippolytus (c170–c236), a major theologian of the early-3rd-c. Roman Church, heard by Origen* when he visited Rome (c212), and the probable author of a major work against heresies*. He opposed the view of the Trinity* presented by Sabellius*, as well as the popes Zephyrinus and Callistus, as too monarchian*. After 217 he became the "anti-pope" against Callistus and his successors. During the persecution under Maximinus, he and the pope Pontianus were exiled to Sardinia; apparently they reconciled before being martyred. A statue of Hippolytus was discovered in Rome in 1551; on its base is a list of many of his works, including the Apostolic* Tradition, an early church* order.

Historiography of Early Christianity as Developed in the 19th and 20th Centuries. Historiography is "the study of the study of history," i.e. the study of approaches and methods used in the historical discipline, and of the assumptions and theories of historians across time. "History" here does not mean "what happened in the past," but refers to a discipline of the modern academy.

Whether history became an academic subject before the development of the 19th-c. Western research university has been debated. Before that, history was usually considered a branch of "letters." Nineteenth-century German scholars such as Leopold von Ranke altered this approach: the historian was to locate primary source documents pertinent to the period and subject being studied and offer a factual and unbiased presentation based on these sources. History was to be an objective "science*"; historians' accounts were to correspond to "what actually happened."

The historiography of early Christianity did not strictly follow this pattern of development. Patristics, the study of the early "church fathers" (2nd–6th c.), was considered a branch of theology. Although 19th-c. historians of Christianity learned to "go to the sources," many approached their subject with an apologetic and polemical aim, often related to their denominational affiliations. In countries where Protestantism dominated, patristics focused especially on Greek and Latin Christian writings of the first three (rather than later) centuries, which were deemed close to the source of Christian truth, the NT. Considerable confidence was placed in the accuracy and credibility of the fathers' accounts of early Christian history and theology.

Augustus Neander, professor of church history at Berlin (mid-19th c.), is often considered the "father" of the modern study of church history. Neander, who saw the providential hand of God directing the course of Christian history, praised the benefits that Roman Catholicism brought to late antiquity and the Middle Ages – an emphasis considered too "Romanizing" for many North American Protestants. Ferdinand Christian Baur* and the Tübingen school developed a historiography marked both by critical historical studies and by Hegel's perspective.

Some decades later, Harnack's* studies of early Christian history and literature were instrumental in the development of patristics as a scholarly discipline.

An issue of paramount importance in the creation of the field was the editing and publication of primary source patristic texts, and in this enterprise, scholars from across Europe took part. France led the way with editions by Benedictine monks (from the 17th c.) and by J.-P. Migne*, the editor of Patrologia Latina and Patrologia Graeca. Italian scholar Giovanni Battista de Rossi's research on Roman catacombs and inscriptions greatly advanced knowledge of early Christian material culture and practice. In England the Oxford* Movement and the reactions to it spurred scholarship on the church fathers. English translations of patristic texts were offered in the Ante-Nicene Christian Library, a series begun by two Scotsmen (1864). Later in the 19th c., a Swiss-born professor in the USA, Philip Schaff, organized the Nicene and Post-Nicene Series. The late 19th to 20th c. saw the founding of Corpus Christianorum Series Latina and Series Graeca, then of Texte und Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der althristlichen Literatur, Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, and Sources Chr tiennes. Writings by fathers in Coptic*, Syriac*, Armenian*, and other "Oriental" languages of their churches – increasingly deemed important – were published in the Corpus Scriptorum Christianorum Orientalium and the Patrologia Orientalis.

The study of early Christianity moved beyond its primary home in seminaries into humanities departments in secular colleges and universities (middle to late 20th c.). In tandem with the development of the field of "late antiquity" within history departments, patristics acquired a new name, "late ancient (or "antique") Christianity." Now, social history approaches abounded, as evidenced in research on women*, asceticism*, law*, slavery*, writing, the family*, children*, and so-called heresy* (the latter of which was much stimulated by the finding of the Nag* Hammadi documents). Social-science* disciplines (especially anthropology) provided "mental tools" quite different from the theological approaches that had dominated traditional patristics. In the English-speaking world, Peter Brown pioneered the introduction of anthropology to studies of late ancient Christianity.

In the early 21st c., social history and social science methods were joined by new approaches stimulated by literary studies and critical theory.

History was now understood to be an analysis of the processes of representation. Sharp criticism was leveled at earlier assumptions regarding the "transparent" nature of texts and "authorial intention." The interest in discourse, power, texts, and language fostered by semiotic* theory seemed well suited to the rhetorical and ideological* nature of much patristic writing. How these newer emphases will meld with more established approaches, theological as well as social historical and social scientific, remains an issue for scholarly debate in the 21st c.

ELIZABETH A. CLARK

History, Concepts of. In The City of God, Augustine* warned Christians against the cyclical concept of history among the Greeks, insisting that the straight line was the path to salvation*. The cyclical view was characteristic of Greek philosophy after Plato, who located perfection outside time and portrayed the visible world as "a moving image of eternity" (Timaeus 37). Stoics believed in periodic conflagrations of the world, after which everything takes place again. Yet Greco-Roman historical writing was generally informed by a "linear" conception; the past furnished exempla, because human nature was held to be consistent (Thucydides 1.22.4; Tacitus, Hist. 4.74). Yet the point of Augustine's warning was not merely to contrast cyclical and linear time, but to present the past as a series of supernatural transactions manifesting God's anger* or wrath and forgiveness* (see Penance and Forgiveness), culminating in the end of history – history as a process of redemption* inherited from Judaism, rooted in the covenant* and in apocalypticism*.

Luke's* history of his people written for non-Christian Gentile readers (Luke and Acts) was a novel amalgam of Greek and Jewish concepts. As Luke 1:1–4 reveals, the author adopted the double criterion on which Greek historical writing was founded: a choice determined by the intrinsic value of events and the best information available. An elaborate sixfold synchronism (Luke 3:1–2) bridges the stories of different nations. The lives of Jesus and his apostles furnish exempla (Acts 10:38). The aim of Luke and Acts – to ensure that nothing about Jesus and his followers escaped the notice of Roman readers (Acts 26:26) – is consistent with the compendious perspective made possible by Roman hegemony. Yet as the continuation of a narrative from Adam (Luke 3:38), Luke and Acts perpetuate the Jewish notion of history as a series of interventions by God in the created world.

Ecclesiastical history, the invention of Eusebius*, is founded on a dichotomous concept: history divided in two by the Incarnation*. The Christian nation was born in heaven, “with the first dispensation concerning the Christ himself,” yet appeared on earth in the time of Augustus (Eccl. Hist. 1.1.8). Although Eusebius took models from the histories of the philosophic schools and Josephus’s* apology for Judaism, his account of the struggle of the church against “heresy*” and persecution was a departure from classical canons. The chronographers of late antiquity and the Middle Ages incorporated mundane events into the Eusebian framework of providential history.

The modern Western concept of history as an immanent and autonomous process in chronological time is part of the non-Christian heritage, even if philosophers of history, such as Hegel*, posit an absolute spirit realizing itself in the dialectic of world history. Against the outlook of historicism (Ranke), Walter Benjamin revives an apocalyptic* concept of history as “a configuration pregnant with tension” in the revolutionary fight for the oppressed. See also TIME.

LAURENCE L. WELBORN

History, Theological Concepts of. History is a theological concept because Christians believe in the incarnate* presence of God in history. The emergence of Western historical consciousness and critical methods for the study of history (historiography*) raised a twofold question for theologians in Western Europe and North America: How does God act in history? Can evidence of God’s presence be acquired from historical knowledge? H. Richard Niebuhr’s* typology of relations between Christ and culture* works well for the relations between God and history.

1. God against history is the type of mutual and total opposition that is evident in apocalyptic* and sectarian views which anticipate the imminent end of history and regard history itself as fallen, corrupt, and passing away. God acts only to end history, and knowledge of God is strictly supernatural, based on miraculous disclosures.
2. God above history is the view of mainstream Catholic theology. Augustine* posited two cities, heavenly and earthly, in which Christians live. World history transpires in the earthly city, while the city of God is the realm of eternal salvation*. The cities are not disconnected, and a hierarchical synthesis forms between them. God acts in the historical realm, but principally to judge and confute worldly designs.

3. God of history is a view that espouses an organic relationship between God and history. God is the immanent power or spirit of history, moving the historical process and manifesting God-self in it. Here the concept of God* is itself historicized, and God can be known from an understanding of the depth and purposes of history. Hegel* is the preeminent exemplar of this type with his image of the divine idea as a weft that drives across the warp of human passions, weaving the fabric of world history.
4. God and history in paradox represents a form of dualism, in contrast to the separatism of God “against history”, the synthetic view of God “above history,” and the holism of the “God of history.” This is the view of the Protestant Reformation, especially of Luther. Christians are subject to the tension of obedience to two authorities or kingdoms, which do not agree and cannot be synthesized but must be accepted. The relationship between God and history is paradoxical and cannot be fully understood.
5. God the transformer of history is a modification of the third and fourth types. Against the third type, it expresses a stronger differentiation between God and history. Against the fourth type, it emphasizes the transformative activity of God in history; it recognizes history to be a realm of tragic conflict in which good can be brought out of evil; and it asserts that historical knowledge can serve as corroboration but not as source of faith. This type is associated with some forms of Protestant liberalism*.

History of World Christianity: A Survey. Christian history began with a small group of Jewish followers of Jesus* of Nazareth. He was a Galilean who had been crucified under Roman rule. His followers, however, claimed he was the Messiah* whom God had raised from the dead. From Jerusalem they spread the message to surrounding cities. Soon Gentiles were admitted to the group without being required to keep Jewish Law. Drawn from various urban classes, these early Christians gathered in house* churches. They shared the teachings of the apostles*, practiced baptism* and the Eucharist* (Lord's* Supper, Communion*), and experienced charismatic* gifts. As the movement began to accommodate itself to its surrounding social world, it modified its earlier egalitarian tendencies. The social inversion implied by the message of the crucified Christ nevertheless provided a permanent source of internal prophetic* critique.

By the 3rd c., Christian communities were scattered from India* to Iberia (Spain*), with their greatest concentration in the Mediterranean world. Opposition from the Roman government was local at first, and always sporadic; and when it did occur, martyrdom* helped spread the faith*. Within the movement, a variety of interpretations and teachings emerged. One of the most important parties, that of the Gnostics*, taught that Christ had brought secret teachings for an elite body of believers. Responding to them, another group of writers whom later generations deemed to be orthodox gave lasting shape to the contours of Christian doctrine.

The 4th c. brought political establishment. The first kingdom to do so was Armenia*. More important for the history of Christianity worldwide was the conversion of the Roman emperor Constantine*. His new capital, Constantinople, became the center of a grand Christian political experiment. Establishment within the Empire took another half-century to complete. With it came the persecution of Jews in the Roman world (see Judaism and Christianity Cluster). Christians in the Persian Empire, on the other hand, suffered the consequences of Roman establishment as their Sassanid rulers began to persecute them.

Organized monasticism* arose in the deserts of Egypt* in the 4th c. and quickly spread to every region of the Christian world. Monasticism's ascetic* practices continued the spiritual tradition of martyrdom. Its structures provided a vehicle for the leadership of women and an effective missionary force for the spread of Christian faith, especially through the practice of hospitality*.

New disputes, such as the one between Donatists* and Catholics in North Africa, challenged the unity of the church. The most important of these was the Arian* controversy, which led Constantine to call the Council of Nicaea* (325). Nicaea's creed eventually became the trinitarian standard for Christian faith. Arian missionaries meanwhile took their form of Christianity across Rome's northern borders, where it found a reception among Germanic tribes (see Goths; Lombards; Vandals). At about the same time, the kingdom of Ethiopia* formally embraced Christian faith.

The 5th c. was one of christological controversies as competing schools argued over the precise relationship between Christ's human and divine natures (see Christologies Cluster). The Council of Chalcedon* (451) provided a definition that became the standard of orthodoxy in Constantinople and Rome. A dissenting party, called Nestorian* by its detractors, eventually found a home in the Persian Empire in the Assyrian* Church. In Egypt*, Ethiopia, Nubia, Armenia*, and Western Syria* another group of non-Chalcedonian Miaphysite* churches, labeled Monophysite* by their detractors, emerged.

Pressure from immigrating Arian Christian Germanic tribes (5th c.) resulted in the breakdown of imperial control over the western regions of the Roman Empire (including Spain, Italy*, and North Africa). The conversion of the Arian Franks to the Catholic faith (late 5th c.) opened a new chapter in Christian history there. In the eastern Mediterranean, Roman civilization continued in its Greek form. Growing cultural and theological differences between Latin and Greek traditions began to strain relations between the pope* in Rome and the ecumenical* patriarch in Constantinople.

In the 7th c., from Arabia came the Prophet Muhammad, whose teachings became the basis for Islam*. Followers of Islam rapidly conquered Syria, Palestine, Egypt*, Persia, North Africa, and Spain*. Within a century, approximately half of the Christians of the world were under Muslim rule as religious minorities. Farther east, Assyrian* Christian missionaries along the Silk Road found a reception in imperial China* (mid-7th c.). Christian sutras and a variety of liturgical texts were produced in Chinese. A small community lasted several centuries before withering away.

Several thousand miles away, the Franks were the dominant political force in the region now known as Europe. Their greatest ruler was Charlemagne*, whom the pope crowned as a new Roman emperor in 800. The Franks sought to impose the Christian faith on their neighbors, but the true task of conversion fell to wandering monastics who brought spirituality to the people.

Charlemagne's coronation was not well received in Constantinople, where Roman imperial rule continued unabated. The Iconoclast* controversy dominated the church there (resolved at Nicaea* II, the seventh ecumenical* council, 787). As in the West, monastic communities were the most important centers of spiritual life. From Constantinople, Christianity spread to the Bulgars*, Slavs, and Russians*. Meanwhile, in the West, the faith made its way north to Scandinavia* by the year 1000.

A series of reforms in the 11th c. significantly strengthened the office of the pope as relations with Constantinople further deteriorated. In Iberia Christian kings began a "reconquest" of Muslim lands. When Muslim rulers closed Jerusalem to Christian pilgrims*, the pope called for the Crusades* – holy wars – against Islam. For the next four centuries, Western Christendom* was on crusade. Muslims in Palestine and Iberia, Jews and other "heretics*" in the West, and Constantinople itself were all its targets. The Crusades failed in their primary goal to establish Latin rule in Palestine. They succeeded in taking Iberia (Spain and Portugal), severely weakened the Byzantine Empire, and opened up a new chapter on terror in the West through the office of the Inquisition*.

A host of new religious movements sprouted in the West during the 12th–14th c. Some were deemed by Rome to be heretical, but others, notably the Franciscans* and Dominicans*, gained official recognition as spiritual orders. Aided by a recovery of classical learning, in part through contact with Arabic learning from Spain, a new intellectual movement, Scholasticism*, took shape. Anselm*, Abelard*, Thomas Aquinas*, and Bonaventure* are just a few of the names associated with their endeavors.

In 1204 a crusading army from the West sacked Constantinople and installed a Latin king for several decades. The office of the ecumenical* patriarch was disrupted, leading indirectly to the formation of autocephalous* Orthodox* churches in the eastern Mediterranean world. Greek rule was eventually restored, but political and theological pressure from the Latin West continued to weaken the Eastern Christian city.

In the 13th c., the most decisive event in world political affairs was the rise of a Mongol ruler named Genghis Khan. His descendants established an empire that extended from the Pacific Ocean to Europe and included China, Central Asia, Persia, Russia, and Armenia. The first Mongol rulers were shamanists* who practiced a moderate degree of religious toleration. By the end of the 13th c., most had converted to Islam or Buddhism*, putting renewed pressure on Christians who lived within their territories.

In Egypt a new dynasty arose and brought about the end of the Christian kingdom of Nubia in the 13th c. Ethiopia* remained the lone Christian kingdom in Africa, and its churches found themselves facing new pressures from Islam. A revival of the Semitic roots of Ethiopian culture helped revitalize Ethiopian Christianity during this period.

Disruptions in the papal office and a time of competing claimants coincided with the growth of power of national kingdoms in the West. The kingdom of Muscovy emerged from under Mongol rule to carry Russian national aspirations forward. The Ottoman dynasty, in the meantime, had come to power in Asia Minor and in 1453 conquered Constantinople, bringing the Byzantine Empire to an end.

The 15th c. opened the history of the modern world. Portuguese and Spanish seafarers led the way in the violent conquest of the Americas, rapid expansion of the African slave* trade, and European colonial incursions into Asia (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). At the same time, the internal disintegration of Western Christendom* began. Humanists* led the way, undertaking a renaissance* in arts and letters. They were soon joined by church reformers*. While some remained under Rome, others, called Evangelicals* or Protestants*, separated. In England the crown took direct control of the church. New confessional state* churches emerged, e.g. in Germany*, Switzerland*, Holland (Netherlands*), and Scotland*. Throughout Europe radical communities of Anabaptists* separated from any civil government. The result was a century of warfare and religious strife.

In the Americas, the Spanish Conquest, coupled with the introduction of new diseases, was brutal. Christianity was forced on the native population, but indigenous expressions soon began to appear. African slaves also began embracing Christianity, often identifying traditional deities with Christian saints. In the Congo*, an independent African Christian kingdom arose, prefiguring forms of African Christianity that would later flourish. Farther east the Portuguese brought Catholic missionaries to India*, Japan*, China*, and Vietnam*. In China converts were initially allowed to maintain rites of ancestor* veneration, a practice Rome later forbade.

France*, Sweden*, Holland, and England (United* Kingdom of Great Britain) soon joined the colonial venture in North America. The English were the most successful, allowing religious dissenters such as Puritans* and Quakers* to undertake new settlements.

Protestant and Catholics alike sought to exert pressure on the office of the ecumenical patriarch in Istanbul, who was now appointed by the Ottoman rulers. Roman Catholic missions were active farther east in Syria, Ethiopia, and India, exerting pressure there on the indigenous Christian communities. Russia, too, felt the pressures from the West as churches left the Orthodox faith to enter communion with Rome. The 17th-c. schism between Old* Believers and the Russian Orthodox* Church resulted when reformers sought to introduce changes from within.

Western Europe was home to a 17th- to 18th-c. intellectual revolution that became known as the Enlightenment*. Supported by the gains of science* and the growth of rationalism* in philosophy, the Enlightenment attacked the authority of tradition* in all its forms. Against the power of church and state alike, it posed the rights of the individual "man of reason." The response from within the churches was varied, but in some places new enlightened forms of Christian belief began to emerge.

For Roman Catholics, spiritual life continued to be associated primarily with the various religious* orders. Within the state-sanctioned Protestant churches of the Continent, Pietists* began to organize collegia, or small groups, for prayer and spiritual renewal. Pietists were prominent among the first Protestant missionaries from the West to join Roman Catholics in Asia. Prominent preachers, most notably the Methodists*, stirred revival* in England, while in North America the Great* Awakening took place. The Awakening brought African slaves* into Protestant Christianity for the first time in the 18th c. Invisible institutions of slave religion emerged on plantations in the Southern USA, and independent African churches were formed in the North (see African American Cluster).

The War of Independence (1775–83), which resulted in the formation of the USA, and the French Revolution (from 1789) marked the birth of the modern nation-state. Political disestablishment was at the heart of the new political enterprise. Meanwhile, the industrial revolution was under way in Europe, fueling the growing economy* of global capitalism. In Europe, liberal democratic political ideals took hold among the middle classes (from the early 19th c.). Socialism and more radical communistic ideas spread (later 19th c.; see Marxism and Christianity). Historical* criticism was embraced in the universities and brought to bear on biblical studies (see Bible Interpretation Cluster, Introductory Entry), while the advances of science* forced a fundamental rethinking of basic cosmology.

Criticism of a different sort brought an end to the African slave trade that had provided forced labor for agricultural production in the Americas. Abolitionism involved Europeans and Africans alike in its efforts. The revolutionary spirit of the age fought about political independence and the abolition of slavery in Latin America as well (see Mission Cluster: And Anti-slavery; Slavery and the Church in Brazil; Slavery and the Church in North America; Slavery and the Church through the Centuries). The Catholic Church, which had been closely connected with the colonial regimes there, initially suffered a considerable loss of influence. It was soon able to reforge its alliances with the new leadership, however, and continued its dominant religious role on the Latin American continent.

Revivalism*, romanticism*, transcendentalism*, and social* reform all characterized the 19th-c. US religious context. The new nation was Protestant in character. As it expanded westward, it annexed half of the territory of Mexico and continued warfare against Native Americans. A bloody civil war tore apart the nation (mid-19th c.) and led to the emancipation of people of African descent. Within a decade, a new system of racial terror emerged in the South. Immigration reshaped the ethnic and religious character of northern urban areas as they underwent rapid industrialization (late 19th c.).

The 18th- to 19th-c. European colonial enterprise grew, opening the door to Western missionaries throughout Asia and Africa (see Colonialism and Imperialism and Christian Theology). A number of new Protestant missionary societies were organized (early 19th c.) as part of what soon became the largest missionary movement in history (see Mission Cluster). European warships forced imperial China to open its doors to foreigners (mid-19th c.). European powers formally divided all of Africa into colonial territories (Berlin* Conference, 1884–85). These were viewed by many in the West as providential acts, paving the way for further missions. From Russia, Orthodox missionaries traveled east into Siberia and Alaska. Many of these missionaries did succeed in planting Christian churches in new territories. As they did, however, the importance of older confessional identities, marked as they were by national and historical factors of their land of origin, declined.

The 20th c. saw the rapid growth of anticolonial and postcolonial* forms of Christianity under successive generations of indigenous leadership in Asia, Africa, and Latin America. European civilization meanwhile tore itself apart through two world wars, then fell into a cold war that placed the entire planet under the shadow of nuclear annihilation. By the end of the century, a new global network of Islamic militants, employing the methods of terrorism and fueled by anti-Western sentiments, dominated the global political scene. This was a century of great death and destruction. Human beings died in the gas chambers of Auschwitz and in the killing fields of Cambodia. It was also a century of great scientific and technological advance. Human beings walked on the moon and were tied together through a global system called the Internet.

The Christian vocabulary expanded significantly in the 20th c. to include the ecumenical* movement, Pentecostalism*, African* Instituted Churches, fundamentalism*, Vatican* II, the Charismatic* Movement, and Liberation* theology. Interfaith dialogue* joined conversion* and church planting as forms of mission*, while many churches opened the ranks of leadership to women*. Perhaps the most important historical event of the 20th c., however, was the shift in the center of world Christianity. After more than a millennium of Christian culture and 500 years of dominating world Christianity, Europe underwent rapid secularization* to become a post-Christian* continent. Meanwhile, Christianity registered enormous growth in Asia and Africa, joining Latin America to create a new global Christian majority. Two thousand years after that small band of Jewish disciples first appeared to spread the news of Jesus, Christians now number between 1.5 and 2.1 billion persons with churches found in every continent.

History of Christianity in Africa

Christianity in Egypt and the Maghreb.

When the Pan-African Liberian Edward Wilmot Blyden visited Egypt in 1866, the experience transformed his life's journey. He was deeply impressed by the creativity and achievements of his ancestors and determined to encourage Africans to recover the glory of their heritage. Skeptics, unwilling to accept that the early church fathers were Africans, questioned whether Egypt was actually an African country and utilized the alleged curse of Ham* to ignore the Kushites, Nubians, Abyssinians, and Africans south of the Sahara desert. Admittedly, Africa is a medley of ancient cultures: Nilotic, Berber, Numidian, Nubian, East African Negroid, and remnants of marauding groups – Punics, Romans, diasporic Jews, and others. But from the earliest stories in the Bible, through the Prophets, the childhood of Jesus, and the ministry of the early apostles, Africans featured prominently; Jacob, Jesus, and apostles took refuge during various periods in Africa. The internal history of the Coptic* Orthodox Church reclaims this past: when the center of gravity of Christianity shifted from Palestine to the Greco-Roman world, Africa was central to the development of early Christianity; according to tradition, the apostle Mark, whose parents were from Cyrene, was the first abuna (bishop) of the Coptic Church and was martyred in the cosmopolitan city of Alexandria. Indeed, Africa produced much of the patristic literature that shaped the dogma. The school in Alexandria* set forth the methods of text examination, exegesis, and philosophical language under Pantaneus (2nd c.; the first head of the catechetical school in Alexandria, according to Eusebius*) and Clement* that became normative. Christianity has a longer history in Africa than in the northern globe.

Early African Christianity at first benefited from association with Judaism, the only licita religio, and the Septuagint*, the Greek translation of the OT by Jews in Alexandria. Christianity followed the inculturating* pathway of the indigenous religious worldview that already affirmed resurrection*, life after death*, salvation*, miracles*, and divine kinship. Its strength, however, lay in its intellectual vitality; the Alexandrian school provided both the apologetics for this persecuted minority and a consolidation of the doctrine, polity*, liturgy, and ethics of Christianity in its formative period, when very diverse texts competed for authority before the canon* of Scriptures* was established.

From Egypt, Christianity spread to Libya and "North Africa," Tunisia, and Algeria (known at that time as Africa, Carthage, and Numidia) along the Mediterranean breadbasket of the Roman Empire (see the present cluster: In Africa: North Africa).

African intellectuals dominated the effort to establish the new Christianity. Origen* was invited by the teachers of Caesarea; Diocletian invited Lactantius* to teach literature in his palace at Bithynia, just as Augustine* was invited to teach in Milan. Africans pioneered Conciliarist* and ecumenical traditions and won the ears of the Syriac*, Cappadocian*, and Greco-Roman teachers during the synodal debates that raged throughout the Roman Empire. The avid debater Tertullian* represents another tendency in African Christianity, namely charismatic* spirituality. Martyrdom strengthened the appeal of the spiritual route and linked it to the search for identity and national resistance. The eremitic* tradition flowered. Pachomius* and his tradition of sacrificial, radical discipleship* and daily ordering of life constitute the root of many Western traditions, especially the Benedictine*. Similarly, Optatus* shaped Western penitential practice.

Translation of the Scriptures into indigenous languages followed apace as the movement expanded; growth was often illustrated by the number of bishops at synods, the intellectual achievements of Augustine* of Hippo, and the endurance of persecutions reflected in vigorous diatribes against traditores who betrayed their faith. Stories of faithfulness during persecution, like that of Perpetua* and Felicitas, represented a new development, noble women opening their homes to protect poorer sisters (the origin of nunneries). Tertullian's Ad uxorem exemplifies the internal dynamics of Christians' care for one another, evangelistic ardor, construction of community, and spiritual devotion. This was a vibrant age of Christianity in North Africa until the end of Constantine's* rule and was prolonged by a more subdued Christianity under the rule of the Arian Christian Vandals* (429–534).

By 500, there were c8 million (M) Christians in Northern Africa, but only 5 M by 1000, 2.5 M by 1200, and 1.5 M by 1500 – a decline that was caused by multiple factors (see the present cluster: In Africa: North Africa).

Origins of Nubian and Ethiopian Christianity. The relationship between Egypt and Nubia (farther south) was cultural, commercial, and religious. The ancient Nubian kingdom of Meroe was linked to Christianity through the Ethiopian eunuch (Acts 8:26–40), traditionally known as Judich, the treasurer of the candace (queen) of Meroe. Formal Christianity was established in the 5th c. in the three Nubian kingdoms: from north to south along the Nile river, Nobatia (Nobatae), Makuria (Maqurrah), and Alwa (Alodia). The Byzantine emperor Justinian* sent a pro-Chalcedonian* mission led by Longinus (543), but his queen, Theodora*, outwitted him with a Miaphysite* mission led by Julian that arrived first in Nobatia. Longinus arrived in Alwa. When the three kingdoms united for security and political reasons, Nubia witnessed a Christian revival evident in the conversion of pagan temples into Christian worship places, royal patronage, and the erection of cathedrals and monastic* houses.

Earlier, two young Syrians, Frumentius* (c300–c380) and his friend Aedesius, were brought as slaves to the Aksum court (Ethiopian highlands), where Frumentius became the tutor of the young king Ezana and persuaded him to convert to Christianity (see Ethiopia). Frumentius, later trained in Alexandria, was ordained as the first abuna in Ethiopia. He brought some of the ancient documents from Alexandria before the Arabs burned the city's large library. Ethiopian Christianity revolved around the king, the abuna, and the heads of the oldest monastic houses. It had strong Hebraic roots, a tradition of icons*, and crosses, a lively liturgical tradition that increasingly absorbed elements of indigenous culture, numerous monasteries, and a wealth of legends, including one concerning the Ark of the Covenant that the son of the queen of Sheba had duplicitously brought from Jerusalem.

The Christian presence up the Nile continued to be important until the 14th c. in Nubia and much later in Ethiopia.

Early African Christianity and Islam, 7th–15th Centuries. The decline of Christianity in Northern Africa points to the insurgence of Islam* in the 7th-c. Maghreb. It is surmised that Christianity had shallow roots or was emasculated by philosophical, doctrinal debates and the tax burdens of the dysfunctional Byzantine emperors. Muslims with their military strategy, horsemanship, and ascetic discipline appeared to be liberators. Yet a closer look indicates that there was a measure of resistance, possibly because the Arabs avoided mixing with the local infidel population, squabbled among themselves, and delegated the mundane task of governance to the bishops and local authorities. The process of Islamization came later amid the hybridization of Islamic identity; Muslims outlawed proselytization and used marriage as an instrument of increasing their numbers. Thus the Christian population was reduced through emigration, incorporation, forced conversion, and cultural exchanges. Still, Christianity consolidated itself in rural Coptic* villages, becoming a marker of national identity, and started a slow decline from the 13th c. in Nubia. Ethiopia was saved from the Islamic pressure by its reconnection with European Christianity in the 15th c. By that time, Ahmad Gran (the left-handed Arab) had seized the region that is now Eritrea.

Iberian Catholicism and Africa, 15th–17th Centuries. Islam also presented challenges to Europe. Islam controlled the breadbasket of Southern Europe and the Levant route to the sources of spices in the Far East. The Muslims established a lucrative trade in salt from the Saharan oasis Taghaza and the trans-Saharan gold trade in the Futa-Jallon basin. They developed an intellectual center in Timbuktu (also known as Tombouktu), the first university in Africa; its huge library collections are currently being edited and indexed.

Challenges elicit responses. Europeans first responded with futile crusades. By the 15th c., Spain* and Portugal* united in the reconquista project. The Portuguese prince Henry the Navigator (1394–1460) experimented with new sails, astrolabe, compass, keel, and many naval projects and finally recaptured Ceuta (North Africa, 1415). By 1460 Prince Henry's captains had reached Sierra* Leone in search of an alternative sea route to the trans-Saharan gold and spices of the Far East. The Portuguese crown secured the monopoly of each new territory with papal bulls and the Padroado* agreements that left evangelization and Christian activities under the control of the Portuguese crown. Christianization was articulated as a motive in this predominantly commercial enterprise, along with the hope of reconnecting with the mythical empire of Prester* John. But the Portuguese cautiously stayed on the islands and forayed only a few miles from the coast into a few places, such as the Gold Coast. The Cape* Verde Islands became a little Portugal, while São Thomé served as a major refueling depot. Only in the Kongo-Soyo kingdoms (Angola*) did they establish a significant Christian community. A court alliance bound the monarchy and the elite into a ceremonial Roman Catholic spirituality and immersed the Catholic Church in political intrigues and the slave* trade. In the 17th c., an African girl who belonged to a ngunza prophetic cult claimed to be possessed by the spirit of St. Antony* and to have received a message to mobilize the Christians to stop the violent civil warfare. The Roman Catholics hanged this patron of popular Catholicism as a heretic*.

When the Portuguese made incursions into Zimbabwe*, the conversion of the king and queen of the Mutapa kingdom was short-lived. They later encountered the Oman Arabs on the islands of the Indian Ocean and the coast of Eastern Africa, and established themselves in Zanzibar, Malindi, and Sofola, where they crossed to India, Sumatra, and Java (mid-1600s). The shoestring empire yielded spices, gold, slaves, and few Christians. Various approved religious orders made evangelistic efforts. Records indicate the ordination of a number of indigenous priests, mostly mulatto sons of traders, domestic servants, and assistants.

Evangelization also occurred in Dahomey (now Benin*) and Nigeria* (17th c.) when the Portuguese made incursions into the Benin and Warri kingdoms from Cape* Verde. The kings were hosts to the church and school, and the Portuguese exchanged guns for pepper. In Warri the olu (king) sent his son to study in Portugal. He ascended to the throne but was quickly dethroned, because the Portuguese abandoned the treaties and purchased pepper from India. The oba (king) of Benin deported the priests. Commercial enterprise was more important than Christian evangelization. The Portuguese celebrated by striking a gold coin named the cruzado.

Chaplaincy and Christian Presence in the 17th and 18th Centuries. Other European countries joined the lucrative venture: Spain disengaged from the united monarchy and competed with Portugal. Spaniards, the seafaring Danes and Dutch, who provided the transport haulage, then the French and English seized portions of the Portuguese African shoestring empire. The slave trade dominated and stifled evangelization as prospective converts were enslaved. By the late 17th c., there were 21 slave-trade forts on the West African coast alone. Some appointed chaplains. Many did not. The chaplains were ridiculed and paid in trade goods. The Danes and Dutch trained some Africans in Europe and brought them back as chaplains, among them Philip Quaque, Jacob Capitein, Christian Protten, Frederick Svane, and Anton Amo. Each failed out of frustration. Amo became a prominent philosopher and professor in Europe.

Abolitionism and Evangelical Revival. As the slave trade stifled evangelization, abolitionism* was the engine of the Evangelical revival. Whether as a result of conscience, economic calculation, or humanistic philanthropy (the influential abolitionist Clapham* sect of Evangelical Anglicans exemplified this ambivalence), the evangelization of Africa became a solution. There were many stakeholders: African Americans adopted a number of strategies that included the option to redeem mother Africa through Christianity; diasporic Africans such as Equiano wrote moving reminiscences of enslavement that stirred consciences; and liberated slaves like Paul Cuffee invested resources in establishing a commercial relationship with Africa and in mobilizing abolitionist groups on both sides of the Atlantic. Quakers* invested in abolitionist organizations. The American Revolution yielded enough liberated slaves to create a climate that resulted in the 1807 abolition of slave trade in the British Empire. The British philanthropist and politician Fowell

Buxton suggested in his Africa Slave Trade and Its Remedy (1839) a combination of treaties with chiefs, legitimate trade in raw materials that could feed British industries, and Christianization as a civilizing agent.

These political, economic, and religious projects catalyzed geographical explorations and the experimental colony of freed slaves in Freetown, Sierra* Leone. When the experiment almost collapsed in 1792, the British shipped African Americans from Nova Scotia to the rescue. Some were Baptist and Methodist, and many had imbibed the New Light Charismatic* Movement. They forged a new Christian spirit and nurtured those who were freed by British squadrons from slave ships on the West African coast. The Holy Ghost Fathers played the same role on the East African coast. Many of these freed slaves returned later to evangelize their native countries.

The enlarged missionary enterprise in the 19th c. changed the face of Christianity in Africa with respect to the number of men and women missionaries and associations, their strategies and foci, resources, and the areas covered (see Berlin Conference). The voluntarist principle sidestepped denominational obstructions, ensured mass support and funding, and enhanced evangelical zeal. Translation* of the Bible into the vernacular, education* programs, charitable institutions, and the recruitment of indigenous personnel combined to engage African responses. By 1914 Christianity had invaded the hinterlands of many African countries. The expansion was uneven, depending on the colonizing nation, accessibility to water and rail transport, and rivalry among missionaries. Education* was the most successful instrument of evangelization.

African responses to missionary and colonial structures took three forms: loyalty, voice, and exit. The educated elite created a movement, Ethiopianism, that sought to rebuild African identity through religion and championed the idea that Africans should evangelize Africa. They gave voice to African discontent and contested the Western monopoly on church doctrine and cultural expression. Some made an exit to found native African churches (based on indigenous forms of African* Religion). Prophets emerged all over the continent, emphasizing the resonance between indigenous worldviews and the charismatic* dimensions of the gospel. Some emerged from within indigenous African Religion; others had had previous contact with Christianity.

From World Wars to Decolonization.

What characterized African Christianity during that period included the disruption of missionary structures, increased space for indigenous agency, the consolidation of Christianity during the inter-war years, an increase in the number of Christians through indigenous adjustment to the colonial situation, the multiplication of African* Instituted Churches, known as “Zions” in Southern Africa, aladura (prayer people) in Western Africa, and abaroho in Eastern Africa. Emphasis on prayer and the inculturation* of indigenous ingredients into doctrine, polity, liturgy, and ethics created a new Christianity that would merge with nationalist struggles for decolonization after 1945 when war-weary Europeans reassessed the cost of colonization. Churches fought against colonization by developing state theology, indigenization projects that included native leadership (theological education and the ordination of Africans), liturgical renewal following Vatican* II, engagement with freedom fighters, and ecumenical* ventures such as church union projects. But these initiatives were attacked from three directions. (1) From the inside, the educated elite rejected limited indigenization, called for a moratorium, and started the African theology project. (2) Revivals* broke out in secondary schools and universities among students who later founded Pentecostal* or charismatic* ministries. (3) From the outside, the cultural nationalists in the new states attacked Christianity. The pace of decolonization of African churches intensified. By 1975, when the World* Council of Churches met in Nairobi, it was obvious that the church in Africa had come of age. Since then, the growth of Christianity with charismatic Pentecostalism at the cutting edge has remained unstoppable. The denominational churches are now charismatized*. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: IN AFRICA; CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN AFRICA; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN AFRICA (various entries); ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN AFRICA.

OGBU U. KALU

History of Christianity in Africa: North Africa.

Christianity first entered Africa in Egypt and spread to Libya (see the present cluster: In Africa). The Gospel of Mark* and Acts* mention, in particular, the presence of disciples coming from the town of Cyrene (Mark 15:21; Acts 2:10, 11:20). The history of Christianity in Western North Africa (modern Tunisia, Algeria, and Morocco) can be divided into three chapters: (1) the expansion and disappearance of a Latin church (2nd–12th c.); (2) a period dominated by captives, slaves, and merchants (12th–19th c.); and (3) colonial times and their aftermath.

The Expansion and Disappearance of a Latin Church (2nd–12th Centuries). Christianity arrived in North Africa first on the coast and later inland with traders and settlers from all regions of the Mediterranean world. Historical documents show that Christian communities had been formed by the end of the 1st c. Soon, every small city shaped its organization around a bishop and his clergy. By 250 CE, regional councils drew 100 bishops. Around 350 there were twice that number. In 411 a council drew 470 bishops, and 50 years later, c700.

This expansion took place despite the many periods of persecution* in the 2nd and 3rd c., during which many Africans gave their lives for their faith. Numerous accounts of their martyrdom* are extant, and some of these martyrs are still venerated by the Roman Catholic Church, e.g. Felicitas and Perpetua* (d203) and Cyprian* (d258).

Among all the figures of the North African Church, special mention should be made of Tertullian* (155–240). Born in Carthage, he was one of the key witnesses of that period and the author of many works written in defense of the faith. He is known as well for his radicalism in matters of morals and his negative views of women. Cyprian*, bishop of Carthage, was viewed by the other bishops as their leader. He regularly called regional councils, which gave a sense of unity to this growing church. Between two bouts of persecution, he encountered a problem that was later to divide the church: the reconciliation of apostates.

The greatest figure of the North African Church remains Augustine* (354–430), who lived during the period after the Roman persecutions had ended with Constantine's* Edict of Milan (313). This return of peace brought about a new period of expansion for the church, but also triggered a split. The quarrel occurred over the reintegration of those Christians who had denied their faith at the time of persecution. Some wanted the church to be rather lenient, while others rejected the lapsed and even doubted the validity of sacraments* conferred by clerics who had fallen and been reconciled. The latter were led by Donatus, their bishop in Carthage, who gave his name to the rigorist group: the Donatists*.

As time went on, the church split into two groups, with two bishops and two clergies in most cities, and violence erupted again and again. In some cases, religious difference was reinforced by social troubles between rich and poor. Elected bishop of Hippo in 397, Augustine led the opposition to the Donatists through teaching, preaching, debates, and councils.

Another danger was already threatening this divided Roman Catholic Church: the Vandals*, a Christian Arian* people from Germany who invaded North Africa. Their kingdom with Carthage as its capital (in modern Tunisia) lasted from 428 to 534. In the name of their Arian beliefs (asserting with the moderate Arians that the Son is "like" [homoios] the Father, but denying that the Son has the same essence as the Father, as the Nicene* doctrine of the Trinity* does), they persecuted Catholic Christians: most of the bishops were deposed or expelled and replaced by Arian bishops. Many Catholic faithful were killed or tortured; their church leaders took refuge in Europe; others were deported and sold into slavery to the Moors (as they would come to be known).

It fell to the Byzantine emperor Justinian* to put an end to the Vandal occupation in 534, at least in a large part of North Africa. Under the rule of Justinian, who cultivated the Chalcedonians of the Eastern churches and the rapprochement with the West, the Roman Catholic Church enjoyed another period of peace, which could not conceal, however, that its strength was no longer what it had been.

This decline became evident when the Arabs arrived and, in spite of strenuous Roman or Berber resistance, launched successive expeditions to conquer North Africa from 647 to 705. The military victory of the Muslim armies did not mean the end of the Christian presence in North Africa. As in the East, Islamic* rule meant that non-Muslims – Jews and Christians – were relegated to dhimmi status (lit. "protected" people, because they are "people of the Book," Ahl al-Kitab), which entailed the payment of a head tax and the acceptance of an inferior position in social and political life.

Suddenly, the links between Europe, Rome in particular, and North African Christians were severed. From 650 onward, written sources, formerly abundant, become scarce, almost nonexistent. People and land were now integrated into a new world, that of the nascent Islamic Empire in the East. Yet one finds signs of a Christian presence far into the 11th c. Repeatedly, Arab geographers spoke of whole regions and villages peopled by Christians. Apparently these communities were left to fend for themselves. Many, clergy included, fled to Europe. The new rulers recruited many Berbers for their armies, requiring them to convert to Islam before enlistment. In cities and villages, Christians went on as before, speaking Latin, tilling the land, or trading, taking care of those churches that they were able to maintain. Rome noted that the number of bishops had dramatically fallen (there were fewer than five in 1053) and some priests were sent to the pope to be ordained as bishops in the 1070s.

New developments hastened the disappearance of Christianity. Around 1050 the arrival of nomadic peoples from Arabia destroyed the old farming system, bringing insecurity to the countryside and ruin to the cities. Muslim religious leaders had often expressed anti-Christian feelings, while rulers and common people seemed to favor peaceful coexistence. The final blow came c1150 when the Almohads, a group of Islamic zealots, took power in Morocco, conquered North Africa and Spain, and in present-day Tunisia, forced Jews and Christians to embrace Islam or be killed.

Christianity did not disappear, purely and simply, on account of persecution. The Christian Church, in fact, was weaker than Eastern Christianity in Egypt for various reasons. Local culture had never been given the chance to give birth to a "native liturgy." Internal strife had weakened its energy. It was a church present in cities, but without surviving monasteries (monks in Eastern North Africa preserved Christian identity in their monasteries, which provided needed theologians and bishops). Moreover, under the Vandals and the Byzantines, and finally at the time of the Arab conquest, clergy and laity fled to Europe in great numbers.

Christians as Captives, Slaves, and Merchants (12th–19th Centuries). The native Christian presence that had faded away was replaced by the Christianity of foreigners in North Africa: trade went on between the northern and southern shores of the Mediterranean Sea. In most harbors, Christian traders from Italy, Spain, France, and Portugal took advantage of commercial treaties between European powers and North African rulers and lived in the cities. At times a priest came with them, officially accepted as their chaplain.

Muslim rulers sometimes felt the need to enlist Christian European troops to ensure their personal security. They came as a body, led by noblemen from Europe and an occasional priest.

Most of the Christian presence, however, consisted of slaves* and captives. Privateers attacked merchant ships of European countries or raided European shores, bringing back with them thousands of captives. They were usually treated harshly. Many were harassed until they turned Muslim. Christian religious, especially Franciscans*, came to ransom them, if they could, or give them spiritual or physical comfort in their trials. Christianity and Islam were not religions in dialogue, but warring empires. Religious conversion meant an act of treason against one's own people.

Colonial Times and Their Aftermath.

With the conquest of Algeria by France (from 1830) and the establishment of protectorates over Tunisia (1881) and Morocco (1912), thousands of people of the Christian tradition came to live in these countries, where the bulk of the population was Muslim. The Christian presence was a simple extension of European Christianity. The Muslim and Christian communities met not on religious grounds, but on the political and social levels, where suspicion, then opposition and downright hostility, led to riots, war, and finally independence (Morocco and Tunisia, 1956; Algeria, 1962). Most of the Christians left with their clergy.

Roman Catholic leaders (Cardinal Duval, other bishops, as well as a number of priests and men and women religious*) stayed on. A new spirit developed between members of that tiny community. They did not conceive of their presence as a means to gain converts and establish a large native church. They felt called to bear witness to God's unconditional love toward all peoples. This love could be expressed by selfless service toward these new nations and their people. As time went on, that attitude brought about a change of atmosphere: friendship began to displace enmity.

When Algeria entered a near civil war in 1992, moderate people suffered at the hands of radical groups. Tens of thousands of persons were killed. Christians remained to offer what help they could, unwilling to desert their friends in time of danger. Nineteen of them – bishop, monks, religious, and nuns – were killed. Even though some Muslims embraced Christianity, most Christians in North Africa are still of foreign origin. Their aim is to be recognized as a "church of non-Christians."

History of Christianity in Asia. There are at least two approaches to understanding the history of Christianity in Asia: an expansionist and a postcolonial* approach. The expansionist approach reflects a West-centered understanding of Christianity. It was written in the West from the perspective of churches in Europe and North America whose missionaries sought to expand the churches' influence to the southern continents with royal or state blessings (see Mission Cluster: In Asia). By contrast, the postcolonial approach reflects a historical consciousness that arose primarily in the 20th c. among peoples of colonized regions who determined to rewrite history from the perspective of the "young churches" and who wanted to elucidate how Christianity is grounded in the history of the new Asian nations. While both approaches are political and, to a large degree, mutually exclusive in principle, when read critically together, they contribute to a rich understanding of Christianity as a whole in Asia.

A major expansion of Christianity took place in the colonial era (16th–early 20th c.). It started as a competition for resources and overseas influence between Spain and Portugal (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). Other European countries, Britain, France, and Germany, filled the gap as soon as Spain and Portugal retreated. The US historian Kenneth Scott Latourette describes the 1800–1914 period as the "Great Century" when Christianity expanded extensively into Asia (and Africa), with missionaries from Europe and North America setting up numerous missionary stations and later "young churches." Stories of "success" have been recorded in massive missionary journals and correspondence, which speak of the steady increase in the number of churches and converts in the Philippines*, India*, China*, Southeast Asia, Indochina, and the South Pacific Islands and Australia*, where colonial conquest took hold. In the cases of some "tribal*" and rural areas of North India, the borderland between Southern China and Indochina, including Northern Thailand*, Laos*, Cambodia*, Myanmar*, and the mountain ranges in Taiwan*, entire villages were converted to Christianity and remained Christian thereafter. In the cities, education, medicine, and charity services became the chief means by which Christian missions won over the hearts and souls of "heathen" people.

Many missionaries of the time carried out their work with a heavy imperialistic impulse (see Mission Cluster: And Imperialism). Their task was to save the wrecked souls* of the evil-driven colonies through the conversion* of "uncivilized pagans" to the one true religion, Christianity, and to the superior science and values of the culture* and civilization of the West. Missionary boards presupposed that their role was to preach "the Truth" and to assume political control and governance. It was therefore not a coincidence that the relations between the missionary churches of the West and the young churches in Asia were structured exactly like the relations between the home colonial bureaucracy in Western nations and the government in Asian colonies. Many missionaries enjoyed the privilege of extraterritorial protection and special access to colonialist facilities similar to that of colonial officers. The organic relationship between Christianity and Western colonial powers placed the churches of Asia in the position of being firmly identified with foreign domination and added a subtle weight to the colonial constitution of Christianity in Asia.

Nevertheless, many missionaries played a dual role in the various colonies. In some remote areas in the mountains or poor inlands, missionaries were reported to have often suffered from tremendous health problems and endured much cultural isolation as they dedicated themselves to education* and medical work with the "natives." In the cities, some missionaries frequently sent critical comments to their countries, denouncing the cruel exploitation of the "natives" by settlers and colonial offices. In some cases, utilizing the authority of their respective missionary boards, they actually influenced local colonial legislation, e.g. against women and child abuse in such cases as sati and the prostitution of girls in India and foot-binding and the slavery of girls in China. Missionaries were also pioneers in the education of girls and the training of women as teachers and nurses in colonized territories. Confronted by the tragedies they saw on the front line, some missionaries were among the few voices of conscience opposing, e.g., the opium trade in China. Thus even from the perspective of Western expansion, it appears that Christianity advanced in Asia from the 16th c. because it was driven both by imperialistic and economic forces and by the humanistic instincts of concerned missionaries.

The 1910 World* Missionary Conference in Edinburgh* was one of the first occasions when Asian Christians consciously articulated their regional identities and resisted continuous control by their founding churches in the West. National consciousness in Asian countries grew tremendously between the two world wars and was heightened with the successive independence of Asian nations after World War II until the 1970s. Since the 1950s, Asian historians such as K. M. Panikkar have raised serious questions regarding the political, economic, and cultural domination of the West, and Asian theologians such as D. T. Niles*, M. M. Thomas*, Masao Takenaka, and K. H. Ting have called for indigenous churches and the development of Asian theology in order to rid Christianity of any remaining imperialistic tinge. The subsequent establishment of regional ecumenical structures such as the Asian Office of the World* Student Christian Federation, the Christian* Conference of Asia (originally the East Asian Christian Conference), and the Asian Alliance of YMCAs* set the stage for a new Asian Christian self-understanding.

It is not uncommon today to read the history of Christianity not only as an eastward movement but also as a westward one. Christianity did not originate from the West, as came to be assumed in the 20th c. Its origin was actually in Asia, given that some of the first church centers, in Bethlehem, Jerusalem, Antioch*, and Armenia*, were geographically located in Western Asia. Early Christian communities were established outside the Roman Empire starting in the 1st c. long before the Western imperialist era. Assyrian* Christians (commonly but inappropriately called Nestorians*, to refer to the early Asian Christian communities) expanded extensively in the East between the 1st and 10th c. Probably the oldest and one of the strongest traditions in the history of Christianity in Asia is the alleged mission of Thomas* the Apostle, who not long after Jesus Christ's resurrection, brought the gospel to India*. A Christian in Edessa*, on the bank of Euphrates River (see Iraq) between Roman Asia and Persia (see Iran*), wrote a lively account called the Acts* of Thomas, a 3rd-c. popular apocryphal text that has survived as the oldest account of a church in Asia beyond the Roman Empire. Despite its partially legendary status, the tradition of the "apostle to the East" provides clear testimony to the spread of Christianity in Asia outside the Roman Empire and east of the Euphrates long before the regional name of Asia came to be used. In sum, from the 1st c., Christianity stretched from West Asia (the ancient Near East) along the Old Silk Road through Persia to China* and along the water routes from Mesopotamia and Arabia to India* and Sri* Lanka; it was adapted in a variety of ways by these cultures over the centuries.

This recent "recovery" of the Asian origin and Asian tradition of Christianity represents a postcolonial politics of resistance to the continued imperial legacy of the West. A strong sense of Asian identity emerged as an outcome of the extensive Western conquest of land and peoples starting in the 16th c.; a strong quest for an Asian Christianity followed. A rewriting of history attempts to incorporate the rise and fall of Christianity into the history of the vast continent that came to be known as Asia. Over against the Imperial West, this recovered history aims to minimize the influence of Western churches in the development of churches, beliefs, and faith practices in the formerly colonized territories. Internally at the high time of nationalistic movement around Asia after WWII, this recovered history corresponds to the quest of Asian Christians for autonomous and independent identities and their will to contribute to the national reconstruction of the newly independent nations. Thus, reclaiming Christianity as a cultural and religious tradition deeply rooted in Asian history and soil serves both external and internal purposes.

Since the 1950s, Christianity in Asia has proceeded in three main directions: (1) the development of structural and financial independence; (2) a theological movement toward indigenization and contextualization; (3) continued expansion through mission and evangelism of developing countries and interior areas.

Development of Structural and Financial Independence. The formerly “young churches” gradually sought independence from their European and North American mother churches along with the political independence of their respective countries. Some of the most notable examples were the united church movement in India* and China*, which involved, in particular, the Church of South* India, the Church of North* India, the Church of Christ in China (Hong Kong District after 1953), and the United Church of Christ in Japan*. Despite political controversies, the postdenominational Three*-Self Patriotic Movement of Chinese Protestants and Catholics has continued to uphold the three principles of self-governance, self-support, and self-propagation. All these churches represent efforts to seek structural and financial independence, and autonomy from outside clergy; they shun overseas influence. Nevertheless, despite local leadership and functioning with local resources, few of these churches have cut themselves off from the tutelage of their mother churches in the West. In many cases, doctrinal and theological positions of the early church fathers and the medieval churches of Europe are still considered the ultimate reference for Christian orthodoxy.

A Theological Movement toward Indigenization and Contextualization was called for in Asia and quietly took place in various parts of the continent, such as India and China, as early as the 1920s. This theological movement started as a response by early Asian Christian intellectuals to the national movements. They took part in the drastic 20th-c. social transformation in Asia and contributed to the theological articulation of a liberating social role of Christianity in decolonization. By setting up national and regional ecumenical councils, these Asian Christian intellectuals drew theological reflection from the processes of nationalism, social revolution, Marxist revolution, and democratic governance. In turn, various attempts were made by local indigenous movements to accommodate Christianity and vernacular cultures. Because of the early theologians’ dedication (from the 1920s), much creative Asian theological thought emerged, which laid the ground for the ongoing development of a movement of Asian Christianity.

Although primarily a theological movement, the movement of Asian Christianity defined much of what we understand by Christianity in Asia today. Through various ecumenical vehicles, such as the World* Student Christian Federation (Asia-Pacific), the Christian Conference of Asia, the Association of Theological Education in Southeast Asia, the North Asia Association of Theological Schools, the Board of Theological Education of the Senate of Serampore College, the Programme for Theology and Cultures in Asia, and the Asian* Women’s Resource Centre for Theology and Culture (see Theological Education Cluster: In Asia), clergy and laypeople joined together in a contextual theological movement and contributed enormously to the identity of an Asian church and its sociopolitical relevance to the postcolonial reconstruction of Christianity in the midst of multiple and sometimes conflicting Asian cultural and religious traditions.

Continued Expansion through Mission and Evangelism. Both Protestant and Catholic churches are actively pursuing mission and evangelism. Nineteenth-century US revivalism* was translated into strong and persistent evangelical movements throughout Asia, taking hold of many free, independent* churches, such as the evangelistic Baptist Alliance and the Christian and Missionary Alliance in Asia. Facilitated by networks such as the World Evangelical Alliance, members of these churches seek to evangelize all Asian natives despite a hostile political atmosphere and an economically deprived environment. Following in the footsteps of European and American missionaries of earlier centuries, some of these evangelical preachers worked on “the frontiers,” in poor villages and remote inland areas, for the conversion of estranged souls. Most recently, newly industrialized countries, including South Korea* and Taiwan*, as well as Hong* Kong, have begun to send missionaries to inner China, “tribal*” areas of Thailand* and Myanmar*, and newly reopened developing countries such as Cambodia* and Vietnam* for long- and short-term Evangelical missions. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS: IN ASIA; CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN ASIA; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN ASIA; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN ASIA. WONG WAI CHING (ANGELA)

History of Christianity in Europe: The Balkans. On the Balkan Peninsula, Eastern* and Western* Christianity interacted intensely in the aftermath of the 4th c., when the Eastern Roman Empire, or the Byzantine* Empire, was established in that part of the world. The arrival of Muslims (14th–15th c.) and Jews (16th c.) added to the region’s religious and cultural heterogeneity (see Islam and Christianity Cluster: In Europe: Southeast Europe).

South Slavs who settled in the Balkans (6th and 7th c.) were eventually Christianized by the Byzantines (9th c.). Particularly important in this process was the missionary work of Cyril* and Methodius (later declared the “apostles of the Slavs”) and their disciples. Cyril created a Slavonic alphabet and translated the Gospels and church service books from Greek into church Slavonic. This allowed for both the development of a Slavonic–Byzantine culture and the formation of autonomous churches by the South Slavs. Bulgarians* succeeded in establishing an independent, autocephalous* patriarchate (10th c.), and Serbs followed suit (14th c.).

The gradual cultural and political estrangement between the Byzantine world and the Latin world, coupled with ecclesiastical and theological disputes (specifically on the issues of the Filioque, papal claims, and the use in the Eucharist of leavened bread by the Greeks and unleavened by the Latins) culminated in the Great* Schism (1054). The rift between the two great churches was deepened by the Crusades*, and particularly by the conquest and pillage of Constantinople (1204) during the Fourth Crusade. Attempts at securing reunion between the Christian East and West in the 13th and 15th c. were short-lived. The Ottomans conquered the Balkan Peninsula (late 14th to early 15th c.).

Under the Ottoman Empire, the region was administratively organized in the “*millet system,” whereby membership in a “nation” was determined by religious affiliation. At the top was the Muslim millet, whose members enjoyed religious, political, and administrative privileges. Christians and Jews under Islam were second-class citizens, yet they enjoyed protections and special rights; they were dhimmi (protected) as “people of the Book” (Ahl al-Kitab). The Orthodox millet, headed by the patriarch of Constantinople, was higher in the hierarchy than the “Armenian*” millet, which included all Christian churches (including non-Chalcedonian* Oriental* Orthodox churches) that did not recognize the authority of the ecumenical* patriarch of Constantinople. “Jews” formed a millet of their own. The Ottomans treated the patriarch of Constantinople as the head of all Orthodox Christians in their dominions. By the mid-18th c., the churches of Serbia* and Bulgaria* had lost their independence and were directly under the Ecumenical Patriarchate.

The close link between church and nation in the Balkans became a key component of the nation-building projects that appeared with the rise of nationalism (from the late 18th c.). The struggle for national liberation was thus intertwined with a struggle for ecclesiastical independence. Throughout the 19th c., a number of national churches emerged – the Church of Greece*, the Church of Serbia, the Church of Bulgaria*, and the Church of Romania* – in a process parallel to the emergence of these independent nation-states.

Churches and various religious communities suffered oppression under the atheistic* Communist regimes established throughout the Balkans after World War II. The end of the cold* war was marked by the return of religion to the public square. Because of the multiple transitions undergone by post-Communist societies, and particularly with regard to the violent dissolution of the Yugoslav Federation into new nation-states, the Balkans experienced a new instrumentalization of religious identities for various nationalist projects as well as inter- and intrareligious tensions related to the newly emerging religious identity politics. See also ALBANIA; BOSNIA-HERZEGOVINA; BULGARIA; CROATIA; GREECE; MACEDONIA; ROMANIA; SLOVENIA; YUGOSLAVIA.

History of Christianity in Europe: Eastern Europe.

The area south of the Danube lay within the Roman Empire and was Christianized from the 2nd c. Incursions of Goths* and Slavs interrupted the process, but missionaries, including Ulfila*, the “apostle of the Goths,” who introduced Arian* Christianity to them before they moved to North Africa and Western Europe (c364–378), as well as Cyril* and Methodius, the “apostles of the Slavs,” from Byzantium (Constantinople), brought Eastern Orthodox Christianity beyond the Danube basin to the Czech*, Slovak* and Polish* lands (end of the 9th c.), where Catholic Frankish and German missionaries were also active. Russia* was Christianized by missionaries from Byzantium (10th c.); the Baltic States by missionaries from Poland and Germany (from the 12th c.).

The emerging states in Central Europe and the Balkans eventually had to choose between Rome and Constantinople, and the divisions became permanent in 1054 (the Great* Schism). To this day, a “fault line” in Eastern Europe separates the Catholic/Protestant and Orthodox worlds.

Several territories bordering or straddling the fault line are of mixed faith (Albania*, Bosnia*, Hungary*/Transylvania); farther north, particularly where the Catholic* Renewal (Counter Reformation) was active (from the mid-16th c.), Eastern-Rite Catholicism was common (Ukraine*, Romania*/Transylvania). The Orthodox world had no experience of the Renaissance* and Reformation*, with the important exception of Ukraine.

When the Orthodox Balkans were under Ottoman (Muslim Turkish) rule (15th–19th c.), Christians were treated as second-class citizens. They were generally allowed to exist in peace, but their activities were limited: church building, monasticism, charity, and education were restricted; many parish clergy were illiterate; theology lost originality and vigor; and missionary activities ceased altogether. One of the main problems for the Balkan Slavs was Greek ecclesiastical control and “hellenization” of their churches. (see the present cluster: In Europe: The Balkans).

Meanwhile, Russia emerged from two centuries of Mongol rule and, after the fall of Byzantium to the Ottomans (1453), began to assert leadership in the Orthodox world. In the 17th c., Russia came back into contact with the rest of Europe. Then the partitions of Poland (late 18th c.) brought Orthodox Ukrainians and Belarusians*, as well as Roman Catholic Poles and Lithuanians*, under Russian rule. The Russian Orthodox Church remained under close state control but maintained a tradition of spirituality*, monasticism*, and missionary activity (to the north and east).

Centuries of confrontation with the Ottoman Empire had some important repercussions in the religious history of Western Europe. It enabled the Protestant princes of Germany to consolidate their political power after the Reformation while their potential Roman Catholic opponents were preoccupied with developments in the east. It also explains the tenacity of Reformed Protestantism in Hungary and Transylvania, in contrast to its eclipse farther north after the Catholic Renewal (from the Polish–Ukrainian ethnic boundary in the east to the German–Polish boundary in the west). In the south, the Catholic Renewal was delayed (until the late 17th c.) by the Ottoman occupation, which made political use of Protestantism as an anti-papal and anti-imperial force, thus allowing Protestantism to establish tenacious roots.

In Poland, Slovakia*, Slovenia*, Croatia*, and Lithuania, the historically close identification between the nation and the Catholic Church was consolidated. Thus Catholicism kept Polish national identity alive during the long periods when the country as a political entity disappeared from the map. In the Czech lands, Catholicism was challenged by Hussitism* (early 15th c.), one of the earliest European Protestant movements. Eastern Germany later became the heart of the Reformation.

Levels of religiosity came to vary widely in Eastern Europe. Poland and Slovakia were highly religious; the Czech Republic and East Germany were heavily secularized (the former partly as a result of the harsh Catholic reaction to the Hussite tradition during the Catholic Renewal).

The first Balkan peoples to gain their independence from the Ottomans were the Greeks (1821). The Serbs followed (1830). The Romanian lands, always semi-autonomous, remained so until 1877. Meanwhile, in 1860 the Bulgarian* Orthodox Church declared its autonomy before the Bulgarian state achieved independence, and the identification of Orthodox churches with particular nations (autocephaly*, phyletism*) became typical of Eastern Europe.

World War I brought about the collapse of four empires, the Russian, German, Austro-Hungarian, and Ottoman, and independence for nation-states that had been taking shape in Central and Eastern Europe.

Meanwhile, Communist control was consolidated in the Soviet Union. Efforts to eradicate religion in the 1930s gave way to uneasy coexistence after World War II and an ambiguous position for the Russian Orthodox* Church. Between 1945 and 1948, the Soviet authorities encouraged the Russian Orthodox Church to extend its authority over the Orthodox churches in the countries of Eastern Europe now under Soviet political control. Thus the Eastern-Rite Catholic Church of Western Ukraine was suppressed (1946) and declared aggregated to the Russian Orthodox Church. After 1948 church representatives regularly promoted the Soviet concept of "peace" in international gatherings. In 1961 the Russian Orthodox Church became a member of the World* Council of Churches; it could not have done so without the Soviet authorities' consent.

In the new nation-states of Central and Eastern Europe under the Soviet Union's control after World War II, Communist governments first attempted to severely restrict religious practice, closing places of worship, arresting and even murdering clergy and believers; later they attempted to co-opt the churches for political ends, even as they neutralized their capacity for independent witness. Constitutional guarantees of religious freedom were interpreted to extend only to the individual's right to believe and to worship.

In Eastern Europe, Communist policies and the churches' responses varied widely, in part owing to the relative strength of the churches within each country. Frequently, the churches found that a combination of "discretion" and "valor" enabled them to retain a visible presence in society. Besides Albania, where all religions were declared illegal (1967), Czechoslovakia saw the most sustained application of repressive policies. Yugoslavia was at the other extreme; from the mid-1960s, there was mutual tolerance and recognition between the Catholic Church and the state.

The national Orthodox churches proved least able to offer resistance to Communist policies, because their identification with a particular nation meant weaker ties with fellow believers abroad and because of the traditional Orthodox relationship with those holding political power. In Bulgaria the Communists brought church-state relationships to a logical conclusion. During the 1940s, the Orthodox Church was reduced by persecution and threats of withdrawal of state subsidy to a position of submission; then the state named it the "traditional church of the Bulgarian people" (1949). In Yugoslavia the Communist authorities viewed nationalism as the most dangerous dividing force in the country; thus they aimed at reducing the social influence of the Orthodox Church in Serbia and of the Catholic Church in Croatia.

The Catholic Church presented special problems because its administrative center was in the Vatican. Communist policies had the least success in countries with a Roman Catholic majority, as in Poland, where the Catholic Church retained far more authority and legitimacy than the government throughout the Communist period.

Communist policies also had limited success when applied to certain Protestant churches: the Protestant Church in East Germany succeeded in making its authentic voice heard on important social and political issues; in the Soviet Union, a significant section of the Baptist Church went underground and assumed the freedom of the outlaw.

Religion was just one of the factors involved in the end of Communism in Eastern Europe. It played its part in several interrelated ways. At the individual level, religious ideas in their broad sense helped to form an ethical alternative to the Communist system. At the social level, the churches were the only public institutions not initiated and organized by the Communist Party and thus proved a haven for alternatives to official activities. At the national level, the churches in several Eastern European countries helped preserve the identity of particular nations in the face of sovietization or its local equivalent, at a time (1970s–1980s) when nationalism was viewed as a vehicle for personal and communal freedom.

After the Communist system collapsed in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe (1989–91), the churches faced a range of opportunities, challenges, and problems. Great expectations were placed on the churches as vehicles for social and even political change, but they were hampered by shortages of resources, property, personnel, and experience. Moreover, they were often divided internally by disputes over their performance under Communist persecution. Authoritarianism had usually become a feature of church leadership under Communism: the leadership had tended toward doctrinal and liturgical conservatism in the face of the atheist challenge, reinforced by a lack of exposure to developments in the wider 20th-c. Christian world. Consequently, the challenges of the new pluralism* were particularly acute. The place of the churches in political debate was an open question (cf. Political Theology), although they were all by and large in favor of integration into the European Union; despite misgivings about Western secularism*, they saw no real political alternative. Meanwhile, the national churches raised their voices against proselytism* by the influx of missionaries from a range of Protestant and new religious movements; the international ecumenical movement faltered. Another problem was the identification of religion with interethnic conflict, particularly in the former Yugoslavia.

The general tendency in Eastern Europe after the end of Communism was a decline in religious practice. In 1999 surveys throughout the region showed an average 15% decline since 1991 (Poland remained an exception). During the Communist era, the phenomenon of “practicing non-believers” (persons attending church to demonstrate their disapproval of the official ideology*) had been common. When Communism came to an end, sociologists of religion increasingly wondered whether patterns of religious observance in Eastern and Western Europe would begin to resemble each other, with an increase in the East of “believing without belonging”: having religious faith without showing allegiance to any specific denomination.

History of Christianity in Europe: Western Europe. Western Europe includes some 17 countries and a small number of microstates (e.g. Vatican City and Monaco). The historic and contemporary Christian identities could be represented as follows: strongly Lutheran (Iceland, Norway*, Sweden*, Denmark*, Finland*), strongly Roman Catholic (Ireland*, Belgium*, Luxembourg*, Austria*, Portugal*, Spain*, Italy*), mixed Catholic and Protestant (Switzerland*, Germany*, Netherlands*), mixed Protestant with a Catholic minority (United* Kingdom), and historically Catholic but largely secular (France*).

Early European Christianity was basically Mediterranean, framed within the Roman Empire. The influence of the church in Rome grew not only because of the increasing number of Christians, but also because of the gradual acknowledgment of a single leader, the bishop of Rome, later also called pope*. Church organization was muted by religious persecutions* (especially in the late 3rd c.). The conversion of Emperor Constantine* (313) and the later acceptance of Christianity as a legal religion within the Roman Empire established a new foundation for advancement and also for the involvement of secular rulers in the affairs of the church.

In the 5th and 6th c., Germanic tribes (e.g. Arian* Christian Goths* and Lombards*, Catholic Franks) took over the western half of the Empire. The establishment of monastic* communities, most notably Benedictine*, sustained the worship, devotional, and intellectual life of the Latin Church and provided numerous missionaries to carry the Christian message to such distant lands as Britain, Ireland, and Germany. Meanwhile, successive bishops of Rome, especially Gregory* I (590–604), claimed authority over the Western Church and contested the positions and actions of the Eastern emperors. During the Middle Ages, this assertion of papal power, together with the parallel claim of authority over secular rulers, was supported by the “Donation* of Constantine,” a document that the 4th-c. emperor had presumably issued, giving all of this authority to the pope (although 15th-c. scholars showed the document to be an 8th-c. forgery).

In 800 the Frankish king Charles the Great (later conflated into “Charlemagne*”), who had significantly expanded his kingdom, met Pope Leo III in Rome. After Mass on Christmas Day, Leo placed a crown on Charles’s head and declared him to be emperor. However regarded at the time, this event was later seen as marking the beginning of the Holy* Roman Empire, separating itself from the East and bringing together political and religious authority over much of Western Europe. Never a unified territory, it gave special status to the person of the emperor, especially in encounters with the papacy. Eventually the position was determined by a vote of seven German “electors,” among whom were the archbishops of Mainz, Cologne, and Trier.

From the 10th through the 15th c., Christianity in Western Europe was shaped by several significant developments: the establishment of new religious orders (e.g. Carthusians*, Franciscans*); the increased presence of itinerant preachers, focusing especially on lay* devotion and local renewal; the emergence of popular movements that protested church doctrine or practice (led by, e.g., Valdès* in Italy, Wyclif* in England); theological debate over such issues as the Eucharist* and the work of Christ; ecclesiastical councils (e.g. Lateran* IV, 1215, and Constance*, 1414–18) that codified dogma and settled governance issues; the systematic consolidation of doctrine by Thomas Aquinas* and others; the encouragement of an interior piety through the writings of Eckhart* and Tauler* and the work of communities of the Devotio* Moderna; and the biblical and historical scholarship of Northern humanists, chiefly Erasmus* of Rotterdam, and the ensuing critiques of immoral clergy, lax bishops, overly scholastic theologians, and worldly religious orders.

The 16th-c. Protestant Reformation* resulted in the formal end of Christendom* in Western Europe, i.e. the sense of a single church integrally connected with the secular government. By the late 16th c. there were Lutheran churches (primarily in Northern Germany and the Scandinavian countries), Reformed churches (in Switzerland, France, Netherlands, Scotland, and the Rhineland area of Germany), Anabaptist churches (small pockets of resistance, chiefly in Southern Germany and the Netherlands, to these ecclesiastical options), and the Church of England (Anglican* Communion). Protestants (so named from the “protestation” of princes and cities at the Diet of Speyer, 1529, who objected to the imperial ban against Martin Luther*) differed from Catholics in appealing to the sole authority of Scripture*, declaring the central doctrine of the faith* to be justification* by grace through faith, and affirming two sacraments* (baptism* and the Lord's* Supper) instead of seven. The Reformed churches, originating out of Zwingli's* and Calvin's* reforming movements in Zurich and Geneva, respectively, came to be organized mainly by country. Each of the Protestant branches appealed to confessions written at crucial moments in the century: for Lutherans, the Augsburg* Confession (1530) and the collection called the Book of Concord* (1580); for the Reformed, several national documents (e.g. Scots, 1560; Heidelberg, 1563; Westminster, 1646); Anabaptists, the Schleithem Confession (1527); and for the Anglicans, the Thirty-nine* Articles (1571) (see Creeds, Symbols, and Confessions of Faith). Reformed churches differed from the Lutheran Church on several key questions, such as the understanding of the Lord's Supper and the presence of Christ; the interpretation of the Bible's direction regarding worship, the ministry, and church government; and resistance to idolatry (the list of the Ten* Commandments, in which Reformed include condemnation of graven images and Lutherans do not, is a small but significant sign of this difference). Anabaptists, despite considerable variety, differed from the other groups over the nature of baptism (believers, not infants, were to be baptized), over the relation of the church to the secular government (including the church as a voluntary community), and over the relation of grace to the sacraments. The Church of England, while basically a Reformed church in the 16th c., affirmed the monarch as "supreme governor," established the Book of Common* Prayer as the core of its worship, and acknowledged the historic episcopate as key to its connection to the early church. These particularities created their own internal conflict, leading to the emergence of more self-consciously Reformed communities later known as Presbyterian* and Congregationalist*.

Catholic activities in the 16th c., traditionally labeled "Counter Reformation," are now commonly termed Catholic* Renewal (or reformation). The Council of Trent* condemned Protestant positions, but also proposed significant reforms, such as forbidding absentee bishops and priests, expanding bishops' control over activities within their dioceses, and encouraging better training for priests. A number of new religious orders were founded for women (Ursulines, Discalced Carmelites*) and men (Theatines, Barnabites, Capuchins*); several combined a traditional contemplative* life with activities in the world. The Society of Jesus, or Jesuits*, approved by the pope in 1540, became the most successful of these new forms of religious life, both in the number of Jesuits and in the kind of work undertaken (as missionaries, teachers, advisers to royal courts).

The classic Christian conviction that there is one God and one truth led to the further convictions that there is only one true form of the Christian religion and that government should have an interest in supporting that religion, in order to avoid popular confusion, reduce occasions for conflict, and promote the good of society. This view, called "Constantinian," continued in Western Europe; virtually every country before the 19th c. had some form of religious establishment (see State Churches). That might take the form of government appointment of bishops, mandatory religious education in schools, public financial support through taxes or payment of clergy salaries, required church attendance, and the involvement of religious leaders in the government (one of the "estates" in France and Sweden; bishops of the Church of England were members of the House of Lords). In several countries, a sectarian or dissenting opposition to state churches also existed, e.g. Reformed communities in France, Pietist* movements in Norway and Sweden, and Nonconformists* and Catholics in Britain. The acceptance, not without struggle, of the principle of religious freedom, the removal of various political disabilities, and the disengagement of some governments from the church (sharply in France, gradually in Sweden) eventually changed dissenting communities into “free* churches.” Several of the continuing state churches have come to prefer the terms “national” or “folk*” churches, to illustrate cultural rather than political connections.

Despite the world wars, the Depression, the rise of totalitarian regimes, and the Holocaust*, several developments in the 20th c. have been notable for Christianity in Western Europe. The beginnings and growth of the ecumenical* movement have extended to the entire world, but European Protestants have played significant roles, from holding international conferences in Edinburgh* (World* Missionary Conference, 1910), Stockholm and Oxford (Life* and Work, 1925 and 1937), and Lausanne and Edinburgh (Faith* and Order, 1927 and 1937), to hosting the first meeting of the World* Council of Churches in Amsterdam (1948). European churches have continued to engage each other toward the end of overcoming historic conflicts and divisions, as demonstrated by the Leuenberg* Agreement (1973) between Lutheran, Reformed, and United churches; the Porvoo* Common Statement (1992) between British and Irish Anglican churches and Nordic and Baltic Lutheran churches; the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification* by the Lutheran World Federation and the Catholic Church (1999); and the dramatic way in which the Catholic Church encouraged religious dialogue through the documents of Vatican* II and the welcome offered to a number of ecumenical observers there.

Church leadership changed visibly in the second half of the 20th c. with the ordination of women to the ministry. Such change did not happen easily, and some opposition continues even in those churches that have permitted it. Some free churches (e.g. English Congregationalists*, 1917) were able to ordain women earlier than state churches because they faced fewer constitutional restraints. Wartime conditions created opportunities for the ordination of women because pastors were enlisted, but such opportunities tended to vanish after 1945. In state churches, the ordination of women usually followed official decisions by a year or two. Among the earliest churches to allow such ordination were the Evangelical Lutheran Church of Denmark (1947) and the Church of Sweden (1958); more recently, the Church of Finland (1986) and the Church of England (1992) have joined them. Pastorates for women in larger churches gradually became possible only after some years, and women were elected to episcopal office or its equivalent even later. Numbers alone reflect the most significant change; by 2000, one-quarter of the ministers of the Evangelical Church in Germany and more than 40% of those in the Church of Sweden were women. The Catholic Church has consistently opposed such ordinations, but some Catholic organizations have continued to advocate them, even though women ordained by retired bishops are immediately excommunicated (see Women’s Ordination Cluster).

Beginning around 1980, the topics receiving the most attention from commentators and the churches themselves were the dramatic decline in church attendance and the extent of religious belief, leading Grace Davie, e.g., to characterize the decline as “believing without belonging” and European Christianity as “the exceptional case” when compared with other regions of the world. “Secularization” (see Secularization and Desecularization in Europe and North America) is the umbrella term, having largely replaced the earlier and more aggressive “de-Christianization” (see Post-Christian Thought). While contested as a theory or as the master narrative, its causes, consequences, and implications have been widely explored. Factors as diverse as the Enlightenment*, revolutions that included the churches among its targets, urbanization and industrialization, the emergence of a vigorous anticlericalism*, the 19th-c. liberal spirit that was rejected for so long by the dominant churches, the challenge of socialism to working conditions and the class system, the gradual assumption by government of social functions such as education and public welfare that the church had performed for hundreds of years (see Laicization), the student protests of the 1960s, dramatic shifts in gender roles since then, and the persistence of privilege on the part of established churches themselves have all been cited as reasons for this decline. It has sharply changed the religious situation, not least by focusing on religion at the popular level (see Popular Christian Practices Cluster: Introductory Entry; Popular Christian Practices Cluster: In Western Europe). What does it mean for religious participation to occur at key points in life (birth, marriage, and death) but seldom at other times? If attendance is down, why are pilgrimages* to some 6,000 sacred sites and shrines in Western Europe more popular than ever? If belief, too, has declined, why are church taxes and other ways in which governments support religious expression financially not seriously protested? If regular worship life is broadly disdained, why has the Liturgical* Movement begun in the 1930s by European Catholic scholars been so influential among Protestant churches worldwide? Why is the Taizé* community attracting thousands of young people for retreats, with a worship style imitated around the world? Why did 2005 World Youth Day in Cologne, Germany, attract some 800,000 youth for Mass with Pope Benedict XVI? Why has a development like the Thomas* Mass (Helsinki, 1988), intended for doubters and seekers, been so successful, spreading throughout Northern Europe? And why has the Community of Sant' Egidio, begun in 1968 in Rome for disaffected youth and emphasizing solidarity with the poor, attracted followers around the world? In their collective ways, the realities and the conundrums of Christianity in Western Europe will ensure continued interest and attention for many years to come. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS: IN EUROPE; CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN EUROPE; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE; ROMAN CATHOLICISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE.

History of Christianity in Latin America and the Caribbean Islands. Following Columbus's expedition (1492), the "New World" became a disputed space and a missionary territory. European Christendom assumed a self-conscious position of global centrality (an ideological stance still active for many) that initiated "world Christianity" as a missionary enterprise of the "Latin Church" (Roman Catholic Church); hierarchical, clerical, and evangelical interests were interconnected in this missionary enterprise. Christianity in Latin America bridged the civilizations of both peoples indigenous to the Americas and Iberian (Spanish and Portuguese) peoples, who were in the process of transitioning from medieval feudalism* to the early modern consolidation of sovereignty in nation-states. This diversity was further complicated by the cultural contributions of African enslaved populations brought en masse to Latin America from the 16th to the mid-19th c. when other Europeans and Asians arrived with their own cultures and religious traditions. The militant Iberian Catholics encountered a mosaic of religious traditions rather than a single homogeneous "pagan" front, even though European ideologies subsumed all these cultural-religious identities under one homogeneous representation. The Spanish Conquest resulted in an ideological and cultural destruction of the Amerindians' past, which too often was also genocide (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions).

Two primary contrasting ideological trends informed the pastoral actions of the (Roman Catholic) Church in Latin America: conversion* by force and the foundation of an "Iglesia Indiana." The traumatic confrontation between the conquistadors and Amerindian peoples marked the religious history of the region. Evangelization took place in a context of violence; conversion by force was self-legitimated. Yet some missionary enterprises differentiated genuine evangelization from conquest, in two distinct ways: (1) the setting aside of territorial havens (the reductions*) from which civil and military Iberian authorities would be excluded and (2) direct ideological confrontation with traditional beliefs and practices and advocacy. Yet most Iberians failed to distinguish between their national identity and their Christian identity, between the interests of the monarchy and of the gospel, as they had on the Iberian Peninsula, despite the incisive appeals of priests (e.g. Bartolomé* de las Casas). Out of pastoral concern, such priests declared a prophetic partiality for the poor and against injustice, and advocated for the welfare of Amerindians by means of legal, anthropological, and theological arguments.

The 17th-Century Institutionalization of the Church. The Christian presence was the result of both the friars'* evangelization of "Indians" and the growing population of Iberian settlers. A stable ecclesial system with parishes and dioceses was necessary, along with religious* orders, including women's* religious orders, since women religious had multiple functions beyond the spiritual domain in the financial, social, and cultural spheres. The different ethnic and social strata – European and indigenous populations, as well as a large mestizo* population – developed distinctive ecclesial styles. In addition, alongside official Christendom, multiple popular* forms of Christianity ranged from European-like Marian devotions (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Devotion in Latin America) to indigenous kinds of Christianity that preserved full-fledged ancestor* veneration rituals and, in between these extremes, different levels of "syncretism"* or "inculturation*", an ever-present phenomenon. In some areas, such as Cuba* and the coast of Brazil*, the richest forms of syncretism or inculturation incorporate African rather than Amerindian components.

The 18th-Century Establishment of the Bourbon Dynasty in Spain brought profound changes in colonial policy, moving toward a greater centralization of power, denoting a shift from the corporate mentality to a modern perspective of individualism and rationalism. The Spanish crown attempted to abolish ecclesial practices not aligned with "regalism" (the king's perspectives and political goals). The starting point of these "enlightened reforms" was the expulsion of the Jesuits* by Charles III (1767), the weakening of religious orders, and the systematic subjection of the Roman Catholic Church to the authority of the state (see Church and State Relations Cluster: In Latin America). Social movements nourished by ideals spread by sectors of the Church resisted such reforms, which retrospectively can be seen as the prelude to the end of the Spanish Empire. Creoles and poor Europeans often joined revolts against the colonial system by indigenous and mestizo church members; members of wealthier classes and Church leaders, as well as most priests and members of religious orders, adopted ambivalent stances. But opposition to religious and political movements became progressively more visible. The viceroyalties of Peru*, New Granada, and River Plate (Argentina*) were shaken by the 1780s popular movements against the Bourbon reforms, progressively leading to the independence process (1810–30).

The 19th-Century Independence and Rule by Liberal States resulted from the disintegration of the Spanish Empire. Christ and Mary, along with Christian ethical notions, were invoked as liberating symbols. Still, some insurgents and their supporters were integrists*, conservative members of the Church and even of the clergy. Christians belonged to the different political factions; Creoles and lower clergy were usually more supportive of independence, whereas Spanish-born people and the Episcopate tended to be "regalist."

In the wake of the postcolonial period, the church endured a profound institutional crisis. The void left by the Patronato* Real called for the establishment of direct relations with Rome, but for decades, the papacy hesitated to recognize the sovereignty of the new republics. In the interim, many episcopal sees were vacant, seminaries empty, and men's religious orders depleted. The Divine Office* of the liturgy of the hours celebrated by women religious in their convents and family prayers kept religiosity alive.

The emancipation process transformed, but did not dissolve, the ties between the former colonies and Europe. British merchants replaced Spain's colonials, as a result of international events and the colonial societies' response to them. The social stratification remained unchanged; some “revolutionary” leaders, seeking a nationally controlled church under the banner of the new states, welcomed new colonial masters.

The Liberal reforms (1850–80) reopened the debates concerning church* and state relations and the role of clergy in education and in the welfare system. Religious reforms involved not only church and state separation, but also confiscation of the wealth of the Roman Catholic Church; the Church’s wealth, particularly land and urban properties, passed into lay hands. Convents, seminaries, and Catholic schools and universities were confiscated by the state. Priests, religious, and monastic orders practically disappeared and lost much of the wealth that gave them the capacity to carry out their social work and exert a social influence among the poor. Furthermore, the state often gained control over the Church, not only regarding political and economical issues, but also regarding liturgical and religious matters (as in Colombia*, 1853; Mexico*, 1857). Some leaders of these reforms were secular* modernists more or less opposed to Catholicism. Others were anticlerical, but profoundly attached to Christian religious signifiers. The institutional church struggled against liberalism and modernization. By 1900 the Catholic Church did not have legal status in nine countries in Latin America, and the states did not have diplomatic relations with the Vatican (only two had concordats*).

Because liberals favored the insertion of Protestantism*, it became viable in the region. Protestants founded schools, Bible societies, and missions. European migration, particularly to the Southern Cone (including Brazil), became another source of Protestant institutionalization, albeit along the lines of national churches with ethnic identities and enclaves. Proselytizing groups came from the USA to Central America, the Caribbean, Mexico, and the Andean region.

Church and State Reintegration and Rupture. The 1930s economic crisis made it clear that some traditional welfare functions of the Roman Catholic Church had not been successfully replaced by the state. Following the failure of liberal states, new political leaders sought a reconciliation with the Church in order to secure the masses’ support and delegated to the Church some welfare functions, including education, health care, the management of social organizations, and even civil registry in rural areas. As the Church regained relevance in the life of the nations, religious orders and the lay Catholic* Action, both with an overwhelming majority of women, attended to social needs and thus became protagonists in the process of church and state reintegration.

In the 1940s and 1950s, some Latin American bishops saw the importance of the Specialized Catholic* Action model and backed its development in Latin America. Following this model, many Catholics shifted their commitment from defending the Roman Catholic Church and the Christian faith from the dangers of modern secularism and secularization* to embracing a Christian vocation requiring concrete dedication to social justice* and liberation* of the poor*. This shift led to the pastoral renewal of the Church (second half of the 20th c.) and the formulation of Liberation* theologies. Following Catholic Action’s national and international experience of pastoral coordination, Dom Helder Camara* (Brazil*) and Dom Manuel Larraín (Chile*) proposed and led the foundation (Rio, 1955) of the Latin American Episcopal Conference (CELAM*) to coordinate Latin American pastoral action. In 1959 religious orders of men and women and their congregations formed in the same spirit the Latin American Religious’ Conference (CLAR). CELAM and CLAR prepared the continent to receive the Second Vatican* Council, publicizing its proposals and adapting them to Latin American realities. The second general conference of CELAM at Medellín* (1968) effectively responded to the renewal spirit of Vatican II and provided fresh insights into the mission of Christians in the concrete reality of Latin America. Pastoral priorities were redefined, with an emphasis on service and evangelization of the poor and marginalized groups, such as indigenous and black populations. Many religious, particularly women, relinquished their traditional settings in large convents and as administrators of large educational and health institutions at the service of the middle classes and established smaller communities in lower-class neighborhoods in order to work and live among the poor.

Following the Specialized Catholic Action organization and adopting its methodology, the pastoral initiative known as Base* Ecclesial Communities favored the role of laypeople and women religious as pastoral agents and sought to apply the gospel to people's struggles in their lives. Base Ecclesial Communities provided a new context for ecumenical* dialogue* and collaboration and, from a committed Christian perspective, further criticized the ills of Latin American societies' dependence on capitalism.

Women's religious orders, Catholic Action youth movements, and priests developed social activities, e.g. literacy campaigns, unions, cooperatives, social movements, and new political forces among blacks, indigenous peoples, women, and other people traditionally marginalized from social, political, and economic activities. A biblical movement with possibilities for a popular hermeneutics* also emerged (see Bible Interpretation Cluster: In Latin America). These lived experiences informed the critical discourse that came to be known as Liberation* theology.

In 1972 conservative bishops started to rule CELAM, led by Alfonso Lopez Trujillo. An ideological confrontation arose in the Roman Catholic Church during the cold war and the implementation of national security regimes.

The dispute within the Church included the internal persecution of the progressive Catholic wing. Christian leaders were also persecuted by the dictatorships in the name of national security in Brazil*, the Southern Cone (1960s–1970s), and Central America (1980s) and in the drug war in Colombia* and Mexico* (since the 1990s). Thousands of people were threatened, jailed, tortured, “disappeared,” or murdered. A large number of the victims were Catholic and Protestant Christians who, out of their faith commitments, struggled along with the poor and defended human* rights. The list of these thousands of martyrs is yet to be compiled systematically.

By the mid-20th c., many historical Protestant denominations had become largely autonomous, with Latin American leaders and vernacular identities and ecclesial styles. The Council of Latin American Churches was created in 1982. Ecumenical relations among Catholics and Protestants became significant after Vatican II, taking the form of diverse interdenominational collaboration and dialogue, particularly after the Medellín conference. Ecumenical dialogue has been almost nonexistent, however, with the fast-growing Pentecostal* and Charismatic* churches.

Under the papacy of John* Paul II (1978–2005), more conservative prelates replaced the bishops who led the implementation of Vatican II's reforms. Conservative movements such as Opus* Dei gained key positions of leadership. The laity favored the more spiritual Charismatic renewal movement within the Roman Catholic Church over the more socially laden Christian movements of the 1970s. In the meantime, a newer generation of Liberation theologians articulated fresh Christian reflections on gender, ethnicity, ecumenism*, and ecology*.

Some peoples of African and Amerindian descent have renounced the Christian components of their syncretistic* or inculturated traditions, seeking to rediscover their ancestral traditions afresh. A significant segment of Latin Americans, especially from the lower classes, have turned to Pentecostalism and the Charismatic Movement, especially as they are shaped by Latin American leaders and struggle to address social issues. Nevertheless, the 2000 census data indicate that, in several Latin American countries, an increasing number of people do not belong to any church. See also CHARISMATIC AND PENTECOSTAL MOVEMENTS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA; CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA; POVERTY CLUSTER: POVERTY, THEOLOGY, AND ETHICS: LATIN AMERICAN VIEWS; PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER:

History of Christianity in the Middle East: Syriac Christianity. Syriac Christianity is at the center of the history of Christianity in the Middle East. With its distinctive theological and liturgical views, Syriac Christianity was responsible for the initial spread of Christianity in the East (India*, China*) and the South (Ethiopia*). It endured in the Middle East through the centuries despite repeated political and religious turmoil.

The Aramaic language, spoken by the people of Syro-Mesopotamia for centuries before the Christian Era, was also the language of Jesus and his first followers. In its eastern dialect, called Syriac, it became the cultural vehicle of Christianity in that area. While several empires rose and fell, Christians continued to live, thrive, and develop theologically and culturally despite their minority status. Their descendants continue to practice their religion in traditional churches in their ancient homelands, which are identified on current political maps as Israel*/Palestine, Lebanon*, Jordan*, Syria*, Iraq*, Eastern Turkey*, and Iran*. Although Arabic gradually replaced Syriac as the vernacular in most places, Syriac has survived not only as a liturgical language but also as the spoken language in several villages in Turkey, Syria, Iraq, and Iran, and the classical language was revived in the 19th and 20th c.

An early tradition links a local king, Abgar*, with Jesus himself, the apostle Thomas*, and his disciple Addai* (Thaddeus). More certain evidence comes from the 2nd c., when Tatian* "the Assyrian" compiled his Diatessaron*, the first gospel harmony, and Bar Daisan* the "Aramean philosopher" taught in Edessa*. Mani* also taught in this region east of the Roman Empire in the Sasanian Persian Empire. The themes of these early sources include doctrinal diversity, hymnody*, and asceticism*.

Two major writers emerge in the 4th c.: Aphrahat* and Ephrem*. Both attest to an early form of asceticism unique to this branch of early Christianity: the "sons and daughters of the covenant." Each also shows a close relationship with the substantial Jewish communities of Mesopotamia (Babylonia). Ephrem, a Nicene-Orthodox poet and theologian, had a lasting impact on all later branches of this tradition.

The 5th-c. christological* controversies resulted in permanent divisions, since most Greek and Latin Christians endorsed the Council of Chalcedon* and Syriac Christians followed either the Council of Chalcedon (Melkites*, Maronites*) or the Antiochene* Christology of Nestorius* (the Assyrian Church, or Church* of the East) or the Miaphysite* Alexandrian Christology of Cyril* as interpreted according to the perspective represented later on by Severus* (of the Syriac* Orthodox Church).

Syriac versions of the Bible* (e.g. the Peshitta*, Harclean, and Philoxenian versions), of great interest to modern scholars of Scripture, also nurtured indigenous intellectual and spiritual traditions. Theodore bar Konai, Michael the Syrian, and Gregory Abu'l Farag (or Bar Hebraeus*), among others, produced scriptural commentaries, theological treatises, histories, and grammatical and philosophical writings in Syriac well into the Islamic* period. Mystical* traditions also flourished, most notably in Isaac of Nineveh.

Baptism and eucharistic worship are central to this tradition, whose members still celebrate these rites in forms established in the earliest centuries. The Anaphora* of Addai* and Mari, still used in the Assyrian Church, is both the oldest known eucharistic rite and the only one lacking words of institution. Syriac baptismal liturgies include anointings* both before and after baptism. Emphasis on the Holy* Spirit, Mary as Mother of God (in most Syriac churches), poetry, and hymnody – eventually accompanied by musical instruments – are central to the communal worship.

Having shared the Thomas tradition with Indian Christians from an early date, Syriac Christians have cultivated ties with Asia and Africa over the centuries. In 345 Thomas of Cana led a group of Assyrian Christians from Syro-Mesopotamia to India*, where their Knanaya Christian descendants still survive along with other Syriac-tradition Christians in Kerala*. The Sian-fu stele inscription (781) attests to the presence of the Assyrian Christian missionary Alopen in China* in 635. The Syrians Frumentius* and Aedesius converted the Ethiopian* emperor Ezana of Aksum in the 4th c. Their common Miaphysite Christology and the rise of Islam contributed to the strengthening of ties among Syriac Orthodox, Coptic*, and Ethiopian Christians that continues today.

Syriac Christians have interacted with Islam* from its formative period to the present. Scholars debate questions of Christian influence on the Qur'an* and hadith (traditions of the Prophet). Jacob* of Edessa* and other Miaphysite Christians translated Aristotle*, studied Greek scientific texts, and mediated the transmission of other aspects of Greek culture to the Romano-Byzantine Umayyad Empire (661–750, centered in Damascus). Their East Syriac counterparts played a similar role in the Abbasid Empire (750–c1300, centered in Baghdad) and its Persian culture. Classified as dhimmi (literally “protected” people, loosely “people of the Book”), Christians under Islamic rule engaged in dialogue and debate. Whereas John* of Damascus considered Islam to be a Christian heresy*, Timothy I started from points of agreement between Christians and Muslims in arguing for his Dyophysite (two natures) view of Christ. Dionysius bar Salibi and others expanded the religious debates to include Judaism as well as Islam and the various christological factions.

Under Seljuk and especially Ottoman Turkish rule with its millet system, Christians were governed by the religious leaders of their own ethnic and confessional communities, subject in turn to the Turkish rulers. This system provided a significant degree of autonomy but also reinforced the subordinate status of religious minorities. At the same time, Western Christians, first as crusaders, then as missionaries*, later as traders and diplomats, and finally as rulers by mandate, interfered in “Middle Eastern” affairs. Their well-intentioned efforts often jeopardized delicately balanced political arrangements. Since the conversion of Muslims was difficult or impossible to achieve, both Roman Catholic and Protestant missionaries eventually directed most of their evangelistic efforts toward the Syriac Christians (and other “Oriental Orthodox” Christians, such as Copts and Armenians). Ecumenical and interreligious dialogues* are healing many of the divisions.

Emigration, especially to Western Europe, the USA, Canada, and Australia, increased in the later 20th c. for economic as well as political and religious reasons. Despite all of these factors leading to division and a diminution of their numbers, Syriac Christians continue to maintain a presence in their traditional lands. The US wars in the Persian Gulf and Islamist* fundamentalism* may prove to be the greatest challenges to this tenacity. See also CHALDEAN CATHOLIC CHURCH; MALANKARA ORTHODOX SYRIAC CHURCH; MONASTICISM; CLUSTER: IN THE SYRIAC TRADITION; ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER: SYRIAC ORTHODOX CHURCH, UNIVERSAL; SYRIAC CATHOLIC CHURCH.

History of Christianity in North America. See CANADA; UNITED STATES.

History of Christianity in the South Pacific and Australia. Australian and South Pacific Christians are connected economically and culturally by their shared experience of colonialism*. Australian Christians were deeply convinced that God had placed them on the continent to further the civilization and evangelization of the islanders to the north. Aboriginal* peoples did not see colonization so positively. The churches' members rarely protested about dispossession, exile, or the cruelties of frontier warfare. Few Aborigines responded to attempts to convert them, and colonists who learned any of their many languages were a rarity. Lutherans* in South Australia and Benedictines* in Western Australia were exceptions.

In Australia*, from the arrival of convicts in 1788 to the 19th c., Christians were predominantly Protestant. Yet a quarter of the population was Roman Catholic. Initially, they were severely discriminated against, even denied priests, because the authorities feared rebellion. The appointment of some clergy and then Bishop Polding (1794–1877) enabled them to take their part in the construction of colonial society. Carolyn Chisholm (known as “Mrs. Chisholm”) (1808–77) worked tirelessly for female Irish migrants. In South Australia, persecuted Prussian Lutherans were helped by a compassionate Baptist to settle, bringing another strand of Protestant Christianity to the colonies, although their connections with the Pacific did not emerge until later in the century.

Anglicans, Congregationalists, Presbyterians, and Wesleyans shared the planting of Christianity on Polynesian islands, in Fiji*, and in parts of the New Hebrides, while Scots and Nova Scotians pioneered in Melanesia; Anglicans established Christianity in New* Zealand through the initiatives of Samuel Marsden (1765–1838). Parent British churches saw the planting of churches in Australia and the South Pacific as part of the same missionary imperative. Sydney became a center for provisioning missionaries and trading with the newly Christianized islands, sometimes providing refuge for those who had fled tribal wars. French Roman Catholic missionaries also saw the advantage of Sydney contacts, even though Australian Protestants were distrustful of French colonial expansion into the Society Islands and New Caledonia and lobbied a reluctant British government to annex, or at least protect, the New Hebrides, Papua New* Guinea, and Polynesia against further French incursions into what was believed to be a divinely ordained sphere of British influence.

Until the pace of free settlement increased (1830s–1840s), Polynesian Christians outnumbered settlers in Australia, who nevertheless were entrusted with increasing oversight of their Pacific brothers and sisters. Although there were far more Pacific Islander missionaries than British ones, colonialist ideas about white superiority made British missionaries reluctant to share authority with the Islanders, lest the young churches be corrupted by local customs. That changed more quickly in London Missionary Society (LMS) areas, although Tongans and Samoan Wesleyans refused to honor a vague British comity* agreement that had awarded Samoa to the LMS. Islanders found European Christian divisions politically useful. Chiefs enhanced their status by linking with a different church than their rivals or defended their newfound faith by war with their denominationally different neighbors. No dissent was permitted in villages, or even on entire islands.

Islanders saw the advantages of literacy and European technologies, but did not adapt to missionary teachings about the time-bound life of the British worker. Large churches showed how quickly Islanders adopted British and French building methods and steel tools. The Bible was accepted as a sacred book, and some of its precepts were speedily integrated into communal life, for the advantages of peace were obvious. Australian colonists could be selective in their hearing of Scripture*, especially in the way they related it to business and politics, and its authority could be interpreted differently in such matters as keeping the Sabbath, the place of music in worship, and the sacraments*. Disputes over divorce* and marriage* with a deceased wife’s sister were settled by legislation rather than theological agreement. Evangelical Protestants campaigned against gambling, sexual impurity, and alcohol abuse, while Roman Catholics and Anglo-Catholics adopted a more relaxed attitude toward the first and the last. Many Protestants felt so strongly about alcohol abuse that they opted for total abstinence. With the help of female temperance* advocates, many replaced wine with grape juice at the Lord’s* Supper. On the Pacific Islands, where there were neither wheat nor grapes, some missionaries chose to use coconuts rather than bread and wine.

Education for ministers was essential in the Islander churches. Theological colleges were established from the 1840s, some of which, like Malua in Samoa, continue to flourish, with a highly qualified faculty.

The refusal of Australian universities in the 19th c. to award degrees in theology forced the churches to explore alternatives. The Australian College of Theology (1891) and the Melbourne College of Divinity (1910) provided long-distance education and external examinations, until Sydney and Queensland provided limited access to degrees. It was not until the 1970s that amendments to the Melbourne College of Divinity Act and the participation of Catholic seminaries made undergraduate degrees in theology possible. Other centers copied the model. Catholic universities have further widened the options, as has recognition of a whole range of other degree-granting institutions.

Two independent churches were developed in Melbourne by evangelists. Alexander Dowie, later founder of Zion City in Illinois, founded an independent church in Melbourne (1880s). Similarly, Dr. Charles Strong established the Australian Church in 1885, which lasted till the 1960s, with a strongly liberal and democratic ethos. Small independent churches of Pentecostal* origins emerged in the early 20th c., but were not independent churches in the sense that they initiated dramatic changes in doctrine and worship that were uniquely Australian. They were inspired by churches in the USA.

Theological disputes were not important in the Islands, but were of great public interest in Australia. The emergence of liberal* theology, the development of the sciences*, and the criticism of dogma challenged the churches to allow for more freedom of conscience and to offer defenses of the faith. Although no world-class thinker emerged from Australian churches, there were many able exponents of the faith and numerous publications on the relation between religion and science, Christology, ethics, eschatology, and the questions debated by Protestants and Roman Catholics. By the end of the 20th c., the form of the disputes had changed, but the limits of adaptation and change were discussed as vigorously as ever. In both Polynesia and Melanesia, there were lively debates about the possibilities of Pacific versions of Christianity across the denominational spectrum, as more and more had received a postgraduate education.

Few South Pacific churches ordain women* for the ministry, but a steady widening of leadership opportunities for educated women has occurred. Some Aboriginal churches have ordained women, but there are still strong regional cultural constraints against women having sacred authority over men. A number of Pacific Islanders have shared in the leadership of the World Council of Churches. Similarly, Roman Catholics have been consulted in Rome, although the number of cardinals in the region is small.

Political independence has posed great challenges to the Pacific churches. They have not always been able to rise above the challenges of tribalism, so that financial impartiality is rare. Ecumenism is fragile. Law and order have broken down in many parts of Papua* New Guinea, with a resumption of tribal fighting. Civil wars in Bougainville and the Solomon* Islands have been very destructive, as have the military coups in Fiji*. Australian churches have contributed modestly to peacemaking and reconciliation. They also have the demanding task of bridging Christian-Muslim differences after jihadist attacks on Australians in Bali and Jakarta.

Independent* churches with indigenous leaders who rejected the tutelage of missionaries emerged early in Polynesia. The Siovili and Mamaia movements were attacked by missionaries as perversions of Christianity. That could not be said of the Free Wesleyan Church in Tonga, founded in 1885. King George Tupou II rejected the authority of the Australasian Conference but did not change local polity* or doctrine, apart from enhancing his authority over the church, ensuring the primacy of Tongan priorities. In 1924 reunion with the Wesleyan remnant was achieved, but a small group stayed outside as an independent church. In Fiji, Apolisi Nai led a group out of the Methodist Church seeking to develop Fiji for the Fijians during the 1930s.

Nothing similar occurred among Aborigines in Australia. The number of converts was too small, and the group was linguistically divided. Although Aboriginal churches had emerged by the mid-20thc., they were closely controlled by their founding bodies and were interdenominational rather than independent, like the Ratana Church in New Zealand. In contrast, “adjustment cults” (also called “cargo cults”), which often had some features of independent churches, were not uncommon in Papua New Guinea; they sought to gain access to European wealth and power by quasi-religious means, especially after 1945. They provided a total culture for their followers, accompanied by strong eschatological* hopes, which sometimes spilled over into politics. The Christian Fellowship Church on the Solomon Islands broke with Methodism and became an independent church, as did Maamafo’ou in Tonga during the 1970s.

In Australia the emergence of mega-congregations, such as Hillsong in Sydney and City Life in Melbourne, may lead to their becoming independent churches with a different relation to Australian culture than the historic denominations.

Urbanization in the South Pacific has undermined customs of social control and weakened religious authority, although as yet individualism, secular views, and a free market in religious and moral choices have not undermined religious commitment as significantly as they have in Australia. The rapidly changing context challenges all the churches to find new ways to transform their societies.

History of Religion School (from the German Religionsgeschichtliche Schule, sometimes inaccurately translated “history of religions school”) was a group primarily of biblical scholars who were drawn to study under Albrecht Ritschl* in Göttingen (late 1880s). The senior figure in the formation of the school was Albert Eichhorn (1856–1926). One of the most influential younger scholars was Hermann Gunkel (1862–1932), who abandoned his studies of the NT to become one of the great pioneers of critical OT study, particularly in his groundbreaking Schöpfung und Chaos (Creation and chaos, 1895). Other members were the NT scholars William Wrede (1859–1906), Wilhelm Bousset (1865–1920), and Ritschl’s son-in-law, Johannes Weiss (1863–1914), the OT critic, Alfred Rahlfs (1865–1935), and a student of comparative religion, Heinrich Hackmann (1864–1935). Others who were later associated with the school were Wilhelm Heitmüller (1869–1926), Hugo Großmann (1877–1927), Paul Wernle (1872–1939), Heinrich Weinel (1874–1936), and Richard Reitzenstein (1861–1931). Ernst Troeltsch* (1865–1923) was known as the school’s “systematic theologian.” While never sharing a common manifesto, all were concerned to investigate religion using a thoroughgoing historical method. This led to a number of publications, including the influential popular series Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher and the massive encyclopaedia Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart. J. C. B. Mohr, the publishing house controlled by the Siebeck family, was particularly influential in ensuring that the writings of the school were widely disseminated.

At Göttingen they soon began to distance themselves from Ritschl, who sought to isolate Christianity from the broader history of religion through the imposition of what was called a “dogmatic” method. Unlike other scholars influenced by Ritschl, the members of the school tended to avoid the isolation of religion through a “value judgment of faith.” Instead, they understood religion* to be a universal human phenomenon enmeshed in the nexus of history. Some members, including Bousset and Troeltsch, were attracted to Ritschl’s Göttingen sparring partner, Paul de Lagarde (1827–1891), professor of Oriental languages, who sought to study Christianity in its historical context. Another important influence was the OT professor Bernhard Duhm (1847–1928), who understood religion to be a matter more of spiritual experience than of dogma. From the outset, many members of the school studied spiritual experience in the individual. Gunkel, e.g., wrote his dissertation on the effects of the Holy* Spirit on Paul. Where Ritschl derided religious experience as “Pietism*” the history of religion school emphasized the study of what William Wrede called “appearances and moods.” Bousset, in his influential work Kyrios Christos, studied the life of early Christian communities, focusing on the sacraments* and mysticism* rather than the more common Lutheran themes of law* and gospel*: it was religion rather than dogma that formed the subject matter of theology. Similarly, Gunkel wrote that the aim of the school was “to look in the hearts of the people of religion, to experience their thoughts inwardly and adequately to describe them.” The study of ancient texts revealed the spiritual life of the individual and of the early Christian communities. Many such experiences were shared with other non-Christian religions. Some members of the school, including Bousset, were deeply influenced by Hegelian* philosophy, which understood history to be the march of the spirit through time. Others were less willing to apply such a constricting teleological framework. Troeltsch, e.g., wrote in 1913 of the impossibility of constructing “a theory of Christianity as the absolute religion on the basis of a historical way of thinking or by the use of historical means.”

Some members of the school espoused the post-Kantian* philosophy of J. F. Fries (1773–1843), who had earlier influenced the OT scholar W. M. L. de Wette (1780–1849). Bousset, e.g., felt that in religion there was an immediate grasp of the underlying essence of things, the thing-in-itself, which allowed for an utter security despite the vagaries of history. Such a philosophy was also adopted by Rudolf Otto in his influential work, The Idea of the Holy. For others, especially Troeltsch, this emphasis on an underlying essence of religion beyond history was a form of mysticism, which meant that Christianity could easily lose its impact in the social world. Members of the school could thus adopt very divergent social and political positions, as is evidenced by the different stances taken by Bousset and Troeltsch after World War I.

The influence of the school on subsequent scholarship, both in biblical studies and more broadly in religious studies, has been immense: its ideas spread quickly beyond the German-speaking world into the USA and Britain. If there was a weakness in the school’s understanding of religion, which often owed more to philosophy than to historical study, it nevertheless attempted to approach Christianity as a religion among religions. In some quarters, its work can still provoke controversy. See also RELIGION AS A CONCEPT AND CHRISTIANITY.

Hodge, Charles (1797–1878). As a professor for 56 years at Princeton Theological Seminary, a Presbyterian minister, and the editor of Princeton Review, Hodge was a major representative of Calvinist* orthodoxy. He defended biblical infallibility* against historical-critical Bible* interpretation, opposed revivalists* like Finney* for reducing true piety to superficial emotionalism, rejected theological liberalism* because it downplayed original sin* and Christ’s atonement*, and called Darwinism* “atheism.” A leading intellectual, Hodge argued that theology, like all sciences*, derived from facts; the-ology’s facts were induced from Scripture* as scientific facts were induced from nature (and the terminology of his commonsense realism). Hodge taught more than 3,000 students, and his Systematic Theology (1873) was a standard textbook into the 20th c.

JAMES P. BYRD

Holiness. In the biblical tradition, holiness is posited to be a characteristic unique to God. Thus Leviticus* has God say, “For I am the Lord your God; sanctify yourselves [= make yourselves holy] therefore, and be holy for I am holy” (11:44; see 19:2). Holiness (Heb qodesh) is what “separates” God from all that is limited. Every other person, place, act, or thing falls under the rubric of holiness by having some connection to God (emphasized in the NT by the Gk root hagios) or being dedicated to God (emphasized by the Gk root hosiotēs). From this perspective, Christ reflects in visible form the holiness of God, and for those who follow Christ he is the model and source of holiness: to the degree that one is “in Christ” one is holy. Consequently, Paul could address his congregations as “saints” or holy ones (e.g. Rom 1:7). Thus holiness (or “sanctity,” a term derived from Lat sanctus) for the person of faith is relative to the absolute holiness of God revealed in Christ. To the degree that one is close to God, one can be called “holy.”

Every generation had to find different ways of living out the holiness to which it was called by grace*, i.e. to have a “sanctified” life. Was one to follow Christ as a missionary, preacher, servant of the poor, or teacher, or less explicitly as a faithful Christian spouse, parent, or person otherwise engaged in the world? The criterion for personal holiness, then, is the degree to which persons’ lives conform to the model of Jesus Christ, who is the way, truth, and life. To the degree that such persons strive to be followers of Christ, they become more holy (sanctified) in that their lives belong to and conform more exactly to God, the source of holiness.

The term “holiness” as applied to persons is also analogously applied to space (holy places; see Hierotopy, the Creation of Christian Sacred Spaces), times (festal seasons), ritual acts (the holy liturgy), and objects (holy water, the Bible [Scripture*] as “the holy Bible”). The applications of the term vary depending on the emphasis given to external manifestations of observances. For example, the Eastern Orthodox* tradition, with its core emphasis on the Divine* Liturgy, uses the term for more things

(e.g. vestment.) or persons (monks) than Evangelicals, who tend to use the term for persons who are “converted* to Christ” and “sanctified,” which is an etymological equivalent of holiness (see Holiness Movement). Indeed, some Charismatic* traditions call their congregations “Holiness churches.”

Holiness also has an eschatological* dimension; holiness for humans is fully attained at the end of this life (the eschaton), when they return to God, who is holy and the final source of all holiness. This completes the circle: humans come out from God, who is holy, and return to God, the source of all holiness. In the Christian tradition, this eschatological dimension of holiness has both an individual and a corporate character. Individually, persons reach their capacity for holiness when they are with the Lord in heaven*. Similarly, according to the biblical tradition, the world will be saved at the end of history when the New Jerusalem is achieved, as described by the language of holiness in Rev 21:1–2: “I saw a new heaven and a new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth have passed away and the sea was no more. And I saw the holy city, the New Jerusalem coming down out of heaven from God.”

LAWRENCE S. CUNNINGHAM

Holiness Movement. The Holiness Movement represented a 19th-c. US renewal of the Wesleyan doctrine of Christian perfection, blended with the themes of revivalism* and perfectionism* that were inherent in antebellum US religion. Emphasis was placed on the immediacy of the experience of sanctification* (subsequent to conversion*/justification*), typically characterized as “baptism* in the Holy* Spirit.” The latter theme derived from the Pietists* via John Fletcher and John Wesley*. Emphasis was placed on the social as well as the personal dimension of holiness, particularly the abolition of slavery*.

Leaders included the evangelist Charles Finney* (1792–1875), the Oberlin school, and the American Antislavery Society. Phoebe Palmer* (1807–74) nurtured a generation of Holiness leaders in her Tuesday meetings in New York, and her work in England inspired the Booths* to launch the Salvation* Army. The Holiness Movement grew to several million adherents, thanks to the international mission work of the Methodist bishop William Taylor (1821–1902), the European Holiness crusades of Hannah and Robert Pearsall Smith (1874–75), and the National Camp Meeting Association for the Promotion of Holiness (1867), among others. Holiness denominations included the Wesleyan Methodist Connection (1843), the Free Methodists (1860s) (see Methodism Cluster), and later the Nazarenes*. These Holiness bodies were among the first to ordain women* ministers.

Holocaust, Jewish (or Shoah), was the systematic, state-organized persecution and murder of approximately 6 million Jews (including 1.5 million children) by Nazi Germany* and its collaborators. Under Adolf Hitler (1889–1945), the Nazi state, a radically anti-Semitic, racist*, and genocidal regime (1933–45), slaughtered two-thirds of Europe's Jews and one-third of the world's Jewish population.

While “Holocaust” designates the Nazi destruction of European Jews, that name does not always or necessarily refer exclusively to them alone. Hitler's murderous regime destroyed millions of other defenseless people, including Roma and Sinti (Gypsies*), Polish* citizens, as well as homosexuals*, the handicapped, Jehovah's* Witnesses, and other religious and political dissidents within Germany. For racial, cultural, or political reasons, members of these groups were attacked in ways that were related to but not identical with the Jews' fate under Hitler. Jews were consistently the foremost targets of Nazi Germany's racism and the mass murder that followed from it.

Historical Context. From 1933 until the beginning of World War II (September 1, 1939), the strategy of Nazi Germany's racist anti-Semitism was to deprive Germany's Jews of their citizenship, employment, and property, thus forcing them to emigrate. Even with Germany's relatively small prewar Jewish population (c550,000), that approach was less than completely successful from the Nazi point of view. Once the war began, Germany's military gains brought millions of Jews under the swastika. Such overwhelming numbers made plans for the forced relocation of European Jews unworkable. By late 1941, the mass killing of Jews was under way in Eastern Europe. It eventually reached continental proportions when Jews throughout Europe were deported to killing centers that the Germans constructed on Polish soil. At Auschwitz, the most notorious site, more than a million Jews were gassed to death.

Religious Character of the Holocaust. As one considers the religious contexts and implications of the unprecedented tragedy that is now called the Holocaust, it is important to note that at least three terms name this event. All of them raise questions concerning why and how it happened. Masters of euphemistic language, the Nazis spoke of die Endlösung, the “Final Solution” of their so-called Jewish question. If Hitler had fully gotten his way, the “Final Solution” would have resulted not only in the annihilation of every Jewish man, woman, and child but also in the eradication of Judaism and every aspect of Jewish tradition. The intention of the Nazis’ assault on the Jews was to rid the earth of everything Jewish.

In the early 1940s, Polish Jews used the Hebrew term shoah to designate their plight under Hitler. The roots of that word go back to biblical sources: Psalms*, Isaiah’s* prophecies, and Job’s* lamentations. Its meanings are multiple. Sometimes shoah denotes dangers that threaten Israel from surrounding nations; at other times, it refers to individual distress and desolation. If catastrophic destruction is signified in each case, the biblical meanings of shoah imply divine judgment. Those ancient meanings, however, are called into question by the “Final Solution,” for in what credible sense could God’s judgment be embedded in the Nazis’ intended destruction of Jewish life and tradition? In contemporary usage, shoah conveys the old sense of destruction but sounds disturbing notes of fragmentation and questioning where religious traditions are concerned.

Although “Shoah” is widely used in Israel and in some European countries, and Yom Hashoah is Israel’s official remembrance day for the catastrophe, “Holocaust,” a term that began to achieve prominence in the 1950s, remains this event’s most common name. It derives from the Septuagint*, a Greek translation of the HB (3rd c. BCE), which employs holokauston for the Hebrew olah. Those biblical words refer to a completely consumed burnt offering. As a name for Nazi Germany’s genocide against the Jews, the term “Holocaust” is also surrounded by problematic religious connotations. In no credible sense could the destruction of the European Jews be called a sacrifice to God.

For both Jews and Christians, the Holocaust raises anguished problems about God’s relationship to history*. For Christians those problems are especially difficult because the Christian tradition is deeply implicated in and indicted by the Holocaust. Specifically, Nazi Germany’s targeting of the Jews in the Holocaust cannot be explained apart from anti-Jewish images –

Christ killers, willful blasphemers*, unrepentant sons and daughters of the devil*, to name only a few – that were deeply rooted for centuries in Christian thought and practice. What can rightly be called Christian anti-Semitism provided the essential background, preparation, and motivation for the Germans’ “Final Solution.” That same long-standing Christian hostility toward Judaism and Jews goes a long way toward explaining why overtly Christian resistance to the Holocaust was as scarce and sporadic as it turned out to be. In the dominant Christian worldview before and during the Holocaust, Jews were considered “outsiders” to such a degree that help in their times of acute need was unlikely to be much of a Christian priority. After the Holocaust, Christian attitudes toward Jews have changed significantly for the better, but the price paid for that reformation is beyond calculation. See also ANTI-SEMITISM; SUPERSESSIONISM. JOHN K. Holy. See HOLINESS; HOLINESS MOVEMENT.

Holy Days of Obligation, Roman Catholic feast days during which laity and clergy are obliged to attend Mass*, abstaining from work that might prevent this observance.

Holy Fool (fool for Christ’s sake) is a type of Christian saint* who pretends to be insane and imitates Christ, willingly subjecting him- or herself to homelessness, poverty, disdain, and persecution. The biblical model is provided by prophets and by Paul’s juxtaposition of heavenly and earthly wisdom (“We are fools for Christ’s sake,” 1 Cor 4:10). Holy fools sacrificed their private lives, names, and identities to God, spoke in parables, and enacted scenes in public to accuse people of their sins and to preach. They first appeared in Egypt* in the 4th c., then in Byzantium* and, in great number, in Russia* (14th–16th c.). See also MONASTICISM CLUSTER: IN THE RUSSIAN AND UKRAINIAN TRADITION. ELENA VOLKOVA

Holy Innocents, children massacred by Herod’s order in an attempt to destroy the infant Jesus (Matt 2:16–18); commemorated on December 27 in Oriental Orthodox* churches, December 28 in Western* churches, and December 29 in Eastern Orthodox* churches.

Holy Name, Veneration of, refers to the practice of bending the knee (Phil 2:10) upon hearing or seeing the name of Jesus. Bernardino of Siena promoted this veneration; at his trial for heresy* (1426), he argued that adoration is not that of the letters (IHS*) but of the person to whom the name refers (cf. icons*).

Holy Office. The Congregation of the Holy Office (Congregatio sancti officii), originally established as the Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition* by Pope Paul III (1542), received the former name from Pius X (1908).

Distinct from national inquisitions, the Holy Office set up by Paul III was a central tribunal directed by a cardinal secretary for judging questions of heresy* and schism*. The focus initially was on Protestants* but soon shifted to Catholics themselves. From the early 17th to the mid-20th c., the Holy Office issued numerous decrees on sacramental, doctrinal, and moral matters.

In 1965 Pope Paul VI changed the name of the Holy Office to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (Congregatio pro doctrina fidei [CDF]). The List of Prohibited Books (Index Librorum Prohibitorum*), which had been under the Holy Office since 1917, was discontinued (1966). The CDF, however, retained the right to examine books for doctrinal and moral problems. Pope John Paul II reorganized the Roman Curia by his 1988 apostolic constitution, Pastor bonus, and reinforced the CDF's duty "to promote and safeguard the doctrine on faith and morals in the whole Catholic world" (Article 48).

Holy Roman Empire. After Roman rule ended in the West (c476), the Roman Empire continued in Constantinople. Relations between Constantinople and the West were strained by schisms over the Henoticon* (482–519), the Three* Chapters (from 547), monothelitism* (649–81), and iconoclasm* (726–87). The last of the Greek-born popes sponsored the Carolingian* dynasty (751) and relied on its military support in Italy*; the "Donation* of Constantine" seemed to give the pope control over the Empire in the West. Thus the way was paved for Pope Leo III to crown Charlemagne* emperor (though only of the West) in St. Peter's on Christmas Day, 800. The title was retained by his heirs and was always conferred by the pope; after an interruption in the line of succession, it was resumed when Otto received the title (962).

Despite the power of some imperial dynasties, the position of the emperor of the "Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation" steadily weakened and the role of the electors among the German nobility became increasingly important. The last emperor to be crowned personally by the pope was Charles* V (1530). The Empire (which, as Voltaire said, had become "neither holy nor Roman nor an empire") was ended in 1806 by another French ruler, Napoleon, who, in the presence of the pope, crowned himself emperor of the French (1804).

Holy Sepulchre, Church of the, rock-hewn tomb of Jesus in Jerusalem, allegedly discovered by Constantine* or his mother, Helena*. Over the "cave" were built a memorial (aedicule) and later, enclosing it, the rotunda called the "Anastasis" (place of resurrection). These structures were demolished under Sultan Hakim (1009); the rotunda was replaced by the Greeks (11th c.), and the church by the crusaders (12th c.). The Templars'* churches in London and Paris were built in imitation of this composite structure.

1) Introductory Entries

Holy Spirit, in Christian theology, denotes both the third person* of the Trinity* (alongside the Father and Son) and the idea of God as Spirit (John 4:24), spiritual presence, or spiritual creative force. Recently, the Holy Spirit has received greater recognition in theology. The reasons are many, including a better knowledge of Eastern Orthodoxy* with its rich pneumatological tradition, the rise of the Pentecostal*/Charismatic* movements, and a general postmodern* interest in spirituality and new religiosity.

The Bible uses a number of metaphors for the Spirit: wind (Gr pneuma, thus “pneumatology,” the doctrine of the Spirit), dove, and Paraclete (comforter, advocate). The foundational biblical insight, especially in the OT, is the Spirit as the life principle that makes all life possible and sustains it (Gen 1:2; Ps 104:29–30). The Spirit is also presented in the Bible as mighty charismatic power, subtle wisdom, and cosmic presence of God. In the NT, the integral connection between Jesus and the Spirit becomes the leading theme.

It took several centuries for Christian theology to come to any kind of doctrinal understanding of the Spirit in the emerging trinitarian doctrine. While early Christian creeds connect the Holy Spirit with the church* and forgiveness* of sins, later Christian tradition, especially Protestant, came to emphasize the Spirit’s role in the individual Christian’s life as the agent of sanctification*. The Eastern tradition (especially that of the Cappadocians* and Athanasius*) helped establish the deity of the Spirit alongside the Father and Son. In the Christian West, Augustine* consolidated the idea of the Spirit as the bond of love between Father and Son. The Western tradition also established the *Filioque (and from the Son) according to which the Spirit proceeds not only from the Father but also from the Son. The charge that the West had subordinated the Spirit to the Son led to the split between the East and West (1054).

Along with these doctrinal developments, the history of lived theology acknowledges a number of pneumatological traditions that places greater emphasis on the experience of the Spirit than on theological definitions. These include the 2nd-c. enthusiastic Montanist* Movement, the highly mystical* medieval movements, various Spirit movements of the Radical* Reformation, and more recently the rapidly growing Pentecostal/Charismatic movements. Pentecostals believe in a universal empowerment of all Christians by the Spirit (Spirit baptism*). All of these Spirit movements emphasize unmediated access to the Spirit, rather than tying the Spirit mainly to sacraments and church offices (especially that of bishop) as the established traditions do, and thus challenge church structures and doctrinal formulations.

Contemporary theology is experiencing a resurgence of pneumatology alongside a reconsideration of the role and nature of the Spirit. The Holy Spirit was connected mainly with salvation*, inspiration*, individual piety, as well as some aspects of church life. Without denying these emphases, contemporary theology also connects the Holy Spirit with other theological topics, such as creation*, God*, Christology*, and eschatology*. Political, social, environmental, liberationist, and other “public” issues are discussed from pneumatological perspectives. Contemporary theology also acknowledges the relation of the Spirit to particular contexts by taking note of the distinctive experience of the Spirit in Africa, Asia, and Latin America, as compared with the North Atlantic world and acknowledging the role of the Spirit as empowering and giving voice, for instance, to women*, the poor*, and the oppressed*. Contemporary theology also investigates the relation of the Holy Spirit to other religions and their respective understandings of “spirits,” as well as the correlations between science and pneumatology now that a dynamic worldview, more sensitive to everything “spiritual,” has replaced the mechanistic one.

Holy Spirit in African Christianity. Holy Spirit, Mzimu Woyera in Malawian Chichewa, is the feminine divine power behind Christian living and transformation, the breath (life giver) of the church, the internal witness of God's revelation, and the Ancestor* facilitating daily communion between the Supreme Being and creation.

In African* Religion, ancestors facilitate communion by bringing revelation from the Divine to humans, who respond through ritual worship. Means of revelation include dreams, visions, and spirit possession. In African Christian theology of conversion*, healing*, and interconnectedness, when this role is conceived of as mediation, it is that of Christ, but when it is conceived of as living communion, it is that of the Spirit as breath of the church. The Spirit-filled Christian remains in daily communion with Jesus Christ, the model par excellence of a transformed and transforming life guided by compassion*, grace*, justice*, and mercy*. The Spirit, as the Ancestor, convicts and empowers in order to transform the heart and community, inaugurating repentance (metanoia) in response to the call to mission. For inspiration, the Spirit reveals the compassionate work of Jesus, who journeyed with the marginalized, reflecting with them and leading them to praxis as a way of ushering in the Reign* of God.

The Spirit also reveals God's will and empowers the intercessor (bishop, prophet-preacher, messianic figure) in sustaining health and in healing. Health is the harmonious functioning of every part of the body in relationship with a particular environment (Weatherhead). Healing restores such harmonious relationships. Faith healing involves prayer and ritual, heavily relying on the disposition of faith of those seeking healing (Moyo). The Spirit reveals the cause of ill-health, effects the healing, and enables human agency for healing.

Women's embodied spirituality interconnects their sexuality with the rest of creation as mother earth. Spirit-possessed women therapeutically sing and dance barefoot in rhythm with the sacred earth, to whom creation owes its survival. Women's barefoot theology presents three levels of interconnectedness rooted in a vulnerable kinship relationship and based on compassion, grace, justice, and mercy. They associate the Spirit first with the Triune God: father and mother creator God, Jesus (the victorious model), and Spirit (Jesus' sister, who facilitates divine interconnectedness with creation, partly embodied in mother earth); second, with divine creation relatedness; and third, with intercreation interconnectedness.

In African Christianity, the Spirit also has an important role in the Charismatic* renewal and the conception of the Bible as revelation (rather than as word) related to the Spirit's internal witness.

FULATA MOYO

Holy Spirit in Asian Christianity. Even though the idea of Spirit or spirits is not foreign to the peoples of Asia, articulating the doctrine of the Holy Spirit involves many challenges, given the multi-religious and multilingual Asian context. Asian Christian theologians have carried out this task in five ways.

1. The process of translating the Bible into Asian languages has engendered a theological activity that looks for dynamic equivalents in the local language. While the Tamil Bible uses the word aavi (vapor, ghost, or steam) for Spirit, the Sanskrit tradition considers atman (soul) appropriate. The very choice of a dynamic equivalent brings in new meanings.
2. Theologians draw from the religious-cultural traditions of Asia to construct an Asian doctrine of the Holy Spirit. Jung Young Lee proposes the concept of chi (or ki in Korean) in presenting the Holy Spirit as a feminine and vital energy embedded in the life of the Trinity*. A. J. Appasamy presents the Holy Spirit using the Hindu idea of antaryamin (indweller). P. Chenchiah uses shakti (the energy of God, represented in the feminine iconic form) to name the Holy Spirit "Mahashakti." Vengal Chakkarai, employing the concept of avatar (decent or incarnation), explains the Holy Spirit as the incarnation of Christ in the hearts of the believers.

3. Korean theologians have linked the Holy Spirit to the Shamanistic* traditions of Korea and the spirits of ancestors*. Such a linking may raise questions about the symbolism of evil* in some of the Shamanistic categories. Minjung* theologians of Korea have grappled with this in varied ways. The Charismatic*/Pentecostal traditions within Asia have found indigenous ways of expounding the Holy Spirit, taking into account some of the traditional spiritual practices in Asia.
4. Liberation theologians expound the idea that the Holy Spirit is a companion who empowers the poor* in their struggle for freedom and dignity. The Dalit* theologians of India, such as Arvind Nirmal, utilize the concept of the Holy Spirit as the empowerer.
5. K. C. Sen, a 19th-c. Hindu theologian, saw the Holy Spirit as the initiator of the Church of Third Dispensation.

These five ways of construing the doctrine of the Holy Spirit clearly indicate that Asian theologians are no longer bound by the categories and conceptual frameworks inherited from the Western missionary enterprise; they are engaging in creative theological exposition of the Holy Spirit.

M. THOMAS THANGARAJ

Holy Spirit in Caribbean Christianity. In the Caribbean, the person and work of the Holy Spirit are conceived of in perhaps as many ways as there are groups that claim to embrace the Christian faith. In the main, these notions are informed by historical and cultural influences related to Africa, where the ancestral roots of the vast majority of Caribbean people are (though some are also from Asia); to Europe, owing to colonial influences; and to North America, as a result of regional proximity and the current global influence of the USA.

From Eurocentric dogmatic theology has come the notion of the Holy Spirit as the divine power who imbues us with the capacity (see Grace of God Cluster) to become the best we can be, despite the odds confronting us. In the context of the Caribbean colonial heritage, the Holy Spirit is the divine resource made available to humans, enabling them to overcome the challenges of this life in order to make the transition to the next life, where such challenges will be no more. Much emphasis is placed not only on the experience of genuine perfection in the here-after, but also on the capacity to endure hardship faced in the present.

The Afrocentric influence is found in the quest for a here-and-now experience. In this perspective, the Holy Spirit's work is considered liberative, endowing humans with the capacity to confront and conquer hardship. It is this confidence in the Spirit's liberating* power that undoubtedly inspired the expression of the spiritual "And before I be a slave, I'd be buried in my grave and go home to my Lord and be free."

More recently, the influence exerted by an aggressive materialism rooted in the US Prosperity* Gospel emphasizes the realization of our God-endowed capacities. Then the Holy Spirit is deemed to be the one who heals, who provides all the material and nonmaterial resources required to live an abundant life, and who equips the believer for faithful Christian witness.

For the most part, Caribbean understandings of the Holy Spirit are rooted in the biblical presentation of the Spirit, especially in the Acts of the Apostles and 1 Cor 12, 14. They portray the Holy Spirit as God's means of transforming and renewing fallen humanity to fulfill their divinely ordained role as God's partners in redeeming the world.

HENLEY BERNARD

Holy Spirit in Latin American Christianity. Diverse experiences of the Spirit during the 20th c. in Latin America led churches and theologians to pay closer attention to the Holy Spirit. Pentecostalism*, the Catholic Charismatic* renewal, popular* religions originating with indigenous peoples (in independent Latin American Charismatic churches), and Base* Ecclesial Communities, among others, have brought about a renewed understanding of the active presence of the Spirit.

For nearly 500 years, the religious experiences of American indigenous peoples were disqualified as diabolic by both Catholic and Protestant Christianity. In institutional Catholicism, the Spirit was understood to be present only in the sacraments and through the clergy's mediating liturgical acts. In Protestantism the Spirit was associated chiefly with the liturgical celebration and, above all, with the reception of the Word. Pneumatology reflected the dogmatic positions of each ecclesiastical tradition and was viewed as secondary to other theological themes.

The eruption of Pentecostalism (from the early 20th c.) and of the Charismatic renewal (since the 1960s) revealed dimensions of the Spirit's role, such as healing (of both individual bodies and communities), inciting believers to a liberating mission, ecstatic experiences, liturgical renewal, glossolalia*, and concrete ecumenical efforts. Also since the 1960s, the Liberation movement has attributed a large part of its motivation to the power of the Spirit; thus Liberation theology has devoted more of its reflection to the liberating Spirit, underscoring the Spirit as the power of liberation, of community solidarity, and of the defense of life.

In Protestant communities, especially Pentecostal and Charismatic communities, the communal character of the manifestations of the Spirit is also emphasized, although these communities give more importance to the concrete manifestations of the Spirit for individuals. The Spirit is understood to be a power that renews life, health in all its dimension, and eschatological* hope* – with a tendency toward reductionist, magical, and exhibitionist views of the actions of the Spirit (see Charismatic and Pentecostal Movements Cluster: Studying).

Recent social, cultural, ecclesiastical, and theological changes in Latin America have brought about significant changes in the perception of the Spirit. A more holistic view of the Spirit, determined less by dogmatic considerations than by the communities' concrete experiences, is emerging. This holistic view theologically retrieves and affirms the Spirit's "community management," the Spirit's ability to renew and preserve life, the Spirit's configuration of liberating and just communities, the Spirit's role in inspiring the quest for dialogue and understanding among diverse groups, and the Spirit's support in promoting the values of the Kingdom*.

DANIEL CHIQUETE

Holy Spirit in North American Christianity. Much of the theology of the Holy Spirit in North America is a continuation of European traditions as well as an attempt to revise and expand pneumatology in order to speak to multiculturalism, the diversity of Christian churches, the postmodern* mindset, as well as Evangelical* and Pentecostal*/Charismatic* movements.

The Lutheran Robert W. Jenson's discussion of the Spirit in his Systematic Theology is representative of traditional mainline approaches. The trinitarian pneumatology of the Roman Catholic Elizabeth Johnson similarly builds on tradition but does so with a view to developing a feminist* interpretation of the Spirit in search of a holistic, egalitarian perspective. Johnson has also attempted to find connections between femininity and the environment. The Protestant Mark I. Wallace's Fragments of the Spirit: Nature, Violence, and the Renewal of Creation similarly makes a passionate case for a theology of the Holy Spirit sensitive to the "biocentric" dimension and preservation of nature as it faces "ecocide." Process* theology's first attempts to offer pneumatological reflections likewise echo many of these concerns.

The Evangelical theologian from Canada, Clark Pinnock, has endeavored to construct a full-scale systematic theology from a pneumatological perspective, thus challenging theology that in general has given the Spirit a secondary role. The American Malaysian-born Pentecostal theologian Amos Yong produced a major Pentecostal theology of the Holy Spirit with a global aim and in dialogue with ecumenical voices. Unlike most Evangelicals and Pentecostals, Yong has also written substantively on the theology of religions from a pneumatological perspective, arguing that the work of the Holy Spirit extends beyond the church and encompasses the whole created cosmos. The discussion of Spirit baptism* by another US Pentecostal theologian, Frank Macchia, is the first attempt not only to clarify theologically this central Pentecostal concept and experience, but also to put it in dialogue with Roman Catholic and Protestant theologies.

VELI-MATTI KÄRKKÄINEN

Holy Spirit in South Pacific Christianity. The traditional life of the peoples of the South Pacific is immersed in and derives from the various spirits. Nothing happens without being caused by spirits, and much of the way of life is shaped by a determination to serve the spirits in order to be blessed by them.

The Christian message was introduced (19th c.) into this context of a complex “spiritual” existence. Until recently, most of the theological attention of the missionary churches has been “christological” rather than “pneumatological.” The clear assumption was that acceptance of Jesus Christ meant the rejection of the spirits of traditional culture.

However, despite the heritage of Christian missionary teaching and its widespread success in planting Christian churches in the South Pacific, there remains a strong sense among Pacific Islanders that their lives are influenced, if not controlled, by the various spirits in their culture. For some, the Christian faith is a variation of their own traditional system of belief and offers yet another spirit (the Holy Spirit) that has the power to bestow good or evil and is to be manipulated in order to seek blessings.

In recent years, with an increase in the number of Evangelical movements with a Pentecostal* or Charismatic* focus throughout the South Pacific, there is a heightened focus on pneumatology in the churches. “Holy Spirit movements” have evolved, both within and beyond the established churches. Elements of these movements include a profound personal experience of conversion*, a renewal of personal life, healing* from affliction, speaking in tongues*, and, in some cases, more unusual events. How are these experiences of the Holy Spirit related to the manifold spirits of traditional cultures? This remains an open question.

These recent developments provoked a mixed response among established churches. An awareness of the genuineness of the movements as a work of the Holy Spirit often existed side by side with accusations or suspicions about the non-Christian nature of the movements. Nevertheless, the impact of these developments in the past generation has been such that the established churches have had to work out ways of accommodating it within their structures. In some cases, this has not been possible and new religious groups have emerged. However, serious engagement with the important theological issue of the relationship between Holy Spirit and the spirits of traditional cultures is still needed.

RANDALL PRIOR

Holy Spirit in Western European Christianity. One of the architects of contemporary Roman Catholic theology, Karl Rahner*, argued that it is the Holy Spirit who makes possible the human reception of divine grace* and the self’s experience of existential transcendence. During Vatican* II, Rahner also encouraged his church to appreciate “the dynamic element in the church.” Eastern Orthodoxy’s rich pneumatological tradition is represented by the Russian-born Vladimir Lossky’s* mystical* theology. In a different vein, the Orthodox John Zizioulas’s take on the Holy Spirit is guided by his “communion theology”: as the Triune God exists as a community of personhood, so the Holy Spirit is the principle of communion.

The most widely debated Protestant pneumatology is delineated in German Reformed Jürgen Moltmann’s Spirit of Life: A Universal Affirmation (1992). Although it discusses traditional topics (e.g. justification* and sanctification*), it also relates the discussion to pressing contemporary themes, such as the environment, justice, and equality, in search of a “holistic,” “all-encompassing,” or “comprehensive” approach to the Spirit. Moltmann wishes to perceive God’s presence in the Spirit in all things and all things in God (“immanent transcendence.”) The pneumatology of another Reformed German, Michael Welker, presents a unique approach in God the Spirit (1994). On the basis of biblical materials, he critiques “metaphysical,” “speculative,” and “abstract” forms of pneumatology in search of “concrete” and “realistic” voices. His main concern is to pursue the question “Where can we discern the Spirit in life?”

The most distinctive feature of the Lutheran Wolfhart Pannenberg’s pneumatology is that he interweaves the Spirit with all major loci of his rigorous systematic argumentation, such as creation* and eschatology*. In search of a theology as public discipline, Pannenberg opposes the idea of the Spirit as the principle of individual piety. Eager to relate the Spirit to science*, Pannenberg takes his cue from the biblical statement of the Spirit as life-giving principle, which he calls the “field-concept” (from modern physics). He believes there are surprising possibilities for agreement between new scientific theories and theological conceptions.

Holy Synod, the Russian Orthodox Church’s supreme governing body, created by Peter the Great (1721) to displace the patriarch’s authority. It was abolished after the Russian Revolution of 1917, and the patriarch’s authority was restored.

Holy Water, water set apart and blessed for religious purposes, including dedication, exorcism*, burial, and ritual cleansing on entering a church.

Holy Week, week preceding Easter*, beginning with Palm* Sunday, reenacting in succession all the events of Jesus’ last week; probably instituted in Jerusalem; Egeria’s* narrative (380–83) is the first account of it.

Homiletics, the theory of preaching. See also PREACHING; RECEPTION STUDIES OF PREACHING.

Homily (Gk homilia, “familiar discourse”), a type of preaching*, usually in a spirit of edification rather than proclamation or argumentation.

Homooousians, Homoiousians, Homoians, Anomoians, the parties in the 4th-c. debate over the Trinity*. The Homooousians asserted with the Nicene* Creed that the Son is homooousios, or “identical in essence,” with the Father. The Homoiousians asserted that the Son is homoiousios, or “like in essence,” with the Father. Their concern was to affirm the threeness of the divine persons. Although they were called “Semi-Arians,” they were reconciled with the Homooousians at the Council of Alexandria in 362 and contributed to the completion of the doctrine that the Trinity is “one essence” in three persons. The Homoians supported the Arians*, arguing that the Son is homoios, or “similar,” to the Father. The Anomoians were extreme Arians who insisted that the Father alone is “God” in the proper sense; the only begotten Son is the “God” and Creator of everything else, but was himself “created out of nothing” by the Father’s will, and thus is anomoios, or “unlike,” the Father in essence.

Homosexuality denotes a person’s sexual* feelings, fantasies, and sometimes sexual activities with (a) person(s) of the same sex. Throughout much of Christian history, homosexuality has been considered sinful and later was viewed as a disease. Although these traditional attitudes remain strong, a growing number of Western Christians in the early 21st c. view homosexuality as medically and morally neutral.

1. Homosexuality as sin. The oldest and most tenacious view of homosexuality as contrary to both God’s supernatural law and the laws of nature is held by the Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, and conservative Protestant churches. According to this view, with roots in Scripture (Gen 19; Lev 18:22; Rom 1: 26–27), homosexuality is morally wrong and represents a turning away from our human nature in God’s image. Those who espouse this view think that granting social justice* to gay, lesbian, or bisexual persons amounts to condoning sin against God.
2. Homosexuality as sickness. To members of movements in the late 19th and 20th c. that advocated pathologizing and “treating” human beings in medical and psychological terms, homosexuals were diseased individuals who needed help. Although Sigmund Freud is often cited as a source of this view, his studies suggested that most people are naturally bisexual. Because the “sickness” theory frees homosexuals from moral responsibility, many Christians stressed the difference between homosexual "orientation" (the disease) and homosexual "behavior" (the sinfulness).

3. Homosexuality as medically and morally neutral. In the late 1960s, psychologist Evelyn Hooker showed that the "sickness theory" was based solely on research involving homosexuals in psychiatric treatment. In 1973 the American Psychiatric Association officially removed homosexuality from its list of mental disorders. Subsequently, in the USA and other Western cultures, through the ongoing work of feminists, and gay, lesbian, bisexual, transgender, and queer* activists and theologians, many Christians began to understand homosexuality, and sexuality* as a whole, to be morally neutral. Like heterosexual* behavior, homosexual activity can be destructive or creative, coercive or cooperative, abusive or healthy, and thus immoral or moral.

Reverend Troy Perry's founding of the Metropolitan Community Church (1968) and its growth around the world signaled a new visibility and activism on the part of gay, lesbian, and other queer Christians. The Presbyterian Church (USA), despite overwhelmingly defeating a more inclusive report on sexuality, forcefully articulated a Christian vision of sexual justice, inclusivity, and acceptance of homosexuality as a morally neutral orientation and behavior (1991). Of concern are the churches' oppression of their own homosexual, bisexual, and transgender members and issues of social justice (e.g. housing and employment equality; the some 1,000 legal and economic benefits associated with marriage).

Throughout Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Eastern Orthodox communities, a Queer theological movement is struggling to transform Christian understandings of homosexuality and sexuality and their root in Scripture*. The 2003 election of an openly gay man, Gene Robinson, as a bishop in the Episcopal Church (USA) and thereby in the worldwide Anglican Communion, as well as the acceptance of openly gay and lesbian priests and bishops in Lutheran churches (e.g. the Church of Sweden and the Evangelical Lutheran* Church in America), signaled a global struggle among Christians to come to terms, or not, with new understandings of homosexuality.

CARTER HEYWARD

Honduras, Republic of. The Christian faith got off to a slow start in Honduras. The Mayan people and culture disappeared for unknown reasons c300 years before the Spanish Conquest. Several Amerindian groups, especially the Lenca, became amalgamated with the Spanish. Consequently, 91% of the population is mestizo*, 6% indigenous, 2% Garifuna (black), and only 1% white.

Early mission efforts by Franciscans* had moderate success. The slow establishment of settlements (because of the lack of exploitable resources) hindered the progress of colonization and of evangelization. Since the colonial period, Honduras has had the lowest proportion of priests (most from foreign lands) to people in Latin America. This has militated against meaningful commitment to the Roman Catholic Church. After national independence was achieved (1838), the Church fought to retain its traditional role in politics and society. However, some of those privileges were taken away in the 1880s. Civil registers of births and marriages, public education, and freedom of religion were adopted. Yet because of its overwhelming presence, the Church continued to exercise significant power in national decisions.

In the 1950s, a serious evangelistic effort was launched by the Catholic Church to resolve the nominal membership of most Catholics. Many lay "delegates of the Word" led worship, received the Communion elements from an urban priest, and distributed the previously consecrated bread to those who came to the services. This grassroots movement, under distant priestly supervision, brought many into a meaningful relationship with the Church. A significant social activism on behalf of the poor* was initiated in Honduras, the second-poorest country in Latin America.

Adventists began mission work in 1891, followed by the Dispensationalist Central American Mission (1896), Quakers* (1902), Evangelical and Reformed (1920), Moravians* (1930), and members of Assemblies* of God (1937). Yet the growth of the Protestant Church was slow until the late 20th c., when the tremendous expansion of Pentecostal*/Charismatic* groups made deep inroads into nominal and folk Catholicism. Complex factors created a milieu conducive to change: the spontaneous rise of lay leaders, the growing disenfranchisement of the poor, the search for transcendental security, faith in biblical teaching, dependence on the supernatural for the solution of concrete personal problems, a future resolution of the crises of this life, and the unconditional recognition of personal worth by the spiritual community.

Pentecostals/Charismatics (now 80% of Protestants/Evangelicals) include classical Pentecostals (members of Assemblies* of God, Church* of God), the Charismatics who are renovating existing denominations, neo-Charismatics, including members of "spiritual warfare" groups, adherents of the Prosperity* Gospel, and others. Most Evangelical groups have little political influence in national affairs.

Statistics: Population (2000): 6.5 million (M). Christians, 6.3 M, 97% (Roman Catholics, 84%; Protestants/Evangelicals and Charismatics, 14%; 1% with dual membership). (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

SIDNEY ROOY

Hong Kong. The first Catholic missionary, a Swiss named Theodore Joset, landed in Hong Kong in 1841, one year before the beginning of its colonization. The first Protestant missionary, Jehu Lewis Shuck from the American Baptist Missionary Union, came in 1842. During the following decades, as a British colony Hong Kong became a gateway to mission in mainland China*.

In 1874 the Roman Catholic Church established an apostolic vicariate. In 1880 the first All-China Catholic Synod was held. It became a diocese* in 1946. However, it was not for another 23 years, in 1969, that the Church had its first Chinese bishop (Francis Chen-peng Hsu). In 2000 there were 55 parishes and 98 places for religious services.

The Protestant community now includes about 1,300 congregations in more than 50 denominations, with many independent churches. The Baptists form the largest denomination. Others include Anglican, Lutheran, Christian and Missionary Alliance, Methodist, Church of Christ in China, Adventist, Pentecostal, and the Salvation* Army. The Hong Kong Chinese Christian Churches Union* and the Hong Kong Christian Council* facilitate ecumenical and joint endeavors among Protestant churches.

The Hong Kong Chinese Christian Churches Union, a congregation-based organization, was established in 1915 as a joint effort between the London Missionary Society, the China Congregational Church, the Anglican, the Methodist, the Chung Tsin missions, the Baptists, and the Chinese Rhenish Church to deal with matters pertaining to the Christian cemetery. Its membership now covers almost one-third of the local congregations, which implies that more than half of the total Protestant population is connected to the Union through their churches. Its ministry now extends to the provision of medical services, education, elderly services, and other social services. The Hong Kong Christian Council was established in 1954. It is a member of the World* Council of Churches, and its core membership contains mainline denominations, ecumenical agencies, and the Orthodox Metropolitanate of Hong Kong and Southeast Asia. It is committed to ecumenism, interfaith dialogue, and the promotion of unity of witness, serving as a bridge between local and worldwide churches.

Between 1980 and 1997, many significant developments occurred. Facing the return of Hong Kong to Communist China in 1997, the churches became highly vocal in negotiating their independent identities, serious about fostering church growth, and cautious about developing a relationship with the churches in mainland China. Many declarations and position papers formulated how the church should theologically and politically face the "1997 issue*," and the number of Chinese-speaking congregations grew dramatically, from 634 in 1980 to 1129 in 1999.

The local Christian community is characterized by its heavy commitment to providing social services and education. Its relationships with other religions or ideologies have been harmonious. Nevertheless, tensions have resulted from the condemnation of Chinese ancestral* veneration as sinful by many Evangelicals and most Charismatics*.

There are now more than 20 seminaries in Hong Kong. However, indigenization of the leadership did not take place until the 1970s. Because Hong Kong is highly Westernized, theological contextualization* and inculturation* are not receiving much attention. Yet since the 1950s, there has been a substantial dialogue between Christianity and Confucianism*.

The most distinctive contribution of Christianity in Hong Kong had to do with the return of Hong Kong to Communist mainland China in 1997 (the "handover"). With the signature of the Sino-British Joint Declaration on the question of Hong Kong in 1984, Hong Kong entered into an era of decolonization. People were, however, in the somewhat ambivalent position of both celebrating the decolonization and finding themselves neither culturally nor politically ready to be integrated into Communist China. Contextual theologization conditioned by this ambivalence became active to an unprecedented extent. In 1984 several statements were formulated by Christian leaders: "Statement on the Catholic Church and the Future of Hong Kong," signed by Cardinal John Baptist Wu Cheng-Chung and the Diocese of Hong Kong; "A Manifesto of the Protestant Church in Hong Kong on Religious Freedom," by the Hong Kong Christian Council; "The Convictions Held by Christians in Hong Kong in the Midst of Contemporary Social and Political Change," by a group of Evangelical Christian leaders in Hong Kong; "A Position Paper on the Future of Hong Kong" by the delegation of Hong Kong Protestant Church leaders. In 1987 Arnold Young published his Theology of Reconciliation, which discussed the 1997 handover. Reconciliation* as a contextualized theological theme, however, lost its impact after the Tiananmen June Fourth event of 1989. Kwok Nai-wang wrote a great deal about pro-democracy and pro-human rights theologies; Archie Lee contributed an Asian perspective on the "1997 issue" with his cross-textual hermeneutics. These theologizations, among others, however, seemed to lose their local audience after the peaceful handover.

Honorius, Pope (d638), during his papacy (625–38), took great interest in the Anglo-Saxon mission and granted the first exemption* to the monastery of Bobbio* (628). He is best known for approving monothelitism*, the doctrine of Emperor Heraclius and Sergius, patriarch of Constantinople. He stressed Christ's unity of person (638), using the expression "one will" without clarifying whether there are one or two "activities"; later he declared that Christ is one "agent," with the divine nature acting through the human. The Third Council of Constantinople* (680–81) condemned monothelitism and anathematized Honorius, fueling later arguments against papal infallibility from Conciliarists*, Gallicans*, and Protestants, since this episode indicated that a council may correct a pope.

Honorius of Autun, or Augustodunensis (early 12th c.), monk and scholar who worked in both England and Germany. His writings, widely read, offered an edifying synthesis and popularization of doctrine; some works were translated into the vernacular.

Honor and Shame. Anthropological and sociological studies have introduced the concepts of honor and shame to describe key elements in the cultures* of the Mediterranean at the time of the origins of Christianity. They are paired values used to structure status and all social interactions. "Honor" refers first and foremost to public reputation. The honorable man (honor is conceived of particularly as a male trait) exhibits personal readiness to maintain or extend the honor of his family. Similarly, "shame" refers primarily to public disgrace but also to the personal sensitivity that seeks to avoid it. Such shame (or modesty) is particularly a female virtue.

Honor and shame helped to shape the culture's morality, i.e. the generally accepted rules of correct behavior. A freeman was expected to function in public roles, competing to maintain his household's status. Women, as less public figures, could not normally add to the honor of the household but were expected to avoid any behavior that might detract from it.

Honor could be inherited or bestowed in response to competition. In general, a reputation for gravity, effective authority, liberality toward friends and clients, and respect for the property of others defined an honorable man. The author of the Pastoral Epistles wanted just such men in the leadership of the Christian churches (1 Tim 3:1–13; Titus 1:5–9). Women showed that they had a good sense of shame by dressing modestly and remaining in the background, although some Christian women were apparently testing these assumptions (Titus 2:3–5) (see Household Codes).

Honor and shame shaped sexual behavior by defining approved sexual couplings. Among Greeks and Romans, a freeman might honorably penetrate others, including not only his wife and concubines, but also slaves and prostitutes, male and female. It was shameful, however, for a free man to be penetrated by another man. Jews differed in that they also prohibited the penetration of another male (see Homosexuality).

Similarly, it was shameful for a married woman to be penetrated by anyone other than her husband or for a freewoman to be penetrated by a slave. In female–female sexual relationships, the assumption was that one woman would play a male role, and this reversal of genders was considered shameful.

While not one of the primary ethical principles of either Scripture or ancient philosophy, honor and shame were powerful forces in the structuring of society. Accordingly, they influenced efforts to set ethical guidelines.

L. WILLIAM COUNTRYMAN

Hooker, Richard (1554–1600), studied, then became a fellow, at Corpus Christi, Oxford, tutored by the “godly” (Puritan) divine John Rainolds and apparently numbered among the “godly”; however, Hooker and Rainolds were expelled c1580. After a ministry in Drayton-Beauchamp, Buckinghamshire (1584), Hooker was appointed master (senior priest) of the Temple Church (London, 1585 until 1591, when he resigned) and now held theological views diametrically opposed to those of his “godly” assistant, Walter Travers. In 1595 he became rector of Bishopsbourne near Canterbury, where he lived until his death. Sponsored by George Cranmer and Edwin Sandys, he wrote (late 1580s) the eight-volume Of the Lawes of ecclesiasticall polittie, defending the status quo of the Church of England (see Anglicanism Cluster: In Europe: The United Kingdom). The Lawes, never a best seller, were criticized by many “godly” writers for being obfuscatory. Since the Restoration, Hooker has been regarded as an icon typifying Anglican theology. This “urban myth,” which began with Isaak Walton’s Life of Hooker, has increasingly come under scrutiny in more modern historiography. Contemporary treatments of Hooker’s theology identify him as Reformed* rather than as specifically Anglican. The question, then, is: What was it that made Hooker’s Reformed theology sound so unreformed to his Reformed (Puritan*) contemporaries? BRYAN SPINKS

Hooker, Thomas. See PURITANS, PURITANISM.

Hooper, John (c1495–1555), bishop, martyr, divine. He is remembered for his stand against ecclesiastical vestments* during the reign of Edward VI and martyrdom* in the persecution during Mary’s reign. A graduate of Oxford and a Cistercian*, Hooper was converted to Protestantism after reading Zwingli* and Bullinger*. After 1539 Hooper became a religious exile and studied in Zurich with Bullinger. Returning to England (1549), he was offered the See of Gloucester, which he declined because he objected to the vestments required at consecration. This caused a serious crisis, resolved only by the intervention of Bullinger and Hooper’s reluctant recantation. A model bishop, he was involved in preparing the 1552 Book of Common* Prayer and in revising the canon law. Despite his support for Mary after the death of Edward VI, Hooper was arrested (September 1553) and imprisoned until he was burned at the stake in Gloucester as a heretic* (February 9, 1555). Considered a “proto-Puritan*” because of his strong positions and severe manner, Hooper was nothing of the sort. He governed his diocese with common sense and a generous wisdom that was anything but doctrinaire. But his radical views (attested to by his many writings) and uncompromising personality made him as much an enigma to his contemporaries as he remains today. DAVID G. NEWCOMBE

Hope. Throughout biblical history, hope is portrayed as an especially forward-looking virtue. Hope presupposes that humans need to be “saved” from something (that there is something wrong, beyond human control). Hope expresses trust in God to bring about the fullness of salvation* in the time and the manner determined by God alone. It implies a resolute attitude: hope arises at the core of Christian existence by the grace* of God, acting within the present experience of suffering, endurance, and love* (Rom 5:1–5; cf. 8:22–25). The love that “bears all things, believes all things, hopes all things, endures all things” (1 Cor 13:7) underpins the tough, patient, and enduring character of hope. Through it, Christian life is strengthened for the long haul: its future fulfillment in “God all in all” (1 Cor 15:28). The goal of hope is anticipated in Christ’s rising from the dead. But this “already” is ever looking to a fulfillment that is “not yet.” Confronted by inevitable suffering and struggle, and by those who have “no hope and are without God in the world” (Eph 2:12), Christian witness demands a courageous “accounting of the hope that is within you” (1 Pet 3:16) (see Eschatology Cluster).

With its God-given and God-ward character, hope is traditionally classified, along with faith*, charity, and love*, as a “theological virtue*.” Directed to the future, it relies on God to make clear what faith holds to and what love (or charity) most desires; love for God arouses desire for God. Hope without faith would be blind. Without love, it would be narrowly individualistic, thereby failing to embrace the God who “desires everyone to be saved and to come to the knowledge of the truth” (1 Tim 2:4). Three perspectives on hope can be considered.

1. The virtue of hope has four features. First, it is intent on the supreme good, God, and the Kingdom* (understood as the reign of God over all). Second, it seeks a future good: although we already share in the life of God, "it has not yet appeared what we shall be" (1 John 3:2). Third, it seeks a possible good, in a future guaranteed by God's promise. Finally, it nonetheless pursues a difficult good, for hope demands the surrender and self-giving love involved in following Christ's way. Thus it differs from natural optimism or human planning because it moves toward a future that only God can give.
2. In Homo Viator: Introduction to a Metaphysics of Hope, Gabriel Marcel* has noted the existential* relevance of hope to a world ravaged by two world wars; being human is to be "on a journey" through time, a viator. As hope moves forward, it is not wishful optimism; it comes into its own when one is most tempted to fall into despair. Because it contests all closed visions of human existence, it takes a prophetic* stance, breathing the atmosphere of an ultimate gracious mystery* that can never be fully named or imagined.
3. In The Principle of Hope, Ernst Bloch locates hope at the very heart of historical progress. It animates all quests for freedom*, striving to bring a new society into being. Hope is therefore "utopian," not as a vague aspiration, but as the active, realistic anticipation of new forms of a just society. For the Marxist Bloch, "God" is a symbol for the as yet unrealized possibilities of human freedom. Jürgen Moltmann's Theology of Hope has proved seminal for a critical assimilation of Bloch's work into Christian theology.

Along with the thanksgiving, longing, and intercession of prayer*, the task of hope is to reclaim the heights already occupied by the martyrs*, reformers, saints*, and mystics*. It extends to solidarity with all hopeful people who, however implicitly, insist that there is something worth living and dying for. Christian hope, anchored in Christ, supports and enlarges the hopes of the world for fulfillment, unity, and lasting life (Teilhard* de Chardin).

Hosanna (Gk form of the Heb petition "Save, we pray"; Ps 118:25), uttered by the multitude during Jesus' entry into Jerusalem and adopted into Christian worship.

Hosea, the Book of, collection of oracles from the 8th-c. prophet Hosea; best known for its use of metaphors of marriage* and adultery to describe the relationship between God and Israel.

Hosea prophesied during the tumultuous years before the Assyrian conquest of the Northern Kingdom (721 BCE). In Chaps. 4–14, the prophet's political concerns are evident as he castigates priests, princes, and other power brokers for their bloody political intrigues, ill-advised foreign alliances, corruption, and idolatry* at national shrines. Hosea evokes many ancient traditions, including the Jacob* story, the escape from Egypt, and the wilderness experience to underscore the nation's dependence on YHWH and the dire consequences of rejecting his Law.

Chapters 1–3 dramatize the nation's transgressions and its possible fate through prophetic acts and metaphors involving Hosea's marriage to a promiscuous woman (or prostitute), the ominous names given to their children, the wife's pursuit of her "lovers," divine threats of divorce, and the promise of a new betrothal in the wilderness. This extended metaphor, most likely original to the prophet, draws on societal expectations of wifely fidelity to underscore the covenantal demand for exclusive worship of YHWH.

The metaphor of covenant* as a divine–human marriage has been influential in both Jewish and Christian thought. The metaphor appears again in the oracles of later prophets (e.g. Jer* 3; Ezek* 16, 23), shaped Jewish interpretation of the love* imagery in the Song* of Songs, and provided the model for Christian self-understanding of the church* as the bride of Christ. Many modern readers, however, are troubled by the marriage metaphor's patriarchal* determinants and question its theological utility today.

After Constantine's* victory in the West (312), he functioned as his chief theological adviser and was sent to Alexandria to deal with the Arian* controversy. He presided over the Council of Antioch (325), was a leading figure at the Council of Nicaea* (325), and presided over the Council of Sardica (343). Because of his defense of Athanasius* and the Nicene* Creed, he was banished (355). Under pressure at the Council of Sirmium (357), at the age of 100 he subscribed to its Arianizing* creed and was allowed to return home. There is a possibility that he is the addressee of Calcidius's Latin commentary on Plato's Timaeus.

Hospice, a movement dedicated to improving end-of-life care with a team approach, so that dying persons will have medical, emotional, and spiritual support tailored to their own wishes, in the home or a homelike setting. Care is also extended to family members and loved ones.

Hospitality, the practice of sharing one's home and resources with guests, travelers, and other Christians (including the opening of one's home as a house* church), but also with needy persons: strangers, foreigners, and refugees* as well as the poor (see Poverty Cluster; Preferential Option for the Poor), the sick*, homeless, orphans, and widows. Repeatedly emphasized in the Bible (OT and NT), this practice remained a central element of the Christian life for centuries, although it became less prominent with the advent of Christendom*. Hospitality is presupposed by ascetic* movements, the many forms of renunciation of property* and of ownership*, and monastic* movements; it has been institutionalized in hospitals* and social programs of many kinds. See also CHRISTIAN SOCIALISM; ECONOMY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: ECONOMIC ETHICS AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY; SOCIAL ENCYCLICALS; SOCIAL ETHICS; SOCIAL GOSPEL MOVEMENT.

Hospitallers. Founded as the Hospital of St. John in Jerusalem (late 11th c.) before the beginning of the Crusades*, for more than 900 years the religious* order of Hospitallers has served Christ by caring for the sick and poor. For nearly seven centuries, this military*-religious order also carried out military activities in defense of Christians against Saracens, Mamluks, and Ottoman Turks from its base in the Holy Land, then on Rhodes and Malta. Today, the order's headquarters are in Rome and it continues charitable work through its national associations throughout the world.

As a hospice in which brothers under religious vows gave spiritual care to the sick poor, with limited medical care, the Hospital of Jerusalem was typical of the hospitals established in Western Europe at this time. By the 1130s, the military needs of the crusaders in Syria and Palestine led the Hospitallers to take up active military functions, and the Hospital was gradually transformed into a military* religious order.

The Hospitallers regarded military activity against the enemies of Christendom* as a labor of love toward other Christians: warrior-brothers who fought and died in that service won spiritual merit. Other members of the order included servants, priests, and sisters who followed a largely contemplative* lifestyle, as well as male and female associates. In their devotional practices, members placed special emphasis on martyr-saints, such as their patron St. John the Baptist, St. Sebastian, and St. Catharine of Alexandria, as well as warrior-saints such as St. George.

After the Mamluk conquest of Palestine and Syria (1291), the Hospitallers moved their headquarters to Cyprus, then to Rhodes, where they set up a new infirmary to care for sick, poor pilgrims to the East and warred against Ottoman shipping vessels. After Rhodes was captured (1522) by the Ottomans, the Hospitallers set up a new base on Malta (1530), from which they continued naval operations against the Barbary pirates. Their military activity ended with Napoleon Bonaparte's conquest of Malta (1798).

During the medieval period, the Hospitallers' infirmary cared for all comers, Jews and Muslims as well as Christians, while its diplomatic contacts with Muslim leaders were beneficial for the defense of Christendom (e.g. their alliance with the Ottoman prince Jem, 1481–95). The modern order continues to undertake essential medical work in some of the most needy areas of the world.

HELEN J. NICHOLSON

Hospitals and Healing Programs as Christian Ministry. Caring for all in need and not just for one's own kin has been an essential element of Christian life and the life of the church from the beginning. Jesus charged those who wanted to serve him to serve the needy (Matt 25:31–46), and the apostles appointed congregational attendants to look after those in need of help (Acts 6:1–6). Soon after Christianity was elevated to the rank of an official religion in the Roman Empire, Bishop Basil* of Caesarea (the Great) established in 369/70 the "Basiliads," an institution for the care of the poor and the sick, setting an example for many similar initiatives. It heralded the unprecedented history of institutionalized charity* motivated by the desire to witness to God's unconditional love to humankind in Christ.

"Hospital," meaning a place for the reception and welcoming of guests ("hotel" and "hostel" are derivatives), was the general term by which these institutions became euphemistically known. Staffed by members of religious or lay orders, often founded just for that purpose, hospitals usually were comparatively small charitable institutions serving not only the sick, but orphans, widows, and the destitute alike. Accordingly, until the 19th c., by which time medicine had evolved from an art to a science, with the laboratory and microscope, hygiene and antiseptics at its core, hospitals hardly resembled contemporary hospitals.

Once medicine proved capable of healing fatal diseases, turning hospitals from places of care into places of curing, pious physicians, in their desire to imitate Christ, felt compelled to bring healing to all people in need, the "all" now having a truly global ring. Supported by philanthropists and later joined by the still very young profession of nursing, they established hospital-based medical missions at home and abroad where, motivated by disinterested benevolence, they rendered medical help gratuitously irrespective of gender, race, or creed.

But when hospitals turned into highly sophisticated, expensive institutions and once national health care services and the World Health Organization (1948) were in place, it was realized that, in order to remain truthful to its mandate, the Christian ministry of healing should focus on programs of disease prevention and comprehensive healing accessible to all rather than remain a competitor in the health care business. Consequently, most of the hospitals were transferred to other hands; healing programs of various kinds were developed and continue to receive support from the churches. See also HEALTH, HEALING, AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

House Churches. Jesus often stayed in private houses on his travels. Paul mentions the "church in the house" of Aquila and Prisca (1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:5), and other names he mentioned are probably those of hosts and hostesses ("heads of household" could be wives or widows) in house churches (Rom 16:2 and 23; 1 Cor 16:15–16; cf. Col 4:15). But the church gathering is sometimes differentiated from the home gathering (1 Cor 11:22 and 34), and for several centuries, Christianity was criticized for undermining the family and the household.

Thus English Nonconformists* and Friends* used appropriate language when they called their places of worship "meeting* houses." Early Christians usually met in private homes, although Justin* rented a hall "above Martinus" in Rome. In the Greco-Roman world, homes were often the locale of various collegia, or associations, philosophical schools, mystery cults, and synagogues. While leadership might be exercised by a guest (priest, philosopher, apostle, or prophet), the etiquette remained that of the household; the householder, a person of some means, inevitably acquired informal or formal authority. Hospitality* toward strangers, praised in the NT (1 Pet 4:9), is one of the requirements for becoming a bishop (1 Tim 3:2; Titus 1:8). The Eucharist* and the *agape began as meals in household settings, and Paul was aware of the tension between customary dinner practices and the needs of gathering "as the church"; he said that if the former are predominant, "it is not the Lord's supper that you eat" (1 Cor 11:18–22).

Early Christian vocabulary seems to move from the "house church" to "the whole church" (Rom 16:23), i.e. all the house churches, which can be called collectively the "household of God" (1 Tim 3:15), then to the church "in the city" (cf. the salutations of Paul's letters). Even when there were multiple meeting places, there was unity through the presbyters* and eventually the monepiscopate*. By the early 3rd c., as the excavation at Dura-Europos shows, a portion of a private home might be rebuilt for exclusively religious use, with a baptistery* and a platform for the eucharistic table. In the late 3rd c., buildings called "the house of the church" were constructed, apparently according to the basilica* plan.

With the subsequent institutionalization of the (Eastern and Western) churches, the center of church life and of communal worship shifted to basilica and church buildings (see Hierotopy, the Creation of Christian Sacred Spaces), with accompanying shifts in ecclesiology. Yet throughout Christian history, house churches can be found as a sole place of worship and church life, especially during persecutions – e.g. in North* Africa (7th–11th c.), where Christianity survived under Islamic rule before disappearing – as well as in branches of Christianity excluded (or excluding themselves) from mainline churches (e.g. in the West, Hussites*, Valdeses*, Anabaptists*, Dissenters*, members of the Independent* and Free Church and of the Restoration* Movement). The factor that determines whether a location is a church* is neither sacred space (church buildings) nor sacred institution, but the gathering of believers and a sense of mission* (the church exists not for itself, but for others).

In the early 21st c., in addition to house churches developed in situations of actual or potential persecution (see, e.g., Chinese Contemporary Independent and House Churches), house churches have been established by the Charismatic* Movement, particularly in its indigenous, postdenominational form. These independent groups of laypersons meet together for biblical studies and prayer in homes, apartments, compounds, or other informal places, participating in charismatic worship, often using “praise* and worship” music adapted to their religious and cultural contexts around the world. Another growing use of the house church model is related to megachurches*, composed of many “cells” that meet in homes.

EUGENE TESELLE and DANIEL PATTE

Household Codes are instructions regarding how groups in the “extended family” or “household” should interact with each other. As first discussed, though not labeled “household codes,” by Aristotle (Politics), such sociopolitical norms addressed the paterfamilias in his three household roles of husband, father, and master (with authority over wife, children*, and slaves*). Within the Christian canon, household codes start to show up in the pseudonymous Pauline literature (Eph 5:22–6:9; Col 3:18–4:1), in 1 Pet 2:18–3:7, and throughout the Pastoral Epistles (and are possibly found in other NT passages, if one also includes instructions that are addressed to any member of a household or that encourage obedience to elders and other ecclesial authorities). This adoption of household codes is an indication that with the organizational development of the Jesus movement, certain Roman or imperial standards had to be embraced (see Inculturation Cluster: Of Christianity in the Greco-Roman World). Rather than addressing the paterfamilias, the NT adaptations of the household codes address the wives, slaves, and children directly. Are their presence and importance acknowledged, as some say? The household codes also become a vehicle for inscribing a patriarchal* (kyriarchal) structure in ecclesial gatherings and valorize the suffering of slaves and wives as Christ-like. The adaptation of a sociopolitical norm in Christian texts affirms its prevalence as social expectation – indeed, as a political norm – since proper maintenance of the household was the most important support of Empire.

The texts requiring that slaves be submissive to their masters (Eph 6:5–8; Col 3:22–4; Titus 2:9–10; 1 Pet 2:18–25) became primary texts for sermons addressed to African slaves in the North American colonies, and the texts that wives be submissive to their husbands (Eph 5:22–33; Col 3:18; 2 Tim 2:8–15; Titus 2:3–5; 1 Pet 3:1–7) are understood to imply that no woman should be a teacher or leader of men. See also COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE; EPHESIANS, EPISTLE TO THE; PASTORAL EPISTLES, 1 AND 2 TIMOTHY AND TITUS; PETER, 1 AND 2 EPISTLES OF.

Howe, Julia Ward (1819–1910), author of the US “Battle Hymn of the Republic,” inventor of Mother’s Day, women’s rights reformer. Born to a wealthy New York family, she married (1843) Dr. Samuel Gridley Howe, a pioneer in education for the blind, then lived in Boston.

Stifled by Samuel’s insistence that as a wife and mother she remain in the domestic realm, Howe wrote poems, plays, philosophy, and theology (1860s). A tour of Union army campsites (November 1861) inspired her to pen the words to “The Battle Hymn of the Republic.” After the Civil War, Howe joined the woman suffrage and club movements, helping found the New England Woman’s Club and the Woman’s Journal.

Her opposition to the Franco-Prussian War (1870–71) prompted her to call on women around the world to celebrate a “Mother’s Day of Peace” annually, arguing that humanity would never fully appreciate its creation in God’s image* until it allowed the nurturing love embodied by mothers to moderate male aggression. In Howe’s theology, God* was just as much a mother as a father.

After her husband's death (1876), Howe campaigned for woman suffrage, the cause of peace, and the ordination* of women. Both Mother's Day and the "Battle Hymn" remain American icons. VALARIE H. ZIEGLER

Hubmaier, Balthasar (c1485–1528), Anabaptist* leader in Southern Germany and Austria. Following studies at the University of Freiburg im Breisgau and, in scholastic theology, at the University of Ingolstadt (with Johann Eck, future adversary of Luther), Hubmaier became cathedral preacher in Regensburg, pilgrimage preacher at the Chapel of the Blessed Mary, and pastor in Waldshut (Austria), remaining dedicated to Catholic observances. In 1523 he became an open proponent of the Reformation and challenged the Catholic clerics to a religious disputation (1524) with 18 theses affirming justification* by faith alone and the Mass* as a memorial of Christ's death (not a sacrifice), and denouncing all the major scholastic theologians, belief in purgatory*, and most traditional Catholic practices, including pilgrimages. Hubmaier's first theological treatise, On the Christian Baptism of Believers (1525), was a defense of believers' baptism*, which he promoted as a part of the general Reformation program. Hubmaier and his wife joined Anabaptists seeking refuge in Moravia, where various religious confessions were legally tolerated, settling in Nikolsburg (Mikulov, 1526). But he was extradited to Vienna (July 1527) when Ferdinand of Austria assumed the crown of Bohemia and Moravia. Charged with rebellion while in Waldshut, he was interrogated and burned at the stake (March 1528). ESTHER CHUNG-KIM

Recalled to England (1956) by his religious order, the Community of the Resurrection, he revisited South Africa briefly after its independence, and his ashes were buried there. See also SOUTH AFRICA. MOKGETHI MOTLHABI

Hugh of St. Victor (also Hugo or Hugues; c1096–1141), medieval theologian, who studied at the monastery of St. Victor (Paris), became head of the school of St. Victor (or Victorine school), and wrote numerous spiritual and mystical* works, as well as commentaries combining literal* and allegorical* interpretation. His De sacramentis (On the Mysteries of the Christian Faith, c1134) was an influential systematic theology. This work affected the development of Scholasticism*, because it was the first to synthesize patristic teachings and to systematize them so as to organize them into a coherent and complete body of doctrine – a systematic theology.

Huguenots. "Huguenots" (along with "Calvinists") was the appellation frequently given to members of the French Reformed* Church. The movement, inspired largely by the French John Calvin's* reform of the Francophone city of Geneva, took root in France (1550s).

The etymology of the word "Huguenot" remains controversial. Does the label suggest association with the early king Hugh Capet? Or, more likely, was it a corruption of Eidgenossen (confederates), referring to the Genevan protective alliance with Protestant Bern (1536) and then applied to French Reformed Protestants? Catholics initially employed "Huguenot" in a pejorative sense. Still, French Reformed Protestants appropriated the word, applying it particularly to their military and political activities: the Huguenot army and the Huguenot cause. The designation took on new life among the Protestants who fled France after the proscription of the Reformed Church (1685; see Nantes, Edict of, and Its Revocation). Refugees clung to their Huguenot identity as they sought asylum in Switzerland*, the Netherlands*, Germany*, the British Isles, North America, and elsewhere.

While subscribing to the theological tenets espoused by Calvin, Huguenots contributed their own distinctive sense of order. The national Confession of Faith (1559, revised in 1571 and thereafter known as the "Confession de foi de la Rochelle") established the fundamentals of belief, while the Discipline (1559) instituted polity*. Taken together, the two statements elaborated a theology founded on the directives of Scripture* and a liturgy focused on its explanation through the pastor's sermons. The administration of the sacraments, notably baptism and quarterly celebration of the Lord's* Supper, completed the life of worship. The Huguenots exhibited a strong sense of order in their polity; they were the first Reformed Church to have a structured series of representative bodies. Each local church possessed a consistory* staffed by pastor*, elders*, and deacons*. They met weekly to confer on details of church administration, oversee the distribution of poor* relief, and discuss breaches of Christian conduct.

Above the consistory, a synod* regularly gathered representatives from the various local churches in a region then at the national level. At each level, the delegates clarified belief, developed polity, and settled disputes among the faithful. A strong need for the correction of sin* added to the sense of order and discipline. Consistories regulated marriage and sexuality, rooted out superstition, and settled people's quarrels in the expectation of constructing a godly society. See also PROTESTANTISM CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: FRANCE.

Humanae Vitae (Of human life), a 1968 encyclical by Pope Paul VI on the regulation of birth that reaffirms the traditional teaching of the Roman Catholic Church regarding abortion*, contraception (see Birth Control and Contraception, Christian Views of), and other issues pertaining to human life.

Humani Generis, encyclical of Pius* XII "concerning some false opinions threatening to undermine the foundations of Catholic doctrine," issued (1950) to correct the questioning attitude and research priorities of the new French theology and other forms of postwar theological revival. It emphasizes two basic convictions: the indivisibility and timeless nature of truth*; and a corporate view of theology (theologians are assistants who communicate the official teachings of the Roman Catholic Church and not their private thoughts). Pius XII also acknowledged that biological evolution* was compatible with the Christian faith, yet argued that God's intervention was necessary for the creation of the human soul*.

Humanism and Renaissance. In Italy a umanista (14th c.) was a practitioner of the studia humanitatis – the disciplines of grammar, poetry, rhetoric, history, moral philosophy, and politics. Humanism was distinguished from professional studies in law, medicine, and theology. The earliest statement of the humanist program of education is Pier Paolo Vergerio's The Character and Studies Befitting a Free-Born Youth (c1402). (Renaissance humanism has no relation to humanism as a nontheistic philosophy of life that originated in the 19th c.) The Renaissance humanist curriculum had many associations with and implications for Christianity.

Grammar included proficiency in languages. Coluccio Salutati (1336–1406) argued that grammar is not Christian but that no Christian can understand Holy Scripture* without it. Humanists used their knowledge to translate and annotate classical texts: Lorenzo Valla (1407–57) wrote Notes on the New Testament (1449–50), later (1504) published by Erasmus*; Giannozzo Manetti (1396–1459) translated the NT into Latin. From the early 1500s, humanists were instrumental in the translation and exegesis of the Bible in French, German, English, and other languages.

Rhetoric. Vergerio, in a series of sermons at the papal court (c1405), introduced Jerome* as the model of a Christian scholar. Erasmus, who viewed Jerome as his patron saint, penned the most enduring example of humanist oratory in Praise of Folly (1511 and 1514, anticipating Luther's* criticisms of the Roman Catholic Church), the book that justifies the assertion that "Erasmus laid the egg Luther hatched."

History. In his Donation of Constantine*, Valla used grammatical and historical arguments to refute the belief that Constantine had willed the western half of his empire to Pope Sylvester. Luther cited this text in his critiques of the papacy. Many Protestant historians followed Valla's example in rewriting the history of the Church.

Politics. Niccolò Machiavelli (1469–1527) transformed political thought with his contention in The Prince that politics is about power, not morality, a notion that in the centuries since has proved profoundly disturbing to Christians. More* (1478–1535) argued in Utopia (a new genre based on Plato's Republic) that the problem with contemporary civilization is greed and the solution is to curb it.

Moral Philosophy. Humanists addressed a host of moral philosophical questions: Is the human condition vile or dignified? Does nobility lie in birth or personal virtue? Does authority rest in Scripture* and tradition* or only in Scripture? Is the human will* bound or free? Humanists remained open on most questions before the Reformation*. Thereafter, they became embroiled in the struggles it engendered.

1) Introductory Entry

Human Rights. The concept of human rights entered the political realm with the English Magna Carta (1215), the British Bill of Rights (1689), the Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776), the French Declaration of the Rights of Man (1789), and the US Bill of Rights (1791). These guarantee “negative rights,” limiting the range of government action; they were animated by opposition to absolutism or the divine right of kings. They have since been supplemented by the more controversial notion of “positive rights,” claims on society or government (e.g. clean air and water*, land*, opportunities for housing, employment, and retirement income). Both kinds of rights are enshrined in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), which was motivated by an awareness of the “barbarous acts” committed during World War II and by protests against many aspects of colonialism*.

The Christian tradition has adopted various attitudes toward human rights. The affirmation of human dignity is often justified by appeal to the creation of humans in the image* of God, to God’s grace*, and to the Incarnation*.

The early church asserted that faith* must be voluntary and not coerced, and the Edict of Milan* (313) made this an official policy. Dissenting movements throughout Christian history have often reasserted this position in the face of coercion by church and state; theological justifications were developed by Anabaptists* and especially Spirituals* during the Reformation, by Independents* during the English Revolution, and by Roger Williams* in Rhode Island. Religious pluralism was championed in some countries, most notably Poland*. Bartolomé de las* Casas and others, building on the tradition of natural* law, asserted the rights of indigenous peoples in the Spanish colonies in the Americas.

Other perspectives often dominated. Beginning with Theodosius*, imperial laws were directed against “pagans*,” Jews (see Judaism and Christianity Cluster), and Christian “heretics*.” The growing partnership between church* and state fostered not only the punishment of dissenters but forced conversion of conquered peoples (especially under Charlemagne* against the Saxons). When inquisitors* declared persons to be heretics, they could be delivered to the “secular* arm” for execution. Rulers not only enforced the church’s judgments, but often tried to control the church for the sake of political unity. The Edict of Nantes* (1598), which permitted a degree of religious diversity in France, was later revoked (1685) by Louis XIV.

The modern affirmation of human rights emerged from criticism of the actions of both church and state, and from actual experience of religious pluralism, showing that it was a permanent fact, was not destructive, and even enhanced civic life. Holders of these views continued to struggle against the older notion that “error does not have the same rights as truth” and that religious conformity is needed for public order. Gradually, human rights were affirmed during the 19th c., after World War II, and at the Second Vatican* Council; but authoritarian governments (at times with the complicity of churches) continue to deny human rights in various ways. Missionary activity in the non-Western world has been met with hostility among the populace and governmental action against those who change their religion, especially in Islamic but also in Hindu regions.

Yet the churches have defended human rights in the face of dictatorships, especially in Latin America and in Africa, documenting abuses and encouraging the creation of truth* and reconciliation commissions (see Reconciliation as Christian Praxis).

Christians continue to disagree over how far human rights should be extended, especially in Western Europe and the USA. Some insist on gender equality, while others adhere to traditional views of gender roles. Some see legal safeguards for reproductive freedom, including abortion* and birth* control, as human rights, whereas others insist that they are contrary to natural* law and demand the right to abstain from participation (as physicians, nurses, or pharmacists). Some believe that the civil institution of marriage* includes rights for same-sex couples, whereas others see it as a violation of both natural law and the traditions of church and society. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS CLUSTER; JUSTICE, CHRISTIAN THEOLOGICAL VIEWS AND PRACTICES, CLUSTER. EUGENE TESELLE

Human Rights and the Churches in Africa. In Africa, deeply affected by past and ongoing colonialism*, slavery*, forced labor, and exploitation of all kinds, churches see human rights in terms of a theology of creation* and of redemption* based on God's will (the Ten* Commandments, Exod 20:1–17), the creation of humans in God's image*, God's everlasting love* for humans reflected through their love for one another (John 13:34–35), and the redemption of God's people through Moses and Jesus (emphasized by Liberation* theology). African Christians understand creation and redemption as people of faith* who love God and depend on God with a living confidence and trust in God's love, grace* (in Christ Jesus), guidance, and care.

From this perspective, human rights and the gospel are understood in terms of each other. The right to freedom is God given; it is part of people's humanity as creatures in the image of God (whether they believe in God or not), and is not granted by the state or other institutions, including the church. Christian churches have simply the duty to stand for the God-given rights of human beings as they live in communities.

The church exists to serve the world and thus should not withdraw into spiritualistic isolation from worldly matters, as it often did by denying or ignoring the violations of human rights. For instance, in Angola*, the church long ignored flagrant violations of human rights by the two main factions involved in a bloody civil war. Finally assuming their duty, the Roman Catholic Church and the Protestant churches issued statements (pastoral letters) denouncing the violation of basic human rights and the resulting degradation of Angolan society through loss of its core values of humanness and the ensuing violence and dehumanization. For instance, looking at Angolan women, one can see on most of them deep scars of violation, of having been forced to serve as human shields in war, as food gatherers for their families and for armies, as combatants' wives, and as carriers of munitions, and today these women are reduced to foraging in garbage dumps for survival and are themselves treated as garbage of society. A sound society is not possible if the wounds of past ill treatment are not cared for. As they become aware of these violations of human rights, churches are working together across denominations and with secular nongovernmental organizations. Yet Africa and African churches have a long way to go in the struggle for human rights and in dealing with the long-term consequences of their violations.

Human Rights and the Churches in Asia: The Philippines. A peaceful "people's power revolution" brought down a mighty dictatorship on the strength of prayer, public statements, and courageous actions (1986). Jaime Cardinal Sin led Roman Catholics, other Christians, Muslims, and political groups, ending 14 years of brutal violations of human rights.

Church–state relations had soured when President Ferdinand Marcos declared martial law (1972), ostensibly to reform society, arresting without warrants thousands of opponents, ranging from feudal oligarchs to idealist youth. Hundreds disappeared. Many were routinely tortured.

The churches awoke. For Catholics, Vatican* II reforms had prepared the ground for church social action. Protestant churches were even more ready. The 1974 national assembly of United Church of Christ in the Philippines called for “freedom of speech” so that “voters could speak out their minds in a national referendum”; it cried out that “many of those detained have not been charged in court,” that “citizens were maltreated.” It called for justice*, asserting that “every individual, however lowly, is a child of the Heavenly Father.” Protestant pastors and church members were among those detained and tortured. In 1978 the United Church called for the dismantling of martial law. The Protestant Church was promptly labeled a “subversive front.” The battle was joined by Roman Catholics, and culminated in the defeat of the dictatorship in 1986, one step in the ongoing struggle for human rights. Human Rights and the Churches in Latin America. The struggle of the Dominican Bartolomé de las* Casas and other clergy in the 16th c. to defend the “Indians” signaled a major landmark in the history of human rights. As a result of that struggle, the Spanish crown formally recognized “Indians” as persons with the same rights as Europeans. In practice, however, Christian natives were exploited, and non-Christian natives were not accorded the same rights. Furthermore, the Roman Catholic Church tolerated black slavery*, although it did protect slaves against abuses and upheld their right to marry and maintain stable relationships. During the wars of independence, Creole clergy (whites born in Latin America) fought for democracy* and equal rights for natives and blacks in the new societies. During the 19th c., the Church became very conservative politically and socially. Nevertheless, in many instances, bishops and priests intervened in favor of natives during antigovernment rebellions.

After Vatican* II, and especially after the episcopal conference of the Latin American bishops in Medellín* (1968), the Catholic Church emerged as one of the principal defenders of human rights, especially during the repressive right-wing dictatorships in Brazil*, Bolivia*, Paraguay*, and Central America. Many churchmen and churchwomen were imprisoned, tortured, and murdered because they defended workers, peasants, and others victims of human rights violence. Archbishop Oscar Romero*, murdered in El* Salvador in 1980, and Luis Espinal, a Jesuit murdered the same year in Bolivia* by a paramilitary group, have become symbols of that era. In Chile* the Vicariate of Solidarity, founded by Cardinal Silva-Henríquez, protected Chileans during the Pinochet dictatorship. In São Paulo, the Peace and Justice Commission founded by Cardinal Paulo Arns* protected prisoners during the military dictatorship in Brazil*. In El Salvador, Tutela Legal, founded by Archbishop Romero, had the same function.

But Catholic bishops were deeply divided over the issue of personal and social rights. For progressive bishops, the rights to own land* and enjoy job security were perceived as a necessary complement to individual rights. Conservative bishops recognized only the rights to life and to physical integrity. In Argentina* the episcopate maintained an overly discrete silence during the “dirty war” (1976–83), when the military kidnapped and executed thousands of Argentinians. In Peru* during the period of terrorism unleashed by the Shining Path (1980–92), Liberation* theology Christians defended the rights of the poor* who were victims of both the terrorists and the military. But the Opus* Dei archbishop of Ayacucho – the home of the Shining Path – refused to deal even with human rights organizations of the Roman Catholic Church. In Castro’s Cuba*, the churches are not allowed to speak out on political issues, including human rights.

The historical Protestant churches also took a strong stand in defense of human rights and frequently collaborated in ecumenical peace efforts with the Catholic Church. In Peru the Department of Peace and Hope, founded by Protestants, worked closely with the Catholic bishops' Social Action Commission during the war against the Shining Path. However, Protestants of a fundamentalist persuasion, frequently encouraged by politically conservative Evangelicals from the USA, openly supported right-wing dictatorships.

In every country, individual Christians, with or without official church support, also contributed to the human rights movements. In Argentina Adolfo Pérez Esquivel*, a layman and Nobel Peace Prize winner (1980), helped organize the Mothers of Plaza de Mayo, mothers whose children had been kidnapped because they were considered "subversives" by groups acting on behalf of government officials. In Uruguay* the Jesuit José Luis Pérez Aguirre founded the Justice and Peace Service for Uruguay. Certain Jesuit-founded centers, like Tutela Legal (El Salvador) and the Miguel Agustín Pro Human Rights Center in Mexico*, have gained both national respect and official harassment for their work.

Human Rights and the Churches in Latin America: Brazil. Although the expression "human rights" is not explicitly mentioned in Scripture, many biblical passages stress human dignity. For instance, since human beings were made "in the image" of God" (Gen 1:27), any human rights' violation disfigures the Creator. Similarly, the gospel accounts of Christ's unjust and violent death reveal, for the faithful, an incarnated God totally identified with human suffering.

In Latin America, contemporary Christian analyses, especially those inspired by Liberation* theology, have reinterpreted the Bible to discern its teaching regarding how to fight for the rights of the oppressed*: the poor*, the weak, and other marginalized* people. Brazil is the largest and richest Latin American country, but it is also the country with the greatest inequality in wealth distribution.

Theologians, clergy, and religious groups denounced state agencies, especially security forces, for constantly abusing human rights. These religious groups strove to link gospel practice and social justice by creating movements for land* and urban reform and for the defense of slum dwellers, the homeless, Amerindians, immigrants, prisoners, and other oppressed people. These movements inspired the creation of non-governmental organizations to denounce racial, social, and gender prejudices and injustices.

This connection between Christian faith and the needs of the oppressed was forged in Brazil in the late 1950s by Roman Catholics and, subsequently, by Protestants, especially Lutherans, Presbyterians, and Methodists (and, to some extent, neo-Charismatics*/Pentecostals). Specialists argue that ecumenical projects on human rights and other social problems must cast a broader net in Brazilian society, following the successful model of the CPT (Comissão Pastoral da Terra, the "Pastoral Commission for Land") and of the project known as "Brasil: Nunca Mais" (Brazil: Never Again). The CPT, a commission of the Brazilian Roman Catholic Ecclesial Conference with Protestant (mainly Lutheran) cooperation, struggles for land policy reform and denounces violence against rural workers. "Brasil: Nunca Mais" was the name of a top-secret investigation (begun in 1979, published in 1985), which furnished proof of the systematic use of torture during the Brazilian military regime (1964–85). Led by Cardinal Paulo Evaristo Arns*, former archbishop of São Paulo, with financial support from the World Council of Churches, "Brasil: Nunca Mais" investigated the dictatorship's most violent period (1964–79), described torture methods, and named more than 400 torturers. Human Rights and the Churches in Latin America: Mexico. The Pontifical Council for the Laity in Rome is the place where one can find information about the repression exercised by South American dictatorships; about the exile of Christians who struggle for human rights in Central America; about Guatemalan* refugees; as well as about the selective political repression practiced by the Mexican* government against bishops, religious, and laity, primarily because of their denunciation of violations of human rights of other people and only secondarily because they protest violations of human rights of which they are victims. They were inspired in this present-day defense of human rights by those missionaries who defended the dignity of the natives as Friar Bartolomé de las* Casas did. Following in his footsteps were the bishops Sergio Méndez* Arceo, Samuel Ruíz, and Arturo Lona; the novelist and poet José Álvarez Icaza; Miguel Concha, OP; Jesús Maldonado, SJ; and Digna Ochoa (a human rights lawyer, who was killed in her Mexico City office, 2001). There are several human rights centers in Mexico struggling against human rights violations.

RAQUEL PASTOR

Hume, David (1711–76), Scottish philosopher, economist, historian. He propounded the principle of “empiricism,” whereby all other concepts must be definable in terms of basic empirical (sensory or introspective) and formal (logical) concepts. The test is whether the words expressing an alleged concept are definable without remainder in words expressing only empirical and logical concepts. “God*” and “soul*” cannot be so defined; thus these words do not express (actual) concepts. The same principle applies to sentences. An apparent declarative statement is meaningful only if it can be stated in sentences made up of words that express only empirical and logical concepts. “God and souls exist” fails this test. This seems to provide a powerful criticism of theology and traditional philosophy, neither of which survives the test. Each is self-defeating.

Having used his theories against his opponents, Hume quietly ignores them in writing his own works. He criticizes natural* theology, especially the argument from design, in Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion. He offered a theory of the origins of religion in The Natural History of Religion. According to this theory, belief in God arises from human propensities to form beliefs that had been awakened by widespread if not universal experiences, especially the awareness of order in nature. Since these propensities do not operate in everyone, and do not produce the same beliefs in everyone in whom they operate, the propensities that give rise to religious beliefs are not part of human nature. Hence they do not result in natural beliefs – beliefs that it is our nature to have. We thus cannot justify having such religious beliefs in the same way that we can justify our belief in empirical and logical concepts. Justifying our religious beliefs is not a matter of having any reason or evidence for thinking these beliefs to be true, but only of rendering us blameless in having them.

KEITH E. YANDELL

Humility (from Lat for “lowly”), the quality or state of being lowly, of having a lowly opinion of oneself; it stands in contrast to pride. Understood by Christians as submission to God, especially when linked with contrition* (Isa 58:57:15), it was considered a religious virtue*. Christ is praised for humbling himself (kenosis*), to the extent of having died on the cross (Phil 2:8). In Christian practice, submission to God has been understood as not having too high an opinion of oneself (Rom 12:3), and receiving correction, especially from superiors but also from others. Feminist*, Liberation*, and postcolonialist* theologians have criticized this self-abasement, especially when it involves acceptance of inequalities originating in human society.

Hungary. The history of Christianity in the territory of the present Republic of Hungary is as complex as its political history. Christianity first arrived in the 3rd c. in the Pannonian Roman province (west of the Danube). Then Arian*, Roman Catholic, and Orthodox missionaries worked among the Huns, Goths*, Lombards*, Avars, and Franks (ruled by Charlemagne*), who successively occupied the region, before the Magyars (Hungarians) with ties to the Orthodox Church invaded it from the east (896). The Magyars’ princes opted for the Latin Church; Stephen I (later canonized) was given the title of apostolic king by the pope (1000) and made Hungary a Catholic kingdom. He converted to Catholicism a population that had been partly Orthodox and partly non-Christian with the help of Italian, German, and Bohemian missionaries, but also through the establishment of a feudal* system that involved adopting the religion of one’s lord. Following an initial defeat by the Mongols (1241), the Hungarian kingdom was fortified and reached its peak, repelling Mongol (13th c.) and Ottoman (15th c.) invasions, becoming a shield for Western Christianity and occupying a vast territory in Central Europe.

In 1526 the kingdom was defeated by the Ottomans and divided into three parts. The west, under the control of the Austrian* Hapsburgs, remained Roman Catholic. In the central part, occupied by Turks indifferent to Christian divisions, Lutheran and Reformed churches were established (late 16th c.). The eastern part, Transylvania, was independent and granted freedom of worship to Roman Catholics, Lutherans, Reformed, and Unitarians*. By 1600 a majority of Hungarians were Protestants, primarily Reformed. But when the Austrian Hapsburgs expelled the Ottomans (1686–99), they introduced the Counter* Reformation, led by Jesuits*; a series of anti-Hapsburg and anti-Catholic uprisings by Protestants and Unitarians seeking freedom of religion (1704–11) were crushed. When the Edict of Toleration was finally granted (1780), Protestants had been reduced to less than a third of the population. In the late 19th c., the Roman Catholic Church experienced an “awakening” that resulted in many religious vocations to the priesthood and the monastic life; the Roman Catholic Church grew in influence, all the more so when Hungary lost many of its Lutheran territories as it achieved independence from Austria after World War I.

Judaism* became religio licita (late 19th c.) in this Christian nation. The Jewish community numbered more than 800,000 before World War II; the anarchy and economic crisis of the interwar period were blamed on “the Jews,” and it was this anti-Semitism that fueled the Hungarian Holocaust in 1944 (when 600,000 Hungarian Jews were deported and died, most in Auschwitz).

During the Communist period (1947–89), the churches faced both the official atheistic propaganda and the secularization* of church schools and institutions. Religion was banned from public life. The totalitarian Communist mobilization of society created a schizophrenic division between the private and public lives of people. In Hungary, satirically called “the happiest barrack” among the Communist societies, the religious segment of society was officially under state control, although it remained active in rural areas and behind closed doors in the cities. Since the establishment of a new democratic regime in 1989, there has been freedom to practice one’s religion in both private and public life. As a consequence, many different forms of religion have emerged, with widespread participation in birth, marriage, and death ceremonies, in Christmas and Easter celebrations, and in popular Catholic devotions. More than 200 churches, denominations, sects, and cults are registered. Yet the effects of secularization* are strongly felt.

Statistics: Population (2001): 10.2 million. Roman Catholics, 51.9%; Reformed, 15.9%; Evangelicals (Lutherans), 3.0%; Greek Catholics, 2.6%; Orthodox, 0.1%; other Christians, 0.8%; Jews, 0.1%; other religionists (including Muslims), 0.1%; nonreligious, 14.5%; no response, 10.8%. (Based on 2001 census.)

Hurley, Dennis (1915–2004), Catholic archbishop of Durban and, for a long time, the lone voice in the Roman Catholic Church in South Africa in the struggle against apartheid* and in the advocacy of human* rights. As president of the Southern African Catholic Bishops Conference, he also worked for reconciliation among the churches and promoted joint communal celebrations. See also SOUTH AFRICA.

Hus, Jan (c1373–1415), theological reformer, priest; catalyzed the Hussite revolution in Bohemia and Moravia, which led to the development of the Moravian* Church. Condemned at the Council of Constance for heresy* and burned at the stake, he remained an important symbol for Czech* nationalism.

Educated at the University of Prague (1390–1409) and a preacher at Bethlehem Chapel in Prague (1402–1415), he welcomed Wyclif’s* thought, which was promoted by Czechs who studied at Oxford. Wyclif’s reforming ecclesiology resonated with Czech discontent but was condemned by Archbishop Zbyněk Zajíc and university officials (1403). Yet Hus and Jerome* of Prague continued to preach against clerical ownership of property. For them claiming ecclesiastical office without embracing apostolic poverty* evinced a lack of the grace that was necessary to hold that office. Their anti-papalism was agreeable to Wenceslas IV, the Bohemian king. But when Hus began to condemn the papacy as Antichrist*, Wenceslas turned against him (1412), forcing Hus to go into hiding.

While in exile, Hus wrote De Ecclesia, arguing that the church* is the universal body of the predestined*, who alone are members of the body of Christ. The division between Roman and Eastern Christianity, he said, suggests the impossibility of the Roman Church's claim to be universal; the church, furthermore, has no need of a pope or cardinals. While borrowing many of Wyclif's arguments, Hus forgoes the philosophical and theological depth of Wyclif's treatises for the sake of brevity and clarity of exposition. Hus did not deny transubstantiation*, but favored *utraquism, in which the communicant takes both bread and wine, over the usual custom of taking the bread alone.

In 1414 Emperor Sigismund and John XXII called the Council of Constance*; Hus was tricked into going. After being tried by the council (under Jean Gerson's* influence), he died at the stake on July 6, 1415. STEPHEN E. LAHEY

Hutchinson, Anne Marbury (1591–1643), lay leader in England, then New England, central figure in the “free grace” controversy, considered a progenitor of feminism*, Quakerism*, and American individualism. Though excluded from the ministry as other women were, she exemplified Puritanism* in her daily life, teaching Scripture at home, “preparing souls for me to convert,” Rev. Cotton said. After the Church of England silenced Puritans, she followed Cotton to Boston (1634), taught Scripture to large groups, questioned ministers’ “covenant of works” as against the Calvinist* “covenant of grace*,” and opposed the 1636 war against the Pequot Amerindians. Banished as a heretic (1637–38), she cofounded Rhode Island with Roger Williams*. She was killed in New Amsterdam by Amerindians fighting the Dutch.

Hutterites. Early in the Anabaptist* Movement (1528), the Hutterites formed a group in Moravia, sharing material goods in the spirit of the apostolic church (Acts 2:44–45, 4:32–35). Their leader, Jacob Hutter, was burned alive (1535); more than 2,000 Hutterites died for their faith.

From 1870 Hutterites enjoyed remarkable growth in the USA and Canada (c50,000 in 2008). Hutterites live in large agricultural colonies clustered like small villages, following three core values: sharing material goods, surrendering self-will for communal harmony, and separating themselves from an evil world. For Hutterites, private property symbolizes selfishness, greed, and vanity. They constitute the oldest surviving Christian communal movement (outside monastic orders). DONALD KRAYBILL

Huxley, Thomas Henry (1825–95), biologist, essayist, defender of Charles Darwin*. Huxley's aggressive repudiation of the authority of theology and Scripture* in scientific matters forced a rethinking of the relationship between science* and religion. Born in England to a lower-middle-class family, he studied medicine, held professorships at the Royal School of Mines, the Royal Institution, and the Royal College of Surgeons, and was dean of the Normal School of Science (South Kensington). Huxley, often seen as an implacable enemy of Christianity, publicly debated proponents of conservative Christianity (e.g. Bishop Wilberforce* and Gladstone*), defended Darwin's right to put forward a purely naturalistic theory of evolution, and coined the term “agnosticism*” (1869). Nevertheless, Huxley saw himself as purifying the Christian Church, just as Luther* had. Pledging allegiance to what he called the “New Reformation,” he aligned himself with liberal Anglicans and Nonconformists who called for Christianity to modernize itself. Huxley was deeply indebted to Unitarianism* for the evolutionary theodicy* that grounded his entire view of the world. He used agnosticism as a way of distancing himself from lower-class atheists* and materialists, but also to underline his links to the ancient church. As an agnostic (“against Gnosticism*”), he stood with the early church, which rejected Gnosticism.

BERNARD LIGHTMAN

Hymn, Hymnody. Augustine* (354–430) defined “hymn” as a song in praise of God, sometimes a vehicle of spontaneous praise, uttered under the influence of the Holy* Spirit. Augustine reflected and refined (for Christian purposes) what he had absorbed from earlier Greek and Roman sources, which expressed elemental human needs articulated through inward and outward “speaking” addressed to mysterious forces beyond ourselves with the expectation that these needs would be heard and met.

The expression of these fundamental desires through hymns has taken many forms throughout Christian history. Attentive to resources (the kinds of musical sounds available), appropriateness (sounds deemed sacred), theological development (various understandings of God), and liturgical expectations (formal, traditional, cultural, informal, emerging), communities have developed repertoires of communal singing, most often referred to as hymnody.

Tracing the history of hymnody reveals that the questions that regularly confronted Christian communities in their decisions about hymns in the past continue to challenge us today: What makes a hymn sacred? What sounds and words connect human beings to a divine presence? How do words and sounds convey the human qualities of God as we know them in Jesus the Christ? Whose experience is primary in deciding what sounds transmit notions of transcendence and immanence? How do our hymns convey the availability and intermingling of the Spirit?

Because hymns are intended primarily to be sung, their power is amplified. Sung music reverberates in the muscles of our bodies. This physical connection with our memories and imaginations influences powerfully what we feel, believe, and do about others and ourselves in relation to God. Hymns can reinforce evil as well as good, they can limit rather than include, shun rather than welcome, as well as evoke shared strength and express collective sorrow and joy.

Choosing hymns requires respectful attentiveness and imagination. Whereas familiar words and sounds provide comfort and certainty, varied rhythms, harmonies, and melodies that reflect the particularities of an array of cultures, ethnicities, and human experiences can help us expand our grasp of divine and human possibilities. Hymns, as Augustine suggested, reflect a mingling of spirits, human and divine. We sing ourselves into what we are coming to know and believe. As such we receive hymns and write them, we change them and treasure them.

Hymns remind us of, urge us toward, support and prick us in pursuing an evolving faith* in God and in one another. See also WORSHIP CLUSTER. JANET WALTON

Hypatia (c375–415), mathematician and philosopher of the Neoplatonist* school in Alexandria. Although a non-Christian, she taught many Christians, including Bishop Synesius of Cyrene. Because she espoused an alternative tradition, defending science* against religion, she was attacked by a mob of Christian health care workers, who scraped off her flesh. Bishop Cyril* of Alexandria (c378–444) may have been involved. While he evaded any penalties, an imperial decree placed restrictions on the activities of the bishop's health care workers.

Hypostasis (Gk for the reality underlying appearances), a key word in the trinitarian* controversy, first used as a synonym of the term ousia (nature) to mean a self-subsisting reality. The Cappadocians* made a distinction between the two terms: "one ousia in three hypostases" – one "nature" in three "realities" or three "persons" – became the accepted view of the Trinity for many churches. Hypostasis became a focal issue in the christological* controversies, when the Council of Chalcedon* declared that Christ was "one person (hypostasis) in two natures," while the Miaphysites* spoke about Christ as "one incarnate nature of the divine Word."

Ibas (5th c.), bishop of Edessa (435–57), a leader of the school of Edessa*, translator of Greek works into Syriac. He succeeded Rabbûla*, a partisan of Cyril* and an opponent of the Antiochene* position on Christology* (see Nestorius). Ibas, along with Theodore*, defended the Formulary of Reunion (433), which mediated between the rival positions. His letter to the Persian bishop Maris (433) denounced Cyril's behavior. Condemned at the Second Council of Ephesus* (449), he was rehabilitated by the Council of Chalcedon* (451). Yet his letter to Maris was included in the Three* Chapters condemned by Justinian* and the Second Council of Constantinople* (553).

Ichthus (Gk “fish”), acrostic using the initial Greek letters for “Jesus Christ, Son of God, Savior”; often suggested by a schematic fish design.

Icon (Gk eikon, equivalent to Lat imago, “image”), a two-dimensional visual image, either painted or done in mosaic, of Christ, the Virgin Mary*, and/or one of the saints. See also ICONOGRAPHY.

Iconoclasm and the Iconoclastic Controversy. While early Christians objected to and sometimes destroyed the idols (sacred images) of “pagans*,” an internal controversy broke out in the Eastern Orthodox Church. The “iconoclasts” (“image breakers”) sought to destroy, or at least marginalize, icons*; the “iconodules*” defended both the production and the veneration* of icons.

During the 7th c., opposition to icons arose within the Eastern Church (and, to a lesser extent, the Western Church) on four grounds: a reassertion of the older view that only the Eucharist* and the cross* can represent Christ; the Monophysite* tendency to minimize the human side of the Incarnation*; Jewish and especially Muslim criticism; and a sense of emergency fueled by the expansion of Islam. In 726 the emperor Leo III (717–41) sided with the iconoclasts, declaring all images idols, ordering their destruction, removing the main icon protecting Constantinople, and persecuting monks and other Christians who venerated icons. In 730 he deposed Germanos, the patriarch of Constantinople, who opposed his measures. John* of Damascus defended icons in three writings (726–30), ironically from within Islamic territory (Damascus), attacking the emperor's interference in matters of doctrine. In 754 a council in Constantinople condemned both the making and the veneration of icons. A “decade of blood” followed, with many “new martyrs,” most of them monks.

The situation changed when Leo IV died (780) and authority passed to his wife, Irene*. A devotee of icons and a supporter of the monks, she prepared the way for the Second Council of Nicaea* (787), which approved the veneration of images of Christ, Mary, and the saints (veneration as contrasted with worship* offered only to God, a distinction lost at first in the translation used in the West). It quoted a statement made by Basil* of Caesarea (comparing images of the emperor to the Son as an image of the Father): “the honor rendered to the image rises to the prototype.”

After Irene's death (802), persecution revived. This less extreme “second Iconoclasm” was ended in 842 by another empress, Theodora*. In 843 a new patriarch was installed, and on the first Sunday in Lent, the icons were restored. This day continues to be observed in the Eastern Church as the “Triumph of Orthodoxy.” From this time on, the Eastern Church looked to the authority of the seven ecumenical* councils, and the emperors settled into a different role, not one of determining, but of defending, orthodoxy. See also CAROLINE BOOKS.

EUGENE TESSELLE

Iconoclasm as a Theological Concept refers to breaking idols*. It has nothing to do with Iconoclasm* or the Iconoclastic controversy of the 8th and 9th c. Despite connotations of fanaticism, iconoclasm harks back not merely to the biblical prohibition of graven images but to its roots, the radical otherness of God, to God's namelessness, whose worship must be guarded against every idolatrous corruption of faith*. Most adamant in denouncing such inborn proclivity is Calvin*, who compares the imagination to an idol-making factory that obfuscates one's capacity for criticism by negating its capacity for self-criticism.

Iconoclasm deals not so much with the cleavage of image and word, icon* and idol, flesh and spirit, as with the dialectic of literal* and symbolic* according to which the literal is a parable* of the symbolic and nothing is more symbolic than the literal that is not taken literally (the sun "rises"; "he is risen") and objectified as though it were a mere world event. Biblical iconoclasm consists in the mutual debunking of divine and human, of religion* through religion, so long as the language through which this occurs – pictographic or alphabetic, visual, or phonetic – does not become a cliché but "speaks" to us.

Creation debunks nature as a matrix of religion, as creation also debunks history insofar as it proleptically "caps" Israel's exodus from Egypt. A similar role is played by the virgin birth (the Incarnation*) with respect to Abraham's descendants according to the flesh (the Jews) and the historical covenant of God with Israel. In keeping with biblical iconoclasm, Christianity, like Judaism, is not a religion of a book but of the living Word. The God that speaks can be silent. The idol is mute.

GABRIEL VAHANIAN

Iconodule, Greek for "one who serves icons*." See also ICONOCLASM AND THE ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY.

Iconography, the Greek term for the painting of sacred images (eikones). John* of Damascus and others insisted that the translation be simply "writing of icons," but this is a wooden application of the verb grapho, which connotes painted figurative art as well as normal "writing."

The proper subjects of a true icon are Christ*, the Virgin Mary*, or the saints*. Other topics and themes are not regarded as the subjects of mainstream icons, since the purpose of this religious art, as understood in Eastern Christianity, is not so much a didactic presentation (an attitude that predominates in the Christian West) as a personal (hypostatic) invocation*. The "writing" or painting of icons is a form of praying, and icons are meant to be prayer forms, to be used in the practice of worship. To this day, the distinction between didactic art and icon can be observed between, e.g., a wall fresco depicting an NT or other biblical scene, and a panel depicting Christ or one of the saints. The latter is regarded as a classical example of an icon and used in public worship (typically being incensed* by the clergy or kissed by the faithful), while the fresco is more "illustrative."

There is a sense, deeply rooted in Eastern Christian attitudes, that the icon opens a door to the spiritual presence* of the holy* one represented. This is probably related to the fact that the early use of the iconography of saints in the churches was related to their tomb relics, which were an important part of Byzantine Church services. While the Orthodox faithful are clear that they are not idolaters* who worship the icon as such (the niceties of this theology were set out at the seventh ecumenical council, the Council of Nicaea in 787), they understand the veneration they give to the icon as passing immediately, and directly, to the person represented there. Icons, therefore, have a generally more substantive "sacramental*" aspect than does any religious art in Catholic or Protestant experience.

The roots of the Christian use of icons have been much disputed over the years. Some see their appearance (as wall paintings in the 2nd c. and as portable panels in the 7th) as a decadent "hellenization" of the early "pure" practice of having no religious images at all in a church building (a position especially favored by Protestant commentators). Others trace the rise of the icon to the emperor cult of the late antique period or to lesser-known traditions of domestic worship of the old gods being displaced by the increasingly important "new god" Jesus, especially in early Christian Egypt* (where most of the ancient surviving portable panels were found). The discovery of new exemplars of ancient art is continually changing perspectives on the debate about origins.

One thing is clear enough, however: when icons do make their regular appearance in Eastern Christian churches, after the 7th c., they already come with a sophisticated technique and a reasoned apologia, one that is added to with remarkable profundity until the 9th c. Some of the most important Orthodox theologians of the icon are John* of Damascus, the patriarchs Nikephoros and Germanos, and Theodore* of Studium. See also ICONOCLASM AND THE ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY.

Ideological Studies of Christianity. Ideological studies scrutinize the expressions of ideologies* in religious metaphors*, psychological archetypes, master stories, confessional myths* that distinguish between "sick" and "healthy" religion, violence*, and mutuality. Religious metaphors and psychological archetypes interact in the human unconscious, shaping constructive and/or destructive spirituality*. Religious master stories and myths provide believers with a framework of ideas for interpreting existence, both mundane and transcendent. That ideological framework both shapes and reflects human spirituality: personal piety, worship ritual, and social action. Christianity is rooted in OT and NT historical narratives. A mythic interpretation of those idealized biblical narratives as Scripture* forms Christianity's ideological framework of meaning, its master story.

All religious master stories and ideologies should be constantly critiqued to discern whether they cultivate growth and health, and can be affirmed to be true, or foster pathology and destruction, and should be rejected as false. Thus scholars continually analyze Christianity's biblical sources, traditions, master stories, and confessional ideologies with methodologies that function as lenses through which to discern the constructive or destructive qualities of the Christian tradition.

Psychological and sociological analyses are useful for assessing the psychosocially constructive and destructive effects of the master story behind the biblical texts, within the texts, and in front of the texts (Kille, Ricoeur*). Master stories and confessional ideologies convey their messages by metaphors, which can be studied through literary analysis. Religious metaphors insinuate themselves through learning processes into believers' unconscious minds (see Metaphor). They provide the content of their psychospiritual archetypes (Freud, Jung).

If religious metaphors are destructive, they fill believers' unconscious minds and their psychological archetypes with pathological content, producing destructive value systems, self-defeating emotions and behavior, and unhealthy responses to life situations. If religious metaphors are constructive, they fill believers' unconscious minds and shape their archetypes with wholesome and growth-inducing content. This creates healthy value systems, growth-inducing emotions and behavior, and constructive responses to life situations (see Psychology and Theology).

Christianity's confessional myth contains an ambiguous representation of God's nature and behavior that derives from the ambiguous narratives of the Bible. In one set of biblical narratives, God is a violent paranoid warrior in cosmic conflict with evil deities (other gods, idols*, Satan*), the battleground being history and the human heart. In this biblical metaphor, God solves ultimate problems with ultimate violence*. Moreover, "he" is so disturbed with humans that to retain psychospiritual equilibrium he must kill somebody: humans or his own beloved son (see Atonement #2). In this master story, God is a (borderline) paranoid schizophrenic, with psychotic episodes. Such a sick God makes for sick people; sick people project such a sick God. This is an ideological construct (a representation of an imaginary relationship of individuals to the real conditions of existence), not an empirical, phenomenological, or heuristic presentation of the existence of an ontological evil or of a cosmic conflict between good and evil, God and the devil.

An alternative biblical narrative presents a Christian master story leading to a quite different confessional ideology, the biblical narrative about God's unconditional, universal, and radical grace* – the good news of much OT teaching and of the Christian gospel. According to this alternative Christian ideology, God embraces all humans unconditionally in spite of themselves. In this master story, God's radical acceptance frees believers from each other and themselves, affording them true mutuality, a truly healthy community and personal life. Christians historically have tended to cling to the sick confessional ideology, eclipsing the healthy confessional ideology of the gospel of grace.

Ideology. Neutrally defined, "ideology is a representation of the imaginary relationship of individuals to their real conditions of existence" (Althusser). In this strict sense, an ideology usually takes the form of a master story about human experience and the external world, expressed in multiple historical narratives, myths*, and/or personal narratives recording memories of origin and development. In this way, an ideology provides the contours and content of people's confessional interpretation of life, their worldview, the ideas they claim to be true, and the values they idealize. Thus an ideology also sets forth a program of social* and political* organization that entails a struggle and the task of recruiting adherents; an ideology creates a deep bond among all those who share it or, conversely, sets them apart from other communities that do not embrace this ideology. An ideology that promotes congeniality facilitates peaceful communication and close association between communities or persons. An ideology that sets people apart can lead to a sense of superiority (our ideology is better, purer, truer) and an “us and them” mentality. The ideology of religious communities that perceive themselves under threat tends to become defensive and aggressive, whereas the ideology of a secure community tends to be open and harmonious.

“Ideology” as used by Marx* is a disparaging term referring to “false consciousness,” which is necessarily destructive and pathological. In the neutral sense, ideologies can be either false and destructive, or true and constructive, promoting growth and health. J. HAROLD ELLENS

Idol, Idolatry. Idolatry is the worship of idols, condemned in ancient Israel because they represented false deities or were claimed to represent God, who cannot be depicted, or were made of impotent wood or stone, silver or gold. The early church followed a similar policy as it confronted, not without ambivalence, the problem of eating idol* meat. It broadened the meaning of “idolatry” by defining it as the absolutization of a true but partial revelation, manifestation, or gift from God (e.g. the creation, Rom 1:19–23; or money/Mammon, Matt 6:24). During the period of Christian persecution*, apostates denied their Christianity by making an offering to idols. As modern theologians (including Liberation* and Death* of God theologians) emphasize, idolatry is a present-day issue. The opposite of faith* in God is not atheism*; it is idolatry – the adoration of a false god, such as power, capital, consumerism, and the market taken as absolute, as a god in whose name the life of millions of human beings and nature are destroyed. For these theologians, such idolatry is the most serious betrayal of the will of the God of life. See also GOD, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER: IN LATIN AMERICA; ICONOCLASM AS A THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT.

Idol Meat (the usual translation of Gk eidolothyta, “meat offered to idols”). The question of eating meat offered to idols – eating in a temple (e.g. during the meeting of a guild), eating meat that had been sacrificed before being sold in the market, or eating meat served to guests in a home – was addressed in an ambivalent way by Paul. In 1 Cor 8 and 10 and Rom 14:20, Paul permits the eating of idol meat, but discourages such practice for the sake of those with a “weak conscience.” In so doing, he applies to a specific circumstance Jesus’ teaching that all foods are clean (Mark 7:29). Paul’s followers express a similar ambivalent attitude in Col 2:16; 1 Tim 4:3; and Heb 9:10, 13:9. However, eating idol meat was specifically condemned in Rev 2:14, 20 and throughout the 2nd c. in the nascent Eastern and Western churches. It remains an issue today, especially for Christian converts in homes where food is traditionally offered to ancestors*.

Ignatius of Antioch (d c107/13), bishop of Antioch, known only through seven letters that he wrote while traveling through Asia Minor, guarded by 10 soldiers, on his way to being martyred in Rome. (A longer recension of these letters, along with four others, came to be widely circulated, but Ussher and other scholars have shown that this was a 4th-c. expansion.)

One letter was sent to the church in Rome, asking that it not intervene to save him from martyrdom*. Five letters were written to churches that had sent delegates during Ignatius’s journey to encourage him, and one to Polycarp*, bishop of Smyrna. Ignatius staged his journey as a triumphal march, dramatized by the delegations and his own letters. He warned against the errors of “Judaizers*” and “Docetists*” (some scholars think that these two names may designate two tendencies in a single group). His insistence on the reality of Christ’s flesh is like that of the Johannine* epistles, although he did not quote them directly. He referred to several Pauline Epistles (1 Corinthians, and probably Romans and Ephesians), and either the Gospel of Matthew or an oral tradition related to it.

Ignatius offers the first evidence for the mon-episcopate*, according to which a single bishop* in each locality, assisted by presbyters* and deacons*, was the guarantor of the church’s unity with Christ in the Eucharist. Consequently, for some scholars, his journey and death may have occurred in the middle or late 2nd c. During his time, however, the mon-episcopate may have been one organizational form competing with others; while it seems to have been common in some of the churches in Asia Minor to which he wrote, Ignatius may have been pressing it on others as a plausible way to ensure the unity of the church, and his status as a martyr may have helped to promote it.

Ignatius of Loyola (1491–1556), founder of the Society of Jesus (see Jesuits). At the dawn of modern times, when humans became aware of their autonomy, Ignatius opened a spiritual path for loving God and devoting one's life to serving God in the world by using spiritual discernment in decision making.

Born in Aspeitia, Guipúzcoa (in the Basque country), Inigo, the 13th child of the lords of Loyola, was a page at Arevalo, then a gentil-hombre-soldier in the service of the viceroy of Navarre. Following an injury in battle and his conversion* in Loyola, he became a hermit* at Monserrat and later at Manresa (1523). After a pilgrimage* to Jerusalem (1524), he studied in Barcelona, Alcalá, Salamanca, and especially Paris (1530–37), where he adopted the name of Ignatius and, with 6 companions, took the “vow of Montmartre” to lead a Christ-like life in the Holy Land (1535). Ordained a priest in Venice (1538), with 10 companions (including Francis Xavier and Peter Favre), he founded the Society of Jesus in Rome (approved by Pope Paul III, 1540). Elected superior of the order, he wrote its “Constitutions” and led its development, sending Jesuits to Germany*, Brazil*, India*, and Japan* (including Francis Xavier* to Japan, 1544). When he died (Rome, 1556), there were 1,000 Jesuits*. The Spiritual Exercises*, the “Constitutions,” his letters (more than 6,000), an autobiography, and Spiritual Journal are the founding documents of Ignatian spirituality.

The autobiography shows the relationship between Ignatius's own spiritual experience and what he sets forth in the Spiritual Exercises. Ignatius seeks to discern God's will for him. His year as a hermit at Manresa, “his primitive church,” was a time of profound illumination regarding the mysteries* of the Trinity*, the creation*, the Incarnation*, and the presence* of Christ in the Eucharist*. This was also a period during which he developed his two central meditations on the Kingdom of God and the “two standards” (of Christ and Satan), which provided the framework for his vision of the Society of Jesus. Ignatius often said that even if there was no Scripture to teach these matters, he would readily die for them simply on the basis of his visions – a stance that made him a suspect in the eyes of the Inquisition*.

For Ignatius one must seek, and indeed find, God in all things. According to Nadal, his vicar*, Ignatius “had received from God the unique grace to contemplate freely the Holy Trinity, especially in his last years. Furthermore, in all things, actions, and conversations, he contemplated the presence of God; he was a contemplative in action.” This unique grace drove him to search for God not only in prayer, but also in action, in order to conform his will to God's through righteous intent and spiritual discernment of God in the world, where the Incarnation takes place and where humans make decisions about their lives. It is in the world that he wanted “to help souls” and “feel with the Church,” whose head is “the vicar* of Christ on earth.” “In between the Christ our Lord, the Bridegroom, and the Church, his Bride, the same Spirit guides us for the good of our souls.”

Ignatius's spirituality is thus marked by constantly seeking to discern God's will, following Christ in his mission, having confidence in humans, nourishing their freedom, and respecting their spiritual meditations. Ignatius wrote, “God wants to be glorified as much through what God gives as Creator, that is, through (human) nature, as through what God gives us as Redeemer, that is, through supernatural gifts.” Thus for Ignatius, theology and spirituality are intimately related. The graces* he received at Manresa gave him an architectonic vision of creation and redemption. Christ is “our Creator and Lord”; his mission is to gather together all of humanity in the Kingdom* of the Father, by freeing humans from the traps set by the “enemy of human nature.” And Christ's task is not finished. Raised from the dead, Christ continues his mission in the (Roman Catholic) Church by calling each and all to become his companions and friends and to work with him under harsh conditions in order to share the joy of his victory.

The expected response to Christ's call is not mere goodwill, but love* reflecting one's conformity with Christ and gratitude for all the gifts one has received, a love that frees one from random devotions and allows one to discern the Spirit's role in all life events and the ways God's will is at work in all things. The Jesuit Hevenesi summarized Ignatius's rule for acting: “Put your self confidently in God's hands, as if the whole success of the action depended on you and not on him; then expect everything from God who will do everything, and you nothing.” In early modern times, marked both by a human desire to assume responsibility for life in society and to transform it and by the lack of helpful guideposts and the limited usefulness of traditions, Ignatius opened a way to Christian decision making.

Image of God (Lat imago Dei), an expression used in connection with the creation* of humanity, male and female (Gen 1:26–27). Later, however, only males, Adam and Seth, are said to be in God's image (Gen 5:1–3); 1 Cor 11:7 also suggests that males alone are the image and glory of God; here, however, Paul might be quoting the Corinthians, expressing his own view in 1 Cor 11:11–12. In Gal 3:28, Paul affirms that there is “no male and female” (among those baptized into Christ; Gal 3:26–29; cf. Col 3:10; Eph 4:22–24). Similarly, Philo* and the Gnostics believed that in the true sense of humanity created in the image of God, males and females were identical.

Wisdom of Solomon (2:23) states that God created humanity for incorruption, in the image of God's own eternity*, but that death entered the world through the devil*. This view influenced the patristic interpretation of Rom 5:12–14 and 1 Cor 15:21, 56, despite Gen 3:5, 22, 32, in which Adam and Eve, by gaining knowledge of good and evil, become like gods or like God and, according to the narrative, would live forever if they were to eat from the tree of life. This complex biblical tradition gave rise to several distinct interpretations.

If the image is something visible, it might be the human form itself, or it might be “dominion” over all created things (mentioned in Gen 1:27). If linked with the prohibition on making and worshipping images, then humanity, as the image of God, has no need for images. Perhaps being created in God's image implies a co-humanity (Barth*). Perhaps God's image is the mental and/or spiritual aspect of humanity, shared by males and females; or immortality or incorruption, as belonging properly only to God (as developed in complex ways by Irenaeus*, Clement*, and Origen*, who at times quoted Plato's comment about becoming “like God” [Theaetetus 176B]).

In a very different vein, Philo and later thinkers interpreted the image of God to be God's Word or Wisdom, the only true, undistorted, permanent expression of God (cf. 2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15; Heb 1:3). Then humanity bears God's image only as long as it is oriented toward and formed by the true Image/Word, and the image is lost if one turns away from God (as is occasionally suggested by Irenaeus and Clement, and made most explicit by Origen, Athanasius*, and the early Augustine*). Thus for some (including certain Protestant thinkers), the image of God is totally lost through sin*.

However, the later Augustine saw human beings as intrinsically the image of God, since their self-relationship is an image of the Trinity*: memory, understanding, and will; self-remembrance, self-understanding, and self-love fulfilled in remembrance, understanding, and love of God. Following him, others underscore that the image abides at least in a minimal way despite sin, although the right relationship with God is lost and must be restored through the grace of Christ.

During the Iconoclastic* controversy, Theodore* of Studios argued that human nature is “God's own iconography”; the Incarnation*, furthermore, appropriates humanity to the Word's own person. Not only does humanity bear a likeness to its archetype, that likeness has been affirmed explicitly by God.

Contemporary theologians in marginalized communities or in solidarity with them affirm that any human being is intrinsically the image of God, and remains so, and thus has a dignity worthy of the respect owed to God – a view that challenges slavery*, oppression of all kinds, and the death* penalty.

EUGENE TESELLE

Image of God: Contemporary Feminist and Liberation Theological Views. The biblical assertion that men and women are made in the image of God (Gen 1:27) is fundamentally egalitarian, affirming that all people are intimately related to God. Yet many Christian communities have interpreted the claim that humanity is made in the image of God in hierarchical ways. Thus women often have been viewed as being in the image of God in a deficient way, e.g., derivatively, through men. Similarly, humanity in the image of God has been seen as wielding unbridled dominion over the earth and all creatures. Such hierarchical interpretations support the oppression of women and the careless destruction of the environment (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster).

Contemporary Feminist and Liberation theologies reclaim the egalitarian meaning of the imago Dei, celebrating the God-given dignity of all persons. Many theologians seek to embrace the universal affirmation that all humans are made in the image of God, while avoiding essentialist statements regarding traits such as gender, sex, and experience. Christians from various traditions challenge views of the image of God that focus on individuality and imply a dualistic* view of the body and mind. Drawing on doctrines such as Trinity* and Christology*, theologians honor plurality and diversity through interpretations of the image of God that highlight embodiment, community, and relations characterized by justice*.

Imitation of Christ (Imitatio Christi), a spiritual classic comprising four books, written for a monastic setting; published in Latin (early 15th c.) and soon translated into many languages. While no author's name was given, it is ascribed to Thomas* à Kempis. He most likely compiled and translated into Latin some writings of Geert Groote*. See also DEVOTIO MODERNA.

Imitation of Christ (Lat imitatio Christi) is one of the ways discipleship is defined (see Discipleship #2) as early as Paul (1 Thess 1:6, 2:14; 1 Cor 4:16, 11:1). According to this definition, discipleship requires a close, intimate relationship with Jesus, through which Jesus' followers are progressively trained and equipped to become disciples. The presupposed view of faith* is that it is a process of moving toward God and Christ (see Faith #5). The presupposed basic predicament is that believers are neither equipped nor trained to do God's will (even if they already know it and want to do it), as in the Aristotelian perfectionist* view of the moral life, according to which one is required to undergo apprenticeship (imitating an expert) in order to acquire character (ethos), virtues, and practical wisdom. Disciples need to be transformed into Christ's likeness. Three variant emphases can be found independently or in combination.

1. By imitating Christ, disciples are resocialized, acquiring a new identity (character) as they share Christ's "symbolic* world" – including his vision of the Kingdom* – and thus learn to be children of the Kingdom and children of God (e.g. praying with Christ, "Our father in heaven"); thus disciples become like Christ, willing to be "poor in Spirit," "meek," "persecuted for righteousness' sake."
2. By imitating Christ, disciples share Jesus' discerning faith and are given the ability to discern in society those who are actually "blessed" by God (not the rich or joyful, but the poor and repressed, those who mourn, as in Matt 5:3–10; Luke 6:20–26) and other manifestations of the Kingdom that should orient their ministry as disciples.
3. By imitating Christ, disciples share in Jesus' power. Although the forces of evil and oppression seem overwhelming, as they imitate Christ disciples discover that God empowers them to overcome these obstacles, even if the disciples have to go "the way of the cross" following Christ.

Immaculate Conception, the Roman Catholic dogma according to which the conception of Mary*, the mother of Jesus, was without any "stain" (Lat macula) of original* sin, as defined in the constitution Ineffabilis Deus by Pope Pius IX (1854), which affirms that Mary* (as the Blessed Virgin) "in the first instance of her conception, by a singular privilege and grace* granted by God, in view of the merits* of Jesus Christ, the Savior of the human race, was preserved exempt from all stain of original sin." The Feast of Immaculate Conception has been celebrated on December 8 since the 15th c. (long before it became a matter of dogma). (The immaculate conception of Mary should not be confused with the dogma of the virginal conception of Jesus; see Incarnation Cluster). See also MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER.

Immanence, the state of being "within" something else. The term is used most commonly with reference to the immanence of God* in the world*, which is often related to the Incarnation* (see Phenomenology and Christianity). In the doctrine of the Trinity*, the "immanent Trinity" is eternally "within God," while the "economic Trinity" is in God's external activities of creation*, incarnation*, and sanctification*. The "method of immanence" is associated with both Blondel* and Husserl*, starting "within" human experience but remaining open to the disclosure of that which transcends experience.

Immersion, baptism by submerging the body in water (rather than pouring or sprinkling water over the body). This was the usual practice of the early church, at first using “living water” in streams, then water in baptismal fonts. Trinitarian triple immersion is practiced in the Eastern Orthodox Church. See also BAPTISM CLUSTER.

Immortality (from Lat for “undying”) is ascribed primarily to God*, who is without beginning or end. It is considered superior to mere survival as a “shade” after death, implied by the Hebrew Sheol* and the Greek Hades*. The view that the soul* is immortal and that its destiny is determined by its own decisions is found first among the Pythagoreans and the Platonists*.

The biblical tradition tends to speak in terms of resurrection* of the dead. When the idea of immortality entered the biblical tradition, it was viewed as a gift of the immortal God as the Creator*: the soul is not immortal as God is, and is thus not preexistent; it is given immortality by God. Thus Wis 2:23–24 says, “For God created us for incorruption, and made us in the image of his own eternity, but through the devil’s envy death entered the world, and those who belong to his company experience it.” The gift of immortality (incorruption), lost through sin*, is retained by “blameless souls*.” The Christian tradition continues to understand immortality in relation to God as the Creator. Without God’s act of creation, creatures would cease to exist; thus immortality and resurrection* of the body are at times understood to be a “new” creation.”

The NT authors, along with the Pharisees* and Jewish apocalyptic* writers (but not the Sadducees*) anticipate the resurrection of the body. If that is to happen, the body must be “further clothed” and its mortality “swallowed up” by true life from God (1 Cor 15:53–57; 2 Cor 5:4). More than the survival of an immortal soul, the hope is for an abiding union with the risen Christ (see Resurrection of Christ), because Christ defeated the “power of death.” Thus the church fathers (e.g. Irenaeus*, Athanasius*, Gregory* of Nyssa*) based the hope* for immortality on the redemptive work of Christ (see Redemption). Yet under Platonist and Neoplatonist* influences, the church fathers and early Scholastics* tended to oscillate between affirmation of the immortality of the soul* (as separable from the body; thus Origen* could envision the soul as preexistent) and affirmation of the resurrection, which involves the reunion of body and soul (e.g. Augustine* at times stressed the immortality of the soul and at times the resurrection). But this uncertainty was largely laid to rest by Aquinas’s* emphasis, with Aristotle*, that the soul is the form of the body; resurrection of the body is necessary for full human immortality.

This doctrinal tradition is challenged by atheist* views, in that the Christian hope of immortality depends on God’s immortality (although this is not the case for Spiritism* and other religious movements). Yet the Christian tradition continues to emphasize the themes of corruption and death, the need for divine grace*, the role of freedom* in determining one’s destiny, God as the giver of true life, and final resurrection.

Incarnation in the Orthodox Tradition is understood to be the union of the divine and human natures in the person of Jesus Christ. The definitive texts on the Incarnation in Orthodox theology are Athanasius* of Alexandria's On the Incarnation and Orations. Athanasius argues that Jesus' divinity must be identified with that of the true God; otherwise, there is no hope for salvation*. In what is now a classic phrase, Athanasius declares that "God became a human being (anthropos) so that a human being can become god." This logic of divine-human communion functioned as a first principle throughout the history of Orthodox theology, both patristic and contemporary. This understanding of the Incarnation in terms of the divine-human union in the person of Jesus Christ is the foundation of the well-known Orthodox notion of theosis* (divinization). It is also the basis for the Christian doctrine of the Trinity*, which is the conceptualization of God's communion with creation through the person of Jesus Christ, by the power of the Holy Spirit. Orthodox theologies of the church, liturgy, sacrament*, and icon* were also shaped by this understanding of the Incarnation.

From the 5th to the 9th c., Orthodox theology contended with objections to the doctrine of the union of the divine and human natures in the person of Jesus Christ, primarily raised from the point of view of Monophysitism* (although the adherents call their movement Miaphysitism*) and Monothelitism*. Although it is often assumed that patristic theology offers a "high Christology," the main concern of the fourth, fifth, and sixth ecumenical* councils was asserting the full humanity of Jesus Christ against tendencies in Monophysitism and Monothelitism to prioritize the divine nature over human nature (a view that Miaphysites vehemently reject). The culmination of Orthodox theology of the Incarnation is the affirmation of the use of icons* in the seventh ecumenical council. Debates, however, over Orthodox theology of the Incarnation reemerged in the 14th-c. controversy over hesychasm*. In response to theologians who argued against the possibility of an experience of the divine light, Gregory* Palamas defended hesychastic practices, such as the Jesus* Prayer, as means to experience the divine light on the basis that it is the same light that Jesus Christ revealed in his transfiguration*. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, EASTERN, CLUSTER: INTRODUCTORY ENTRIES; SOLOVIEV, VLADIMIR SERGEEVICH; TRINITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

ARISTOTLE PAPANIKOLAOU

Incarnation in the Western Tradition

denotes the belief that God has entered into human history in an act of solidarity and redemption*, and that this entrance and embodiment are focused on the specific historical individual Jesus* of Nazareth. Though rooted in the NT, the doctrine was formalized and given systematic expression during the patristic* period. The first four centuries of Christian reflection on the identity and significance of Jesus of Nazareth involved the exploration and assessment of a number of possible christological* models, including Ebionism* (leaning toward Adoptionism*, according to which the human Jesus is the adopted Son of God) and Docetism* (according to which the humanity of Jesus is merely apparent). Both were eventually judged to be inadequate.

During the Arian* controversy (4th–7th c.; Arianism, in its prevalent form, asserted that the Son is "like" [homoios] the Father, but refused to say that Father and Son are "of the same essence"), the idea of "incarnation" was subjected to rigorous scrutiny.

Debate centered on a number of questions. First and foremost, was this a legitimate way of interpreting the identity of Jesus* of Nazareth? It seemed to raise several philosophical difficulties; e.g. classical Greek philosophy was unable to accommodate the idea of a God* who became incarnate. Furthermore, the concept of the "two natures" of Christ was seen as creating logical tensions that undermined confidence in the belief. Second, writers such as Athanasius* of Alexandria argued that some such belief in the Incarnation was necessary to do justice to the NT witness to the significance of Jesus of Nazareth, especially as the bearer of salvation* and the object of Christian worship. Other issues concerning the relation of the human and the divine in Christ arose during the Nestorian* controversy (particularly the early 5th c.; Nestorianism affirmed that Jesus' humanity and divinity were joined by will, not by nature).

The issues were discussed at a series of ecumenical* councils, culminating in the Council of Chalcedon* (451), which gave formal expression to the doctrine using categories drawn from contemporary Greek metaphysics. The "Chalcedonian definition" spoke of Christ as "being of one substance with the Father as regards his Godhead, and at the same time of one substance with us as regards his humanity; like us in all respects, apart from sin; as regards his Godhead, begotten of the Father before the ages, but yet as regards his humanity, begotten, for us and for our salvation, of Mary* the Virgin, the God-bearer (Theotokos*)."

This basic notion has subsequently played an important role in Christian thought. Two ongoing debates can be identified in subsequent Christian theology, each continuing the discussions of the patristic period. First, the question of whether the concept of the Incarnation is the best way of expressing the NT's witness to Christ remains open and subject to debate, particularly during the modern period. Second, the specific role of classical Greek metaphysics in the Chalcedonian formulation of the doctrine of the Incarnation has been argued to be an unnecessary imposition on the ideas of the NT.

Some Christian writers have sought to distance themselves from these ontological* concepts, replacing them with relational or existential notions more acceptable to contemporary cultures. More recently, however, a new debate has developed, resulting from growing awareness of the religious diversity of the world. Some have argued that the doctrine of the Incarnation represents an inappropriate affirmation of the uniqueness* or superiority of Christ, insensitive to other religious sensibilities. Others, however, argue that the doctrine must be retained on account of its credentials, while conceding that thought must be given to its mode of presentation in this new cultural climate. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Incarnation in Africa is most important not only because it has a central place in the Christianity brought to Africa by missionaries, but also because the Christian faith must be "incarnated" into the African context, just as God entered into the human context by taking a human form in the man Jesus of Nazareth. Thus beyond the Chalcedonian dogma, African interpretations of the Incarnation are necessary, such as the following ones related to the Haya tradition (Northwestern Tanzania).

Incarnation of the Father Ancestor. Who is incarnated and can be identified with the first person of the Trinity? African ancestral anthropology answers: Ruhanga, the Creator, the Source of All, the Proto-ancestor, the Greatest Father of Humans, Father Ancestor, the Ancestor par Excellence.

Incarnation of Brother Ancestor / Son of God. Who is Jesus Christ for Africans, from the perspective of African anthropology and culture? What is the significance of God's incarnation through Jesus Christ to Africans? "A Christ who is not present is not relevant, as he does not address people's needs and problems encountered in existential life" (as a 2006 Lutheran World Federation Document states). For many Africans, Jesus Christ is Kazoba, the Illuminator and Eternal Light who guides humans and all creatures, and the Elder Brother, "the First Born," and thus the Brother Ancestor, the archetypal model for both humans and spiritual beings. Ancestral incarnation integrates well the two natures of Jesus Christ, humanity and divinity, into one nature without confusion, contradiction, or change – a view that complies with classical formulations, while being fully African.

Incarnation of Sister Ancestor / Spirit of God. The first two African views of incarnation are incomplete unless they are related to the Spirit of God and its sanctifying role. A Haya tradition provides an anthropological pneumatological model of Ntangaire (or Amagara, "Vital Force") that offers a way to conceive of Christian pneumatology as an integral part of incarnation. The Holy Spirit is "Sister Ancestor," who gives life and distributes talents, who as Ntangaire participates in the creation as the breath breathed in the nostrils of the clay figure created by the creator God, Ruhanga, in collaboration with his Son, Kazoba the Illuminator. Thus the Christian experience of the Holy Spirit can be envisioned from a Haya perspective.

In Africa, incarnation is and should be understood in terms of African trinitarian models rather than Greek and Neoplatonist ones, as they invite Africans in general and African believers in particular to participate in the mystery of God incarnated and to become true brother or sister descendants of Jesus.

SYLVESTER KAHAKWA

Incarnation in Asia. Alexandre de Rhodes (1593–1659), a French Jesuit missionary in Vietnam*, remarked that the doctrine of the Incarnation is the hardest Christian mystery* for Asians to accept. It offends the imagination and sensibilities of Asians, even those well disposed to the Christian message. Thus Ram Mohan Roy, the founder of the Brahmo Samaj, an Indian society dedicated to the promotion of monotheism and the eradication of social abuses in India, denounced the Incarnation as polytheistic. Yet the notion of a god "descending" to the human and even animal world is not absent from Asian religions. Thus in Hinduism, Krishna tells of his 10 embodiments in both animal and human forms (avatars), not by necessity but out of the deity's gracious choice.

Some Christian theologians have attempted to express the Incarnation in terms of the concept of avatar. A. J. Appasamy calls Jesus the supreme avatar. V. Chakkarai affirms that Jesus as mediator of God to the world is the incarnation of cit of the triad sat, cit, ananda (being, consciousness, bliss). For P. Chenchiah, Jesus is God taking a body permanently in God's historical process of ever-new creation. These praiseworthy attempts nevertheless risk the danger of eclipsing what is unique in the Christian doctrine.

PETER C. PHAN

Incarnation in Latin America. The Incarnation ("the Word became flesh and lived among us," John 1:14) emphasizes the historicity of Jesus' life. Paul describes the Incarnation as happening at "the fullness of time" (Gal 4:4) and thus at the culminating point of history. Through the fullness of love and grace (John 1:14, 1:16–17), God became human – indeed, God became a poor person (2 Cor 8:9). Jesus assumes human life in all its beauty and its vulnerability, in its wealth* and its poverty*. Through his incarnation, the Son of God, "born of a woman," gives himself to the poor of the world, assuming the full humanity of the poor, as the Gospels show. Jesus was born, lived, and died as a poor person. As contemporary Latin American theologians underscore, through his radical preferential* option for the poor, Jesus proclaimed the Kingdom* of God and God's justice*, as good news for the poor.

Through Jesus' birth, the God of the poor burst into the history of the poor in a special way and yet in continuity with the history of salvation*. Salvation history is fulfilled through Jesus' life, death, and resurrection.

The Incarnation is presented in Paul's text as a liberation giving to the poor as well as to everyone else the possibility of being children of God. Jesus' coming is liberation from the yoke of a law that is powerless to save (whatever that "law" might be) and the adoption of all as children of God (Gal 3:23–25; 4:4–5). Through the Incarnation, the poor and everyone else receive the gift of being daughters and sons of God, rather than slaves. "In Christ Jesus you are all children of God through faith" (Gal 3:26–28).

The Incarnation is the foundation of discipleship* and of the life and mission* of the church. As a community of Jesus' brothers and sisters, the church prolongs Jesus' incarnation by serving those who are excluded and vulnerable ("the little ones," in the language of the Gospels).

The Incarnation is also the central point of the liturgical celebration of the mystery of faith for Latin American Christians. We celebrate, in Leonardo Boff's words, "the humanity and the joyfulness of our God," who was born and became poor among us to save and give life through the community of Jesus' brothers and sisters who follow an incarnational praxis as Jesus did.

VICTORIO ARAYA GUILLÉN

Incarnation in North America. There are two basic trends in North American views of the Incarnation. Most North American Christians hold to classical ("orthodox", Chalcedonian*) Christology, a substantialist (ontological*) view of the Incarnation, which popular religious rhetoric reduced to mere slogan and formula ("Jesus is God"). North American theologians tend toward relational* theologies of incarnation.

Profoundly affected by ontologies emanating from the Hellenistic world, the doctrinal language of the 4th-c. church transformed the "enfleshment" of the divine Logos (John 1:1–18) into a straightforward identification of Jesus with God at the level of substance or being itself, the view most often held in North America. Many of the more reflective Christologies that have emerged in North America (and elsewhere) during recent years, including some Feminist* theologies, have been attempts to move away from substantialist and toward relational theologies of incarnation. They emphasize that the fundamental interest of biblical faith is not in being as such (whether that means God's being or ours) but in being-in-relation (see Relationality; Heteronomy). Thus Jesus is the incarnation of God's Word, not because he is "of the same substance" (*homoousios) or even "of a similar substance" (homoiousios) to God, but because believers experience him through faith as the supreme manifestation of God's being with us – Emmanuel*.

DOUGLAS JOHN HALL

Incarnation in North America: Feminist Understandings. The doctrine of the Incarnation* affirms that the Word* of God became human in Jesus Christ to liberate* and redeem* creation. Rather than focusing on Jesus' human nature, however, certain interpretations of incarnation, patriarchal* interpretations, emphasize that Jesus' maleness is essential to his divine identity and redemptive work. This distorts the liberating significance of incarnation for women by subordinating female humanity and excluding women from full identity as imago Christi (image* of Christ). It reinforces male images of God and legitimizes male superiority, since God "chose" to become flesh as a male. Theoretically, it jeopardizes women's salvation*, because as the ancient maxim holds, what is not assumed is not redeemed.

Redeeming incarnation as liberating for women requires inclusive interpretations of this mystery*. Feminist theology asserts that incarnation actually subverts patriarchal dualisms* by connecting the divine with bodiliness. This theology retrieves the biblical Wisdom* tradition, identifying Jesus' redemptive ministry as God's enduring creativity in the world. As prophetic Wisdom, Jesus incarnates the divine inclusive love that effects and delights in the flourishing of all, especially the poor and marginalized. Recast in these terms, the mystery of incarnation unleashes hope* and vision for relationships of mutuality that create a discipleship* of equals in Christ.

ELIZABETH A. JOHNSON and
GLORIA L. SCHAAB

Incarnation in South Pacific and Australia. Incarnational approaches to theology were rare in early Pacific contact histories; exceptions were those of William Ridley and Daniel and Janet Matthews, who engaged early-19th-c. indigenous cultures on equal terms. The irrefutable cost of colonial* regimes to indigenous peoples, crises and advances in anthropology, theology, and ministry training, and the obvious failure of traditional models of the church (thus, e.g., the crisis of Roman Catholic vocations*) have moved Christian thinkers toward more dispersed and laicized ecclesial models. The papal exhortation Ecclesia in Oceania (2001) is typical of traditional church responses, proposing “communion, inculturation*, and a renewed proclamation of the gospel in ways appropriate for the peoples of Oceania.” The recognition that early missions had sought to impose elements that were culturally alien to the people unleashed diverse attempts to find Christian patterns in Pacific and Australasian indigenous cultures. Rainbow Spirit theology, “women’s business” theologies, the use of Maori karakia (incantations), and Deep Sea Canoe missions are the result, with both European and indigenous thinkers (e.g. at Wontulp-Bi-Buya and Nungalinga Colleges) working on symbolic transferences that enable indigenous practices to enrich Christian praxis. This form of intellectual incarnation has proved easier to find among declining mainstream churches. How Christianity should incarnate itself in indigenous societies is viewed very differently in expansionary neo-Pentecostal/Charismatic* traditions, which look to revivalist* experience to radically change cultures. Revival movements (e.g. Elcho Island, 1979) have produced adherents of both approaches; the creation of national churches and autonomous indigenous commissions has not solved the tension over quite different understandings of incarnation.

MARK HUTCHINSON

Incarnation in Western Europe. See THE PRESENT CLUSTER: IN THE WESTERN TRADITION.

Incense and Olfactory Experience in Worship. Often mentioned in the OT and NT, gradually introduced since 312 in Orthodox, Catholic, and high Anglican worship, and almost universally used in ancient Mediterranean religions, incense accompanies individual, collective, domestic, monastic, and civic worship or symbolizes sacrifice and conveys prayers; its scent, together with that of perfumed holy oil, marks spaces (see Hierotopy, the Creation of Christian Sacred Spaces), actions, implements, and persons as holy (Exod 30:22–38).

In biblical and theological traditions, incense signals human initiatives toward the divine, such as sacrifice or prayer (e.g. Ps 141:2). Holy oil (perfume) signals the divine presence and divine favor or blessing toward humans. Thus olfactory encounters signal human–divine relations, interactions, and exchange as 2 Cor 2:14–16 invites believers to join Paul in spreading the fragrance of the knowledge of Christ as a sign of salvation and of Christ’s power.

As a category of religious experience, smell was tied to ancient, pan-Mediterranean symbolism. Good smells signaled health*, blessing*, divine presence, immortality*, and paradise*. Bad smells were associated with decay, mortality, death*, sin*, and hell*. These associations were rooted in ancient medical and hygienic practices: herbs and spices healed, cleansed, disinfected, decontaminated, and purified. Patristic writers shifted attention away from the functional use of incense toward its epistemological meaning. Smell provides an effective physical signal of human–divine encounter: experienced in concretely affective terms, yet invisible, intangible, and silent. Smells move incomprehensibly: they are uncontainable, transgressive, contagious, and dangerous. Scent wafts ahead of encounter and lingers afterward; it provokes memory and emotion. Patristic writers cited all these characteristics to attune Christians to the way olfactory experiences in daily life provided constant reminders of God’s presence and action in the world.

SUSAN ASHBROOK HARVEY

Inclusive Language is a system of vocabulary and syntax that does not exclude, diminish, or render invisible any person or group on the basis of gender, race, class, disability, legal status, or other criteria. The strategies by which inclusive language is developed are in the realm of grammar and thus are specific to each language, yet the ethical and theological significance of inclusive language cuts across such differences.

Gender is the most obvious arena in which one encounters changes in language in order to make it inclusive. Today women as well as men hold jobs such as “firefighter,” so older forms like “fireman” no longer reflect reality. Women’s visible presence in society is not honored by generic words like “mankind.” Supposedly generic terms that privilege one gender over the other have been used to justify the exclusion of women from occupations and places. Simply put, such generic use of gender-specific terms or of masculine pronouns to encompass both genders or a person of unspecified gender is untrustworthy and consequently disempowers women.

Gender is not the only issue addressed by those who advocate inclusive language. People with disabilities are people first, and their disabilities are merely descriptors. “People who are blind” are not “the blind.” Crayon manufacturers recognized that the beige crayon is not the only one that is “flesh-colored.” “Black” and “dark” as metaphors for evil or impurity perpetuate racist prejudice against persons with black or brown skin in many cultures.

Inclusive language is a theological issue. It is related to language and images for God*. To speak about God, the Ultimate, the Transcendent, the Ground of Being, the Infinite, using finite human speech is at heart an impossible task. At best, such words and images can point to God, without naming God directly. To use only male terms to refer to God obscures the theological affirmation that God transcends all human categories of race, gender, culture, and time, and that all humankind has been created in that inclusive divine image (Gen 1:27).

Far from being a matter merely of political correctness, inclusive language goes to the heart of religious language and ethical practice. Although its specific forms and strategies are still being developed, inclusive language identifies a profoundly theological agenda. See also DISABILITY AND CHRISTIANITY; FEMINIST THEOLOGY CLUSTER; IMAGE OF GOD; RACISM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Inculturation of Christianity and the Gospel. A coinage introduced in the 1960s, “inculturation” refers to the process whereby the gospel and the culture of a particular people are integrated and are thereby mutually enriched. Yet inculturation is as old as Christianity itself (see the present cluster: In the Greco-Roman World); the gospel has never been acultural. First clothed in Jewish culture and religion, in the Western* churches the good news took on Hellenistic, Latin, Teutonic, Anglo-Saxon, Iberian, and other elements. It is this Western-inculturated Christianity embodied in layers of theology, canon* law, liturgy*, and spirituality* that was exported primarily by missionaries to the so-called Two-thirds World.

In the late 20th and early 21st c., inculturation became for many Western missionaries a self-conscious effort to prolong the Western process of inculturation of Christianity by promoting inculturation of Christianity in other cultures around the world. This practice goes far beyond what it was for the early missionaries and takes different forms according to each cultural context (described in the following entries). Yet from a Christian theological perspective, the inculturation process can be viewed as having the following characteristics, the emphasis varying from one culture to another.

1. Inculturation is a two-way process of inserting the already inculturated gospel into a particular culture and this culture into the gospel, so that the resulting inculturated Christianity will be something different and new (as a dialogue between two cultures, it could be called "interculturalism").
2. Inculturation is an integral and constitutive dimension of mission*.
3. Inculturation is guided by the mysteries* of Jesus' incarnation*, death, and resurrection* and the descent and active presence of the Holy* Spirit, the guiding force of inculturation.
4. The principal agents of inculturation are the local church and the native people, not the missionaries, the experts, or the central authorities.
5. Inculturation embraces all aspects of church life, from theology to ethics, law, liturgy, catechesis, and spirituality.
6. Inculturation must criticize and reject aspects of culture that dehumanize human beings and thus goes hand in hand with Liberation* theologies.
7. Since culture is often bound up with religion, inculturation is often carried out as part of interreligious dialogue and pays special attention to popular religion.

Ideally, a self-conscious practice of inculturation seeks to keep in tension the promotion of diversity and pluralism and the preservation of the unity of faith by assessing its compatibility with the gospel and communion with the universal church.

PETER C. PHAN

Inculturation of Christianity in the Greco-Roman World. The Christian message, originally based on Jewish apocalyptic* premises, was soon reexpressed in Hellenistic terms in both form and content, becoming accessible to the Greco-Roman world even as it challenged some of its aspects, as a few examples show.

Christianity initially spread in Mediterranean cities where the dominant Greco-Roman culture was omnipresent. The earliest formulations of the Jesus tradition already reflect this Hellenistic context. The saying "The eye is the lamp of the body" (Matt. 6:22–23; Luke 11:34–36) is related to the philosophical debate about sense perception and cognition; the closest analogy to the genre of Q* (as a collection of sayings) may be the "Principal Doctrines" of Epicurus, a philosophical catechism. The collections of Jesus' miracle stories have an epiphanic* function, like those of Hellenistic "divine men." The canonical Gospels may follow the genre of Greco-Roman biography. The complex role of inculturation as both accommodation and challenge to a culture becomes apparent when one asks, How did Hellenistic audiences subjected to Roman rule receive the message about Jesus as "Son* of God" and "Savior*" when the same terms were used for Augustus and when Caesar's birthday was celebrated as "glad tidings" (euangelion, gospel) for the world?

Paul's* apostleship to the Gentiles is a thoroughgoing inculturation. 1 Thessalonians draws on Cynic traditions in differentiating Paul's behavior from that of other missionaries (2:5–12) and alludes to Greek epitaphs in consoling the bereaved (4:13–18). The creed "Jesus died and rose" (4:14; cf. Rom. 10:9) uses familiar vocabulary for readers accustomed to savior gods who die and rise. Paul's extended debate with elite converts at Corinth adapts the Greco-Roman discourse form to pastoral purposes: 1 Cor 1–4 is an "appeal for concord," a subgenre of deliberative rhetoric; to glorify love*, 1 Cor 13 follows the model of Plato's speeches in Symposium; 2 Cor 11:1–12:10 is a mime-inspired "fool's speech." Paul's inculturation was not an accommodation to the values of Greco-Roman society, but a transformation of the concepts appropriated, in accordance with the paradoxical revelation of the "crucified Messiah." Thus Paul reinterpreted the political idea of “reconciliation*” (2 Cor 5:18–21).

Late-1st- to early-2nd-c. Christian literature shows an infiltration of Greek philosophical concepts that made Christianity more meaningful to Hellenistic elite: Middle Platonism* in Hebrews* and the Stoic vision of cosmic harmony in 1 Clement* 20. The Christian–Platonic synthesis of Clement* of Alexandria completed the transformation of the Jewish apocalyptic Jesus movement into a Hellenistic religion of the salvation* of the soul*. Fourth-century Christian art reflects the depth of inculturation: the Good Shepherd is represented as Hermes. See also HELLENISTIC RELIGIOUS TRADITIONS AND CHRISTIANITY’S SELF-DEFINITION; POVERTY CLUSTER: AND THE EASTERN ORTHODOX CHURCH. LAURENCE L. 2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Inculturation of Christianity in Africa: Central and Southern Africa. The general tendency among Western missionaries to Central and Southern Africa was to assume that European culture was Christian and that African culture and religion were demonic* and therefore should be dismissed. However, many African Christians wanted Christianity to take root in African culture and religion so that the gospel might be truly African. While the inculturation of music* and liturgy* has been relatively easy, rites of passage were the battleground where mission churches and indigenous churches confronted each other most strongly. For instance, all the mission churches of Malawi* struggled over the practice of initiation ceremonies for men and women – ceremonies highly valued in most cultures in Southern Africa. Thus in 1903 the Dutch Reformed Church Mission banned its members from taking part in traditional initiation ceremonies. By 1920 the missionaries realized that the local Christians, especially women, preferred to be suspended from church membership for a period in order to initiate their daughters and sons and be reconciled to the church afterward. Thus by the 1930s, most mission churches in Malawi decided to develop Christian versions of the initiation ceremonies, which are still practiced today. Similarly, among the Shona of Zimbabwe*, the major struggle has been over burial rituals (see Death, Christian Views of, Cluster: In Africa). First-born sons are bound by culture to bury their parents in a traditional way, something that African Christians did, even if they were temporarily excommunicated from the church. The result has been the Christianization of traditional funeral rites in the Roman Catholic Church. In South Africa, most mission churches have Christianized the traditional unveiling of tombstones because of its value in local traditions. ISABEL APAWO PHIRI

Inculturation of Christianity in Africa: Eastern Africa.

Starting in the mid-19th c., European missionaries introduced and consolidated Christianity in the Eastern African region, according to the form in which it had been molded in their own countries. Since they largely ignored or sidelined the religious perceptions and sensibilities of the indigenous people, “missionary Christianity” has remained a sort of “second-layer” faith imposed on and parallel to indigenous beliefs and practices.

The question of inculturation* has become urgent since the 1960s. It concerns how to express Christianity in African cultural terms so that it speaks through local mythical*, symbolic*, and conceptual religious “language.” This language for Christianity entails the importance of the spiritual universe, ritual, and human relationships through community, cooperation, and sharing.

Since ancestors* and spirits* play a significant role in Eastern African spirituality*, it is not surprising that they do so in Eastern African Christianity. Ever present and involved in the life of society, ancestors are the custodians of the people’s moral traditions, entrusted to them by the Creator. They are responsible for the strength and life of the community.

All elements of creation are powers, “vital forces” (forces of life), mutually interdependent and supportive. The greatest vital force is the life of humanity, sustained by proper relationships. Ritual* activity is geared toward enhancing human life with the help of the ancestors. Rites of passage – birth, puberty, marriage*, old age, and death* – are extremely significant. Concepts drawn from ritual activities and applied to Jesus as healer, elder brother, and diviner form a new theological language of inculturation.

Situating Christianity in the socioreligious context of Eastern Africa began with evangelism* and its reception. In Eastern African Christianity, perceptions of religious mediation through ancestors and spirits refuse to die. Similarly, notions of evil* as powers (related to witchcraft*) are still very common. Thus whether secretly or openly, Christianity in Eastern African can be viewed as syncretistic*. It needs to recognize this syncretism and its ambivalence, although some want to view it as a form of inculturation*. See also TANZANIA. LAURENTI MAGESA Inculturation of Christianity in Africa: Western Africa. “Inculturation,” the incarnation* of the gospel in the context of living Christian communities, is fraught with tension. The gospel transforms every culture*, but its reception also empowers West Africans to live the good news in dialogue with their culture. Inculturation (not decorative adaptation of cultural patterns) challenges West African churches to undertake a vital reception of the gospel through new liturgies, catecheses, ethical practices, ministries, church structures, and theological formulations, which have nevertheless to be recognized as “catholic,” as expressions of the universal church. Fear of syncretism* results in superficial adaptations of deep African traditional psychoreligious practices, instead of enriching the religious treasury of humanity.

The Bible in West African languages is foundational for inculturation. Translations display the compatibility of the biblical and African worlds penetrated by and embodying revelation by the same God. Sermons and interpretations highlight the continuing relevance of the text present in peoples’ lives.

Vernacular liturgies accompanied by gestures, songs, instrumentation, and new ritual texts exemplify the West African reception of Christianity. Experiences vary according to regions and Christian churches. Christian initiation* integrates the stages and rhetoric of traditional African initiation in Burkina* Faso; African* Religion’s child-naming and marriage* ceremonies are integrated into Nigerian Catholicism; healing* rituals reflecting traditional rituals abound in all churches.

African* Instituted Churches (AICs) expand ministries and church structures. They create new rites tying together the Bible and West Africa, e.g. the ordaining of prophets and visionaries for the healing* ministry. AICs and the Charismatic* Movement integrate traditional West African mysticism* into Christianity. The experience of the descent of the Holy* Spirit into the elect, women and men, is displayed in ways similar to “possession” by West African spirits.

Systematic theological reflection focuses on methodology, family* and community ethics*, ecclesiology, and Christology*. The titles of Christ – Chief or King, Ancestor*, Master of Initiation, Liberator, and Healer – integrate West African traditions into Christianity.

ELOCHUKWU EUGENE UZUKWU, CSSP

Inculturation of Christianity in Asia.

Christianity that was brought to Asia in the 16th c. was primarily Iberian in form, since mission in all of Asia was undertaken under the patronage* of Portugal* (and Spain* in the Philippines). For good and for ill, Christian mission was associated with Western imperialism and often perceived as its handmaiden. Later, other Western powers joined in the military conquest, commerce, and Christian mission in Asia: the Netherlands*, the UK, France*, and the USA (see United Kingdom; United States).

Even if the Christian faith was often identified with its Western form, many missionaries were aware of the difference between the gospel they were to preach and the Western civilization they carried with them. Early examples of those who promoted inculturation were the Syrian* (non-Chalcedonian) Orthodox missionaries to China* who in the 7th–8th c. attempted to express the Christian faith in Buddhist*, Confucianist*, and Daoist* terms. Thus they taught that Christianity is the “ever-true and unchanging Dao” itself; that Jesus established a “new teaching of nonassertion” (Daoist), taught “how to rule both families and kingdoms” (Confucianist), and took an oar in “the vessel of mercy” and “ascended to the Palace of Light” (Buddhist). Similarly, many 16th- to 17th-c. missionaries (mainly Jesuit) – such as Alessandro Valignano in Japan*, Matteo Ricci* in China, Roberto de Nobili* in India*, and Alexandre de Rhodes in Vietnam* – self-consciously sought to explain Christian beliefs and practices in terms understandable to the native peoples.

For its practitioners in the early 21st c., inculturation goes far beyond what it was for the early missionaries in Asia. See also THE PRESENT CLUSTER: AND THE GOSPEL. PETER C. PHAN Inculturation in Latin America and Elsewhere. See POPULAR CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Indebtedness, the sense of monetary, social, or personal obligation that a person or group owes to another person or group for something received. Seneca, in “On Benefits,” describes the concept of indebtedness as essential to the patronage system – a system of social reciprocity that characterized human relating during the Pax Romana. Yet with the Roman Empire and its patronage system, indebtedness was often a concept reflecting basic inequality, a relation between unequals. More generally, the concept of indebtedness is also central to the honor*/shame system. In the NT, this concept (expressed by the verb opheilo and the nouns derived from it) is frequently found, referring positively or negatively to a sense of indebtedness to God or to other people (as in the Lord’s Prayer in Luke 11:4 and John 13:14, reciprocal foot-washing). Paul (especially in Romans) refers to it in order to encourage people in Christian communities to imagine themselves in relationships that emphasize a sense of mutual-ity and interdependence – what Filipinos might call “indebtedness of the heart” and Paul the “indebtedness of love” (Rom 13:8). More specifically, Paul uses this concept to express a mindset that acknowledges other people’s talents, gifts, and contributions and thus one’s indebtedness to this other person or group.

Index Librorum Prohibitorum (List of prohibited books), issued by the Inquisition* in 1557, it prohibited Protestant books, among others. It was originally enforced by the Congregation of the Index and then by the Holy* Office. Since 1966 it no longer has the force of canon* law but retains moral force.

India, a country whose civilization has spanned several millennia, with the rare distinction of having welcomed the gospel during the time of the apostles. According to tradition, Thomas preached the gospel in Northwest India, landed (52) in Cranganore, Kerala (on the western coast of South India), and suffered martyrdom in Mylapore (the eastern coast, today part of Chennai, formerly Madras). His memory is alive, particularly in Kerala, where a group of Christians call themselves “Thomas Christians” and follow the Syriac tradition and liturgy; they are members of the Malankara* Orthodox Syrian Church, which has maintained a relationship with Syrian* Orthodox churches; their bishops were sent from Chaldea (Iran* and Iraq*). In addition, in 345 Thomas of Cana (Kani) led a group of Assyrian* Christians from Syro-Mesopotamia to Kerala (India), where their Knanaya Christian descendants still survive (see History of Christianity Cluster: In the Middle East: Syriac Christianity).

Although the Christian tradition in India is ancient, Christians there have remained numerically a "little flock." According to the Indian census of 2001, Christians constitute just 2.3% of the population, in contrast to Hindus, who make up the overwhelming majority (80.5%), and Muslims (13.4%). In absolute terms, however, the number of Indian Christians is significant: a total of about 28 million people (more than twice as many according to nongovernmental sources), a larger number of Christians than in many traditionally Christian countries of the West.

Christians are not uniformly spread throughout the country; they are concentrated in certain pockets, with a sprinkling of Christians elsewhere. There is a strong concentration of Christians in the southern states of India (Tamil Nadu, Kerala, Karnataka, Andhra Pradesh, and Goa), in the eastern parts, among the Adivasis* ("original dwellers of the land," also called "tribals"; see Tribalism and Christianity), and in the northeastern parts, among the Adivasis of Mongoloid origin. In the sparsely populated states of Nagaland, Mizoram, and Meghalaya, the majority of people are Christians. A sizable majority of Indian Christians are Adivasis and Dalits* (formerly known as "untouchables"), who embraced Christianity through mass conversion (especially in the 19th and early 20th c.).

Practically every Christian denomination is represented in India. Roman Catholics, Orthodox, Lutherans, Baptists, and Anglicans have a longer history than do those of other denominations. However, it would be incorrect to identify Indian Christianity with the history of the various denominations. Indian Christianity is a river with its own route into which the streams of the histories of the various denominations flow. Their active involvement in mission led the various churches to set aside the inherited Western denominational divisions and collaborate in the work of the gospel. For example, historical divisions among Christian churches are much less visible in India than elsewhere, as was demonstrated by a highly significant event with global ecumenical implications. The Church of South* India (CSI) was formed in 1947 as a single communion comprising Episcopal and non-Episcopal churches. It was the culmination of persistent efforts on the part of outstanding church leaders and long negotiations. The Church of North* India (CNI) was formed (1970) on the same basis. This unique union of churches is a challenge to a divided Christianity and has served as an inspiration for church union in other parts of the world.

The Spread of Christianity. We have scant information about the period between apostolic times and the modern missionary era (from the 16th c.), e.g. the arrival of Franciscan* friars, including John of Montecorvino, who spent some months (1291–92) in Mylapore before setting sail to Khan Balik (Beijing), China*.

The expansion of Christianity in India really started with Portuguese traders, who brought missionaries with them to India and eventually came to hold political power (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). These missionaries established themselves in Goa, which would become the hub of Christianity for the whole of India and East Asia. Francis Xavier*, SJ, came to India in 1542 and worked tirelessly in the southern coastland to convert and baptize its fishing peoples. The Jesuit* order established its mission center in Madurai (Madurai Mission), and the well-known Italian missionary Roberto de Nobili*, a nephew of Cardinal Bellarmine, did his missionary work in and around that city. The caste* system was already a crucial issue in Indian Christianity. Fearing that any interference with the system might jeopardize their missions, the missionaries followed a strategy of division of labor: some became missionaries exclusively for members of the low castes and outcastes, and others, like Roberto de Nobili, worked among the Brahmins and members of the upper castes. The outcome of this strategy is apparent to this day in the caste conflicts among Christians in the southern states.

With the suppression of the Society of Jesus (1773), missionaries from other religious orders came in large numbers. The Carmelites* began their missionary involvement in Kerala, whereas the Paris Foreign Missionaries, with Pondicherry as their headquarters, expanded their work in Tamilnadu, Andhra Pradesh, and neighboring regions. One of the issues that plagued the Indian Church was the patronage rights (Padroado*) retained by the Portuguese crown by which they exercised ecclesiastical jurisdiction over the churches in India. Noting that the missionary work was attuned to Portuguese national interests, Rome attempted to control the affairs of the Catholic Church through its newly established Congregatio de Propaganda* Fide (Congregation for the Propagation of Faith, 1622). The missionaries of Padroado and those from the Propaganda Fide were locked in conflicts and feuds, resulting in many scandalous clashes. Some villages today have two adjacent churches: one that had been under Padroado jurisdiction and the other that had been under Propaganda Fide. The Roman Catholic mission could not make much headway during the 17th and 18th c. owing to a lack of missionary personnel and, above all, to the internal conflict of jurisdiction between the Portuguese Padroado missionaries and the Rome-appointed apostolic vicars and priests working in these territories.

In the northern parts of the country, the earliest Christian mission was associated with the Mogul emperor Akbar. He was deeply interested in understanding religions and concerned about religious harmony. Such was his openness that he had the Virgin Mary* and angels* painted on his palace walls. His eagerness to learn more about Christianity led him to invite Jesuit missionaries from Goa to his court, though the missionaries were disappointed because they had entertained false hopes of converting the emperor.

While the Catholic mission was in a state of confusion, following Portuguese domination, the Protestants began their mission. The German missionary Bartholomäus Ziegenbalg brought Protestant Christianity into the Danish colony of Tranquebar, Tamilnadu (1706). By then the British East India Company was politically entrenched and did not allow missionaries, lest its commercial and political interests be adversely affected. So Ziegenbalg's and his companion Plütschau's missionary work took the form of translating the Bible for the first time into an Indian language, Tamil. This great missionary learned Tamil, to a considerable degree, through dialogue with Hindus. More than a century later, another Danish colony, Serampore in West Bengal, became the center of mission work for Baptist missionaries. Best known among them was William Carey, whose contributions covered many areas; chief among these was his involvement in higher education and translation of the Bible into several Eastern Indian languages.

When the charter of the East India Company was up for renewal (1813), the Evangelicals of England spearheaded by Charles Grant and Wilberforce* wanted a "missionary clause" to be included that would permit the entry of missionaries into India. After heated debate in the British Parliament, the clause was approved; missionaries of different denominations set sail to India and established mission centers, especially in Southern India. Missionaries from the London Mission Society, the SPCK* (Society for Propagating Christian Knowledge), and other organizations worked side by side. As a result of the Protestant and Roman Catholic efforts, there was mass conversion of outcastes (Dalits) and people from the lower castes. During the same period, Baptist and other Protestant groups established mission centers in Northeast India, working with Adivasi groups there and in the East. The mission work also challenged traditional practices such as the live cremation of a widow on her husband's funeral pyre (sati), child marriage, and denial of remarriage to widows, and aided in enacting new legislation by the colonial government to reform these traditions.

During this conversion work, there was a fresh realization of the "civilizing mission" of Christianity. This eventually led to the institution-building phase in Indian Christianity. Beginning in the mid-19th c., numerous educational institutions from the primary level to colleges, medical services offered by village dispensaries and modern urban hospitals, and social and economic development activities were established. These institutions constitute the visible face of Indian Christianity throughout the country. An evolution of the self-understanding of Christian educational institutions has taken place. At first, they were viewed as a means of converting members of the upper castes and classes; during the post-independence period, they were viewed as contributing to nation building; and today educational involvement is a means of empowering the most powerless groups, such as the Adivasis and the Dalits. It is noteworthy that literacy among Christians, especially among Christian women, is strikingly higher than the national average. Christian educational institutions are known for their excellence and high quality of education.

This tradition was set by great missionaries like W. Miller of Madras Christian College and C. F. Andrews of Stephen's College, Delhi. The challenge facing Christian higher education is how to reconcile the twofold commitment to the education of the poor and the maintenance of high standards.

Hindu-Christian Relationship. During the early centuries of Christianity in India, the Thomas Christians accommodated themselves to the Hindu environment and have continued to maintain many Hindu customs and traditions. In other parts of the country, a deep spiritual affinity between Hindus and Christians is manifest, especially during mutual visits to pilgrimage centers or local religious festivals. Popular* Christianity in India has adopted many elements of Hindu symbolism and modes of religious worship.

The relationship with Hindus was strained during the time of the Portuguese mission, which condemned the Hindu practices and instituted the infamous Goan inquisition. Another period of conflict with Hindus occurred in the 19th c., at the beginning of the Indian war of independence (1857). Hindu and Muslim soldiers revolted against British authorities for attempting to convert them and for stealthily introducing Bibles into the barracks. At the time of the revolt, Christians were found on the side of the British, which provided a motive for inflicting violence on Christian communities. Christians were killed in large numbers in North India. These events are to be viewed against the backdrop of growing animosity of Hindus toward Christians; Hindus suspected that the colonial government and its officials were undermining Hinduism by joining forces with the missionaries in swelling the Christian ranks and that the converts or "apostates" (in the Hindu perception) were collaborating with the missionaries. The missionary support of state policy such as banning sati and the introduction of the Bible in English classes in government schools seemed to confirm the Hindus' suspicion. Added to this was the passing of the Caste Disabilities Removal Act of 1850, which gave the converts the right of succession as in the Hindu tradition. Furthermore, there was, rightly or wrongly, a general perception that the colonial government and its officers were supportive of Christians and missionaries. It is an irony of history that anti-Christian sentiments contributed to the forging of unity among Hindus across caste, religion, and language (see Colonialism and Imperialism and Christian Theology).

Ambiguity has characterized Hindu-Christian relations since the mid-19th c. There was vehement opposition to the Christian mission (including bitter criticism by Gandhi), especially to conversion efforts. Yet movements like the Brahmo Samaj in Bengal saw Christianity as a great resource for the renewal of Indian society and culture, and the stalwarts of this influential association, Rammohun Roy, Keshub Chunder Sen, and others, were attracted by the Christian message. Several missionaries, influenced by Orientalists who brought the riches of Indian culture and tradition to the West, began to cultivate a positive attitude toward Hinduism and sought to incorporate some of its traditions and customs into Christianity.

By the early 21st c., opposition to Christianity had grown, and the Brahmo Samaj legacy of an intellectual rapprochement between Hindus and Christians had waned. This is not to deny the peaceful coexistence of Hindus and Christians in daily life. The opposition to Christianity and Christian mission might be explained by the steady rise of Hindu militancy, starting in the 1920s with the founding of Hindu Mahasabha, and the emergence of Hindu right-wing politics represented by the Bharatiya Janata Party. Since the late 20th c., sporadic attacks against Christian ministers and institutions in the northern parts of the country have increased.

Underlying the general Hindu attitude toward Christians, at every level and at all times, is the fact that Christianity is alien to the Indian nation and culture, and it expanded in the country with the support of the colonizers. Another issue is conversion*. Although the Constitution of India ensures religious freedom, there is suspicion that Christians use numerous methods to entice the uneducated and rank and file of the poor classes to Christianity. Many Hindus make an argument similar to Gandhi's: conversion infringes on the freedom of the masses. This argument fails to note that the poor have their own agency, and it is they who decide to convert to one religious group or the other (see Hinduism and Christianity Cluster).

Development of Indigenous Christianity. Obviously India has been influenced by the West, and Christianity has been an important channel of influence, as the numerous educational institutions of Western education run by the churches indicate. But Indian Christianity itself did not remain Western. During the period of Roman Catholic and Protestant missions, the missionaries dominated the affairs of the churches. Many missionaries were convinced that indigenous people were not capable of and not yet ready for ordination as ministers. Yet local catechists, teachers, "Bible women", and others were crucial for the expansion of Christianity in India, and without these men and women, missionaries could not have reached out to the people. The story of these indigenous ministers of the gospel is yet to be written. In spite of this general climate, the ordination, amid stiff resistance, of Aaron, a Lutheran of India, in 1733 foreshadowed things to come. In the Roman Catholic Church, the emergence of an indigenous movement took much longer. The trend toward ordaining indigenous priests and bishops became more pronounced only in the late 19th and early 20th c., particularly under the impetus of Pope Leo* XIII.

The dependence of churches on foreign missionaries continued throughout the 19th c. and until the mid-20th c. However, even in the early 20th c., indigenous people began questioning the control missionaries exercised on Indian Christianity by occupying leadership positions and controlling finances. A very powerful voice for autonomy was that of Bishop V. S. Azariah, who forcefully raised this point at the World Missionary Conference in Edinburgh* (1910). The movement toward autonomy led Indians to take over leadership of the churches and to shape the future of Christianity there. It is important to note that this movement toward autonomy was triggered by the Indian national struggle for independence. The political struggle had repercussions for the transformation of churches into indigenous ones.

With national independence (1947), the number of Western missionaries declined rapidly. Any missionaries that remain today are exceptions. A new development has taken place: Indians from regions with a strong Christian presence, especially in the south, go to other parts of India to serve as missionaries. Indian missionaries today even serve in Africa, Latin America, and other parts of the world. While there were only two indigenous Roman Catholic religious orders in the 19th c. (Carmelites of Immaculate Mary and the Society of St. Francis Xavier, or "Pillar Fathers"), the 20th c. witnessed the emergence of numerous indigenous congregations in response to local needs.

Christianity and Indian Culture. In spite of opposition from many missionaries and conservative local Christians, indigenization sought to adapt Christianity to the Indian religious ethos and its way of thinking and worshiping. This kind of adaptation was even stronger in the Roman Catholic Church, especially after Vatican* II. More recently, cultural adaptation efforts have raised some critical issues (see Inculturation Cluster). First, it is impossible to define Indian culture as a homogenous reality. Although there is an increasing realization that Indian culture is composite, made up of many elements from different regional, linguistic, and ethnic groups (e.g. Aryans, Dravidians, people of Mongolian ancestry), adaptation or cultural contextualization* was typically thought of in terms of the dominant Brahminical culture. A similar adaptation took place theologically, by employing Brahminical religious concepts to interpret various aspects of Christianity. Dalits and the Adivasis, who constitute the majority of Indian Christians, strongly oppose this type of indigenization of the dominant culture. Dalit Christians, struggling against oppression by the upper castes (including in the churches), are betrayed by the adoption of symbols from dominant Brahminical Hindu culture. Indian Adivasis seem to be less inclined to accept any such adaptation, and they retain to large extent the Western form of Christianity. This is particularly true of the Adivasis of Northeast India, including the Nagas and Mizos.

Indian Nation and Christianity. Whereas in most parts of Asia there are official or state-sponsored religions, in India the constitution ensures religious freedom and equality for all religions, regardless of their numbers. Christians also enjoy protection under the law as minorities, and they are given the right to run educational and other charitable institutions. Nevertheless, in spite of a history of tolerance within India, the ideology and praxis of the religiously inspired right-wing Bharatya Janata Party and Hindu militant movements like Rashtriya Swayasevak Sangh have created a sense of alienation and insecurity among Christians.

Along with most other Indians, Christians viewed the British government as beneficial to the country. However, many Christians joined the struggle for full independence, including some prominent members of Congress (Kalicharan Banerjee, J. C. Kumarappa, S. K. George, and the Joseph brothers).

At the time of independence, there was serious apprehension about the future of Christianity. Christian leaders were unsure of the kind of treatment Christians would receive from the majority community of Hindus once the British were no longer ruling. One suggestion for ensuring the safety of Christians as a minority was to create a separate electorate for Christians. By choosing their own representatives, they could be sure their voice would be represented politically, but the British had already rejected this idea of separate electorates for minorities like Christians and Muslims. The idea was vehemently opposed by Gandhi and other national leaders, not to mention by many Christians themselves. In the constituent assembly that framed the present-day constitution, Christians, trusting in the fairness of the majority community, gave up any such claim to a separate electorate, a move that was highly admired for its spirit of openness.

The contribution of Christianity to the nation and its development spans many and diverse areas. Because missionaries sought to translate the Christian Scriptures into native languages, they were able to make significant contributions to the grammar and literature of Sanskrit, Tamil, and other Indian languages, beginning as early as the 17th c. (see Indian Literature, the Bible, and Christianity). Some Christian missionaries served as mediators by transmitting to the West some of the riches of Indian culture and civilization, but many projected a distorted picture of India and its culture – something resented by many Hindus even today.

Christianity did contribute to the creation of new social and egalitarian thought in India. In an atmosphere that excluded the poor and those of the lower castes from knowledge, because members of the upper castes and classes thought that education was their privilege, Christians introduced the idea that education was everyone's right, irrespective of a person's social and economic conditions; thus schools for those in the lower castes and for women were started by Indian social reformers like Jyotirao Phule. Christians contributed to the emergence of the idea of equality of all before the law. In particular, Christian missionaries defended the cause of the Adivasis, protected them from rapacious exploiters, were involved in the struggle for liberation of the oppressed castes – e.g. in the princely state of Travancore in South India – and defended workers from exploitation by colonial and local landowners.

Dalit and Adivasi Christians. Christians of Dalit origin and Adivasis make up the overwhelming majority of Indian Christians. Dalit Christians suffer discrimination both in the church and in society. Within the church, discrimination extends from segregated seating for Dalits to refusal to accept them as equal partners in the management of its affairs. One of the most serious problems encountered by Dalit Christians is that they are not eligible, according to current legislation, to receive those benefits protecting non-Christian Dalits from discrimination, even though Christian Dalits suffer the same kind of discrimination, political powerlessness, and economic deprivation as others. The reason cited is that Christianity does not recognize caste, which is something characteristic of Hinduism. Once Dalits are converted to Christianity, so goes the argument, they lose their caste status and cannot claim the constitutional provisions that favor Dalits.

Dalits have an ambiguous relationship with Christianity. Christianity contributed to their social uplift through education, medical care, and other developmental and social activities. But Dalit Christians are treated as second-class citizens in most churches and are prevented by upper-caste Christians from exercising their agency in almost all of the churches in India. In many instances, Christian mission has created a new sense of dignity and self-confidence for the Dalits. But there is also the widespread view that Christianity dampened their political involvement, in comparison with Hindu Dalits. Dalits are developing their own theology (see Dalit Theology).

Christianity has also empowered Adivasis in several ways, especially through education and many social and developmental initiatives, resulting in greater self-confidence. Christianity is so deeply rooted among some Adivasis, like the Nagas, that it has become part of their self-identity. But from the perspective of some sections of the Indian population, Christianity has alienated the Adivasis from their culture and has imposed Western culture on them. Moreover, the insurgency among the Adivasis* of Northeast India and the emergence of secessionist tendencies are attributed to the influence of Christianity. The relationship of other Christian churches to Christian Adivasis is also ambiguous. See also NORTH INDIA, CHURCH OF; SOUTH INDIA, CHURCH OF.

Statistics: Population (2001): 1.2 billion. Hindu, 80.5%; Muslim, 13.4%; Christian, 2.3% (c28 million); Sikh, 1.9%; other, 1.8%. (Based on the 2001 census. The percentage of Christians given in the World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001, is 6.2% (62 million); apparently the discrepancy exists because the Dalits and Adivasis were underrepresented in the census.)

Indian Christian Theologies. Although the origins of Christianity in India, according to tradition, date back to the apostle Thomas*, there is little to say about Indian Christian theologies of apostolic times. This is because the ancient Indian Church of Thomas Christians (Malankara* Orthodox Syrian Church), in the state of Kerala on the west coast of South India, was dependent on Middle Eastern churches for theology, worship practices, and even their bishops. The theology from that time can only be glimpsed today in the liturgical tradition of Thomas Christians. Undoubtedly, their theology had a Nestorian* influence, i.e. the belief that the human Jesus was taken hold of by the Logos* to become lord and creator of the universe: Jesus' humanity and divinity were joined by will, not by nature, although Jesus and the Logos become one person, not two. Their liturgical books were in East Syrian and contained not only the names of Nestorius*, Theodore*, and others, but Nestorian formulas as well. This theological orientation did not change until the 20th c.

The missionary era in India began with the arrival of Vasco da Gama on the western coast of India (1492). The missionaries taught the scholastic* theology that they had learned in their native country. There were laudable exceptions, such as Stephen Thomas, Ernest Hanxleden (popularly known as Arnos Padri), the Carmelite* priest Paulinus of St. Bartholomew (1748–1806), and most exceptionally, the Italian missionary Roberto de Nobili* (1577–1656). Nobili followed an apologetic method of trying to prove the truth of the Christian message to Hindu Brahmins, while allowing his Hindu interlocutors to expound their doctrines; but Nobili also pioneered a method of adaptation to Hindu customs and traditions, which caused a confrontation with Rome. His greatest contribution to Indian theology was his praxis of inculturation*, or contextualization*, which continues to be a source of inspiration for many forms of Indian theologies.

De Nobili's way of life as a Christian sannyasi (ascetic*) – closely resembling that of a Hindu sannyasi – fully embodied his theology of inculturation. His belief was that if Greco-Roman modes of thought were initially incorporated into Christian thought and praxis, the same must be true of Indian tradition. Thus he tried to give a Christian theological interpretation of Hindu customs and traditions. His praxis of dialogue* led to the development of some Indian Christian theological vocabulary. On the Protestant side, Bartholomäus Ziegenbalg (1683–1719), in his life and missionary work at the Danish colony of Tranquebar, Tamilnadu, showed great sympathy toward Hinduism, as is evidenced in his works, Description of Malabar Books and The Genealogy of Malabar Gods.

These seeds of a new Hindu–Christian theological orientation began to bear fruit (late 19th c.) when a Brahmin convert to Christianity, Brahmabhadhava Upadhyaya (1861–1907), carried forward this task. He was a pioneer in relating Christian faith with the culture, philosophy, and genius of India. Although Upadhyaya did not create any theological system, his developments of Hindu–Christian concepts influenced subsequent theologians, who interpreted Christianity through advaita, or nondualism, in which God* and soul* are viewed neither as one nor as two distinct entities. The same is true of the relationship between God and nature or the world. The Christian ashram movement has further developed the advaitic interpretation of Christianity. Bede Griffiths, an English Benedictine monk associated with the Saccidananda Ashram in Thaneerpalli, in the center of Tamilnadu, developed many theological insights through the advaitic experience and interpretation of the gospel. The encounter with Hinduism, in this way, led also to a development of an Indian theology of religions. This theology passed through various stages, starting from a theory that Christianity is the “crown of Hinduism,” to the recognition of revelation in other religious traditions (“the unknown Christ of Hinduism”) and the working of God's Spirit and plan of salvation through the symbolism and sacramentality in these religions.

Such Christian efforts parallel the Hindu attempt to interpret Christianity. This is something quite unique, and it enlarges the horizon of Christian theology as well as its methodology. Hindu social reformers like Rammohun Roy (1772–1833) focused on the significance of Jesus Christ and his “ethical precepts”; Keshub Chandra Sen, another towering intellectual figure of 19th-c. Bengal, saw in Jesus a true Asian and affirmed the importance of recovering the original Asian Jesus from the accretions and distortions that have taken place over two millennia. Sen viewed Jesus Christ from an “evolutionary*” perspective and saw the destiny of every human being and the whole universe to become the Christ, something the Western theologian Teilhard* de Chardin would later call "Christification." Sen interpreted the mystery of the Holy Trinity* through the Hindu concept of sat-cit-ananda.

A creative movement of Indian Christian theologies is represented by the "Rethinking Christianity in India" group, including P. Chenchiah, V. Chakkarai, and A. J. Appasamy. Chenchiah (1886–1959), a convert from Hinduism, attributed to the Indian scriptures a role similar to the OT with respect to the NT. He saw in Jesus the birth of a new creation, and those who are joined with him are on the move toward the Kingdom* of God, being fashioned by the creative energy of the Spirit*, or shakti. In this interpretation, he was greatly influenced by the modern evolutionary Hindu thinker Sri Aurobindo. Chakkarai (1880–1958) developed an understanding of Jesus through the key Hindu concept of avatar (descent of God) and showed how, unlike Hindu avatars, the avatar Jesus is not a momentary intervention of the Divine, but a permanent feature in the relationship of the Divine to human beings. For his part, A. J. Appasamy interprets Christianity as a way of bhakti, or personal devotion of love and surrender. He draws inspiration from the great medieval Hindu theologian Ramanuja, who systematically developed the concept of bhakti.

Involvement with the sociopolitical realities of the country has also been important for developing Indian theologies. In the post-independence period, under the influence of general social ferment, theologies of nation building emerged, followed by a theology of development. These theologies explored the relationship between humanization, salvation*, and liberation*. An Indian theology of liberation emerged from the unique experience of oppression in the nation, was stimulated by secular movements for liberation and peoples' struggles throughout the country, and drew on many sources: the liberative thoughts, narratives, and symbols in Indian religious traditions, peoples' movements, and secular ideologies. M. M. Thomas* among Protestants, and Sebastian Kappen, Samuel Rayan, and Soares-Prabhu among Catholics, were outstanding representatives of Indian Liberation theology. In short, there have emerged two broad streams of Indian theology: one with the religiocultural heritage of India as the interpretative key; the other with the sociopolitical condition of the country as the perspective from which the gospel message is to be read. The more recent trend of Indian contextual theology has attempted to merge these two streams.

The most significant development in recent decades is the emergence of Dalit* theology, based on the experience of negativity, brokenness, and oppression suffered by the Dalits (so-called untouchables) owing to the ideology* of the pollution of purity, a caste-based social hierarchy, the traditional Indian semifeudal system, and exploitation through the neoliberal economy. (Dalits constitute the majority of Indian Christians, although the churches are still controlled by middle- and upper-caste Christians.) Immediacy, concreteness, and radicalism characterize the Dalit theology, which is critical of futile theoretical discussion and theological narcissism, and is suspicious of Indian theology based on the classical Hindu worldview and concepts. In the Hindu religious justification of caste, Dalits see the root of their oppression and therefore reject any Indian Christian theology that accommodates Brahminical tradition (as those just mentioned do). The Dalits' theological critique of caste draws inspiration from Jesus' attitude toward purity and pollution, his suffering, humiliation, and death outside the gates of the city.

Another major group of Indian Christians are the Adivasis*, or "tribals," concentrated in the east and northeastern parts of the country. An "Indian Tribal theology" is developing, with deep roots in their slighted and neglected traditional cultures. The Adivasis, the "original dwellers of the land," are alienated from their lands and are therefore undergoing an identity crisis. They are caught up in a situation of armed struggles in the midst of political convulsions and cultural crises caused by modernity and globalization that may completely destabilize them. Their engagement with the Christian message has resulted in fresh "tribal theologies" that can inspire other forms of theology developing in India.

An Indian Feminist theology is struggling to emerge, countering patriarchy colored by the reality of caste and traditional cultural factors, and dealing in particular with the issues of dowry, sati, rape, domestic violence, and female feticide, as well as with the social and cultural constructs of the feminine in India. Pandita Ramabhai (1858–1922) converted to Christianity and fought against patriarchy* in both Hinduism and Christianity. Her legacy as a pioneer in the liberation of Indian women is alive in Indian Feminist theology. Feminist theologians are also critical of the Indian churches, in which discrimination against women persists. The distinct strident voice of criticism from Dalit feminists, victims of gender discrimination compounded by caste and economic deprivation, has posed many challenges to developing Indian theologies. Indian Literature, the Bible, and Christianity. A highly romanticized legend portrays Jesus receiving wisdom in India. Yet, although this Hindu chronicle, Bhavisya Purana, contains a reference to Christianity in 8th-c. India, it is viewed as a 19th-c. interpolation. The first authentic Christian record can be found in Tarisapalli copper plates (849, Malayalam language) in Kerala. Pope Gregory XV's 1623 permission granted to Roberto de Nobili* to dress in Brahmin's robes anticipated a synergetic relationship between Christianity and non-Judaic religions and cultures.

The Bible mediated between Christianity and Indian literatures. The missionary aim to make the Bible available in Indian languages led to revolutionary growth of literature in all Indian languages, through the preparation of grammar books and dictionaries. De Nobili learned Sanskrit and Tamil; so did Constanzo Beschi (1680–1747), whose Christian poems became Tamil classics. Beschi Indianized Christian figures, giving them the dress and weapons of Hindu gods and combining concepts like karma with divine decree and original sin*, rebirth of an avatar with Christ's second* coming. Jerome Xavier translated or wrote Christian texts in Persian, Urdu, and Arabic; J. S. Thomas Stephens in Kokkani and Marathi; William Carey in Bengali, Sanskrit, Oriya, Marathi, and Hindi; and John Hanxleden in Malayalam. Pandita Ramabai (1858–1922, a woman advocating the education of women) translated the Bible from Hebrew and Greek into Marathi. The Bible is now available in 50 Indian languages (it was first translated into Tamil, 1726).

Thomas Ramban and a disciple, who described St. Thomas's coming to Malabar (c52) in The Ramban Song (Thooma Parvam in Tamil, 1601), were the first Indologists; their two-way translations initiated comparative literary and religious studies. Eighteenth-century bhakti (devotional) literature presented Christ as a figure of divine manifestation, just like the avatars of the larger Hindu traditions, and compared the Christian Trinity and the Hindu trimurti.

In the 18th and 19th c., Christianity became a catalyst for social reform, in part through its development of literature in different languages, e.g. by writing in Roman script the (primarily oral) languages, thus Christianizing local literary traditions. Ramkrishna Paramahansa's experiments with multireligious mysticism* integrated religions found in the writings of Brahmo Samaj (and the Bengal Renaissance), Raja Rammohun Roy, Keshub Chander Sen, Brahmabandhab Upadhyay, Sri Aurobindo, and Gandhi. Sadhu Sunder Singh's With and Without Christ is well known for combining Christian and Indian religious practices. In the 20th c., Indian English, Hindi, and Marathi fiction presents a more realistic picture of Christian life. Christianity has been most influential in the revolutionary development of Dalit* literature in all Indian languages. SUNANDA MONGIA

Indigenization. See INCULTURATION CLUSTER.

Indonesia, the fourth most populous country in the world (after China, India, and the USA). Of its 225 million citizens (2007), 88% are Muslims, but it has a strong Christian minority, 9% (six-tenths Protestants, four-tenths Roman Catholics). Christians are found mostly in the "outer islands," with only 3% in the central island of Java. A protected and somewhat privileged group during the colonial period, Christians were able to establish a strong community in the independent Republic of Indonesia starting in 1945 owing to better educational facilities. Since the 1990s, various administrations have allowed a stronger Muslim influence in public life, a source of some increased tension between Muslims and Christians.

Some have speculated about early Persian Assyrian* Christians (commonly called "Nestorians*") in the archipelago. But the only firm facts about Christianity date from the arrival of the Portuguese in Malacca (1511) and the Moluccas (Ternate, 1522). The Portuguese came for the spice trade, and they found that the local dynasties had converted to Islam only some 50 years earlier. They started the conversion of some local communities, leading to a mosaic of Christian and Muslim villages in the Moluccas (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). When the Dutch took over the Portuguese trading factories (after 1605), the small Christian communities of the Moluccas became Protestant. Under the Dutch East India Company (1598–1800), most efforts to spread Christianity were stopped. Only after 1830, Protestant missionary societies started organized work in the outer islands with remarkable success in restricted regions. In the 1830s, the conversion of most people of the Minahasa (North Sulawesi) took place in combination with a very strong colonial presence that drastically changed the local economy through the forced cultivation of coffee. A 1859 agreement with Portugal brought East Flores and parts of West Timor under Dutch colonial rule, and subsequently Catholic priests started missionary work in Flores and West Timor. In the 1860s, a successful campaign of the German Rhenish Mission (Ludwig Nommensen) was begun in Batakland, North Sumatra, resulting in the largest Lutheran Church of the country.

During Dutch colonial rule, many inland regions of the outer islands were occupied in 1900–10 through campaigns labeled “wars of pacification.” The Dutch preferred Christianization of the inland and mountainous regions, as well as on islands where the coastal areas had accepted Islam for centuries. This resulted in a strong Christian presence after 1910 in inland South and Central Sulawesi (various Toraja tribes), where the coastal region had accepted Islam since 1605. Inland regions of Flores, Timor, and Sumba accepted Christianity as a majority religion during this period. The Christian presence also became strong in the easternmost island of West New Guinea or West Papua.

To bring an end to headhunting and rituals in which large groups had sexual intercourse with women and spread venereal diseases, men and women were ordered to leave the traditional longhouses and live in new villages organized around a school with a teacher from other islands, a church, and small family houses. The colonial government prevented “double mission,” and therefore West Papua was divided into a northern Protestant region and a southern Catholic one. Four Indonesian provinces (out of 31) have a Christian majority with a strong political influence: East Nusa Tenggara, 3.8 million (M) (88% Christians); Papua, 2.2 M (76% Christians); North Sulawesi, 2 M (67% Christians); and Maluku, 1.2 M (50% Christians).

In the last year of the “Pacific War” (the Japanese occupation of the archipelago during World War II), a committee for the preparation of Indonesian independence debated the status of the new independent Republic. Several Muslims proposed an Islamic state, but the threat of Christian secession in the eastern islands necessitated the pancasila (five pillar) compromise: a state ideology based on five pillars of belief in one God, democracy, nationalism, humanism, and social justice. During the war of independence against the Dutch colonial army (1945–49), the strong Christian presence in the guerrilla struggle (with a large number of Christians earlier trained in the colonial army) was a good start toward Christian participation in nation building in the following decades.

Protestant missionaries started to establish independent regional churches in the early 1930s, while the Indonesian Catholic hierarchy was formally instituted in 1960. In reality, however, expatriate missionaries still dominated much of the Christian churches until mid-1960s when a double movement of independence and new relations took place. There was then an infusion of money in the form of developmental aid, in which the churches played a major role until the mid-1980s. But for religious activities outside theological education, most churches were self-reliant owing to the improvement of the economy in the 1970s under the harsh and increasingly corrupt regime of General Suharto (1966–98) that took place after the economic decline under the first president, the strongly nationalist but chaotic and corrupt Sukarno (1945–67).

Although Christians lost many of the privileges they enjoyed during the colonial period, after 1945 they nonetheless continued to oversee many educational institutions, hospitals, and activities for social welfare and thus exercised a strong influence in society. They were and are strongly present in the media*, from newspapers to radio and television. The strongly anti-Communist policy of General Suharto after the 1965 coup (a first step toward the removal of President Sukarno) required everyone to be a member of one of five global religions (Islam*, Hinduism*, Buddhism*, Protestantism, or Roman Catholicism), and this brought many Muslims to Christianity, especially on the major island of Java, where Christians are now about 3% of the population. Christian–Muslim relations became more tense, however, as a result of this success of Christianity, especially since 1990.

Both sides feel threatened. Christians fear that the growing application of shari’a Islamic law (as in the westernmost province of Aceh and several other districts) will restrict their religious freedom and make it very difficult to build new churches, schools, and hospitals. However, hard-line Muslims spread the fear of Kristenisasi, the ongoing efforts of Christians to seek adherents among Muslims. From a global perspective, Indonesia seems to be the single example of a dominant Muslim society in which a considerable number of people have embraced Christianity.

Regional ethnic and cultural differences are very important in Indonesia, and most classical Protestant churches have an ethnic identity. The great Lutheran Batak* Church is found in all major towns of the country. It serves Batak people who migrated from Sumatra to other parts of the archipelago. Many other churches, however, encourage their members to join the “local” Protestant churches that are members of the Union of Protestant Churches.

Chinese Christians are a case apart in Indonesia: they have established Protestant churches of their own, although the language used in most of them is not Chinese but modern standard Indonesian. In the Catholic Church, Chinese were not given the privilege of ethnic cultural expression as other ethnic groups, such as the Flores, Dayak or Batak Catholics, were. Starting in the late 19th c., Batak Christians, wishing to take matters in their own hands, became more independent of foreign missionaries. In the towns of Java, they make up c20–30% of the Christians.

Unlike the Indian, Japanese, and Chinese Christian communities, Indonesia has not produced internationally known theologians. This may be the result of the Indonesians’ modest character. Similarly it has been said that Indonesian Muslims, whose numbers are larger than in any other country in the world, have never taken the lead. Nationally the best known Christian thinker was the gifted architect, novelist, political activist, and Catholic priest Yusuf Bil-yarta Mangunwijaya (1929–99).

Women have prominent positions in Indonesian churches. They were admitted as ordained ministers decades before the missionary churches of the Netherlands admitted female ministers (see Women’s Ordination Cluster). Nearly all Protestant churches have female ministers. Theologian Marianne Katoppo, who wrote the English-language Compassionate and Free (1979), is the best known internationally.

Until the 1950s, Protestant churches were mostly classical or mainstream: Lutheran in Batakland and Kalimantan (from German and Swiss missions), Reformed in the rest of the country (from Dutch missions). Since the 1960s, many new churches of the Evangelical* and Pentecostal*/Charismatic* traditions have been established with strong ties to US missionary societies. The Christian and Missionary Alliance started (1929) in Sulawesi and Kalimantan, but many other churches started missionary work in the 1960s, especially among the Chinese population. Although these new churches claim to address non-Christians, in fact they often attract members from established ethnic churches. Prayer meetings of Pentecostal/Charismatic groups or churches are often spirited, with modern music played on a guitar rather than an organ, held in convention halls or hotels rather than in traditional churches, and attended by well-to-do and urban people. Pentecostals/Charismatics are much more active on the island of Java than in the more rural areas of the outer islands. In the major towns of Java, this has resulted in the creation of many, sometimes hundreds of, scattered small Christian churches among a Muslim majority. All religions in Indonesia, but mostly Islam and Christianity, have shown an increasing vitality in the late 20th and early 21st. See also BATAK CHURCHES.

Indulgence, relaxation of the “temporal” penalties for sins* that have been confessed and forgiven. Indulgence began in the 3rd c. with the promise of martyrs* to intercede for sinners and the practice whereby confessors* (those who had been imprisoned but not martyred) readmitted the “lapsed*” (“sinners” who had denied the faith during persecution) to the church. With the growth of the juridical view of sin and atonement* (the necessity of satisfaction and/or punishment for atonement), purgatory* came to be seen as the place where, in the interim between an individual’s death* and the general resurrection*, the soul* of a person to be saved temporally expiates venial* sins* or mortal* sins* after contrition* and confession*. Penance* under the supervision of the church came to be understood as a substitute for “temporal” punishment in purgatory (in contrast to “eternal” punishment in hell*). With the presupposition that the Roman Catholic Church has the right to administer the “merits” of Christ and the saints (the “treasury of merits”) in order to alleviate temporal punishments, plenary indulgences for all temporal punishments were first issued by the popes for those participating in the Crusades*, then on Jubilee* years (e.g. the turn of a century) and on other special occasions.

Abuse of indulgences increased in the late Middle Ages, when mendicant* orders were often accused of the indiscriminate sale of indulgences. This was the occasion for Luther's* call for reform, which led to a number of reforms by the Catholic Church. After the sale of indulgences was prohibited (by Pope Pius V, 1567), plenary indulgences were still used to encourage piety and good works. After the Second Vatican* Council, Paul VI substantially restricted the use of indulgences (in Indulgentiarum Doctrina, 1967), while retaining the concept.

EUGENE TESELLE

Inerrant, incapable of or exempt from error, particularly as ascribed to Scripture. See also INFALLIBLE; SCRIPTURE.

Infallible, incapable of or exempt from failing or error (inerrant). Infallibility has been ascribed to Scripture*, the church and its councils, and the pope*.

Infallibility or Inerrancy of Scripture has been affirmed by most Christian groups, but the Protestant Reformation affirmed it to the exclusion of any infallibility on the part of the church or the papacy. This claim has been based on (1) God's calling of the prophets* and apostles* to proclaim God's Word to their contemporaries and (2) the inspiration* of the writings they later set down. There has been disagreement since the Reformation over several questions: whether the Bible is the Word* of God or contains it or conveys it; whether the Bible is infallible in all aspects (including scientific or historical statements) or only in matters affecting the human relationship with God. Usually it is said that the Word of God is heard and understood only under the guidance of the Holy* Spirit, and that certitude about the authority or infallibility of Scripture comes not from human reasoning or from the authority of the church, but from self-authentication by the Word of God (see Scripture).

Infallibility of the Church. Infallibility is also ascribed (on the basis of John 16:13 and Acts 15:28) to various aspects of the church: its unanimous tradition (see Tradition Cluster; Vincentian Canon), the sense of the faithful (which Pope Pius* IX sought before declaring the dogma of the Immaculate* Conception), councils of the church (see Conciliarism), and the pope.

Papal Infallibility may first have been suggested by Peter John Olivi*, a Franciscan* Spiritual, in order to guarantee the permanence of the bull of Pope Nicholas III (1279) that affirmed the Spirituals' practice of poverty*. Papal infallibility was championed by many in the Catholic Church. It was defined as a dogma by the First Vatican* Council (1869–70), which stated that the pope, when he speaks ex cathedra on issues of faith and morals, has "that infallibility which Christ willed his church to have." Thus it does not take away anything from the church but affirms that the church's infallibility may be concentrated in the one person of the pope.

In all these cases, infallibility is not considered an inherent quality of the human beings or documents involved, since it is a function of divine infallibility, to be received gratefully and humbly by human beings – and sometimes in opposition to what they regard as their best insights and inclinations.

Infant Baptism, while not practiced by "believers' churches" (Anabaptists*, Baptists*), is practiced by other churches with different ecclesologies and theologies. Among Roman Catholics, it was often associated with the "removal of original* sin," thereby affording the possibility of entry into heaven* rather than an eternity in the "limbo*" of unbaptized infants." There is evidence that, by 200, baptism was regarded as essential for salvation* when the infant was in danger of death (hence the permission for women to baptize infants in an emergency). Since Vatican* II, these associations have largely faded through a more comprehensive, biblically driven understanding of baptism as a sacrament of initiation into the Christian community wherein, through grace*, one "puts on Christ." This is close to the Lutheran view of baptism* as sacramental, and even of the quasi-sacramental Reformed* view of baptism (the covenant* applies to children of believers; cf. the "households" that were baptized, Acts 16:15, 33; 1 Cor 1:16). In the Orthodox* Church, through baptism, infants are incorporated into Christ and his church that they may share in his deified* humanity, being given the gifts of sanctification*, righteousness*, and filial adoption. See also BAPTISM CLUSTER; SACRAMENTS IN WESTERN CHURCHES.

Infralapsarianism, the view of predestination* according to which God's election* of some for redemption* is "subsequent" to God's foreknowledge of the Fall*. Most 17th- to 18th-c.

Reformed* theologians affirmed infralapsarianism, rather than supralapsarianism*, which placed God's election "prior" to foreknowledge of the Fall.

Inner Mission, a term coined by Wichern* for his work in Hamburg (from 1833); used after the first Kirchentag* (1848) to refer to all activities undertaken to reclaim, through preaching, tracts, and charitable works, persons who had fallen away from the faith in the midst of social upheaval related to industrialization. It became a vast network of social relief institutions all over Germany*.

Innocent III, Pope (c1161–1216), born Lotario di Segni. After being elected pope (1198), he sought to work with reform groups such as the Humiliati and the Trinitarians, and supported Francis* of Assisi. He strengthened papal rule of the Papal States and took a leading role in the disputed election of a successor to Emperor Henry VI and the election of an archbishop of Canterbury (1207). He was greatly conflicted when the Fourth Crusade* conquered Constantinople (1204), becoming a major obstacle to East–West relations, especially when he imposed the use of the Latin Rite. Against the Albigensians*, he initiated both the mission of Dominic* (1205) and the crusade (1208–29) that led to French domination of Languedoc; he also sponsored the Teutonic* Knights' conquest in the Baltic region. Later Innocent focused chiefly on the summons of the Fourth Lateran* Council (1215), the most important of the medieval reform councils that defined the doctrine of transubstantiation*, approved new procedures for confession and penance*, and prohibited the writing of new rules for religious* communities.

Inquisition (from Lat inquisitio, "inquiry"). Special tribunals to detect and eradicate heresy* developed in several stages:

1. Investigations of heresies predated the actual Inquisition. In 1184 Pope Lucius III directed bishops to investigate heresy in their dioceses and hand those who would not recant over to the secular authorities for punishment. Pope Innocent* III approved the mission of Dominic* (1205) in the hope that there would be conversions* among the Albigensian heretics (see Cathars, Catharism), but this by itself proved ineffective. Pope Gregory IX (c1233) commissioned certain members of the Dominicans and Franciscans, with direct responsibility to the pope, to investigate this and other heresies and take corrective measures.

2. An actual "inquisition" arose when these investigations were coordinated in the dioceses. When an inquisitor came into a district, people had one month to come forward to abjure* heresy and receive penance*; then information from other persons could be used to call them to a hearing. Inquisitors functioned as pastors or theologians, not as canon lawyers. Trial was voluntary, and the inquisitors sought repentance; if the accused recanted, the sentences were those of the sacrament of penance, accepted voluntarily (on the theory that satisfaction* means voluntary suffering). The bishop had to be involved in any sentencing. Despite many abuses and major flaws in the system, features of due process also existed.
3. Voluntary confinement gradually became a part of penitential procedures and required the construction of facilities. Refusal to appear or to be confined for purposes of inquiry and refusal to recant were taken as admissions of guilt. Torture was eventually permitted by the pope (1252) in the case of stubborn suspects, but it was not to cause mutilation, bleeding, or death.
To ensure that penances were carried out, the sentences were stated publicly; confinement (understood to be voluntary) might be included, but penances usually involved wearing a yellow cross and performing public acts of penance. The property of imprisoned penitents could be confiscated by temporal rulers to pay for the inquisitors, their staffs, and the prisons that had to be maintained. Unrepentant heretics were handed over to the "secular* arm," which usually burned them at the stake.
4. Inquisitors utilized the classic manuals about heresies; thus they often tried to fit the beliefs of the accused to the older heresies. The possibility of arbitrary judgment increased when translation between the vernacular and Latin was involved. Thus it has been suggested that the inquisitors imagined "phantom heresies" (e.g. the Free* Spirit) or helped to make real heresies more definite among their adherents. Witchcraft* was not originally within their scope, but on the theory that it involved a pact with the devil* it was eventually added (1398), and in Germany the Malleus Maleficarum (Hammer of heretics, 1487) was written by two inquisitors. Inquisitors played a minor role in the prosecution of the Templars*; they were more active against the Franciscan Spirituals* and Joan* of Arc. In the Papal States, they were involved in the burning of Giordano Bruno in 1600.

5. The Spanish Inquisition was a new institution, established by Ferdinand and Isabella* (1478) with the reluctant permission of the pope. It operated as an instrument of the rulers, and its autos de fe* were staged as public spectacles to intimidate the populace. Its first role was to examine converted Jews (*conversos) and Muslims (*moriscos), then the alumbrados (those perceived to be false mystics) and followers of Luther*, but it even investigated Ignatius* Loyola and Teresa* of Ávila.

Inquisition and “New Christians” in Brazil.

“New Christians” was a name given at first to Jews and Moors who were forced by law to convert to Catholicism as a result of the Inquisition*, a procedure supported by the state in Spain* (end of the 13th c.). The name “New Christians” segregated the newly converted Christians from the “old Christians,” in order to preserve the prerogatives of the latter. Consequently, new Christians were also called *conversos (converted) or marranos (a derogatory term, “pigs,” from the Arabic mahrān), used in a pejorative sense seemingly to designate those who did not eat pork, like the Moors and Jews. Such terms were used starting in the early 12th c., when the “recently reborn” (Lat nuper renati) started to be excluded from public offices and official dignities.

With the mass coercive conversions ordered after 1497 by the Inquisition on the Iberian Peninsula, most of the recently converted, mainly from Judaism, fled to the New World. Thus “New Christians” participated in the “discovery” of Brazil*, among them Gaspar da Gama and Fernando de Noronha. Different groups of New Christians spread across Brazil in the northeast (Maranhão, Pernambuco, Bahia) and southeast (Espírito Santo, Rio de Janeiro, São Paulo). The New Christians did not form a homogeneous group; they slowly became assimilated into the colonial society in Brazil without a particular ideology. Following the Iberian union (1580–1640), the Inquisition became active once again in the New World. Inquisitors frequently arrested some New Christian apostates and took them back to Portugal*, where they were judged and occasionally sentenced to death. During the Dutch invasion of Northeast Brazil (1624–54), some New Christian groups, actually crypto-Jews, reconverted to Judaism. When Brazilian explorers found gold in the Southeast (late 17th c.), an enormous number of people moved there, many of them New Christians who became rich, influential bourgeois. Inquisitional persecutions started again, showing that the Inquisition had economic as well as religious motivations. Finally, the laws that distinguished old Christians from new were gradually phased out after the 1750s and abolished by the Act of 1773. MARCOS CALDAS Inspiration (Lat inspiratio, “in-breathing”; Gk theopneustos, “God-breathed,” 2 Tim. 3:16). Common to all Christian notions of the inspiration of Scripture* is the idea that the Holy* Spirit influenced the coming into existence of the Christian canon as authoritative Scripture* (see Bible, Canon of). The basis of this doctrine is the self-witness of Scripture to its divine origin and inspiration. The nature and extent of inspiration can be determined by focusing on the biblical writers’ own statements (found throughout the canon) as well as by considering the phenomenon of Scripture; the latter approach, however, raises all sorts of issues, especially when it is held that inspiration also means infallibility* or inerrancy*.

Similarly, the locus of the Holy Spirit’s action in inspiration is commonly held to be either the authors (as in 2 Pet 1:21) or the writings themselves (as in 2 Tim 3:16). These two notions are not necessarily opposed.

The view of the intensity and power of inspiration varies in different theological schools. A classical, traditionalist view makes inspiration almost an act of “dictation,” as found in many historical statements, both Protestant and Catholic. The contemporary Fundamentalist* Movement emphasizes a somewhat similar idea of inspiration as verbal or plenary inspiration, thus making every word authoritative. At the other extreme, for 19th-c. liberalism and later liberal movements that arose as a result of the Enlightenment (see Liberalism in Christian Theology and Ethics), inspiration is an enhancement of the human capacity to grasp essential insight into divinity, as in an artistic act of inspiration; in that case, inspiration is mostly a function of the human spirit, and its “authority” is the authority of an authentic experience of the divine. The neo-orthodox school (e.g. Karl Barth*), while holding to the divine source of inspiration (as the traditionalists do), made inspiration a matter of an authentic, though not necessarily infallible testimony (as the liberals do). Most theologies locate themselves between the traditionalist and liberal extremes, trying to negotiate the complex relationship between the divine and human agency in inspiration, as illustrated in Dei Verbum (No. 11) of Vatican* II, which states, “God chose men and while employed by Him they made use of their powers and abilities.” The Protestant Reformation*, while insisting on divine inspiration and authority, also spoke strongly for the human element in the process, thus opening the way to a critical study of Scripture.

VELI-MATTI KÄRKKÄINEN

Institution, Words of, words of Christ during the Last Supper (1 Cor 11:23–24; Mark 13:22–24, par.), used in the central prayer of the Eucharist*. See also ANAPHORA; EPICLESIS.

Institutional Church. (1) Since the late 19th c., an urban church providing specialized ministries and social services to a vulnerable population, e.g. women, children and youth, laborers, and ethnic groups. (2) In contemporary parlance, an often derogatory characterization of the church* as a human “institution” rather than as a “faith community,” “mission,” or “true church.”

Insufflation, breathing or blowing on a person or thing to symbolize the influence of the Holy* Spirit (cf. John 20:22).

Integrism, Integralism, Integrist Movement, in the Roman Catholic Church, a trend opposing liberalism* (specifically, ecumenism and modern Bible studies) and Modernism*. It is associated especially with Pope Pius* X’s “Oath against Modernism” (1910). It is often linked with socially and politically conservative movements in Roman Catholicism, which supported dictatorships in Spain*, Italy*, and Latin America (including Argentina*).

Intercession (Lat “a coming between”), prayer* on behalf of others, usually for very specific issues or events in their lives.

Intercommunion, sharing of the Eucharist* by two churches or denominations, usually considered a key manifestation of agreement on matters of both faith (doctrine) and order (system of government).

Interdict, exclusion of persons or regions from participation in the rituals of the church, especially the sacraments*.

Interfaith Dialogue. See DIALOGUE, INTERFAITH.

Interims, decrees attempting to secure temporary religious unity between Catholics and Protestants after the defeat of the Protestant princes in the Schmalkaldic War (1546–47). The Augsburg Interim decreed by Charles* V (1548) made concessions to the Protestant doctrine of justification*, but imposed outward conformity with bishops and the Mass. The milder Leipzig Interim (1548) gained the assent of some Lutheran leaders. Others (in Magdeburg) objected that the doctrine of justification was contradicted by the emphasis on works, decreed by rulers rather than the church. This led to Flacius’s* doctrine of status confessionis*, according to which there is a need for “confession” when a given situation sends a wrong message about the gospel; when indifferent matters are made essential, they are no longer indifferent and must be opposed.

Internet Technology has changed society and dramatically altered congregational life and the practice of communal religion. As members of congregations increasingly adopted e-mail, the Web, and other Internet technologies, so too did churches, mosques, and synagogues and their leaders. In North America from 1997 to 2007, the percentage of congregations with Web sites increased from 11 to more than 50%. Those using electronic newsletters, digital projection equipment, blogs, text messaging, and member databases increased almost as dramatically. In 2005 nearly 90% of US clergy reported having Internet access and using e-mail. National surveys in the USA have found a strong correlation between the adoption of these technologies and membership growth. This trend will increase as Internet technologies continue to facilitate the work of congregations by enhancing communication among members and clergy, improving the delivery of goods and services, revolutionizing the worship experience, and developing new congregational configurations, including cyber-linked church sites and online campuses. See also TECHNOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY.

Intinction, practice of dipping the bread into the cup during Communion. It is often recommended for hygienic purposes.

Introit, a psalm or hymn sung when the celebrant enters the church or approaches the sanctuary.

Investiture Controversy, the dispute between popes* and emperors (of the Holy* Roman Empire) over the right of secular rulers to confer the symbols of spiritual office (crozier* and ring*) on bishops and abbots. “Lay investiture” was prohibited by the Easter Synod in Rome (1059), the decrees of Gregory* VII (1074), and another Roman synod (1075). Henry* IV in Germany denounced Gregory’s position (1076), and the controversy continued (involving Anselm* of Canterbury, among others). Under the Concordat of Worms* (1122), it was agreed that bishops would be canonically elected, but rulers could be present at the election, confer “temporalities” (temporal powers), and receive feudal* homage.

Investment Funds are funds that seek investments from religious congregations or individuals at a lower interest rate than the market rate. For example, the Grameen Bank in Bangladesh* was a pioneer in making small loans (enough to plant a crop or buy basic tools) at a low rate of interest through peer lending groups whose members continue to offer support and advice. The Ecumenical Development Cooperation Society, nicknamed Oikocredit, is related to the World* Council of Churches and is based in Holland. Loans are offered to church-related cooperatives or other grassroots organizations, which lend money for sustainable, income-generating projects. The Nicaraguan Community Development Loan Fund was started in 1991 in cooperation with CEPAD, the Nicaraguan Council of Protestant Churches; loans are made to cooperatives, home-based businesses, and women’s organizations.

Invisible and Visible Church, a differentiation made by Augustine* and revived by the Protestant Reformation*, according to which, since its inception, the true but invisible church consists of the elect*, all those who will believe* in the grace* of God, will be justified*, and will receive salvation*, whereas the visible church also includes those who remain captives of sin* (cf. the parable of the wheat and the weeds, Matt 13:24–30).

Iona, a small island off the west coast of Scotland, where Columba* founded (563) a monastery. From there, Columba set out to preach and evangelize in Scotland. (The surviving medieval buildings and crosses all date from after his time.) The influence of Iona as a center of learning and monasticism* continued after Columba’s death, and monasteries founded by monks from Iona, such as Melrose and Lindisfarne, continued its Irish monastic and artistic traditions into the 7th c. The Book of Kells (an illuminated manuscript of the Gospels) may have been begun in Iona. Although sacked by Vikings (806), Iona became a place of pilgrimage; it was the burial place of a number of medieval Scottish, Irish, and Norwegian kings and, in 1994, of the British political leader John Smith. In the Middle Ages, it was home to a Benedictine* nunnery and monastery. In 1938 Iona Abbey became home to the Iona Community, a dispersed Christian ecumenical community working for peace and social justice, the rebuilding of community, and the renewal of worship.

Iran. Non-Persian minorities – Assyrians*, Chaldeans* (both descendants of Syriac-speaking Christians from Mesopotamia), and Armenians* (brought to Persia as deportees, 604) – constitute 97% of Christians.

In the early 2nd c., Syriac* Christianity entered ancient Persia, first among Jewish-Christian communities of Parthia, via Edessa* and Adiabene. There were Christian communities in Parthia and Media c200–230. Shapur II (309–79) severely persecuted the church, which was distinguished by the contribution of Aphrahat* (d339) to Syriac spirituality. After the Council of Chalcedon* (451), Dyophysite (“two natures”) Christology became church doctrine. With the expansion of Islam* (7th c.), the church faced persecutions but remained true to its faith and vigorous in evangelization.

Western missionary activities (gaining converts primarily from Oriental Orthodox* churches rather than the Muslim community) began with the Roman Catholics (15th c.); Protestants arrived much later (18th c.).

Since the implementation of the Islamic shari’a (law) (1979), Christians have experienced new restrictions. Many churches and affiliated institutions have been closed. Protestant missionaries were forced to leave.

The church “families” in Iran include the Catholic (including Chaldean*, Armenian*, and Latin), the Eastern and Oriental Orthodox* (Assyrian* Church of the East, Armenian* Apostolic, and Russian Orthodox*), and small Protestant churches.

The Oriental Orthodox churches are sustained by ancient liturgy and rituals, with high attendance and participation. Despite their variety, two factors have united Iranian Christians: a common faith and a shared experience as ethnic minorities. Since apostasy is proscribed in Islam, evangelization has produced few converts, who remain, by necessity, crypto-Christians. Because of the rise of Islamic fundamentalism and political instability in the region, many Christians are emigrating to the West. The prospects for the survival of Christianity in Iran are dim. See also IRAQ.

Iraq, a new nation whose multiethnic and multi-religious population is proud to lay claim to its ancient roots in the Mesopotamian “cradle of civilization.” Iraqi Christians (especially Assyrians* and Chaldeans*) have ancient ethnic and religious roots. Those Christians of the Syriac* (East Aramaic) tradition can trace their roots with certainty to the 2nd c., although some claim the 1st c. (see Abgar; Addai and Mari). Despite their long history as a minority that is usually tolerated and respected, they have sometimes suffered persecution (see History of Christianity Cluster: In the Middle East: Syriac Christianity).

Though subject to the ecclesiastical See of Antioch*, the Church* of the East declared its autonomy at the Synod of Markabta (424); the final schism took place after the Council of Chalcedon* (451). At the Synod of Seleucia (486), the Syrian Church of the East affirmed a Dyophysite (“two natures”) Christology* and adopted the appellation “the Assyrian* Church of the East.” In 1553 the Chaldean* Church was established as a uniate* church; today it is the largest church in Iraq.

The East Syrian Church had illustrious scholars, including Tatian* (2nd c.; author of the Diatessaron*); Rabbula*, bishop of Edessa (c350–c435 who revised the Peshitta*; and Ephrem* (c306–373), the great Bible exegete and a doctor of the church. From 400 to 1100, the Assyrian Church was engaged in vigorous evangelization in India*, China*, and Central Asia.

During the Abbasid caliphate (750–1258 CE), many Christians reached high positions in the state Muslim administration and, as scholars, translated Greek philosophical and medical texts (see Islam and Christianity Cluster: In the Middle East). Since the invasion of Baghdad by Tamerlane (1373 CE), the church has faced many persecutions, the last one during World War I.

Established under British mandate with arbitrarily drawn boundaries after World War I, Iraq achieved independence in 1932, first under a king, then as a republic (1958), which initially came under Ba’ath Party control (1961–2003), then under US occupation, and eventually under the government elected during the US occupation.

The Christian community is divided into Catholics (including Chaldean* and Syriac* Catholics), Orthodox (Assyrian*, Syrian* Orthodox, and Armenian* Apostolics), and Protestants (converts from the various communities through evangelization by Western missionaries since the 19th c.).

Despite the current violence, Iraqi Christians are determined to maintain their presence in the place they feel is their homeland, just as it is for the larger populations of Sunni and Shi’ite Muslim Arabs and Kurds. Yet the number of Christians is dwindling.

Statistics: Population (2000): 23.1 million (M). Christians, 740,000, 3.2% (Roman Catholics, 268,000; Orthodox, 139,000; Protestants and independents, 315,000); Muslims, 22.2 M, 96%; nonreligious, 157,000, 1%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.) 2009 (after massive emigration): fewer than 400,000 Christians.

Ireland. Christianity in Ireland has been marked by a close association of religious and political allegiances, giving organized religion an unusual resilience, but also making it a source of deep and sometimes violent divisions.

Ireland was Christianized (5th–6th c.) by missionaries, including Palladius* and especially Patrick*, who became the island’s patron saint. English monarchs established control over part of the island from 1169, but their grip in the early 16th c. remained too weak to extend the Protestant Reformation to a peripheral and religiously conservative population. The Church of Ireland (episcopal in governance and Protestant in doctrine) found its adherents almost exclusively among English immigrants drawn to Ireland by the opportunities created as the Tudor state extended its political and military control. An influx of Scots (17th c.) created the basis for a substantial Presbyterian presence in the northern province of Ulster.

This identification of Protestantism with a process of conquest and expropriation ensured that religious and political allegiances became closely linked. Civil wars (1642–53, 1689–91), both resulting from crises in England (see United Kingdom), gave the victorious Protestant minority a monopoly of political power and a near monopoly of landed property, while Roman Catholics were subjected to strict penal laws. Even after the last of these had been repealed (1829), resentment of continuing social and economic inequalities contributed significantly to the rise of Irish nationalism among Catholics. Yet Protestants saw a continued political union with Great Britain as essential to their survival as a threatened minority.

The 19th c. was a period of religious revival. Historians of Catholicism speak of a midcentury “devotional revolution,” characterized by a sharp rise in church attendance, the spread of lay pious associations (sodalities and confraternities), and the replacement of popular rituals, many of them linked to the rhythms of the agricultural year, by the orthodox devotions of Ultramontane* Catholicism. Meanwhile Protestants of all denominations were powerfully affected by Evangelicalism*, in particular by the great transatlantic revival* movement (1859).

During 1920–22, conflicting political aspirations were resolved by the creation of an independent Irish state in the predominantly Catholic south, while six counties of Ulster, where Protestants had a two-thirds majority, remained within the United* Kingdom as a self-governing region, Northern Ireland. Independent Ireland, though never formally adopting a state church, became a strongly Catholic society, in which the Roman Catholic Church controlled schools, hospitals, and other institutions, and exercised a strong if informal influence over legislation. In Northern Ireland, Catholics were subjected to widespread discrimination in employment and other areas, leading eventually to an outbreak of sustained political violence in 1969.

Religion in early-21st-c. Ireland is in a state of transition. In the Irish Republic, two decades of unprecedented prosperity have undermined both nationalism and Catholicism. The proportion of adults attending church at least weekly, which was as high as 90% in the 1970s, has fallen sharply, although whether this decline will continue or attendance will stabilize at its current level (about 50%) remains to be seen. In Northern Ireland, church attendance has also declined, but more slowly: the 14% decline in the number stating a religious affiliation is an index less of secularization* than of the pressures of a divided society. Survey evidence suggests that the proportion of genuinely nonreligious is around 5% and shows a strong correlation with disassociation from the dominant political ideologies of nationalism and unionism.

Statistics: Population (2002): 3.9 million (M). Christians, 3.7 M (Roman Catholics, 3.5 M; Anglicans, 0.1 M; Presbyterians, 0.02 M; Methodists, 10,000); nonreligious, 0.1 M.

Northern Ireland: Population (2001): 1.7 M. Christians, 1.6 M (Roman Catholics, 0.67 M; Presbyterians, 0.35 M; Anglicans, 0.26 M; Methodists, 0.06 M); no religion/not stated, 0.23 M. (Based on Louise Fuller, Irish Catholicism since 1950, 2002.)

SEAN CONNOLLY

Irenaeus (c125–c200), bishop of Lyon. Born in Asia Minor, he heard Polycarp* in his youth. He became a presbyter in the Greek-speaking church in Lyon, which commissioned him to go to Rome to request toleration for the Montanists*. While he was absent, persecutions broke out in Lyon (c177), and when the bishop Pothinus was martyred, Irenaeus was chosen as his successor. He also sought toleration for the Quartodecimans* during their controversy with Rome (c190).

Two works by Irenaeus survive, largely in Latin, Syriac, and Armenian translations: Against Heresies (or Exposure and Overturning of the Falsely Called Knowledge) and Exposition of the Apostolic Proclamation. For him the “apostolic proclamation” is the teaching handed on publicly (not in secret traditions) in the apostolic churches, orally but chiefly in writing, i.e. the books of the NT; he thinks of the Apostles’* Creed as a summary of this teaching.

Confident about this common heritage, he offers a comprehensive synthesis of Christian doctrine, attacking Gnosticism* in detail, then presenting his own position, a developmental view of human history that has been attractive to modern thinkers: Adam and Eve were to be educated gradually in God's ways, but their sin* brought serious malfunctioning into human life; Christ has "recapitulated" human life, correcting what Adam and Eve did and leading it back to God.

EUGENE TESELLE

Irene (750/55–803), Byzantine regent (780–90) and emperor (797–802). Upon the death of her husband, Leo IV (780), she became regent for her son, Constantine VI, and devoted her efforts to overthrowing Iconoclasm*.

She carefully prepared the way for an ecumenical council; after the army broke up the first session in Constantinople (786), it was reconvened in Nicaea (787). This Second Council of Nicaea* approved the making and veneration of icons*. After Constantine asserted power as sole emperor (790), she engineered his removal (797), had him blinded in the purple chamber where he had been born, and assumed the title of "emperor" (basileus in official documents, basilissa on coins). The fact that a woman sat on the throne in Byzantium was one of the reasons offered by Charlemagne* for assuming the title of emperor of the Holy* Roman Empire in 800 (the Caroline Books* had been written a few years earlier, likewise to discredit the Eastern Empire, saying that the West neither worshiped icons nor venerated them). After Charlemagne became emperor, he and Irene entered into friendly negotiations so that the Empire could once again be united, and marriage may have been contemplated. Instead, she was removed from power and exiled (802).

Irish Articles, the 104 articles of faith adopted by the Irish Episcopal Church (1615), probably compiled by James Ussher*, a Calvinist* in doctrine, like a majority of bishops in the Church of England at the time. They affirm predestination* and perseverance*, call the pope Antichrist*, teach Sabbatarianism*, and make no mention of the threefold* ministry or the need for episcopal ordination. These articles were the chief model for the drafting of the Westminster* Confession (similar order and headings of chapters, and even similar language).

Isaac. The Bible presents Isaac as the long-awaited son of the covenant* whom God promised to Abraham* and Sarah* (Gen 21:1–3). Yet by God's command and Abraham's obedience, Isaac nearly became the victim of child sacrifice (Gen 22). Shortly thereafter, his mother died. Through a servant, his father arranged for him to marry the formidable and attractive Rebekah*. Upon Abraham's death, Isaac received his inheritance. Soon he and Rebekah had twins, Esau* and Jacob*. But in an encounter with the Philistine king Abimelech, Isaac protected himself from potential death by lying about Rebekah, calling her his sister. In his old age, Rebekah and Jacob deceived the blind Isaac so that he mistakenly blessed Jacob rather than Esau (Gen 25:19–28:5).

Judaism* praises the young Isaac as a willing victim of sacrifice*. Although spared death, Isaac becomes a paradigm for martyrs (4 Macc 13:12). Christianity sees his story as foreshadowing Jesus' crucifixion (Rom 8:31–32). Isaac also foreshadows the church, the heir of God's promise (Gal 4:21–28). In Islam* the Qur'an* reports the near sacrifice of Abraham's son without naming the son. The subsequent section, however, announces "the good news of Isaac as a Prophet, one of the righteous" (Surah 37:100–112). See also SACRIFICE OF ISAAC: THE AQEDAH.

Isabella I of Castile (1451–1504), born to John II of Castile and Isabella of Portugal; married Ferdinand of Aragon (1469), uniting two powerful kingdoms over which they held equal authority. She was given the title "Catholic" by Pope Alexander VI, signaling both her devotion to the Catholic faith and her determination to promote cultural hegemony through religious practice. She used the Spanish Inquisition* (established 1478) to guarantee Catholic orthodoxy, with its forced conversion and expulsion of Jews and Muslims. She sponsored Christopher Columbus (1492) and articulated the first Spanish responses to the "Indies," and achieved the "reconquest" (of the Iberian Peninsula from Muslims; 1492) by retaking Granada. She was the patron of a significant spiritual reform led by her confessor, Cardinal Francisco Ximénez* de Cisneros, including the foundation of the University of Alcalá, the production of the Complutensian* Polyglot Bible, and Castilian translations of important medieval mystical* treatises. See also SPAIN; SPANISH EXPLO-RATIONS, CONQUESTS, AND MISSIONS.

Isaiah, Ascension of, a Christian document, possibly incorporating some earlier Jewish traditions, that tells how, because of unfavorable predictions, the prophet Isaiah is sawed in half by Manasseh at the behest of the devil*. The main emphasis is on the prophet's visions concerning Christ and Antichrist*, the church, and the end of time. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA.

JOHANNES TROMP

Isaiah, Book of. Modern translations of the Bible locate Isaiah first among the Latter Prophets followed by Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Book of the Twelve, but the Babylonian Talmud (14b–15a) locates it immediately before, and the Septuagint immediately after, the Twelve, with which it has much in common. The standard division of the book into First Isaiah (1–39), Second or Deutero-Isaiah (40–55), and Third or Trito-Isaiah (56–66), widely accepted in critical scholarship, represents no more than a very rough chronological sequence; First Isaiah is itself a compilation that includes very late material. The book attained its final form not haphazardly but as the end product of an incremental process of rereading, reinterpreting, and reapplying earlier prophecies – a process that was complete before the publication of the Septuagint version and the Isaiah Scroll from Qumran* (1QIsa^a), by which time interpretations could not be incorporated into the book itself as they had been, but took the form of a commentary apart from the book.

The earliest of these commentaries are the six fragmentary Qumran Pesharim* (4QpIsa^{a-c} and 3QpIsa), comparable in some respects to the fulfillment sayings in the Gospel of Matthew*, most of which cite Isaiah. Together with Deuteronomy and Psalms, Isaiah was the most cited book at Qumran, and its interpretation was, in general, of major significance for the Jewish sects of the late Second Temple period (see Dead Sea Scrolls). It was no less important for early Christians in their attempt to grasp and articulate the meaning of the identity and mission of Jesus – especially as the Servant* of the Lord – together with their own identity. However, there are no Christian commentaries before Origen's (early 3rd c.), which is now lost but mentioned by Jerome.

The title (added later) attributes the book to Isaiah ben Amoz, who was active under successive Judean rulers from c742 to c701 BCE. There is no reason to doubt Isaian authorship of a nucleus of sayings found in Chaps. 1–12 and 28–32, which expand on Amos's powerful critique of his Israelite contemporaries, especially the political and religious leadership. In addition to numerous (mostly prose) expansions of oracular sayings, First Isaiah contains a compilation of poems directed against foreign nations, principally Babylon (13–23), as well as a section somewhat misleadingly known as "the Isaian Apocalypse" (24–27). The long narrative in 36–39 about Hezekiah's revolt against Assyria followed by the Assyrian punitive campaign of 701 was taken, with slight modification, from 2 Kgs 18–20. It features a prophet who plays a supportive role, heals, and works miracles, in contrast to the Isaiah who elsewhere in the book fearlessly condemns corruption in high places.

The Deutero-Isaiah (40–55) focuses on the expectation of a new beginning aroused by Cyrus's victories and the anticipated fall of Babylon, the return from exile*, Jerusalem's restoration, and the servant mission of Israel to the world, which, by default, will pass to an unnamed prophet, the Suffering Servant (53). In Trito-Isaiah (56–66), from the late Persian and early Hellenistic period, the disappointment of these high expectations led to conflict and schism within the Judean community and the emergence of an apocalyptic* worldview, fully developed in the Book of Daniel*.

We therefore find represented in the book three distinct profiles of its putative author: the prophet as man of God, a kinder and gentler version of Elijah or Elisha; as apocalyptic seer; and as social critic. The first is dominant in the early history of interpretation (Chronicles, Sirach, The Lives of the Prophets, The Martyrdom of Isaiah*); the second carries over into Daniel, Qumran, and early Christianity; and the third reemerged only in the early modern period with the beginnings of critical study of the prophetic literature.

Ishmael was the firstborn son of Abraham and his second wife, Hagar*. After the birth of Ishmael's half-brother, Isaac, Abraham expelled him and his mother to the wilderness. In time, Ishmael fathered 12 tribes (Gen 16, 21, 25:12–17). Judaism* deems him the rejected son of the covenant* who became the ancestor of the Arabs. Christianity makes him a symbol of the Jews, born "according to the flesh" (Gal 4:21–31). The Qur'an describes him as a messenger and a prophet, faithful to his promises (Surah 19:54). Islamic* tradition holds that Ishmael assisted Abraham in building the Kaaba (the "House of God" at Makkah [Mecca]).

Isidore of Kiev (c1385–1464), scholar and monk, delegate from the Greek Orthodox* Church to the Council of Basel* (1434), appointed metropolitan* of Kiev and all Russia (1436). He attended the Council of Florence* to negotiate reunion between the Eastern and Western churches (1438–39). As the papal legate for all of Eastern Europe, he tried to persuade Poland* and Lithuania*, which favored the Council of Basel*, to accept a council called by the pope. He entered Moscow, went to the Church of the Ascension (with a Latin cross, it was said), and had the decree of union read out. Four days later, Vasili, grand prince of Moscow, confined him to a monastery on charges of heresy*. He escaped and had a long career in Rome as a cardinal, archbishop for Russia, and legate to the East, with jurisdiction over the Venetian Empire. As the Turkish siege of Constantinople tightened, Isidore went to the city with 200 archers (1452). He persuaded the people to accept union, and a synod of the clergy proclaimed the union in Hagia Sophia. When the city fell in May 1453, Isidore was captured, although he escaped to Cyprus and Rome, where he raised money to ransom those captured in the city and promoted a crusade to retake Greece* from the Turks.

Isidore of Seville (c560–636), born to a noble family in Cartagena, educated in Seville, probably under his brother Leander, who was a monk before he became bishop of Seville (c580). Leander was vigorous in the conversion to Roman Catholicism of the Arian* Christian Visigothic rulers (see Goths*), and Isidore, who succeeded him (c600), built even closer relations with the royal house. His History of the Goths, Vandals, and Suevi is a useful source for the history of his times. Presiding over several councils and associated with a major collection of canons, he defended the *Filioque against criticism from Rome and Constantinople. His Etymologies, a classification of all learning in 20 books, was based on his own fragmentary knowledge and mistranslations from the Greek; but it was much cited throughout the Middle Ages.

Islam and Christianity: Christian Views of Islam. Islam arose in the 7th c. amid Christianity, Judaism, and Zoroastrianism (the main religion of Persia). From the beginning, it was ambiguously formulated both as a continuation of these religious traditions and as a pure and Arab revelation, correcting the deviations of its predecessors. This ambiguity marked the Christian perception of Muslims throughout history. Christians either perceived a deep connection with the basic doctrines and practices of Islam or exaggerated the differences by characterizing Islam as a negation of Christianity because it rejects the divinity of Jesus and his death on the cross*. Like Manichaeans* and some Christian sects (see Docetism), Muslims believe that someone else was placed on the cross to die, while Jesus was rescued by God.

Assyrian* Christians (also called Persian Nestorians*), Syriac*, Egyptian* and Ethiopian* Miaphysites*, and Chalcedonian* Greeks were the Christian neighbors of Islam during its quick expansion after Muhammad's death (632 CE). Some of the first reactions were apocalyptic* in style, like the vision ascribed to Shenute*: "After that shall arise the sons of Ishmael and the sons of Esau who hound the Christians and the rest of them will be concerned to prevail over and rule all the world and to rebuild the Temple that is in Jerusalem." John* of Damascus, son of the finance minister of a Muslim caliph, had a more theological and balanced view. Islam was included in his book about "Christian" heresies because Muslims recognize Christ as the Word of God and as God's Spirit, although they differ from Christian orthodoxy in many details. Themes central to both religious traditions were later debated by Eastern* Christians and Muslims, who were viewed as respected heretics. Yet in Western* Christianity, not much was said about Islam until the Crusades* (1096–1291).

During the European Middle Ages, Islam was the stronger party. In his theological writings, Thomas* Aquinas (d1274) paid great honor to Muslim thinkers, especially Averroes* (Ibn Rushd), for their efforts to bring Greek philosophy into harmony with monotheistic belief. At that time, Muslim civilization was economically and politically far superior to Christian societies. But Muslims turned from respected heretics into "members of a backward religion" when the power relation changed after the fall of the Caliphate of Baghdad (1258). European power expanded, starting with the Portuguese travels to India and the Far East from 1498 on. In the heyday of colonial* imperialism (1880–1940), most Muslim lands (except Turkey and Arabia) came under the rule of Christian countries, and Islam became a distinct "backward" religion.

Vatican* II (1962–65) reevaluated this conception of Islam, stating in its document Nostra Aetate, "The Muslims adore the one God, living and subsisting in Himself; merciful and all-powerful, the Creator of heaven and earth, who has spoken to men; they take pains to submit wholeheartedly to even His inscrutable decrees, just as Abraham, with whom the faith of Islam takes pleasure in linking itself, submitted to God. Though they do not acknowledge Jesus as God, they revere Him as a prophet." Other churches formulated similar statements. However, the religious and political uprising of Islam since the late 1970s, and numerous violent acts linked to Islamic doctrines, have caused much anxiety, fear, and animosity among Christians. The ambiguity remains.

Islam and Christianity: Muslim Views of Christianity.

From its inception, Islam was touched by the spirituality of desert monks (see Eremitic Monasticism; Monasticism Cluster: In the Syriac Tradition) and other Christians who lived in and around Makkah. The Qur'an* and the Prophetic tradition (Hadith) praise the piety of Christians, but decry their belief in the Trinity and the divinity of Jesus. Although the Qur'an and subsequent tradition assert that Christ is the Word of God and a "spirit from Him" (God), they nonetheless insist that he is a human creature of God and one of God's messengers. This mixed assessment of Christian faith and piety rendered Muslim views of Christianity at best ambivalent.

In spite of the rapid expansion of Muslim rule into both Latin and Byzantine areas of Christendom* from the 7th to the 16th c., Muslims treated Christians with deference. This attitude changed with the development of the legal and theological sciences under Abbasid rule [750–1258], which led many Muslim scholars to adopt a critical attitude toward Christianity.

Among the first to write about Christianity were early historians like 'Ali b. Rabbān al-Tabarī (d870) and al-Ya'qubī (d897) and heresiographers like Ibn Hazm (d1064) and Shahrastānī (d1153). Apart from Ibn Hazm, who lived in turbulent times in Islamic Spain and thus condemned Christianity as utter madness, the rest were generally sober historians.

With deepening Muslim-Christian political and economic conflicts starting at the end of the 11th c., Christian polemics against Islam, its Prophet, and its scripture increased. Muslims retaliated by attacking Christians and what they considered to be their creedal errors. Soon a literary genre known as "answering" or "refuting Christian errors" appeared. It has persisted in one form or another to the present. Muslims, however, have from the beginning been constrained by the Qur'an's veneration of Jesus and his mother and its repeated injunction to "debate with the people of the Book in the fairest manner."

Muslim attitudes toward Christians and Christianity were profoundly affected by the Crusades*. Modern Muslim thinkers coined the phrase “international crusadism,” which they connected with ideas of Western neocolonialism. Three additional elements contributed to the growth of this critical attitude: Christian missionary work in Muslim lands, Orientalism, and colonialism*.

Beginning in the second half of the 19th c., the Muslim world witnessed the rise of numerous intellectual and social reform movements. Increasingly, Christianity came to be regarded as a tool of Western colonialism*. Until World War II, many educated Muslims both hated and admired the West; they sought to emulate it in the fields of science and technology but rejected what they considered to be its corrupt morality and irrational religion. Post-colonial Muslim discourse has since tended to view Western civilization negatively and to see Islam as a self-sufficient faith and worldview, capable of restoring the Muslim Ummah to its rightful place on the stage of world history.

Muslim immigration to the West, and the good efforts of the World* Council of Churches and the Vatican (Vatican* II), have contributed to constructive Muslim-Christian dialogue. Such dialogue remains the only hope for international cooperation and world peace, particularly after the 9/11 tragedy.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Interactions

Islam and Christianity in Africa. Present-day Sudan*, Egypt*, and Ethiopia* were Christian strongholds by the early 7th c. During the colonial period (19th–20th c.), European missionaries penetrated the rest of the continent. Christian missionary efforts brought about the Christianization of the equatorial zone of West Africa, as well as Central, Southern, and Eastern Africa. The exponential growth of Christianity took place during the post-independent era (from the late 1950s), when church leadership was transferred to indigenous African hands. The ecclesiastical traditions now include the Coptic* Church in Egypt and North Africa and the Ethiopian* Orthodox* Church (the oldest Christian traditions in Africa), as well as the Roman Catholic, mainline Protestant, Pentecostal*, African* Instituted, and Charismatic* churches.

With the emergence of Islam (7th c.), Arab Muslim armies invaded Egypt (641), subduing the rest of North Africa in the subsequent centuries. The Islamic Conquest was followed by the dispersion of Muslim traders (of slaves, ivory, gold, and salt) and clerics into tropical Africa. Along the East Coast, Arab and Persian Muslims formed trading communities on the shores and the coastal islands (e.g. Zanzibar, Pemba, the Comoros). In West Africa, itinerant Muslim traders and clerics settled among indigenous communities. Although they were not formally “missionaries,” their presence and activities became the main means of converting indigenous Africans into Islam. As Islam passed to indigenous African leadership, it was blended with African* Religion practices and customs. Sufism (mystical Islam) offered to African Muslims what the African* Instituted Churches have more recently offered to African Christians, namely the opportunity to take responsibility for the faith and give it a specific African imprint. The legal and political tenets of Islam were deliberately ignored in most places, haphazardly appropriated in some, and fiercely resisted in others. By the 18th c., Islam was firmly established in North Africa and along the East Coast of Africa, but it remained a class religion of the mercantile bourgeois and an additional royal cult in most of Africa.

Some African Muslims viewed as a “corruption of Islam” its apparent “stagnation” in tropical Africa, the blending with African traditional elements, and the non-application of Islamic law (shari’a) in public life. Such Muslims launched a series of military campaigns (jihad), especially in the Western Sudan* (late 18th and early 19th c.), ostensibly to purge Islam of African traditional elements, to extend the influence of Islam territorially, and to enforce the legal and political content of Islam. The celebrated “jihad” of Uthman Dan Fodio (d1817) affected present-day Northern Nigeria*, Southern Niger, and parts of Cameroon*. The political and legal dictates of Islam have remained major sources of controversy and conflict in places like Nigeria* and the Sudan*. Yet Sufism in its varied orders (or branches), with its capacity for incorporating African elements, remained the main attraction to Africans and the main vehicle for the propagation of Islam in Africa.

Just when Islam appeared to be on the ascendancy in Africa (early 19th c.), the modern European Christian missionary enterprise entered the continent with its three-pronged agenda: Christianity, commerce, and colonialism* (see Mission Cluster: In Africa; Mission Cluster: Introductory Entries). Despite suspicion, and occasional direct confrontation between the colonialists and Muslims, on the whole Islam enjoyed a favorable patronage under colonial rule and achieved more success in converting Africans during the century of colonization than during the previous 12 centuries.

Nevertheless, the 19th-c. European scramble for Africa and the Christian missionary attacks against the slave* trade caused tensions and open confrontation between Muslims and Christians. Western/Christian civilization was regarded by most Africans as more advanced than that of Arab/Islamic civilization. Those communities that regarded Islam as the religion of their oppressors (e.g. natives of Southern Sudan and middle Nigeria) regarded Christianity and Western civilization as attractive alternatives to Arab/Islamic domination. Conversely, Muslim rulers responded to Western/Christian civilization during the colonial period with self-protective withdrawal, especially from Western education. British colonial policies of indirect rule and the ban on missionary work in Muslim areas contributed significantly to keeping African Muslims and Christians asunder.

The African sense of community and extended family ties helped to overcome the theological and ideological divide between Islam and Christianity. There are numerous examples of "interfaith households" across the continent in which members of the same families are of different religious persuasions. Some ethnic communities, such as the Yoruba of Nigeria, are almost half Muslim and half Christian. Religious festivals like Christmas, Easter, and Ramadan are jointly celebrated by all. Muslim and Christian relatives and neighbors attend religious services during such occasions as marriage and funeral ceremonies. Occasionally Christian family members are called on to contribute to Muslim relatives' pilgrimage to Mecca (the Hajj), and Muslims to contribute to the theological training of their Christian relatives and friends. Senegal, a majority-Muslim country, had a democratically elected Christian president, Leopold Senghor, while a Muslim, Bakili Muluzi, was elected president of Malawi*, a predominantly Christian country. In Tanzania* the elected presidency rotates between Christian and Muslim leaders through the ballot.

Both Islam and Christianity remain missionary in Africa. Several Islamic missionary groups have sprung up, drawing their funding and training from North Africa and the Middle East. Similarly, Christian missionary groups, funded mainly from Europe and North America, have also stepped up their activities in evangelizing Muslims. The theological and ideological postures of these groups have been a source of tension and occasional open conflicts in various parts of Africa. However, the nondogmatic, nonideological, and therefore less confrontational African ethos neutralizes the competitive sting of Islam and Christianity. See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN AFRICA.

Islam and Christianity in Asia: Indonesia. With 178 million Muslims (88% of the population) in 2000, the Indonesian Muslim community was by far the most numerous worldwide (with 8.9% of Christians in Indonesia). Since independence in 1945, the "five-pillar-ideology," or pancasila, the basis of the Indonesian Constitution, protects the great religions. The five pillars – belief in one supreme deity, humanism, democracy, social justice, and national unity – were chosen as a middle road between an Islamic and a secular state. The island of Java, the most populous, is almost exclusively Muslim (less than 2% Christian); Christians live in a number of ethnic and Christian pockets in the so-called outer islands. Thus the relations between Christians and Muslims are also interethnic. In 1945 Christians of the outer islands warned that they would leave the young nation if it became an Islamic state.

Observers have defined Muslim-Christian relations in Indonesia as those between two minorities. Muslims, by far the largest group, lack economic power (because ethnic Chinese dominate much of the economy); until the 1990s, they lagged behind in education and cultural manifestations (newspapers, books, prestigious schools) and in participation in the army (because the Dutch rulers preferred Christians to be members of the colonial army) and could not gain political power (because moderate Indonesian Muslims were opposed to Arab-style fundamentalism). Religious harmony has been a great concern for all governments since 1945. Sukarno (1945–65) promoted unifying secular and nationalist ideas. Muhammad Suharto (1965–1998) initially sought the support of all religions against Communism, yet he soon excluded all religions from politics and ordered the acceptance of pancasila as the “foundation of all social organizations.” Some fundamentalist Muslims and committed Christians rejected this creation of a “civil religion” as a catalyst for interreligious harmony. In the 1990s, Suharto and other politicians increasingly played the “Islam card,” creating unrest that was fueled by economic problems (after 1997) and growing ethnic tensions. Radical Muslims expressed fear of aggressive Christian missionaries, while Christians blamed the political opportunism that introduced Islamic elements into the national laws (a ban on mixed marriages; the establishment of shari’a in the rebellious province of Aceh; the prohibition of religious propaganda). Indonesia is the only country in the world where a large number of Muslims converted to Christianity (about 2% of the inhabitants of Java, or 2.4 million) without many problems until the 1970s. Since then, however, tensions have sharply increased.

Islam and Christianity in Asia: The Philippines.

Islam arrived in the Philippines c1380 (about 200 years before Christianity) through Arab traders and missionaries in the Sulu islands (south of the Philippine Archipelago). The first Muslim sultanate was established in Sulu (1450); subsequently other sultanates were established on the larger Mindanao island (c1475) with Islamic institutions (mosques; madrasas, or schools; and shari’a, or law). Local traditions (adat) were blended with orthodox Islamic practices and teachings; this local Islam, called Luwaran (especially among the Cotabato Muslims), governed Philippine Muslims until 1900, when the more orthodox Sunni Islamic shari’a gained ground.

Roman Catholic Christianity had been firmly established in the Philippines* by 1565. North American Protestantism was introduced by US missionaries after the defeat of the Spanish colonial forces (1898).

Spanish wars against the Moros (Philippine Muslims), from 1578, when Spanish forces invaded Sulu, until 1898, limited the spread of Islam in the Philippines. The succeeding US regime and the independent Philippine government (with Christian ties) tried to improve Christian-Muslim relations.

The progressive immigration (from the early 17th c.) of Christianized Filipinos from Luzon and the Visayas into the island of Mindanao, along with the evangelization of the indigenous Filipinos (most people practiced native religions in Northern and Eastern Mindanao), made the Moros a minority in Mindanao, even though they claimed Mindanao to be historically theirs. This minoritization of the Moros caused endless troubles and bloodshed – most recently the rebellion against the Philippine authorities, first (1971) by the Moro National Liberation Front (MNLF) and later the Moro Islamic Liberation Front (MILF). A peace agreement was reached with the MNLF (1996), but not with the MILF.

Both Islam and Christianity interacted with animistic Philippine religions, leading to the development of “folk Christianity” (with popular* Christian practices) and “folk Islam” alongside the more orthodox Christianity and Islam. Three forms of Christianity had a lasting impact on Philippine Islam, with differing modes of interaction: Spanish Roman Catholicism (through wars, now dialogue*); North American mainline Protestantism (through dialogue); and the triumphalist indigenous non-Catholic groups (Iglesia ni Kristo and Filipino Millennialist* sects, such as the Tadtad and Ilaga) along with the more recent Charismatic* and Pentecostal groups (through the total rejection of Islam).

With the end of the long period of Moro wars, which hardened negative attitudes and suspicions, Muslim–Christian encounters are now more peaceful. In Mindanao and large urban centers in Luzon (Manila, Baguio) and the Visayas (Cebu), dialogue in various forms makes this peaceful situation possible.

These encounters have produced a deepening of Islamic and Christian self-consciousness, along with some degree of acculturation*. Christians influenced by these encounters have considered more seriously their Christian faith: the biblical tradition of creation* (Gen 1, 2); Abraham’s* role in both Islam and Christianity; the role of the Virgin Mary* and Jesus Christ (as savior* and prophet); the biblical canon (e.g. the recognition that besides the four canonical Gospels there are other gospels, including the Gospel of Thomas*); Christian beliefs about “salvation* only in Jesus Christ”; the possibility of God’s manifestation in Islam and other religions; and challenges to the celebrations surrounding Christmas* and Holy* Week. A growing number of Filipino Christians have converted to Islam (the Balik–Islam Movement).

The impact of Christianity on Filipino Muslims includes a deepening respect for and veneration of the Qur’an* as the Word of God; following the shari’a in Mindanao (for the more orthodox); the importance of the madrasas (Islamic/Arabic schools), the ulama as interpreter of the shari’a, and of the dawah (call or mission); and the Balik–Islam (Return to Islam) Movement. Practices surrounding marriage (with a trend toward monogamy), the wearing of the veil among women and the growing of the beard among men (as markers of Islamic identity), and the improved status of Muslim women are visible signs of Christian influence on Filipino Muslims. See also PHILIPPINES.

Islam and Christianity in Europe: Southeast Europe.

While the Muslim presence in Southeast Europe dates to the 10th c., when members of various Asiatic tribes settled in different parts of the Balkan Peninsula, it was the Ottoman Conquest (14th–15th c.) that led to the massive expansion of Islam in Southeast Europe and added to the long-term coexistence and interplay of multiple religions and cultures in that part of the world, notably Eastern Orthodox Christianity, Roman Catholicism, Islam, and Judaism*. The Muslim expansion was achieved both by the influx of Turkic-speaking populations and by the gradual conversion of parts of the local Slavic population.

The coexistence of Islam and Christianity has created modes of living together with tolerance and respect for others in everyday life. Muslims and Christians sometimes share shrines and pilgrimage places, and a number of saints have both a Christian and a Muslim identity. Various forms of religious syncretism*, crypto-Christianity, and biconfessionalism were not uncommon (particularly between the 17th and 19th c.). Generally, however, established Muslim–Christian relations fit into the practice of komshiluk (from the Turkish word komshiya, “neighbor”), according to which people of different ethnic and religious groups live peacefully side by side and often interact positively, while preserving their structural and cultural differences and sustaining generally unbridgeable boundaries.

Theological interaction between Christianity and Islam in Southeast Europe went through various stages. Islam was initially seen as a variation of Arianism*. Among the major points of the Christian critique of Islam were Muhammad's status as Prophet, and the Muslim belief that the Qu'ran* is the uncreated Word of God. Muslims, in turn, criticized the doctrines of the divinity of Jesus Christ* and the Trinity*. Theologians on both sides interpreted the other religion as incoherent.

With the decline of the Byzantine Empire and the Ottoman conquest of Constantinople, and under the pressure of new historical developments, the initially derisive and hostile attitudes toward the spreading Ottoman Islam were replaced by attempts at better understanding, more objective interpretations, and greater interest in dialogue*. While this dialogue between Christianity and Islam in Southeast Europe subsided between the 16th and 19th c., it reappeared in the 20th c., specifically under the influence of the interreligious activities undertaken by the World* Council of Churches and the Second Vatican* Council. Interreligious dialogue was massively fostered by various international agencies as a means for peace building after the secessionist Yugoslav wars (1990s). See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN EUROPE: THE BALKANS. INA MERDJANOVA

Islam and Christianity in Europe: Western Europe. In the 1950s, many came from the rest of the world to find work when Europe faced the task of reconstruction after World War II. Colonial history often determined where people immigrated. For example, the UK received people from Pakistan and India, France received those from North Africa, and Germany those from Turkey. At first, the religious affiliation of these immigrants mattered little: they planned to leave after a few years and usually suspended their religious practice for the duration of their stay.

European Christians initially saw them as foreigners who needed help in settling down and feeling at home. As time went on, social problems came to the fore. Christian groups, e.g. in France the (Protestant) Cimade* and Catholic* Action groups, were accustomed to providing social assistance. In the 1970s, the economic crisis led these countries to curb their immigration policies drastically. Foreign workers realized that reentry to Europe would be impossible if they returned to their homelands. Hence they stayed in Europe for good, and their families joined them. Religious practices could no longer be set aside: new generations needed education in the faith of their ascendants.

Several facts have emerged: (1) Many of Muslim descent are no longer keen to be identified as "Muslim" (in France, this is the case of 40% of such Muslims). This is especially true of the younger generation born and educated in secular Europe. (2) Nevertheless religious practice, estimated to involve 5–10% of the community, requires buildings and religious personnel, which are still lacking in many places. (3) Muslims in Europe are as divided over religious issues as are those in the rest of the Islamic world, which is torn by warring factions. (4) Muslim communities organized themselves along widely different lines, e.g. ethnic groups in Britain and dispersion in France.

Christians face the Muslim presence in Europe with a whole range of attitudes. Many have an image of Muslims that is totally negative. Others have become friends with them, helping them as immigrants or refugees*. Some churches have set up structures of dialogue*: interfaith activities in the UK, a Service for Relations with Islam in France, and centers for documentation and dialogue in Germany (CIBEDO in Frankfurt) and Belgium (el-Kalima in Brussels).

Muslims and Christians are gradually discovering that their encounter is only a small part of the wider interreligious encounter in a very pluralistic world.

FR. JEAN-MARIE GAUDEUL

Islam and Christianity in the Middle East. Islam originated and developed in a world deeply influenced by Christianity.

By the time of the Prophet Muhammad (c570–632), Christianity was firmly established among the Arabs of Northern Arabia, and there were also strong communities in parts of the Arabian Peninsula. When Arab armies conquered parts of the former Byzantine Empire in the Middle East and North Africa (7th and 8th c.), they became rulers of substantial Christian populations, which maintained their own beliefs and practices. As Muslims reflected on the doctrinal and ethical implications of their own scripture, they did so in an interreligious context in which they both influenced their Christian subjects and were influenced by them (see History of Christianity Cluster: In Africa: North Africa).

The Qur'an* contains many references to Christianity. It portrays those in the Christian community as recipients of revelation (e.g. Q 3:3–4, 5:82), although it pointedly asserts that Christ was human and not divine (e.g. Q 3:51, 5:116–17), and it makes allusions that were later formulated into acerbic criticisms, primarily that Christians believed in three gods (Q 4:171, 5:73) and that their scriptures, originally revealed to Jesus (Q 5:110), had been corrupted over time (e.g. Q 3:78, 5:41; in the Qur'an, the criticism is usually leveled against Jews, but it was later generalized).

Such teachings decisively shaped Muslim attitudes toward Christians. These gradually developed into the view that, as recipients of a scripture from God, Christians were part of the line of faith that culminated in Islam and therefore merited respect as Ahl al-Kitab, “people of the Book,” but that they had divinized the messenger sent to them and distorted their scripture; they had strayed from monotheism into illogical beliefs in a triple Godhead and in a being both divine and human. The denial of the crucifixion in Q 4:147 ruled out any consideration of the atonement*.

For their part, Christians usually looked down on Muslims. At first they saw them as a manifestation of God's punishment for the christological* divisions that divided Christians or as heralds of the Apocalypse*; later, they simply found little time for their beliefs. The most charitable Christian assessment of Muhammad was that he had delivered to the “pagan” Arabs an elementary form of Abrahamic faith that prepared them for the fullness of Christianity. More frequently they dismissed him as a self-seeking fraud who had borrowed his teachings from Christian heretics (John* of Damascus's condemnation of him in these terms exerted a lasting influence) or, relatively rarely, as possessed by the devil* (see Demonization).

In the formative 8th and 9th c. of Islam, Muslims and Christians interacted closely in the burgeoning cities of the Islamic Empire, where Christians were often esteemed by their Muslim rulers for their learning and skills. The caliph's own doctor was usually a Christian, while Christian secretaries maintained the bureaucratic and fiscal structures of the Empire. Above all, Christian translators, the most important of whom were the group led by Hunayn ibn Ishaq, opened the doors to Greek learning that stimulated intellectual exploration in the late 8th and 9th c. by a monolingual Arabic-speaking Muslim readership and led to a surge in Muslim theological reflection about the being of God and God's involvement with the world. Whether Christian theology provided actual models for Muslim thinking is uncertain, but it is clear that at this time theologians from both faiths debated their respective doctrines according to the same logical methods and in Arabic, which by 800 CE had largely replaced Greek and Syriac. For a period at least, Arabic-speaking Christians, among them the Melkite* Theodore Abu Qurra, the Syriac* Orthodox (polemically nicknamed Jacobite*) Habib ibn Khidma Abu Ra'ita, and the Assyrian* Christian (commonly named Nestorian*) 'Ammar al-Basri, articulated their traditional doctrines in forms shared by Muslims. This helps explain why debates were focused on the common issue of the being of God: Muslims insisted that Christians violated reason* by portraying the Godhead as triple and confining God to a human form, while Christians contended that Muslims demeaned God by depicting him as a bare singularity.

Such theological exchanges led to significant points of cross-fertilization. But any respect that accrued was strictly limited by the uneven social relationships that prevailed. Christians, like other non-Muslims, were cast as dhimmi (more specifically Ahl al-dhimma, “people of protection,” based on a pact supposedly agreed on under the 7th-c. caliph ‘Umar), a status that theoretically accorded them legal redress against wrong but effectively divided them from Muslims by requiring them to dress distinctively, yield to Muslims in public, and pay a poll tax. These regulations accentuated the differences produced by religious disagreements; Christians increasingly felt reduced in social status, conversion to Islam gathered impetus, and communities dwindled in confidence and numbers.

Islam and Christianity in the Middle East: Lebanon.

Although interreligious relationships in Lebanon* have been strongly influenced by the politicization of the different religious communities, which tended to obscure common interests, recent developments have shown that many kinds of interreligious relationships can exist and, perhaps less visibly, have existed over the years. Not only do Christians, Muslims, and Druze share common political goals, such as the secularization* of politics and liberation from foreign political interference, in daily life the boundaries between Christians, Druze, and Muslims are far less rigid than the political structures suggest. Inter-marriage is not uncommon, and in public schools children of all communities are educated together. As in the past, class is often more important than religion, and Muslim-Christian relationships within a certain social layer are often more important than those across class boundaries within the same religious group. Over the years, many organizations for interreligious cooperation and study have been established and play a role in easing the tensions between Christians and Muslims not only in Lebanese society but also in the wider Middle East. Cooperation in relief activities (e.g. during and after the 2006 war between Israel and Lebanon) is coupled with dialogue on political, social, and religious issues, as well as religious experience shared by Christians and Muslims in prayer and pilgrimage, among which a renewed Marian devotion (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster) plays an important role. Among the active institutions are the Islamic-Christian National Dialogue Committee (initiated in 1993, working with the official leadership of the communities), the Lebanese Gathering for Dialogue (since 2002, focusing on political dialogue; one of the founders, Tareq Mitri, was active in religious dialogue and became a cabinet minister), the Arab Group for Christian-Muslim Dialogue (since 1995, with members in various Arabic countries; Riad Jarjour was one of its general secretaries), and the educational Institut d'études islamo-chrétiennes at the University of Saint Joseph.

Israel. While Christians disagree as to the place of Israel in Christian theology and feel particular concern for Arab Christians in Israel and Palestine, for Jews the centrality of the land of the Bible (see Promised Land), and the survival of a third of world Jewry, are at stake.

When dispossession arose following the destruction of the Temple (70 CE), Christians argued that the Exile* occurred as a result of divine punishment. Traditional Christian interpretation emphasized punishment for failing to believe in Christ, a supersessionist* view – the belief that Christians replaced Jews as the people* of God – that contributed greatly to anti-Semitism*. The possibility of a rebuilt Temple caused great concern in the 4th c. As long as Jerusalem and the Temple lay in ruins, and Jews remained in exile, Christians appeared to be correct in claiming that Judaism had lost its legitimacy.

These views have changed in more recent times, particularly since the creation of the state of Israel (1948). The Palestinian Church, whose members are a small minority in Israel, faces a major crisis, both practical and theological, partly as a result of the belief that the Bible has been used as a political Zionist text. For Palestinian* Liberation theologians, Arab Christians have paid the price of Western Christian anti-Semitism. Furthermore, churches are generally controlled by those who are foreigners to the indigenous Arab Christians, who trace their Christianity back to the 1st c.

Initially, there was a noticeable lack of Christian comment on the establishment of the state of Israel, possibly because of Israel's challenge to the traditional stereotype of Jews as a suffering and persecuted minority (according to Alice Eckardt). The first modern Christian document to discuss the place of Israel, by the Synod of the Reformed Church of Holland (1970), stressed that Christians must appreciate the significance of the land of Israel for Jews. The Synod of the Evangelical Church of the Rhineland (1980) stated that "the continuing existence of the Jewish people, its return to the Land of Promise, and also the creation of the State of Israel, are signs of the faithfulness of God towards His people" – a view endorsed by other Protestant denominations. Some Evangelical Christians – including US evangelists such as Jerry Falwell (1933–2007) and Pat Robertson (b1930) – view the Jewish return to Zion as a fulfillment of biblical prophecy and to some extent see Jews as pawns used to fulfill God's final predetermined game plan in history. Today many manifestations of this position, sometimes called Christian Zionism, disagree on many points, including the conversion of Jews.

Roman Catholics, before Vatican* II, traditionally saw Jews only as victims rather than as people capable of power and sovereignty. However, the 1965 document Nostra Aetate, while not explicitly mentioning Israel, began the process that eventually led to the Vatican's recognition of the state of Israel (1994) and the pope's pilgrimage to Israel (2000).

Only a very small proportion of Israelis are Christians. Of the 7 million inhabitants, about 20% are non-Jewish. Of this group, about 85% are Muslim and 15% Christian. Most Arab Christians date their origins to the time of the Crusades*, and even to the 1st c., and many of the holy places are in the possession of Greek Orthodox, Roman Catholics, and Armenians*. "Solidarity groups," another type of Christian presence, seek "solidarity with Israel" – e.g. the Christian village of Nes Ammim in Galilee – following their conviction that there is a special relationship between the Christian churches and the Jewish people and that Christians bear historical responsibility for centuries of anti-Judaism and anti-Semitism.

Israel, People of. Israel, the name given to Jacob during his struggle with the angel (Gen 32:29, 35:10), has an unknown etymology, deriving perhaps from the phrase "God [El] is fighting" (see Hos 12:4–5). The earliest attestation to an Israelite entity is the Egyptian "Merneptah stele" (13th c. BCE). Originally a league of 12 tribes – traditionally all founded by sons of Jacob – the people of Israel were united by their monotheistic faith in YHWH as creator of the universe and lord of history.

Moved by the conviction* of God's election* (Deut 4:37; Amos 3:2; Acts 13:17), Israel saw itself as a priestly nation (Exod 19:6; 1 Pet 2:9; Rev 1:6; 5:10). Its relations with other peoples knew heights and lows, owing mainly to the frequent hostility and incomprehension of neighboring powers. Israel's "otherness" and difference of values set it apart, reinforcing the conviction of a divinely appointed destiny (on the condition of heeding God's Word, Deut 6:4). Jesus is proclaimed "king of Israel" (John 12:13).

Israel's perennial character (Rom 11:28–29) is seen by some as proof of God's existence. Others insist on the supersession* of Israel by the church, veritable heir of the promises (according to certain readings of Rom 9:6; 1 Cor 10:18; Gal 5:16). The role of the OT in Christianity depends on the (anti)supersessionist stance one adopts.

ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Italian Literature and Christianity. Italian literature was from the beginning influenced by Christianity in spirit, form, genre, theme, and gender roles, owing to the predominance in Italy of the Roman Catholic Church in all its variety and complexity.

The Latin origins of Italian literature can be traced back to Jerome's* Vulgate* (385–404), which made the Scriptures* available in medieval Latin. All texts in the vernacular (Italian, volgare) reflect some contact with Latin texts. Francis* of Assisi wrote the first vernacular poetic text of value, the Canticle to Brother Sun (Il cantico di Frate Sole, c1225); Jacopone da Todi popularized the laudi (songs in praise of the Lord) and, through them, religious theater.

Dante's* Commedia universalizes Christianity. Unlike Dante's, Petrarch's* Christianity is influenced by Augustine's* philosophy. He expresses the (male) individual's anxieties before God's unknowable power. However, the work that best represents the profound 14th-c. Christian faith is Catherine* of Siena's Letters (Le lettere).

During the Renaissance, Pope Nicholas V created the Vatican Library, while Pope Pius II worked to unite humanism and Christian culture. Pietro Bembo, author of the seminal Prose in the Vernacular (Le prose della volgar lingua, 1525), was in charge of the official pontifical documents and later became a cardinal. In response to the Reformation and the challenges to the religious basis of the temporal power of the Roman Catholic Church, the Church created the (in)famous Index Librorum Prohibitum*, a brutal form of censorship. Nonetheless, the Church remained a powerful cultural center. Torquato Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered (Gerusalemme liberata, 1598) brought Italian literature outside its geographical borders.

After the Enlightenment, in Milan, Carlo Porta and Alessandro Manzoni (author of the novel The Betrothed (I promessi sposi, 1827) put Catholicism back at the center of Italian literature. Anti-Jansenism* flourished. Romanticism combined the Catholic attachment to Rome with the idea of an Italian nation.

During the Italian unification (risorgimento) and the modern era, Catholicism maintained a central place in Italian literature, especially in the many works of Vincenzo Gioberti, in Antonio Fogazzaro's The Patriot (Piccolo mondo antico, 1881), Giovanni Papini's Life of Christ (Storia di Cristo, 1921), Federico Tozzi's Three Crosses (Tre croci, 1920), philosopher Benedetto Croce's Why We Cannot Not Define Ourselves As Christians (Perche' non possiamo non dirci cristiani, 1942), political theorist and Communist leader Antonio Gramsci's "The Catholic Question" in his posthumous Prison Notebooks (Quaderni del carcere, 1948–51, 1975), Clemente Rebora's Curriculum vitae (1955) and Songs of Infirmary (Canti dell'infermità, 1955–56), and Mario Luzi's Complete Poems (L'opera poetica, 1988).

SAMUELE F. S. PARDINI

Italy. Although the political unity of Italy is relatively recent, the homogeneity of the area (the peninsula south of the Alps, and the islands of Sicily and Sardinia) was accentuated after the 14th c. by the shared use of the Italian language.

Evangelization and Birth of the Christian Community. The origins of the Christian communities in Italy are poorly documented. The marginal and often precarious condition of Christian groups in the Roman Empire explains the scarcity of historical documentation, yet archeological findings can complement it.

As the capital of the Empire, Rome attracted the apostles*, all the more so since a flourishing Jewish community was already there. Some NT writings testify to the spread of Christianity in Italy, centered on the two major apostles, Peter* and Paul*. Paul addressed a significant letter to the Romans* (c54–58). A few years later (c61), he arrived in Rome as a prisoner. The apostle Peter was martyred there (perhaps in 64, as his martyrdom is traditionally related to the burning of the city under Nero). Similarly Paul was thought to have been martyred (possibly c67) in Rome, where the Christian faith was already considered suspect for cultural and political reasons (see Persecutions). Regarding liturgy and church order in the Christian community in Rome at that time, much information is provided by the Apostolic* Tradition, an early church* order, probably written by Hippolytus* (c170–c236). The Christian faith was also preached in other cities – Naples, Ravenna, Milan, and Aquileia – and in Sicily and Puglia.

The Edict of Toleration (313) by the emperors Constantine* and Licinius opened a new period. Christian churches were erected in Rome, and pagan temples were transformed into churches. The custom of burying Christians in underground necropolises (catacombs*) ceased. Until the 3rd c., the liturgy in Italy was conducted in Greek; the transition to Latin* came during the 4th c.

Following Constantine's decision to transfer the capital of the Empire to Constantinople (324), Rome saw an increase in its ecclesiastical importance because of its association with the apostles Peter and Paul. In Northern Italy, the people's choice of the popular provincial governor Ambrose* (c338–97) as bishop of Milan (to replace an Arian* bishop) testifies to the integration of political life and Christianity, and the increased social prestige of ecclesiastical officials. Milan under Ambrose gained importance as an ecclesiastical center beside Rome. The Council of Aquileia (381), presided over by Ambrose, had a decisive role in this process.

By the end of the 4th c., the Christian communities were grouped in approximately 100 dioceses. The distinction between clerics and laypeople was still tenuous and fluid. A variety of liturgical traditions emerged; the Ambrosian* Rite in Milan and the Aquileian Rite (in the northeast of Italy) differed from that of Rome.

Italian Christianity under "Barbarian Rule" (5th–10th Centuries). The sack of Rome by the Visigoths of Alaric (410) – followed by the rise of the Ostrogothic kingdom of Italy (493–552) established by Theodoric – constitutes a turning point, because it signaled the sunset of a culture that had been hegemonic for nearly two centuries. For peoples within the area of Latin culture, Rome had become the center of the Latin Christian faith, assuming a role analogous to that of Jerusalem in the 1st c. The “barbarians” (Germanic tribes; the Goths*, often identified with the Vandals*) were Christians themselves, but as Arian* Christians they challenged the catholicity of the Roman Church.

With the slow evangelization of the countryside, distinct centers of Christian life, often monasteries of the Roman Church, were formed there. Nevertheless, the cathedrals in the cities, each presided over by a bishop with a college of presbyters, remained the central points of reference for Christian life. Christian dioceses corresponded to the municipia (cities with their own local governments according to Roman law, continued under the Goths). The bishop (often Arian) had social and political standing; he often assumed the titles and roles associated with other imperial functionaries.

During this period, Benedict* of Nursia (c480–c555) was a hermit at Subiaco and then founded several monasteries, most notably that in Monte Cassino (Southern Italy). With the monasteries, an authoritative Roman Christian presence outside of the cities was established. Yet popular forms of Christianity – “syncretistic” or “inculturated” Christian practices and doctrines, according to one’s perspective – also developed. The piety of common, lay Christians – often Arians – was centered in the family, with traditional prayers and simple celebrations transmitted orally from generation to generation. The Lombard* conquest (568–605) added new pressures from Arian rulers. Yet as Lombard rulers minimized in their governmental administration the role of Christian dioceses as municipia, the churches were more independent; Latin-speaking Christians could assert their distance from the Arianism of the rulers.

In the meantime, the violent doctrinal controversies about Christ, his person and nature, though centered in Constantinople, reached Italy, and the West was often the center of opposition to developments later judged to be heretical* (see Arianism; Christologies Cluster; Miaphysite; Monophysite; Three Chapters).

The Centrality of the Roman Church. The growth of the territorial domain of the Church of Rome, the nucleus of the future temporal power of the popes, was given a legal foundation by the “Donation* of Constantine*,” a forgery produced in Rome (c750–80) granting to the pope supreme authority in the church and temporal rule in Italy. The bishop of Rome, like all bishops, had been elected by the “clergy and people” of the city, but a Lateran Synod (769) sanctioned their exclusion from active participation in such a selection. Thus began the relationship between church* and state (and the broader society), which led to envisioning Christendom* as a society in which the ecclesiastical and the political and civic were so closely associated that they often became indistinguishable, in terms of both mutual support and contamination.

The Christian life of laypeople was very simple: they were to take Communion at least at Easter (later also at Christmas and Pentecost), know the “Our Father” (see Lord’s Prayer) and the Apostles’* Creed, and frequent the Sunday Mass. Regarding morality, there was an effort (not always successful) to purify popular customs. With the conquest of Sicily by the Muslims (831), a radically different religion with its own cultural and social structure was present side by side with Christianity.

With the second millennium, important changes took place on the peninsula. In the north (under the rule of the German emperors of the Holy* Roman Empire, successors of Charlemagne*), there was economic growth and the beginning of a reform movement. In the south, the Norman settlements (since the early 11th c.) ended Arab/Muslim domination and stabilized the situation. A Christian faith more disposed to take up its own armed defense and to undertake military expeditions and crusades* grew in Italy as well as north of the Alps. New social classes surged to prominence and called for an urgent reform of the Roman Catholic Church that would free it from both ecclesiastical and imperial control; e.g. the movement of the Patarini in Milan and Florence led by laypeople and the lower clergy protested the simony* and the wealth of the higher clergy.

During that period, a major Western institution was born: the universitas studiorum (Bologna), the “university,” where the inheritance of the past was studied and conflicting perspectives analyzed. Gratian* compiled at Bologna the Concordantia discordantium canonum, which would constitute the nucleus of the Corpus Iuris Canonici (see Canon Law) destined to regulate the life of Roman Catholics until 1918.

From Francis* of Assisi to the Council of Trent* (13th–16th Centuries). The reformist ferment became concrete in the Lay* Piety Movement, as seen most dramatically in the religious revivals of 1233 (the “Alleluia” Movement) and 1260 (the flagellants of Northern Italy, who whipped each other to atone for their sins and calling on the populace to repent). The figure of Francis* of Assisi (c1182–1226) synthesizes the complex spiritual pressures of the moment. Unlike the clergy, Francis rendered tangible and explosive the imitation of Jesus in late medieval society. His followers gave rise to the Franciscans*. The need to preach the gospel motivated another layperson, Peter Valdes*, to engage ordinary Christians, including women, in the task of preaching; but the radicalism of Valdes's followers* resulted in their condemnation by the official church at the Council of Verona (1184). This confrontation led to the creation of a "heretical" church, the Waldensian* Church in the Piedmont valleys, whose members, like the "Poor Lombards," were subjected to relentless persecution.

Between the mid-15th and early 16th c., denunciations of the institutional, theological, moral, and pastoral decadence of the Roman Catholic Church multiplied. Girolamo Savonarola (1452–98), a Dominican, sought ecclesiastical, social, and political reform in Florence, and was eventually executed; Catherine of Genoa (1447–1510), a canonized mystic, offers another example of the spiritual commitment of this period. While Martin Luther's* movement was maturing in Germany, the spiritual climate in Italy was very different. From 1542 the relentless work of the Roman Inquisition* limited the Protestant expansion in Italy, creating a climate of frustration and spiritual collapse in many places. Flight to Protestant lands was the solution for many: Bernardo Ochino (1487–1564), a Franciscan reformer in Venice, escaped the Inquisition by going to Geneva (1542); Peter Paul Vergerio (1498–1565), formerly bishop and papal nuncio* to Germany, became Protestant while attempting to refute Lutheran writings and introduced the Reformation in parts of Northern Italy, but soon had to escape to Germany (1549). The Waldensian communities felt affirmed by the Protestant reform; at their synod of Cianforan (1532), in which Farel* participated, they adhered to Calvinism*. Rather than flee, others preferred to keep their beliefs to themselves (Calvin called them "Nicodemites*"): they shared the Catholic liturgy and outward behavior, but professed in the privacy of their own consciences the "true religion." But most Italian Catholics simply accepted the demonization* of Luther and Protestants relentlessly presented by Roman propaganda. For common Italian Roman Catholics, the Council of Trent* (1545–63) was a remote assembly of grand ecclesiastical dignitaries far removed from their daily life.

The Modern Period (16th–20th Centuries). The political division of the peninsula into three zones influenced Christian perspectives: the north was sensitive to contact with Catholicism on the other side of the Alps; in the central region, primarily the States of the Church, the "government of priests" progressively fed anticlericalism and a greater disposition toward secularization*; in the southern region (including Sicily and Sardinia), subject to Spanish and then French influence, a relaxed ecclesiastical regime coexisted with an awareness of the dignity and independence of the clergy in the care* of souls. During the 17th–18th c., the civil and religious became interwoven. The baroque developed as a cultural attitude that also involved the religious. Jansenism* had a moderately significant impact, with adherents in certain circles, whereas the anti-Jansenist reaction was much more vigorous and produced a literature of contestation (see Italian Literature and Christianity). The age of worldwide exploration expanded the missionary sensibility toward the "pagan" continents.

The suppression of the Jesuits* (1750–73) provoked in Italy the constitution of the "Christian Friendships" (Amicizie cristiane), a secret society fighting the rise of modern culture. In this context, Scipione de' Ricci (1741–1810), bishop of Pistoia-Prato, sought at the Synod of Pistoia (1786) to reform the Tuscan Church along the lines advocated by the Jansenists by promoting a rediscovery of the Bible, a greater liturgical devotion, the use of the vernacular* in the Mass, and the Church's renunciation of social privileges. But all this was rejected in Italy (de' Ricci recanted in 1794); it was realized in France with the French Revolution, which was viewed as a frontal attack on Catholicism.

In the early 19th c., the first germs of secularization* became manifest in Italy. The later 19th c. was dominated by the "Roman Question." The process of unification of the peninsula put an end to the States of the Church. Rome became annexed to the kingdom of Italy (1870). In protest, one of the high apostolic tribunals, the apostolic penitentiary (1871, confirmed by Pius IX, 1874), forbade Catholics to participate in political elections. Yet national unification was accepted by certain lay Catholics – especially Giovanni Acquaderni and Mario Fani, who founded the Italian Catholic Youth Society (1867, later called Catholic* Action) – and resisted by others, the “intransigents” of the Opera dei Congressi (1874–75). The predominantly rural population, very poor and still profoundly religious, called for Christians to confront social issues. Thus Catholic social movements developed especially in Northern Italy, forming the embryo of a postclerical Catholic ruling class. Toward the end of the century, a young priest, Romolo Murri (1870–1944), attempted to bridge the separation of Catholics from democratic political life in a movement that led to the creation of “Christian Democracy.”

A harsh reaction and repression was the response of the Roman Catholic Church to the need for the cultural renewal of Catholicism. This climate of suspicion and denunciation marginalized many young intellectuals and spiritually gifted individuals (the “Modernists”). As a result, both clergy and laity were impoverished, pushed as they were to avoid theological issues and cultural research (illustrated by the 1871 abolition of the theological faculties in state universities).

After World War I (1918), fascism appeared to be a providential answer to the threat of “Red” socialism and anticlericalism. The fascist movement promised to reestablish social order and to respect religion. The papacy and a great part of the clergy regarded fascism with sympathy; Cardinal Gasparri for the Holy See and Mussolini, as head of the Italian government, signed the Lateran Pacts (1929) that resolved the Roman Question and created the Vatican City as a sovereign state. The Christian antifascist minorities were marginalized. Catholicism was established as the “state religion.” On the cultural level, the Catholic University of the Sacred Heart (Milan, 1923) was established through the initiative of the Franciscan Agostino Gemelli. The laity became more active, developing Catholic Action; yet the movements that animated Christians elsewhere in Europe at that time barely touched Italy.

Christianity in Contemporary Italy (20th–21st Centuries). At the end of World War II (1945), Catholicism lived with the conviction that it was definitively shaped and established; no improvement was necessary. After the reconstitution of the democratic regime, the Catholic presence in Italian society had two forms: Catholic Action, now directly controlled by the Church hierarchy; and the Christian Democratic Party, indirectly controlled and supported by Catholic Action. Preventing the expansion of the Communist* Party’s ideology was the dominant concern. Many Catholics were convinced that with the proper social and political commitments (Catholic Action and the Christian Democratic Party), the democratic system could bring about a “Christian state” that would concede to them the management of power and ensure that faith would have the influence that is due to the gospel. But the Holy See’s excommunication of Communists and their supporters (1949) had the opposite effect; it marginalized Catholics. The ferment of renewal was nevertheless present, especially among the youth. Many groups embodied a spirit of freedom, an intense spiritual commitment to a Christian presence in society, and the quest for a mature life of faith. The majority lived an activist spiritual and political life under the leadership of Luigi Gedda, the general president of Catholic Action, and the Jesuit father Riccardo Lombardi, promoter of the “Crusade for a Better World.” The government and magistrates, however, interpreted the Lateran Pacts (Article 7) in a way that was often oppressive and discriminatory with regard to religious minorities (Waldenses, Methodists, Jews). Freedom of religion, though sanctioned by Article 8 of the constitution, had a difficult time.

The Second Vatican* Council (1962–65) rapidly aroused profound interest in Italian public opinion. The events of the Council taking place in Rome brought Italian Catholicism out of its peripheral condition. Even ordinary people became involved in the great themes of Christian renovation. In the last years of the pontificate of Paul VI (1963–78), a spiritual flowering became manifest, especially with the birth of spontaneous monastic communities (Monte Sole, Bose, Spello), characterized by an intense commitment of faith that attracted the participation of a broad range of Christians. Such communities coordinated and enriched myriad prayer and Bible study groups.

With the election, after four and a half centuries, of two non-Italian popes (Karol Wojtila, 1978; Joseph Ratzinger, 2005), the Catholicism of the Italian Peninsula entered a new phase of its history. The pope’s diminished involvement in Italian affairs was accompanied by deep sympathy for “movements,” ranging from the Focolare* (emphasizing ecumenical and interfaith dialogue) to “Communion and Liberation” (emphasizing collaboration in the mission of the Church in all spheres of life) and Sant’Egidio (emphasizing solidarity with the poor). These movements find it difficult to maintain a balanced relationship with ordinary believers. Their efforts to root Christian identity in certainties that are historical and temporal betray a kind of fundamentalist* tendency. The conciliar impulse nevertheless triggered processes of renovation: the spread of direct contact with the Bible, participation in the liturgy, and a slow but ongoing diffusion of historical and theological studies on Christianity in the university. All these are helping to overcome centuries of passivity and marginalization of lay believers. In the 1980s, while Catholic Action was losing vitality, other commitments developed. The volunteer sector involves many Christians in services on the "frontier," such as assistance and rehabilitation of drug addicts, assistance of the elderly, and service in Two-thirds World countries.

Church and state relations in Italy have extended to the Reformed churches, which became beneficiaries of public funds; a similar agreement was made with the Jewish communities. The rapid decomposition of the Christian Democratic Party after the fall of the Berlin Wall necessitated a strenuous search for a new mode of presence in Italian society. The climate of greater freedom, resulting from Vatican II and the ecumenical initiatives of contact and dialogue, has calmed the tensions between Christian confessions, while the rapid evolution toward a multireligious tradition has profoundly changed the spiritual climate and the increasingly secularized culture of Italy.

GIUSEPPE ALBERIGO

I-Thou Relation, an intimate, loving union, usually between persons, human or divine, who view each other as free, self-directed individuals possessing intrinsic value and dignity. (The English "thou" is a translation of the familiar form of "you" in French [tu], German [du], and other languages). It is contrasted with an I-him/her relation between persons who view each other as separate things or objects whose value lies in their particular features and functions. The loving bond between I and thou enhances each party, for it entails a sharing of lives and experiences while respecting the mysterious uniqueness of each.

THOMAS C. ANDERSON

Jackson, Rebecca Cox (1795–1871), Shaker* preacher and founder of an African American Shaker community in Philadelphia (1859). Born in Pennsylvania, she was converted to Christianity in 1830 and became an itinerant preacher (1833–40) before joining the Shakers (1843). Jackson's life draws together the Holiness* Movement, perfectionism*, and race. Her spiritual visions, recorded in Gifts of Power, indicated a desire for both spiritual perfection and physical protection. As an itinerant preacher and an African American woman, Jackson faced persecution*. Her visions taught her that hardship was inevitable but that God would protect her if she became an obedient and pure spiritual vessel. As direct communications from the Holy* Spirit, Jackson's visions also provided her with a source of spiritual authority; she left her marriage, embraced celibacy*, and began preaching. She abandoned the African* Methodist Episcopal Church, in which she had experienced conversion* and sanctification*, for the Shakers, whose theology cohered with her beliefs regarding purity. But the overwhelmingly white Shaker community did not make sufficient inroads among African Americans. Creating her own religious community gave her spiritual authority uncommon among 19th-c. women, black or white, and the opportunity to work among African Americans.

SARAH JOHNSON

Jacob, son of Isaac* and Rebecca*, younger twin brother of Esau*. Isaac favored Esau*, but through deception Jacob received the Abrahamic blessing (Gen 27). Fleeing Esau's wrath, Jacob was employed by Laban and married his daughters, Leah* and Rachel* (Gen 29–30). His 12 sons, by four mothers, were considered the ancestors of the 12 tribes of Israel*, so called because of Jacob's name change after wrestling with God at Peniel (Gen 32). Late in his life, he and his sons went to Egypt, where Joseph* was a high official and gave them assistance (Gen 46). The Israelites were later enslaved in Egypt, leading to God's deliverance, the Exodus*.

Jacob Baradai, or Baradaeus (c500–578), the name deriving either from “Bar Addai” or from “Bardaya” (saddle blankets), referring to his humble garb. Born in Tella and educated at a monastery near Nisibis, Jacob spent 15 years in Constantinople as a member of the circle of Theodora*, a sympathizer of the Miaphysites*, at a time when her husband, Justinian*, was enforcing the doctrine of Chalcedon*. Through her influence, he was secretly consecrated metropolitan of Edessa* and traveled through the East, consecrating an underground hierarchy of bishops and priests, without ever being betrayed. Because of their invisibility, they were called the akephaloi, the “headless ones.” This was the beginning of the non-Chalcedonian Syriac* Orthodox Church, called “Jacobite,” a polemical name.

EUGENE TESELLE

Jacob of Edessa (c640–708), scholar, exegete, bishop. Born near Antioch, Jacob studied in the monastery of Qenneshre, then in Alexandria, before becoming bishop of Edessa* (684–688, 708). He resigned over a conflict with clergy about ecclesiastical discipline; he spent 11 years in the monastery of Eusebona and 9 in the monastery of Teleda, where he revised the Syriac translation of the OT. He died shortly after resuming his episcopate of Edessa. Jacob wrote biblical commentaries, letters, a chronicle, canons, and treatises on liturgical, philosophical, and philological subjects. His encyclopedic learning and uncompromising attitude contributed to the redefinition of Miaphysite* Christian identity after the Arab Conquest.

UTE POSSEKEL

Jacobite, a polemical (and offensive) nickname given to the Syriac* Orthodox Church, after the name of its Miaphysite* bishop, Jacob* Baradai (c500–78), who revived the spiritual life of the Church in Syria*, Armenia*, Egypt*, Persia, and Cyprus*.

Jacob of Serug, or Sarug (c451–521), Syriac poet-theologian and author, important writer about non-Christian religion in Syro-Mesopotamia, bishop in Serug (Sarug) (519). Together with the Syriac* Church, Jacob distanced himself from Chalcedonian* doctrines, although he was never directly involved in christological* controversies. Known chiefly for his metrical homilies (memre) – including those on the Mother of God (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Theotokos) – Jacob also wrote letters and festival homilies in prose. His significant anti-Jewish* polemic and positive attitude toward women are associated with Ephrem* the Syrian. Three early biographies, one by Jacob* of Edessa, survive. He is credited with having written a liturgy and an order of baptism. He was influential in the Malankara* Orthodox Church of India.

KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Jacob of Voragine (c1230–98), member of the Dominican* order (1244), provincial of Lombardy (1267–86), archbishop of Genoa (1292–98), author of the Golden Legend*.

Jamaica. Christianity on this island situated in the Caribbean Sea includes African-rooted movements and churches, as well as other denominations.

Originally populated by the Arawak Indians, who disappeared during Spanish rule (from 1509), Jamaica became Catholic when the pope created an abbacy (1516). When Jamaica became a British colony (1655), Anglicanism* became the official religion, until 1869, when the separation of the Anglican Church and the colonial state occurred. Jamaica has been an independent nation since 1962.

In 1837 the Roman Catholic mission became an apostolic vicariate*, and Jesuits* have been active since then in the educational* field. The vicariate became the Diocese of Kingston (1956), then the archdiocese (1967).

Arriving in 1754, the Moravians* were the first Protestant missionaries among slaves* in Jamaica, followed by the Wesleyan-Methodist* Church (1789). The Jamaican Baptists became independent in 1842. The Scottish Missionary Society and Secession missionaries formed the United Presbyterian Mission in 1848. In 1965 the Congregationalists and Presbyterians came together as the United Reformed Church of Jamaica. The Jamaican Council of Churches has existed since 1941.

Starting in the late 18th c., conformist missionary churches attracted an increasing number of slaves and free blacks. The arrival of freed slaves from the US colonies during the War of Independence stimulated a Native, or Black Baptist, tradition in Jamaica. Many slaves practiced different forms of African* Religion. There were increasing “outbreaks” of Myalism, a Jamaican syncretism* of African spirit belief and apocalyptic Christianity (also called “revivalism,” as an inculturation* of apocalyptic Christianity into African slaves’ religious culture). Jamaican Myalism evolved over time to combat the effects of obeah, the word for witchcraft* practice, that was disseminated in West Africa and Jamaica (see History of Christianity Cluster: In Latin America).

The Jamaican Christian tradition developed a peculiar interpretation of the faith*, according to which Jesus is the Savior who will liberate God’s people from “Babylon” (the evil and oppressive world). It was found among earlier groups, including the “revivalists,” and it continues among the Pentecostals and Charismatics* today (250,000 members in 1970; 385,000 in 2000). This theme of “Babylon” is also present in the Rastafari* Movement.

Statistics: Population (2000): 2.5 million (M), more than 90% of African origin. Christians, 2.1 M, 84.0% (Protestants and independents, 60%; Roman Catholics, 8%); Spiritists, 10.1% (including Rastafari); Hindus, 5%; nonreligious, 3.9%) (some double affiliations). ARMANDO LAMPE

James. In the NT, the name “James” (Gk Iakobos) refers to at least three different persons:

1. James, the son of Zebedee, brother of John. The brothers were the second pair of disciples to be called by Jesus (Mark 1:19; Matt 4:21) and part of the Twelve* (Mark 3:17; Matt 10:2; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13), as well as the inner circle of Jesus’ disciples (Peter, James, and John; Mark 5:37, 9:2, 14:33, and par.; Luke 9:28). He was killed by Herod Agrippa (Acts 12:1–2), the only one of the Twelve whose martyrdom the NT records.
2. James, the son of Alphaeus, is another of the Twelve, identified as such only in the four lists of apostles (Mark 3:18; Matt 10:3; Luke 6:15; Acts 1:13).
3. James, the brother of Jesus or “the Lord’s brother” (Gal 1:19), a “pillar” of the Jerusalem Church (Gal 2:9) and participant in the Jerusalem conference (Gal 2:1–20; Acts 15:1–20), who saw the risen Lord (1 Cor 15:7). This is the person referred to as James in Acts 12:17, 15:13, and 21:18, i.e. after the death of James, the brother of John (12:1–2); he is also the brother of Jesus mentioned in Mark 6:3 and Matt 13:55 (see also Jas 1:1; Jude 1). “James, the brother of Jesus” is interpreted to mean (a) James, a younger son of Joseph and Mary; or (b) James, a son of Joseph by a previous marriage, a foster brother of Jesus (on the basis of apocryphal sources), a view favored by many Orthodox and Protestants; or (c) James, a cousin of Jesus (based on the Semitic idiomatic use of “brothers” to designate “cousins”), who was identified with James, the son of Alphaeus, the son of Mary (“mother of James and Joses,” Mark 15:40, Matt 15:40), the preferred Roman Catholic interpretation, following Jerome* and Augustine*.

DANIEL PATTE

James, Letter of, a pseudonymous* letter (c90s, Rome?) written to poor Jewish-Christian communities, is the most radical NT document speaking out against the rich (5:1–6, 4:13). It seeks to give hope* (1:2–4, 12) to oppressed* people and to exhort them to undertake a coherent practice in which actions are consistent with faith (1:22–27, 2:4–17, 3:13) (see Faith #1). There was discrimination against the poor within the community (2:1–6, 2:14–16) and exploitation of the farmworkers by landowners (5:1–6). Apparently, the majority of the poor were women, since the Letter of James uses the feminine adelphē, “sister” (2:15) (in those days, inclusive language was not a concern).

The Letter of James is known for affirming “justification* by works” (2:24) and for eliciting Luther’s* scorn (“epistle of straw”). Nevertheless, when read from the perspective of the historical Jesus* (since it includes Jesus’ sayings), James advocates a Christology of the Way centered on the practice of justice* and what has been called more recently the preferential* option for the poor (1:27, 2:5–6, 14–17). Paul’s phrase “justification by faith” was misinterpreted to imply that faith does not demand a commitment to neighbors*. In the presence of the poor, James corrects this view by emphasizing that works of justice are an important element in justification and the unity of faith and works (in agreement with Paul himself; see Gal. 5:6). James constantly challenges the churches to demonstrate their faith through commitment to the oppressed and discriminated, especially women.

James, Liturgy of St., eucharistic formulary in the Greek language, probably elaborated in Jerusalem on the basis of the anaphora* of the Mystagogical Catecheseis (post-380) and the two stages of the Liturgy of St. Basil*. Until the 12th–13th c., the Liturgy of St. James was used in the Orthodox Patriarchate of Jerusalem and the Catholicate of Georgia. It was subsequently replaced by the Byzantine liturgies of St. John Chrysostom* and of St. Basil. The Liturgy of St. James (in Syriac translation) is also used by the Syriac* Orthodox Church and the Malankara* Orthodox Church of India, both Oriental Orthodox* (non-Chalcedonian) churches, and by Oriental churches in communion with Rome, including the Syro-Malankara Catholic Church. Some Eastern Orthodox churches celebrate the Liturgy of St. James on October 23 and the Sunday after Christmas, both feasts of St. James.

STEFANO PARENTI

James, Protoevangelion, or Gospel of, one of the Greek apocryphal Gospels (2nd c.). The purported author, James*, the brother of the Lord, describes the birth and childhood of Mary, her coming of age and betrothal to Joseph* (who was a widower with several children, as Origen* discussed), and Jesus’ birth and early childhood. It emphasizes God’s work in Mary’s life, her purity and perpetual virginity*, i.e. before, during, and after the birth of Jesus. Widely read and translated (in Syriac, Ethiopic, Coptic, Georgian, Old Slavonic, Armenian, Arabic, Irish, and later in Latin), the Protoevangelion was one of the bases of the Orthodox doctrine of Mary as Theotokos. See also MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER: THEOTOKOS.

James I of England (1566–1625), king of Scotland and England, political theorist, ecumenist, peacemaker. Born in Scotland, he became James VI on the abdication of his mother, Mary*, queen of Scots (1567). He became James I of England on the death of Elizabeth I* (1603), then proclaimed himself king of Great Britain (1604).

As king of Scotland, James successfully balanced rival political and religious factions and played a significant if controversial role in governing the Church of Scotland*. He defended the monarchy against Calvinist* resistance theories. On his accession in England, he proposed an ecumenical council to resolve disputes among churches. James convened the Hampton Court Conference (1604) to consider Puritan* proposals for reform. One result was a new English translation of the Bible*, the Authorized or King James Version (1611). Under his direction, the Church of England was administered by capable bishops and was largely Calvinist* in theology, but included some Arminians*. James sent British representatives to the Synod of Dort* to resolve theological disputes in the Netherlands; he patronized in England French Huguenots* and exiled Roman Catholics; he initiated relations with the Greek Orthodox Church through Patriarch Cyril Lucaris*. After ending the war between England and Spain (1604), James assisted in the peaceful resolution of disputes elsewhere in Europe, attempting without success to negotiate settlements at the beginning of the Thirty* Years' War and to forge an alliance with Catholic Spain.

Long derided for his undignified appearance, his fondness for male favorites, his extravagance, the corruption at his court, and his frequently contentious relations with the English Parliament, James is now also admired for his virtues and achievements. A shrewd politician, he brought stability to his kingdoms; he was an able theologian, an ecumenist and peacemaker, and the pungent writer of The Trew Law of Free Monarchies (1598), Basilicon Doron (1599), Triplici Nodo, Triplex Cuneus (1607), and A Premonition to All Christian Monarches (1609). See also BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER: ENGLISH TRANSLATIONS.

W. BROWN PATTERSON

Jane Frances de Chantal (1572–1641), widow, Roman Catholic saint, cofounder (with Francis* de Sales) of the Visitation of Holy Mary, a diocesan congregation (Annecy, Savoy, 1610), which became a formal monastic order (1618). The Visitation was an innovative early modern Catholic women's religious community that emphasized interior rather than austere exterior discipline*. Entrants included widows and handicapped women who were not eligible to enter other reformed orders. The Visitation's motto, "Live Jesus," captured the idea that one's heart should be inhabited by the gentle, humble heart of Jesus (Matt 11:28–30) through the practice of the "little virtues" such as gentleness and humility*. Spiritual guidance was undertaken in this same spirit of gentleness in order to "win hearts." The characteristic prayer of Mother de Chantal and the Visitandines was a simple, nondiscursive entrustment of self to God. This spirituality reflected the changing spiritual ethos of early modern Catholicism, which emphasized an individualized and inward faith focused on the acquisition of virtue, a spirituality that gradually replaced the more exteriorized, concrete spirituality of the late medieval world. After de Sales's death, Mother de Chantal oversaw the phenomenal growth of the order, especially in France. See also CATHOLIC RENEWAL.

WENDY M. WRIGHT

Jansen, or Jansenius, Cornelius (1585–1638), author of Augustinus (1640), taught Scripture* in Flanders (now Belgium) and wrote biblical commentaries. Together with the abbot of Saint-Cyran, who was theologian and spiritual counselor of Port-Royal, he studied the church fathers, especially Augustine*, compiling from them a summa theologica, in which he emphasized Augustine's main doctrinal points: original* sin, predestination*, and grace*. Humans are powerless under sin* and need to be empowered by divine grace* to do God's will; he affirmed predestination* and irresistible grace*. Named bishop of Ypres, he prematurely died of the plague. His name will remain attached to "Jansenism*."

JEAN LESAULNIER

Jansenism, a movement that emerged following the posthumous publication of Jansen's* Augustinus (1640). The term "Jansenism" or "Jansenist" was first used polemically to designate the "new" doctrine of this volume, rejected as such by Roman authorities. In reality, it was an effort to return to Augustine's* thought, in reaction to the Renaissance's anthropology*, which minimized the effects of original* sin. Jansen used Augustine to affirm the depth of human sin, against the Renaissance view as well as against the view of the Jesuits* (especially the disciples of Molina*); Jansen rejected the notion that humans have received free will, a free agency giving them the potential to choose what is good (see Freedom, Free Will), and the Jesuits' toleration of lax morality.

Augustinian theology as presented by Jansen was attacked, even though it was closely related to the views of Pierre de Bérulle, cardinal and mystic* (1575–1629), and Francis* de Sales. But the Roman condemnation of statements from Jansen's Augustinus and comments by Jansen and Saint-Cyran, and the suspicions of political authorities such as Richelieu, had a negative impact on the monastic renewal of the Port-Royal Abbey, its remarkable nuns (including Angelique Arnauld*), and intellectuals (including Antoine Arnauld* and Blaise Pascal*) who gravitated around Port-Royal.

A center of spirituality and theology, Port-Royal became, for many, an object of condemnation, even though its spirit won over many dioceses and much of French society. Outside of France, there was a parallel development of Jansenism and anti-Jansenism, which resulted in renewed Roman condemnation in the 18th c. (for, among other things, Jansenism's association with Gallicanism*) and in the transformation of the movement. Without severing its roots, it moved away from its original inspiration, emphasizing the propagation of the Christian message through study of the Bible and of patristic literature, and demanding freedom of conscience, as well as a rigorous moral life and ecclesiastical discipline. By becoming synonymous with rigorism, Jansenism obscured the true spirit of Port-Royal. JEAN LESAULNIER

Japan. In 1549 the Jesuit Francis Xavier* introduced Christianity in Japan, which was impoverished spiritually and physically as a result of recurring bloody civil wars. Christianity was spread among local rulers and the people by the Catholic missionaries; in 1582 Kyushu Christian rulers sent a delegation of four Japanese boys with the Jesuit Alessandro Valignano to Gregory XIII in Rome. Despite this initial success, the process of national unification and a policy of isolation after the late 16th c. led to the official proscription of Christianity, partly out of fear of Western colonization* and ideological* subversion. Christians were oppressed and almost eradicated (see Kirishitans and Hidden Christians in Japan). Most notably, 26 Christians were crucified at Nagasaki (1597), when the number of Christians was about 300,000.

When Japan opened itself to the world (1850s), Catholics and Protestants came to the country. In 1865 B. T. Petitjean, a Catholic missionary, discovered the "hidden" Christians and invited them to Ooura Cathedral at Nagasaki; later more than 3,000 Christians were persecuted by the authorities. When this event became an international diplomatic issue, the authorities officially lifted the proscription on Christianity (1873). The first Protestant church was founded in Yokohama (1872).

Christianity contributed to the modernization of Japan by creating educational* institutions, supporting civil* rights, forming labor, farmer, and consumer unions, teaching personal and social ethics, enriching Japanese* literature, and enhancing social* welfare. The 1889 Japanese Imperial Constitution established freedom of religion, but only insofar as it did not infringe on the national order and subjects' duties. Consequently, from 1889 Christian pacifists*, pastors, and educators who opposed nationalism* were persecuted. In 1891 Kanzou Uchimura, who later created the Non-church Movement, had to resign his teaching position in Tokyo because he refused to comply with the Imperial Precept on Education signed by the emperor (see Chinese Rites Controversy). Yet Japanese Christendom was ultimately incorporated into Japanese nationalism, as was the case with the United Church of Christ in Japan and with a union of Protestant churches.

After the Allied defeat of the Japanese in 1945, full freedom of religion, provided by the new constitution written during the US occupation, contributed to a renewal of Christianity. Since the 1960s, issues such as the inculturation* of Christianity in Japan, Christians' collaboration with the wartime government, and the stagnation of Christianity have been reexamined. Christians still constitute a small percentage of the population, but Christianity has contributed immensely to the improvement of various aspects of the Japanese society. See also BURAKU LIBERATION IN JAPAN; KAGAWA, TOYOHICO; SHINTO AND CHRISTIANITY.

NOZOMU MIYAHIRA

Japanese Literature and Christianity. Christianity intersects with Japanese literature mainly in the modern era and introduces a new rhetoric of individual moral and spiritual quests.

After the ban on Christianity was lifted (1873), Christianity provided a context and a language to define spiritual freedom, individualism, love, and aesthetic and poetic ideals crucial to the development of Japanese romanticism and naturalism in the Meiji period (1868–1912). Kitamura Tokoku (1868–94), Shimazaki Toson (1872–1943), Kunikida Doppo (1871–1908), and Tayama Katai (1871–1930), all Christian converts, incorporated Christian themes (the divine, sin*, guilt, sacrifice*, commandments) into works that are essentially secular yet soul searching. In the Taisho period (1912–26), Arishima Takeo (1878–1923) questioned the hypocrisy of conventional Christians in A Certain Woman (1919) but condemned the moral degeneration that followed the rejection of Christianity. Miyazawa Kenji's (1896–1933) indebtedness to Christianity is evident in his description of a transcendental world in The Night of the Milky Way Express (posthumous) and the figure of humility* and self-denial in his poem "Undaunted by Rain" (1931).

Biblical motifs are found in Natsume Soseki's (1867–1916) works, such as the image of the lost sheep in Sanshiro (1908) and the herd of pigs hurtling themselves over the cliff in the Ten Nights of Dream (1908). In The Confessions of a Mask (1949), Mishima Yukio (1925–70) constructs his ultimate vision of beauty and tragedy using the tension in the biblical iconography of the Madonna* (purity), Sodom* (corruption) and St. Sebastian* (martyrdom). Abe Kobo (1924–93) borrows from the image of the Apocalypse (the Book of Revelation*) and a surviving ark of humanity (The Ark Sakura, 1984) to describe a haunting post-nuclear world of doom.

The works of Christian writers range from church history in Japan to the use of a religious rhetoric for moral investigations. Endo Shusaku (1923–96) depicts the difficult and at times tortuous encounter between a pantheistic Japan and a monotheistic West. His fictional depictions range from the persecution of Christian converts in Japan (Silence, 1966) to a Jesus to whom a “yellow man” can relate (A Life of Jesus, 1973). Sono Ayako's (1931–) Watcher from the Shore (1979–80) raises questions about faith* and moral judgment through the daily confrontation of life and death in a gynecologist's work (see Medical Ethics). Other Christian writers include Ariyoshi Sawako (1931–84), Inoue Hisashi (1934–), Miura Ayako (1922–99), Shi-mao Toshio (1917–86), Shiina Rinzo (1911–73), and Kaga Otohiko (1929–). ANGELA YIU

Jaspers, Karl (1883–1969), philosopher, psychopathologist, cultural critic, professor in Heidelberg (dismissed in 1937 by the Nazis because his wife was Jewish; reinstated in 1945) and later in Basel (1948). He wrote the standard work on psychopathology and numerous works in philosophy influenced by the Bible (mainly the OT), Kant*, Kierkegaard*, Weber*, and Nietzsche*.

As a result of his Protestant and politically liberal upbringing and his career as a psychopathologist, Jaspers realized the limits of scientific knowledge about humans, who spiritually “live out of” sources transcending nature. He developed a phenomenology* of faith* as a basis for any vision of ultimate truth by time-confined humans. Jaspers affirms the value of Christianity for teaching a sense of individual freedom and dignity arising from a personal relatedness to God (“transcendence”) and transmitting the unconditional morality of the OT. For Jaspers God* transcends time and human grasp. The biblical stories of God's acts and commanding presence are myths* and symbols* (“ciphers of transcendence”) that inform our faith and guide our practice. Hence Jaspers critiques the emphasis of Christianity on confessing to creeds (fides quae creditur) instead of undertaking the risk of living by one's belief (fides qua creditur) (see Faith #3).

Jaspers takes issue with the modern neglect of the Bible, its theological dogmatization, and attempts to demythologize* it. Against Bultmann*, Jaspers insists that truths conveyed by myths or symbols are translatable only into other myths or symbols. Any myth, including that of the Christian act of salvation*, “is to be tested from the standpoint of the earnestness of existential actuality, for the power emanating from its language and the truth issuing from it in the actuality of life.”

Jaspers sharply criticizes the Christian doctrine of revelation* and its claim that Christian truth supersedes or excludes the validity of other religions (thus in The Great Philosophers Jaspers puts Confucius, the Buddha, and Socrates on a par with Jesus). Claims to the exclusiveness of truth lead to intolerance, religious wars*, and persecution*. God transcends all historic revelational religions. The validity of my faith does not require that others believe as I do. Encountering different religions calls for solidarity among believers and mutual tolerance, rather than the intolerance that arises when believers are “militant defenders of a creed.”

LEONARD H. EHRLICH

Jeanne de Jussie (1503–61). Born into a family of lesser nobility, she professed at the Convent of St. Clare* in Geneva* (1521), where she was a scribe (écrivaine) and eventually the abbess (1548). Sometime before 1555, she wrote the Petite chronique (Short chronicle), which concerned the threat to, and subsequent translocation of, her Catholic convent as a result of the Reformation in Geneva (1530–35). She describes soldiers and Protestant civilians constantly threatening the inviolability of the convent (and of its nuns). Local preachers and newly married former nuns (including Marie Dentièr*) repeatedly entered the convent to preach the value of marriage*. In 1535 the Clarissan nuns undertook a difficult trek to Annecy in order to take refuge in the convent of Sainte-Croix. Jussie freely disputed the doctrines and practices of the Reformers, including Luther*, and caricatured the former nuns and priests who attempted to persuade the nuns to give up enclosure. Her narrative is rich with details about daily life during the Reformation, the hardships of travel, and the strength of women (the nuns, as well as the wives of Protestant civilians) during the crisis. A Catholic press published Jussie's chronicle as The Leaven of Calvinism (1611; nine editions; Italian and German translations between the 17th and 19th c.).

JESSICA A. BOON

Jefferson, Thomas (1743–1826), third US president, founder of the University of Virginia, author of the Declaration of Independence. Baptized Anglican, he became a Deist*, distanced himself from traditional Christianity, and yet left perhaps the most important religious legacy of any president. An advocate of religious liberty, he wrote the “Statute for Establishing Religious Freedom,” which became Virginia law (1786). Later he supported a “wall of separation between church* and state” in a letter to the Danbury Baptist Association. For Jefferson, Baptists* were colleagues in the struggle for the disestablishment of state churches. Despite his Deist beliefs, Baptist preacher John Leland called Jefferson a “patriarch of liberty” for his defense of church–state separation. Jefferson considered himself an authentic Christian because he followed Jesus’ moral teachings, although he rejected traditional doctrines about Jesus’ divinity, which he considered superstitions and divisive. These convictions led him to produce The Life and Morals of Jesus, later called the “Jefferson Bible,” which contained Jesus’ teachings from the Gospels, with miraculous and theological stories removed. For Jefferson traditional Christianity would eventually lose credibility in an enlightened* age, and he expected Unitarianism* to become dominant in the USA.

JAMES P. BYRD

Jehovah’s Witnesses, with its origins in the late-19th-c. teachings of the US evangelist Charles Taze Russell*, has at present some 7 million active members around the world. The Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society of Pennsylvania, with its headquarters in New York, is the main corporate vehicle of the organization. The name “Jehovah’s Witnesses” was adopted in 1931.

Russell was convinced that the world was in its last days, and this view remains a core part of the group’s doctrine. Witnesses are expected to devote a number of hours each month to spreading the Millennialist message (see Millennialism Cluster). They conduct much of this activity by talking to people while distributing publications door to door.

Jehovah’s Witnesses regard the Bible as the source of all theological knowledge. It is held to be factually true and the only basis for sound belief. Other Christian groups are thought to be in error because they rely on nonbiblical traditions or on misinterpretations of the Scriptures*; they are thus part of the (evil) world that is coming to an end.

Witnesses believe that the idea of the Trinity* is nonbiblical and false. God* has a proper name, Jehovah. Jesus Christ is his son, but he is neither part of Jehovah nor equal to him. Likewise, the cross* is seen as a “pagan” symbol; Witnesses believe that Jesus died on a vertical stake.

The group teaches that death* brings life to a complete end; there is no immortal* soul* and hence no hell* in which existence would continue. When God’s Kingdom* is established on earth, those who are worthy of renewed life will be resurrected (see Resurrection of the Body in Western Christianity). Most will live forever in this world, which will have been transformed into a paradise; only 144,000 people have been anointed to join Jehovah and Jesus Christ in heaven.

There has often been tension between Jehovah’s Witnesses and public authorities because members refuse to swear oaths* of allegiance, serve in the military (see Pacifism and Christianity), or vote. Their refusal to accept blood transfusions has also been controversial. Witnesses do not celebrate birthdays or holidays (including Christmas* and Easter*), although an annual memorial service commemorates Christ’s death.

All Witnesses are responsible for evangelizing, and congregations are led by male “elders” rather than professional ministers. Local groups meet in buildings called “kingdom halls” (not churches). The organization is highly centralized, with directives coming from the governing body via national offices to every individual congregation and member.

DAVID VOAS

Jeremiah, Book of. Jeremiah reflects theologically on the military threat facing Judah* (late 7th c. BCE), the Babylonians’ siege of Jerusalem*, and subsequent efforts of Judean political groups to develop strategies for life under occupation and in diaspora*.

Jeremiah prophesied from 627 through the fall of Jerusalem (587), then briefly in Egypt* (43:8–13, 44:1–30). Judah was caught in the geopolitical tensions between weakening Egypt and ascendant Babylon. Jeremiah’s role as royal adviser during those unstable times brought him into conflict with the kings Jehoiakim and Zedekiah (Chaps. 36–38).

Jeremiah's theology of history underlines the persistent spiritual stubbornness of the people of Israel*, the culpability of Israel's political and clerical leaders, and God's power to punish (e.g. 15:1–9) and to restore (30:18–31:14). Intense lamentations ("jeremiads") are employed to dramatic effect as a form of prophetic biography (11:18–12:6, 15:10–21, 17:14–18, 18:18–23, 20:7–18). Jeremiah's turbulent poetry also makes visible the suffering of personified Zion* and the pathos of God. Emphasis on Israel's accountability for apostasy is balanced by the promise that God will renew the covenant* with Israel.

Jeremiah preserves divergent voices struggling to make sense of the disaster that had befallen Judah. Most clearly articulated is the position that Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon was God's instrument deployed to punish Judah for its disobedience to God. "Submit to Babylon and live!" was the rallying cry of those who, to preserve belief in a sovereign God, interpreted the devastation of Judah as God's will. But the book records subtle opposition to the accommodationist position, as well. Thus a key ethical question is left unresolved: should the faithful inhabit a threatening world as pragmatic assimilationists (29:5–7) or as idealistic resistance fighters (35:1–19)?

Fierce debates about false prophecy* (23:9–17, 28:1–17) reveal that much was at stake for Judean leaders vying for authority. Internecine accusations (24:1–10, 42:7–22) show a community bitterly divided against itself. These traditions, ostensibly exilic, may reflect an ongoing tension within postexilic Israel regarding the benefits of cultural assimilation versus the importance of guarding communal boundaries.

The commissioning of Jeremiah (1:4–10) is read in services of Christian ordination*. Jeremiah's laments offer an iconic model of spiritual wrestling with the costs of vocation*. Jeremiah's "new covenant*" (31:31–34) has been extraordinarily influential in Christian liturgical theology since the 1st c. (Luke 22:20; 1 Cor 11:25; Heb 8:8–13, 9:15), appropriated as a central idiom for Christ's redeeming work and its memorialization in the practice of the Eucharist*.

CAROLYN J. SHARP

Jerome (Lat Hieronymus) (c331/347–419), biblical scholar and commentator, translator, polemicist, ascetic*, transmitter of classical learning and Greek biblical, theological, and monastic scholarship into the Christian Middle Ages. Born in present-day Croatia*; studied in Rome. Having chosen an ascetic* life, he lived as a hermit* in the Syrian desert for about three years, studying Greek and Hebrew. After returning to Rome (382), he served as papal secretary until 385. Subsequently, Jerome moved to Bethlehem and founded a monastery* with Paula*, one of the aristocratic Roman women with whom he had a lifelong friendship. There he translated the Bible from Hebrew and Greek into Latin, wrote commentaries, engaged in polemic consisting of much satire and abuse, and writing letters (of the c120 extant letters, c40 are addressed to women), and corresponding with Augustine* on theological and biblical questions. These works are of historical, literary, as well as the theological and biblical interest.

Immersed in classical culture and literature, and a brilliant literary stylist, Jerome used his wide learning in the service of the developing Christian culture. An exponent of the ascetic life, he was criticized by some for overemphasizing the value of sexual chastity*, as in his Letter 22 to the young girl Eustochium, his works against Jovinian and Helvidius, and his Life of Malchus. Suspected of Origenism*, he became a critic of Origen's doctrines and later wrote against Pelagius*.

He was hugely influential in the Middle Ages as a model of an ascetic, as a biblical commentator, and as a compiler of reference works such as the list of famous people (De viris illustribus) and the translation and expansion of Eusebius's* Chronicle and dictionary of biblical places names. Later writers gave many of his sayings the status of proverbs. His Latin translation of the Bible, later known as the Vulgate*, became the standard text in Western Europe.

CAROLINNE WHITE

Jerome of Prague (c1373–1416), theological reformer who, with Hus*, led the early stages of the Bohemian* reform movement that would develop into the Moravian* Church and inspire Luther*. With Hus, Jerome was tried and burned at the Council of Constance in 1416.

Educated at the University of Prague (1398), Oxford (1399–1402), and Paris (1406), and expelled from Heidelberg for his Wycliffite* leanings (1408), he may have gone to Jerusalem on pilgrimage (1403). He actively promoted Wycliffism in Prague in 1409 and in the presence of Emperor Sigismund in Hungary (1410). He was tried in Vienna (1410) and excommunicated; he escaped to Moravia, where he preached against the papal crusade against Naples (1412). He followed Hus to Constance in 1415, where after Hus's murder he recanted on September 23. Despite this, he was imprisoned, reaffirmed his Wycliffite beliefs, and was burned on May 31, 1416.

Jerome was, along with Oxford scholar Peter Payne (d1455), instrumental in bringing Wyclif's texts to Prague. Influenced by Wyclif's Triologus, he promoted Wyclif's philosophical and theological ideas throughout Europe. Like Hus, he rejected Wyclif's denial of transubstantiation*, but argued for the church as the universal body of the predestined* and vigorously attacked the clerical hierarchy.

STEPHEN E. LAHEY

Jerusalem. Old Assyrian Ursalimmu, "City of Peace," also called "Jebus" (Judg 19:10–11; 1 Chr 11:4–5); political and religious capital of Israel after David moved the Ark of the Covenant there (2 Sam 5–7). Isaiah 52:1 refers to Jerusalem as the "Holy City," while Ezekiel interprets Jerusalem as "YHWH is here" (48:35) and "center of the world" (5:5, 38:12; cf. Judg 9:37); Jerusalem is also viewed as the repository of God's Name (Ps 122; Isa 54). Because it is the locus of messianic expectation (Isa 2:3), all nations are to come to Jerusalem on pilgrimage (Zech 8:20–23). Jesus' death and resurrection occurred there, and from Jerusalem, Christianity sprang (Acts 1:8). Revelation 21–22 offers a vision of the New Jerusalem, along with a new heaven and a new earth. See also ZION.

ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Jerusalem Council (51 or 49), an apostolic council attended by Paul*, Peter*, and James*. As Paul described it (Gal 2:1–10), this conference addressed the tensions between James's and Peter's mission to the Jews – proclaiming a gospel with the Law – and Paul's mission to the Gentiles – proclaiming a gospel without the Law. Both forms of the gospel were recognized as authentic; the gospel is necessarily inculturated*, even as it maintains its continuity with Judaism*, and a fundamental unity exists among Christians who follow different forms of the gospel. This ideal was difficult to implement, as the incident in Antioch (Gal 2:11–21) already showed. Acts 15:1–30, and other passages in Acts 11 and 18, seem to reflect a similar reluctance; Acts' secondhand reports seem to have been reshaped by conflating several meetings and softening the agreement (15:29 requires Gentiles to follow part of the Law).

Jesuits (Society of Jesus), Roman Catholic religious* order of priests with a distinctive vow of obedience to the pope in order to serve the gospel and the universal church.

Founded by Ignatius* of Loyola and his companions (Rome, 1540), the Society of Jesus counted at the time of his death (1556) 1,000 members in Europe, Brazil*, and Japan*. Its Constitutions, approved by Pope Paul III, inspired other religious orders. According to the 1975 General Congregation, "To be a Jesuit is to know that, although a sinner, one has been called to be a companion of Jesus as was Ignatius, who implored the Virgin Mary to 'put him in relationship with her Son,' and who then saw the Father himself asking Jesus, carrying his cross, to take this pilgrim in his company. What is, today, to be a companion of Jesus? It is to be under the cross as a standard and to be committed to the decisive struggle of our time, namely the struggle for faith* and for the justice* that faith implies."

The years 1550–1645 constituted the golden age of the Society of Jesus. The 15,000 Jesuits included famous theologians, scientists (who welcomed Galileo* to their Roman "college" [high school], 1611), pedagogues who established many "colleges" and universities throughout Europe and beyond, and missionaries who traveled to India* (de Nobili*, 1606), China* (Ricci*, 1583), Tibet* (Andrade, 1624), Canada* (Brébeuf and Jogues, 1640), Paraguay* and its "reductions*" (separate mission colonies where converted natives resided), Brazil*, and Japan. The lay Marian congregations, inspired by Ignatius's Spiritual Exercises* (especially among students), multiplied all over Europe. After 1645 the Jesuits were deeply involved in major controversies, notably over Jansenism*, Gallicanism*, and Chinese* rites (condemned by the pope, 1704, when the mission in China counted 300,000 Christians).

The Jesuits' successes and power prompted jealousy and international intrigues, related especially to the reductions in Paraguay, the rise of nationalism*, and the Enlightenment*. The Jesuits were banished from Portugal* (1754), France* (1763), Spain* and Naples (1767), and were abolished by Pope Clement XIV (1773) (except in Russia and Prussia). Restored in France in 1815 (where Clorivière had prepared novices), Jesuit missions and educational work resumed (especially in the USA, where the Jesuits opened "colleges" and universities, and conducted missions among Native Americans). By 1950 the Society had 36,000 members.

In 2000 there were 19,800 Jesuits (Latin America, 3,000; North America, 3,200; Asia, 5,600; Europe, 6,600). Since Vatican* II, and the “updating” (Italian, aggiornamento) led by Pedro Arrupe, the Society has devoted itself primarily to promoting justice*, inculturation*, and the service of the marginalized*, especially refugees*.

1) Introductory Entry

Jesus, Images of. Historical Christianity is rich in visual imagery, conveyed in poetry, song, and pictorial arts, most often centered on the figure of Jesus. Much of the iconographic evidence can be subsumed under three overlapping rubrics: typology, portraiture, and narration.

Typology. Christian typology seeks to demonstrate that all of reality (nature and history) prefigures and culminates in Jesus Christ (or in the time of the believers, or in the future; see Typology). Typology was used by early Christians to assert themselves against Jews and pagans. Typology consists of “types,” or prefigurations, and “antitypes,” their fulfillments. Types are inferred, allusive, or associative; they depend on the interpreters’ creative imagination. In visual art, Christian interpreters and viewers found iconographic types of Jesus virtually everywhere.

The most familiar OT iconographic types of Jesus include Adam*, Daniel*, David*, Isaac*, Job*, Jonah*, and Moses*. There also were Greco-Roman mythopoetic typological figures of Jesus, including Asklepios, Helios, Herakles, and Orpheus. Generic figures functioning as iconographic types include images of Jesus as king, philosopher, shepherd, soldier, and teacher. There are animal types (dove, fish, eagle, lamb, peacock, phoenix, unicorn) along with cosmic images (air, earth, fire, light, sun, water). Cultivated plants (grape, olive, palm, wheat) have also been pictorial shorthand types of Christ, along with letters (e.g. alpha and omega, iota and chi), geometric figures (circle, octagon, triangle) and inanimate objects (e.g. the cross).

Portraiture. The earliest surviving portraits of Jesus date to the 6th c. The most famous is the painted bust of Christ at St. Catherine’s Monastery, Mount Sinai (most likely executed in 6th-c. Constantinople). Christ as “Pantocrator” (the Almighty One) is shown facing front, looking out at the viewer, dressed in a purple tunic, his right hand raised in a gesture of blessing, his left arm holding a large codex (presumably the Bible). Surrounding Christ’s head is a gold halo*. Such icons*, executed on a thin wooden board, were originally portable pictures patronized by private persons, often set up in private chapels and houses. As devotional images, such icons of Jesus have been popular in Eastern Christendom from the 6th c. to the present.

Since there are no eye-witness accounts of Jesus’ physical appearance, by definition icon portraits of Jesus are products of the creative imagination of Jesus’ followers. But to devout viewers, the veracity and reality of the Jesus portrait icon remain. Devotees bow down before the Jesus icon, and touch, kiss, and speak to the image, engaging it as if it were a beloved living person. The Christ icon is what it represents, the presence of God in a palpable form, accessible to human sight and touch.

In Orthodox churches, icon piety lives on. To Western Christians, piety directed to icons of Jesus (or Mary* and the saints*) is foreign and difficult to comprehend; such difficulties led to the Iconoclastic* controversy (7th–9th c.) and the condemnation of icon piety as idolatrous by many Protestants. Nevertheless, echoes of Jesus icon portraiture can be found in Western medieval and modern art history (see the present cluster: In Western European Art).

Narration. Pictures illustrating Jesus' story play a major role in Christian iconography. The clearest figural renderings of Jesus engaged in actions described in the NT are found in 6th- and 7th-c. illustrated Gospels (e.g. Rabbula codex, Rossano codex, Latin codex of Bishop Augustine of Canterbury); still earlier visual narratives are those of catacomb* paintings and early Christian sarcophagi. The basic story line depicting Jesus' life in visual form includes his birth, infancy, and childhood, adult ministry, and especially the last days (entry into Jerusalem, the supper, the garden scene, betrayal and arrest, trial and crucifixion, post-resurrection appearances). Since the late 5th c., Jesus' crucifixion* has dominated Jesus visual narratives. Typology often overlaps: OT types are exhibited alongside or in juxtaposition to Jesus as fulfillment of these types.

PAUL CORBY FINNEY

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views

Jesus, Images of, in Byzantine Iconography. Since there is no NT description of Christ's physical appearance, the 4th-c. Eastern church fathers described Christ either as an ordinary and even ugly man who "had no form or majesty" (following Isa 53:2) or, on the contrary, as more beautiful than any other human (following Ps 44:3).

1. Christ Pantocrator. By the 9th c., literary descriptions of Christ as a handsome middle-aged man with hair down to his shoulders, an oblong face, and full beard had taken shape. This iconographic type was readily accepted because it resembled the extremely popular statue of Zeus at Olympia made by Phidias. Since the 11th c., these iconographic representations were inscribed "Jesus Christ Pantocrator" (the Almighty or All-Ruler), pointing both to Christ's power in heaven and on earth, and to his eternal existence as the second person of the Trinity. After "the triumph of Orthodoxy" ended the Iconoclast* controversy (843), this representation took the dominant position in the cupolas of churches and became the most widespread representation of Christ in Byzantine iconography.

2. Christ as Handsome Young Man was preferred by some Christian authors (e.g. Theodorus Anagnostus, 6th c.), who rejected the "Zeus-like" image. The image of Christ as a beardless youth with wavy hair symbolizing the eternal beauty of the embodied God (as in the mosaic image of the altar in the Church of San Vitale, Ravenna, 6th c.) remained popular until the Trullo Council (692) demanded "realistic" representations, as it rejected allegoric images of Christ, such as Christ as the Lamb.

By the mid-11th c., other types of Christ iconography were established and ascribed specific names (the miniatures of the Paris Gospel Gr. 74).

3. Jesus Christ the Ancient of Days named the image of a gray-bearded old man (Dan 7:9; Rev 1:14) – representing Christ as he appeared in the visions of prophets, before the Incarnation*, as an eternal being in heaven, the second person of the Trinity*.

4. Christ Emmanuel presents "God with us" as an innocent and unprotected child; for Byzantine theologians, it is a reminder of the Incarnation* and of the redemptive* sacrifice.

5. Christ as Priest reflects this liturgical quest of Byzantine iconography. Following an early Byzantine apocryphon, it represents Christ as a youth with an outlined beard, crownlike hair style, and priestly tonsure (a mosaic image at St. Sophia, Kiev, mid-11th c.; a fresco of Nerezi, Macedonia, 1164). In manuscripts and church decorations, various images of Christ were deliberately juxtaposed to reflect Christ's priestly role at different stages of salvation history and of the mystery* of the Eucharist*, in which the same Christ offers, is offered, and accepts the offering in heaven together with the Trinity. After the 13th c., the Byzantine "Christ as High Priest" represents the Lord in the robe of an officiating bishop or patriarch (sometimes with a royal crown, a sign that Christ is supreme ruler and high priest).

6. Anapeson (the Vigilant Eye) represents Christ as a child sleeping with open eyes. It can be traced back to biblical images (Judah as a lion, Gen 49:9) combined with ancient legends of lions born dead and becoming alive on the third day. With its stress on the Resurrection*, this image was set on the western wall of a church, above the entrance (e.g. frescoes of Protaton at Mount Athos, late 13th c.).

7. Christ the Angel, representing Christ as a winged youth with crossed nimbus, was inspired by the second Easter homily of Gregory* Nazianzen. The earliest depictions are illustrations of this homily in 11th- to 12th-c. manuscripts, and since the late 13th c., it appears on church murals (Church of St. Clement, Ochrid).

8. Byzantine Images of Christ connected with renowned miracle-working icons of Constantinople. The most venerated and widespread was the Mandylion – a representation of the holy face on a cloth. Tradition claimed that this image was "not made by human hands" and presented the "self-portrait" of Christ, first brought to Edessa*, then to Constantinople (944), and extensively reproduced, taking a prominent place in the Orthodox Church. Other Byzantine images of Christ were inscribed as "Chalkitis" or "Antiphonitis," indicating their connection with miracle-working icons of Constantinople.

In the mid-16th c., a major controversy related to the iconography of Christ erupted in Moscow (the "Viscovaty affair"). Kremlin icon painters, influenced by Western art, inserted new allegoric images of Christ, e.g. Christ as crucified angel or as warrior. Despite protests and discrepancies with the Byzantine tradition, these iconographic experiments were approved.

Since the 17th c., there has been no significant development in iconography except some discussions with Old* Believers concerning the gesture of blessing and the abbreviation of Jesus' name in Russian icons. Most images replicated renowned miracle-working icons, frequently connected with the Russian royal family (e.g. the "Savior of Smolensk" icon). See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

ALEXEI LIDOV

Jesus, Images of, in Latino/a Depictions. Latino/a theologians, writers, and artists evoke images of the barrio Christ, the mestizo Christ, and the intimate Christ. Latino/a theology often emphasizes the earthly Jesus, the one exposed to abject circumstances, human suffering, and death. Jesus suffers as we do, and identifies with the poverty and social marginalization* that many Latinos/as experience. However, the earthly Jesus also challenges entrenched power to respond justly to the needs of the oppressed*. He is the "hard-hitting" Jesus, the "barrio Christ," who comes from and for the neediest (Recinos). He is the "mestizo Christ," who hails from Galilee, on the margins of power, but confronts Jerusalem, the center of entrenched power (Elizondo). Jesus also stands with women, outcasts in society because of gender discrimination and health challenges. Jesus heals them, and many join his gathering of disciples. In the end, only women stand with Jesus in death and bear first witness to new life (Aquino). Finally, many Latinos/as identify with this suffering but confrontational Jesus in intimate ways, even naming their children after him, as depicted in the book Jesus Is My Uncle (Pedraja). See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER.

EFRAIN AGOSTO

Jesus, Images of, in Literature. The plethora of noncanonical and later fictionalized appearances of Jesus in world literature makes the hyperbole in John 21:25 something of a reality: everything written about him, let alone a useful description of each, would require many volumes.

Aside from his portrayal in noncanonical Gospels, the earliest Western literary appearances of Jesus occurred in the period of Mediterranean and European translation of the Bible; they were often highly imaginative paraphrases (e.g. Juvencus's Historiae Evangelicae libri quattuor, Spain, early 4th c.; Christ and Satan, Anglo-Saxon, late 8th c.). Paraphrasing, gap filling, and fictional departures from biblical narrative have created distinctive views of Jesus. Beyond such paraphrases, H. Richard Niebuhr's* Christ and Culture (1951), with its fivefold classification system, offers a helpful nexus (see Culture Cluster: And Christianity).

1. The "Christ against Culture" Images.

When traditional Germanic* epics met Christianity, a heroic "Christ against culture" figure emerged, as seen in the Old Saxon alliterative epic Heliand (c830) and in the 8th- to 9th-c. Anglo-Saxon Jesus poems. The triumphalist Jesus reappears with Roman overtones in works as varied as the 1602 Portuguese Life of Jesus (later in Persian and Latin translations) by the Indian* Jesuit Hieronymus Xavier; Giles Fletcher the Younger's Christ's Victory, and Triumph in Heaven, over, and after Death (1610); and John Milton's* Paradise Regained (1671). He is the ethical model countering revived Stoic classical virtues in Sir Richard Steele's The Christian Hero (1701). Such characterizations of Jesus faded in the 18th-19th c. and reemerged in Liberation* theology and literature in the 20th c. Thus in Ernesto Cardenal's Cosmic Canticle (1993, Nicaragua*), Jesus is a Communist hero, or in James K. Baxter's "The Maori Jesus" (1966), he is a postcolonial countercultural prophet.

2. The "Christ above Culture" Images are most dominant in mystical* literature, such as the devotionals of the European Middle Ages. Among these images are the rapturous, ethereal Jesus of Teresa* of Ávila, Madame Guyon*, and the Pre-Raphaelites, as well as the evanescent, almost hallucinatory Jesus as the muse of the Syrian poet Tawfiq Sayigh ("The Sermon on the Mount," 1970).

3. The "Christ of Culture" Images followed German romantics such as Annette Droste-Hulshoff ("Gethsemane" in Das Geistliche Jahr, 1839) and might be better labeled "Jesus of Culture." One important variant makes Jesus a kind of romantic hero, at one with nature, as in English poet Felicia Heman's "Mountain Sanctuaries" (1825), echoed in Ernst Renan's best-selling La Vie de Jésus (1863). Another, more predominant in modernity, is exemplified in William Blake's* Jerusalem (1820), as well as Walt Whitman's "To Him that was Crucified" (1860) and Leaves of Grass (1855), and is apparent in the opening lines of Heinrich Heine's "Deutschland: A Winter Tale" (1844). This approach permits a radically personalized reading of the Gospels; a portrait of Jesus becomes self-portraiture. In the 20th c., this trend accelerates. With the loss of belief in the divinity of Jesus, he appears as a locker-room buddy approving of self-indulgence and adultery, as in Canadian Rudy Wiebe's My Lovely Enemy (1982); as disillusioned and desultory as Easy in John Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath (1939); as the cynical and defiant antihero Jesus in New Zealander R. A. K. Mason's "Nails and a Cross"; or as depressive as Reiner Maria Rilke's Jesus in "The Olive Garden" (1906). Occasionally the irony of postmodernism's loss of the sense of loss produces an infernal reading of Jesus, as in Gore Vidal's Messiah (1954); or a failed Messiah and lost religious hope, as in Russian Vladimir Lvov's untitled postwar poem about the Crucifixion, exemplified by "We can only pity Christ today, / So, of course, he's no longer great. / Our earth loves the victorious."

4. The "Christ Transforming Culture"

Images are a counterdevelopment, clearly present in Marxist* and neo-Marxist literature. Initially European, this strain is first visible in Christian Socialism, as in Elizabeth Linton's The True History of Joshua Davidson (1872), Elizabeth Phelps's A Singular Life (1895), and perhaps Upton Sinclair's They Call Me Carpenter (1922). This political theme is developed in Africa by Senegalese Leopold Senghor, Congolese Tchicaya U Tam'si, and Nigerian Chinua Achebe, in all of whose work Jesus is a poignant but exemplary figure to whom a proper response would produce reconciling rather than violently revolutionary social change.

5. The “Christ in Paradoxical Relation to Culture” Images – never quite at home in culture, never quite able not to be in culture – is found in postmodern writers’ portrayal of Jesus as a complex, problematic teacher, but also in many modernist works that drew heavily on post-canonical or Gnostic* Gospels to create an ambivalent Jesus, such as Robert Graves’s King Jesus (1946), Nikos Kazantzakis’s The Last Temptation of Christ (1953), and the quasi-biographical account A Life of Jesus by Japanese Shushiako Endo (1973), and still more sensationally in Dan Brown’s The Da Vinci Code (2003). By their opposition to a paradoxical representation of Jesus, Dorothy Sayers’s The Man Born to be King (1943) and Francois Mauriac’s Vie de Jésus (1936) highlighted the trend toward problematizing the Jesus of the Gospels, reflecting this sense of ambivalent struggle with the claims of faith, even though, as Miguel de Unamuno (The Christ of Velasquez), has written, “Jesus, you are as a living fount / which, in the thick of the forest, / sings ever new songs of eternal love.”

DAVID LYLE JEFFREY

Jesus, Images of, in Movies. In the history of cinema, from the late 19th c. to the present, there have been literally dozens of biographical films about Jesus. These films follow the overall conventions of the “biopic” (biographical film) genre: they are explicitly based on textual sources – the four Gospels – and they make a claim to be historically authentic, and perhaps even historically accurate, at the same time as they clearly invent numerous elements of the story. The number, variety, appearance, and content of the Jesus movies demonstrate that these films do not tell us about the past so much as they reveal tensions, concerns, assumptions, and anxieties about the present. For example, North America’s understanding of itself as the champion of the individual against an oppressive regime, or of a democracy* against tyranny, can easily be detected in the films’ portrayals of Roman rule in Galilee and the people’s longing for salvation*.

The Jesus movies span all eras and all genres. In the early silent era, they tended to be static and episodic, little more than slightly animated tableaux of famous biblical paintings. An exception was Cecil B. DeMille’s 1927 film, King of Kings, which presented a highly developed and often entertaining narrative, including a raunchy “backstory” that explains how Mary* Magdalene came to follow Jesus. After DeMille’s film, there was no full biopic of Jesus until the era of the biblical epics (1960s). This long break was due in part to the enormous influence of DeMille’s movie, but perhaps even more to the Production Code (1930–1960), which greatly limited the types of stories and images that could be shown on the screen. The major biblical epics, such as The Greatest Story Ever Told (Stevens, 1965), were, and continue to be, enormously popular. Some films drew explicit connections to the modern era. For example, Pasolini’s moving black-and-white film, The Gospel According to Saint Matthew (1964), used Jesus’ life as an allegory for the class conflicts in Southern Italy after World War II. These films were soon followed by the Jesus rock musicals Jesus Christ Superstar (1973) and Godspell (1973), in which Jesus is treated with both humor and irony as he sings his way through his mission and parables*. Palpable in these films are such current issues as the Civil* Rights Movement and the conflict in the Middle East, as well as the countercultural ethos of the hippie movement. The 1980s saw two major iconoclastic* films, Scorsese’s Last Temptation of Christ (1988) and the Canadian film Jesus of Montreal (Arcand, 1989), which, like Pasolini’s film, used the story as an allegory* of their own time and place. These two films made no claims to historicity and hence can be placed at the boundaries of the biopic genre. Another, shorter hiatus ensued, causing some critics to suggest that the era of Jesus movies has finally ended. The appearance of The Gospel of John (Saville, 2003), The Passion of the Christ (Gibson, 2004), and The Nativity Story (Hardwicke, 2006) dispelled this notion and showed that the Jesus story continues to be amenable to interpretation in many different ways.

The great variety in these cinematic depictions demonstrates that Jesus' story remains useful as a vehicle for exploring issues that resonate far more with the films' audiences than do the concerns of 1st-c. Galilean Jews. Furthermore, underlying these films, as well as their popularity among viewers, is the idea that Jesus himself, whether as Messiah, prophet, champion of the poor and oppressed, flower child, wise teacher, or superhero, continues to intrigue us and to be a vehicle through which we can view and attempt to understand ourselves and our problems and issues as they change over time.

ADELE REINHARTZ

Jesus, Images of, in Western European Art. Western iconographic traditions – with a narrative and/or didactic character, in contrast to Eastern Orthodox icons* – mirror the hopes, fears, and convictions of Christians during nearly two millennia.

Early Christianity. The earliest images of Jesus (catacomb* frescoes and sarcophagus reliefs) show Jesus in three iconographic types: those of generic figures (e.g. healer, king, philosopher, shepherd, teacher); OT types (e.g. Jonah, Moses); and pagan gods and heroes (e.g. Asklepios, Herakles). In the 5th and 6th c., the first fixed pictorial conventions for the rendering of Jesus emerged, especially in basilicas*: Jesus was shown seated, facing front, his right hand raised (gesturing speech or blessing), his left hand holding a codex. This enthroned Pantocrator Christ, a figure of authority and power, was often flanked by images of apostles, disciples, evangelist symbols, martyrs, and saints.

Medieval Christianity. From the 7th to the 14th c., Jesus images in illustrated Gospels and Bibles that presented narrative, pictorial versions of Jesus' life largely followed early Christian precedents. Yet the enthroned Christ appeared especially in larger public formats (e.g. tympana of Romanesque and Gothic cathedrals), together with images of Jesus crucified.

Throughout the medieval period in Western Europe, crucifixion iconography was ubiquitous as book illustration, fresco painting, relief sculpture, engraved glass and gemstones, enamels, mosaic, bone and wood carving, metalwork, and textiles.

Modern Christianity. From the late 13th c. to the present, pictorial arts have been rich and variegated. Giotto's frescoes in the 1305/6 Arena Chapel (Padua) include Jesus crucified, the pietà (Mary holding the dead body of her son), and Christ enthroned (the Last Judgment). The style of Giotto's traditional iconography points to the 15th- and 16th-c. Italian Renaissance, when well-known artists elaborated the narrative sequence of Jesus iconography, from his birth to his public ministry, from the Last Supper, the agony in the garden, the betrayal, to the Messiah's ignominious death, his descent from the cross, his resurrection, and his ascension. The Italian Renaissance tradition was adopted and then continued into the 17th and 18th c. throughout Western Europe; yet in Protestant territories, the traditional iconographic repertory was either diminished or altogether eliminated. In the 19th c., Jesus iconography declined in artistic importance.

In the 20th c., Jesus iconography all but disappeared in large sectors of traditionally Christian Western Europe. At the mid-20th c., the so-called art sacré movement (led by the Dominican Marie-Alain Couturier) attempted to revive traditional Christian religious iconography, but soon died a quiet death in the 1960s. Thereafter, there has been little of artistic note.

PAUL CORBY FINNEY

Jesus, Quest for the Historical. The quest for the historical Jesus began during the Enlightenment*. Thomas Emlyn and Thomas Woolston, both Unitarians* (early 18th c.), challenged the veracity of the Gospels' accounts. But the four stages of "the quest" began with the book of H. S. Reimarus that is variously entitled in English translation On the Aim (or Purpose or Intention) of Jesus and His Disciples (German original, 1778).

The First Quest. Reimarus's book posed what became the central question of the quest: How much continuity and discontinuity is there between the historical Jesus and the canonical portraits of him? Was Jesus somewhat different from what the NT says about him? Sharply different? Or even, as a few have occasionally argued, was he a fiction?

Reimarus argued that Jesus' aim and that of his followers were very different: Jesus proclaimed the Kingdom* of God; his followers proclaimed Jesus. The details of his portrait of Jesus as an anti-Roman political Messiah whose life ended in bitter disappointment and his claim that Jesus' followers stole his body and invented a religion about Jesus have been discounted. But Reimarus's distinction between Jesus as a figure of history* and the way the Gospels tell his story, as well as doubts about the veracity of Jesus' miracles* (D. F. Strauss, 1835), led to a study of the sources. Scholars assigned historical priority to the Synoptic* Gospels rather than to John* and concluded that Q* and Mark* are the oldest layers of the synoptic tradition, as is still broadly accepted today. "Lives of Jesus" proliferated in the 19th c., although what effect the first quest had on churches, clergy, and laity is unclear.

Within the academic world, Schweitzer* brought the first quest to an end with his enormously influential Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906; a sequel to his Mystery of the Kingdom of God, 1901). Schweitzer narrates brilliantly the quest up to his time, presents his argument that Jesus' message and mission were dominated by apocalyptic* eschatology*, and concludes with the theological claim that it is not the historical Jesus who matters for theology, but the living Christ who "comes to us as One unknown." His argument that the historical Jesus does not matter was anticipated by Martin Kähler, a theologian, in The So-Called Historical Jesus and the Historic Biblical Christ (1892). Yet Schweitzer admired the historical Jesus and thought we could know quite a bit about him. Far from discrediting him, Schweitzer's portrait of Jesus as a heroic but deeply mistaken eschatological figure was and remains persuasive to many.

The Second Stage of the Quest (a time of "no quest") resulted from Schweitzer's book and lasted until the mid-20th c. Although C. H. Dodd, Rudolf Bultmann*, and others wrote important books, there was a relative lack of interest in the historical Jesus and considerable skepticism about what we can know, as well as theological uncertainty about whether the quest mattered for Christian theology.

The Third Stage: The Second Quest (from the 1950s) was motivated by the conviction that the historical Jesus does matter for theology. It focused on the understanding of existence mediated by the *kerygma (preaching) of early Christianity and by the message of the historical Jesus. Notable authors include James Robinson, Günther Bornkamm, and Norman Perrin.

The Fourth Stage: The Third Quest (a renaissance of Jesus scholarship, from the 1980s) is differentiated from the second by a multidisciplinary approach that incorporates models drawn from the social sciences and history of religion (see History of Religion School); a greater and more appreciative understanding of the Jewish context of Jesus and his Jewishness; collaborative studies of the sources (the Jesus* Seminar and the International Q Project; see Q, a Collection of Sayings Ascribed to Jesus).

Regarding sources, a strong majority continue to affirm the priority of Mark and Q. Recently, some scholars have emphasized the importance of the study of orality, which can be combined with the study of written sources.

The Expanded Context for Jesus Research. The first and second quests focused on "Jesus within Christianity" (the NT and Christian theology), and often entailed a negative or negligible treatment of Judaism*. In the third quest, a larger context emerged: Jesus within Christianity within Judaism. Shaped by a post-Holocaust* awareness of the ways that Christian perceptions of Judaism have fed anti-Semitism* and by detailed research into the varieties of Judaism in Jesus' time, the third quest produced a thoroughly Jewish Jesus who was in conflict with some forms of Judaism (assessments of the conflict vary). An even larger context has been emphasized by some: Jesus within Christianity within Judaism within the Roman Empire. This emphasis includes an understanding of christological terms like Son* of God, Lord*, and Savior in the context of Roman imperial theology.

To what extent do the Gospels report "what happened"? And how much is based on subsequent beliefs (from a post-Easter perspective)? Third quest scholars range from minimalists to maximalists. At the minimalist extreme, a few argue that Jesus never existed, and others affirm his existence but assert that only a very small portion of the gospel tradition is based on what he actually said or did (mostly wisdom sayings). Maximalists defend the historical reliability of most of what is in the Synoptic Gospels.

In the center, the majority of Jesus and scholars of the Gospels agree that Jesus existed; the Gospels are a developing tradition that combines memory, testimony, and metaphorical narrative; and it is possible to know some things about the historical Jesus with various degrees of probability. They emphasize in various combinations that Jesus was a Jewish charismatic/mystic; a wisdom teacher; a healer and exorcist; a prophet of the Kingdom of God; and the initiator of a movement. Other issues include eschatology, the political Jesus, and the relevance of the quest to Christian theology.

Eschatology. Scholars in North America seem about evenly divided. Many agree that Jesus proclaimed an imminent interventionist eschatology ("apocalyptic" eschatology): the Kingdom would come by divine intervention in the near future. But some argue that Jesus espoused no eschatology; the eschatological sayings in the Gospels are the product of early Christian beliefs. Still others argue for a fulfilled eschatology; Jesus himself was the eschatological fulfillment of God's promises to Israel. Others argue that Jesus held a participatory eschatology: the Kingdom would come through human participation. The notion of imminent intervention is gone, yet eschatology as God's purpose for the earth remains central to the message and activity of Jesus.

How Political Was Jesus? Those who affirm imminent interventionist eschatology commonly see Jesus as apolitical. Because Jesus believed God would soon transform the world through divine intervention, what did political institutions and systems matter? They would soon be irrelevant. Those who say that Jesus was primarily a wisdom teacher also commonly see him as apolitical. But many argue that Jesus was concerned about politics in the way that much of the Bible is: God's purpose, God's passion, for the earth is that it be a world of justice* and peace*. Jesus' passion for the Kingdom of God led him to criticize the system of domination of his time and to advocate an alternative vision; all this led to his arrest and execution.

The Relevance of the Quest to Christian Theology and Practice Remains Disputed. Some third quest scholars set the question aside and concern themselves only with the historical task. Others argue, as Kähler did, that only the canonical Jesus matters for theology. By contrast, others argue or imply that only the historical Jesus matters. Still others believe that both the historical Jesus and the canonical Jesus are relevant to Christian theology and practice.

The quest will continue, although its shape is impossible to predict. As long as Jesus matters, historical and theological interest in the quest and its significance will abide. See also PARABLE. MARCUS J. BORG

Jesus Prayer (not to be confused with the Lord's* Prayer), originated in Greek hesychasm*: "Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, have mercy on me (a sinner)." Following the injunction to pray unceasingly (1 Thess 5:1), in the Orthodox* tradition the faithful repeat the Jesus Prayer again and again as a means of concentration. At first they engage in a simple recitation of the prayer, but as they enter more deeply into the process of prayer, they make their own the words of the prayer; ultimately the prayer becomes a "prayer of the heart," the prayer of adoption, "when we cry, 'Abba! Father!'" (Rom 8:15).

Jesus Seminar, a group of mostly North American scholars who began meeting in 1985 to analyze and discuss the historical authenticity of sayings and deeds attributed to Jesus in the Gospels and other early Christian documents and then to vote on their authenticity, reporting the vote in The Five Gospels: What Did Jesus Really Say using four colors (red, pink, gray, and black) to indicate the probability that a particular saying or deed was authentic (red) or not (black). Joachim of Fiore (c1135–1202), biblical interpreter. After having experienced several visions on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, he entered a Benedictine* monastery (later a Cistercian* one) and eventually founded his own monastery. Claiming to have received the gift of understanding, he developed an original interpretation of the Bible providing an alternative to the traditional view that history will end with the return of Christ in judgment*.

He wrote concurrently Concord of the New with the Old Testament, Exposition of the Apocalypse, and Ten-Stringed Psalter. According to his doctrine, which is one of remarkable simplicity, there is a correspondence between the events and persons of the OT and NT, and those (foretold by Revelation*) of a third age – the age of the Holy* Spirit that began with Benedict* (6th c.), continued with Bernard* of Clairvaux (1090–1153), and was to be fulfilled in 1260 (“a thousand, two hundred, and threescore days,” Rev 11:3, 12:6) when the reign of the Son would be superseded by the reign of the Spirit, new religious orders would be founded, and a truly “spiritual church” would arise. In this third earthly period, humankind would leave its condition of tutelage and be guided inwardly by the Holy Spirit.

The Franciscans* saw their own order foretold in Joachim’s writings. A Franciscan, Gerard of Borgo San Donnino, wrote Introduction to the Eternal Gospel (Paris, 1254). In addition to reproducing excerpts from Joachim’s writings, it introduced the notions of a “third testament” superseding the other two and the coming of the “eternal gospel” (Rev 14:6) – views quickly condemned by the pope (1255). Yet Joachimist beliefs persisted among Franciscans, especially the Fraticelli*.

Movements of innovation or renewal (e.g. the Lay* Piety Movement, the Free* Spirit, the Radical Reformation, hopes about the New World and about progress, the American and French Revolutions, the new spirit of liberty) were not directly influenced by Joachimism, although, in hindsight, Joachimism seemed to be the earliest formulation of a new, more hopeful approach to human history.

Lessing* gave intellectual legitimacy to this way of thinking, which was widely followed in the 19th c., as a distillation of the loving and emancipatory aspects of Christianity; as a religiosity outside the church, even in post*-Christian perspectives. At the dawn of the 21st c., Joachimism was either viewed with favor by progressive and liberationist Christians or blamed by conservatives as a major source of disruptive hopes for an infeasible earthly future.

EUGENE TESELLE

Joan of Arc (1412–31), virgin* martyr, military leader, French national hero. Born into a farming family, Joan claimed she had been divinely inspired to lead the French army in victories against the English that turned the tide of the Hundred Years’ War. She facilitated Charles VII’s coronation; later captured by the English and deserted by her French king, she was burned at the stake for heresy* (a conviction overturned 24 years later). Joan’s rejection of clerical authority and insistence on personal religious experience somewhat anticipate the Reformation*. Beatified (1909) and canonized (1920), Joan remains an inspirational figure as a woman who defied the standards of her time.

MAUD BURNETT MCINERNEY

Job, Book of. One of the wisdom writings of the HB, Job is a literary rendering of a traditional story concerning a pious and wealthy man who inexplicably experiences devastating loss and suffering. Although the character Job is not an Israelite, the book is the product of a Judean author, writing probably in the 5th c. BCE.

The book is written in two contrasting styles, including a frame tale, composed in simple but elegant prose (1:1–2:13, 42:7–17), and a series of poetic speeches, consisting of a dialogue between Job and his three friends (Chaps. 3–27), a poem on the elusiveness of wisdom (28), a final speech by Job (29–31), a speech by a fourth friend, Elihu (32–37), and God’s speeches from the whirlwind with Job’s brief replies (38:1–42:6).

The frame tale focuses on the motives for human piety. Is it, as the adversary suggests (1:9–11, 2:4–5), an implicit bargain in which piety is exchanged for wealth and security? Or can piety be disinterested? The sufferings inflicted on Job provide the conditions for determining the answer. In the frame tale, Job retains his piety, his wealth is restored, and new children are born to him.

By contrast, in the poetic section, Job bitterly criticizes the lack of moral order in the world and the abusive behavior of God toward humans, even as he yearns to meet God in a trial at law. His friends defend God’s governance of the world and treatment of Job, whom they see as justly punished. The most radical perspective in the book, however, is that of God, whose enigmatic speeches from the whirlwind implicitly reject the belief, widespread in antiquity, that God acts according to the principle of retributive justice*. Traditional Christian interpretation, however, has tended to focus on the suffering of Job rather than on the book's radical theological claims. See also THEODICY.

Joel, Book of. In the Book of the Twelve Prophets, Joel appears second, after Hosea*. The prophecy was evoked by calamitous economic events, described poetically as an attack by locusts, an invading army, and severe drought. A balanced structure depicts the disaster in the first half of the book (1:1–2:17) and promises complete restoration in the second half (2:18–4:21, Hebrew text). Divine judgment of sinners from all nations follows the restoration of God's elect. There are sociological indications of a post-exilic date: a reference to trade in slaves by the Ionians (Greeks) and Sabaeans, and language about the day of YHWH, especially frightening cosmic symbolism similar to later apocalyptic* symbolism. Affinities with the Book of Jonah* exist, but it cannot be determined which author, if either has borrowed from the other. The question asked by both, "Who knows whether he [God] will turn and repent?" comes from the divine proclamation in Exod 34:6–7 about God's nature as merciful and just. Joel's message, addressed to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, is best known for two things: the reversal of the utopian vision concerning transforming swords into plowshares and spears into pruning hooks (Isa 2:4; Mic 4:3) and the extraordinary prediction about the outpouring of the divine vital force (spirit) that erases distinctions of gender, age, and social class. Early Christians interpreted the events associated with Pentecost recounted in Acts 2 as the reversal of the confusion of language recorded in the story about the Tower of Babel in Gen 11 and the fulfillment of Joel's prophecy.

JAMES L. CRENSHAW

Johannine Comma, an interpolation in the text of 1 John 5:7–8, "the Father, the Word, and the Holy Spirit," a trinitarian formula added c800 to the Vulgate* after "There are three that testify." The interpolation became part of the official Latin text but is missing from Greek and other manuscripts.

John. In the NT, "John" (Gk Ioannes), a common Jewish name, refers to at least four different persons.

1. John, the son of Zebedee, called by Jesus with his brother James* (as the second pair of disciples; Mark 1:19; Matt 4:21), one of the Twelve* (Mark 3:17; Matt 10:2; Luke 6:14; Acts 1:13), and one of the inner circle of Jesus' disciples (Peter, James, and John; Mark 5:37, 9:2, 14:33 and par.; Luke 9:28). Luke associates John with Peter, the two being leaders of the disciples both in the Gospel of Luke (e.g. 22:8) and in Acts (Chaps. 3, 4, 8); yet after James's death (12:2), John does not play any major role in Acts. By contrast, in Gal 2:9–10, the earliest record, Paul identifies John, alongside Peter*/Cephas and James* ("the brother of the Lord"), as one of pillars of the church in Jerusalem. In the Gospel of John*, John is never mentioned by name, although the "sons of Zebedee" (John and James) are said to have seen the risen Christ (John 21:2). Church tradition associates John with the "beloved disciple" (John 13; 19; 20; 21), the presumed author of the Gospel of John (21:24), an authorship doubted by most scholars (see John, Gospel of).
2. John of Patmos, the seer and presumed author of the Book of Revelation* (1:1, 1:4, 1:9, 22:8).
3. John Mark, an early Jewish Christian who participated in Paul's, Peter's, and Barnabas's missionary activities (Acts 12:12, 12:25, 13:5, 15:37–39). Church traditions identify him as the presumed author of the Gospel of Mark* and as Mark, the companion of Paul (Phlm 24; 2 Tim 4:1).
4. The Elder (presbyteros) (2 John 1; 3 John 1) was sometimes identified with John the Apostle (as Papias* seems to do). Eusebius* clearly distinguished John the Presbyter from John the Apostle.

John, Acts of. See APOCRYPHA CLUSTER: APOCRYPHAL ACTS OF APOSTLES.

John, Apocryphon of ("Secret Book of John"), often considered a classic example of Gnosticism*, purports to be a revelation by Christ to the apostle John about the divine realm and its relationship to the visible cosmos and humanity. A 2nd-c. original Greek version may have been the source of the mythology that Irenaeus* ascribed to certain "gnostikoi." Three copies in Coptic translation (c4th c.) survive among the Nag* Hammadi Codices, and a fourth in Berlin Codex 8502 (c5th c.).

The myth portrays an ineffable transcendent Spirit, from whose self-contemplation emerges a perfect realm or family of personified attributes ("aeons"). The material cosmos is an imperfect copy fashioned by a lesser being named Ialdabaoth, an offspring of the lowest entity (Wisdom*) in the transcendent realm. True humanity is the spiritual family in the realm of perfection, including the spiritual Adam*, his son Seth*, and the race or offspring of Seth. Earthly humanity possesses the physical form created by Ialdabaoth, but also the spiritual element, or seed, of Seth, which bears the image of God and is capable of salvation* if one is receptive to this revelation.

MICHAEL ALLEN WILLIAMS

John, Epistles of, a collection of three letters directed to an open public (1 John), an individual church (2 John), and an individual Christian (3 John), exhorting them to remain faithful to their vocation*. The main topics are faith*, truth*, and love*. The language echoes the Gospel of John* and OT covenant* traditions.

The addressees seem to be Christians in Asia Minor, organized in house churches, subject to the influence of Judaism*, Hellenism*, mystery* religions, and the Roman imperial cult, at the beginning of the 2nd c. CE.

The readers stand in the Johannine tradition, but the meaning of this tradition is debated. In the Gospel of John, there is a tendency toward a spiritualization of the Christian message, of Christ, and of Christian existence. The adversaries of 1–3 John seem to be "Ultra-Johanneans" who are proud of their spiritual "unction," lack social responsibility, and are influenced by contemporary enthusiastic* movements leading to Gnosticism*.

In 1 John, the central issues are the conditions of the new* covenant relationship with God: faith* in Christ incarnate and love* of one's brothers and sisters in readiness to share the daily bread (1 John 3). Only in this way can one be proud of knowing God, loving God, and being God's child. 2 John takes up the same criteria, and 3 John applies them to a concrete situation.

The twofold emphasis of 1–3 John on Christology* (faith and truth) and ethics (love) can be explained by a particular anthropology*: instead of boasting about one's communion with God through the Spirit and disregarding Christian solidarity, one should continue to confess Jesus Christ, who has "come in the flesh" (1 John 4:2; 2 John 7) for the redemption* of sinners, and acknowledge one's communion not only with God, but with fellow Christians.

JOHANNES BEUTLER, SJ

John, Gospel of, or "Fourth Gospel," authorship unknown but attributed pseudonymously* to "John," often identified as John, son of Zebedee; written c90 CE, probably in Asia Minor, independently of the Synoptic* Gospels but drawing on some similar traditions. Unlike Matthew* and Luke*, the Gospel of John begins not with an infancy narrative but with a cosmological introduction proclaiming Jesus to be the preexistent Word* of God. In John 1–12, Jesus' ministry is built around a series of "signs" narratives; John 13–20 has a lengthy set of "farewell discourses" at its heart, followed by the Passion narrative and Resurrection* appearances. Chapter 21 is an epilogue.

The Fourth Gospel was probably written within and for the use of a Jewish-Christian group, the "Johannine community," which had a distinctive theology and history. The Gospel of John suggests considerable tension between Johannine believers and Jews who did not share their view that Jesus was the Christ* and Son* of God. While some passages imply that the Jews had expelled Johannine Christians from the synagogue* (9:22, 12:42, 16:2; cf. Martyn), this cannot be proved.

In keeping with its heavily christological focus, John draws from the broad range of Jewish speculation on the nature, title, role, and origins of the Messiah*, in order to emphasize that Jesus is the Savior* – the Messiah, the prophet, the king of Israel – anticipated by Jews and Samaritans alike. Most important, Jesus is the Son of God, who through his life, death, and resurrection will remove the sins of the world and provide the way to eternal life for those who believe (1:19–22, 4:26, 20:30–31).

John calls upon witnesses (God, John* the Baptist, Scripture*; 5:31–47). It also uses a strident rhetoric of binary opposition, in which believers are associated with positive terms such as life, light, and spirit, and nonbelievers with their opposites: death, darkness, and flesh (e.g. 3:17–21, 5:22–24). The negative characterization of “the Jews” symbolizes those who are condemned to God’s wrath* on account of their unbelief (8:31–58).

The Gospel of John was the subject of homilies and commentaries by the church fathers (e.g. Origen*, John* Chrysostom, Augustine*) and became a part of the Christian canon*. In the modern era, it has furnished the “born again” label and other slogans adopted by some Christians (3:3, 3:16). Negatively, John 8:44, in which Jesus tells some Jews that “[y]ou are from your father the devil*,” has contributed to anti-Semitic* discourse throughout the centuries.

ADELE REINHARTZ

John of Ávila (1499–1569). A preacher and Catholic reformer (see Catholic Renewal), he is best known for his influence on the reform of the Council of Trent* and his spiritual treatise Audi, Filia (1556; definitive, complete version published posthumously, 1574). Born into a wealthy *converso (New Christian) family, he studied at the University of Alcalá (1524?), was ordained (1526), and then was posted to Seville. But he was imprisoned under suspicion of being a lapsed converso and an alumbrado heretic (false mystic) by the Inquisition* (1531). After being declared innocent (1533), he spent two decades focusing on Christian education* and reform of the church. An unauthorized version of the complete Audi was put on the 1559 Index* of Prohibited Books.

John of Ávila was a renowned preacher of Passion spirituality at the beginning of his career. His treatises on pastoral, clerical, and papal reform influenced several Spanish delegates to the Council of Trent. The Audi, Filia, an exegesis of Ps 45:11–12, was written as a guide for a female follower, then expanded for a larger audience. It focuses on Bible study, obedience to God, and contemplation of the Passion. In the final expanded edition, John also describes the city of God, warns against the devil’s* temptations*, and advocates the glory of Christ.

JESSICA A. BOON

John the Baptist, a 1st-c. apocalyptic* prophet* and ascetic* (“neither eating nor drinking,” Matt 11:18 cf. Mark 1:6 and par.). From Josephus* (Jewish Antiquities) and the NT Gospels, one can conclude that John was from a lower, rural, priestly family (Luke 1, 2) and possibly associated temporarily with the Essenes* of Qumran* (in the “wilderness of Judea”), and that in defiance of the aristocratic religious and political authorities (Pharisees and Sadducees, Matt 3:7; Herod Antipas, who killed him, Mark 6:14–29), he preached the imminent coming of God’s wrath* upon faithless Israelites. He called them to do works fit for repentance* (Matt 3:7), namely works of social justice* (Luke 3:10–14) and ritual purification (John 3:25) through baptism* (Mark 1:2–11 and par.), and proclaimed the coming of a further purification by the “Holy* Spirit and fire” (Matt 3:10–12).

Building on this tradition, the four Gospels present John as the precursor of Jesus. The early church absorbed most of John’s movement (although some claimed John’s superiority to Jesus). Mark presents John as Elijah* incognito (1:6, 911–13), preparing the way of Jesus, who is mightier than John (1:1–8, 6:14–29). Matthew explicitly presents John as (the new) Elijah (17:12–13) and puts Jesus’ words on John’s lips (3:2, 4:17); yet Jesus’ baptism scene involves a rebuke of John for misunderstanding Jesus’ ministry (3:14–15). For Luke John’s ministry is completely separate from that of Jesus: he still belongs to the period of the “Law and prophets” (16:6). In the Fourth Gospel, John the Baptist is simply “the voice” witnessing to Jesus as the light (1:6–8), as the Christ who increases while John decreases (3:23–30); here John is the first confessing Christian, a model missionary*. Thus despite original ambivalences in the history of the church, John was viewed as a saint, a model of discipleship.

DANIEL PATTE

John Chrysostom (c349–407), theologian, ascetic*, archbishop of Constantinople; viewed as one of the greatest preachers of the early church, hence the epithet “Chrysostom” (golden-mouthed). Born in Antioch, Syria, he studied rhetoric under the renowned Hellenistic orator Libanius. He was ordained a deacon* (381) and priest* (386) in Antioch and became archbishop of Constantinople (398–404). Twice deposed and banished for involvement in political and ecclesiastical intrigues, he died in exile.

John’s life spanned a pivotal period of transition in the Roman Empire and the ancient world. Christianity was gaining political and social ascendancy, but it continued to compete with older religions, the imperial cult, and Judaism, and struggled with internal tensions. Politically the Empire was officially divided between East and West, and ecclesiastically the rise in power of Constantinople provoked the jealousy of the more prominent Eastern sees* of Antioch* and Alexandria*. Chrysostom's career reflects these rivalries and tensions.

Born into an educated upper-class family, after his father's early death John was raised by his mother, Anthusa. A gifted student, he received a traditional classical education and was possibly headed for a career in law or the civil service. But John soon turned away from a secular career and began to prepare for ministry in the church, where his rhetorical training would serve him well. For three years, he was an aide to Meletius*, the bishop of Antioch, studying the Scriptures* under him; he also frequented a form of ascetic school led by the priest Diodore*, later bishop of Tarsus. John was ordained as a lector, a minor clerical position, but soon retreated to the nearby mountains to pursue an ascetic life, first under the tutelage of an elderly monk and later in greater isolation. His rigorous austerities are said to have damaged his health; after approximately six years in the Syrian desert, he returned to Antioch to resume his duties as a lector, was ordained a deacon (381), and was largely responsible for administration of the church's charity.

Ordained a priest in Antioch (386), John pursued for the next 12 years an active pastoral and theological career. He preached regularly in the churches of Antioch and was involved in civic affairs. His sermons are an excellent source of information about the city and the diverse Christian and non-Christian factions that competed for popular attention. John became embroiled in high-level ecclesiastical and imperial politics when leaders in Constantinople appointed him as their bishop (398). He already had enemies, chief among them Bishop Theophilus* of Alexandria, a rival episcopal see. John's efforts to reform church administration and finances, outspoken criticism of the higher clergy, scorn for the affluent lifestyle of the imperial court, and persistent reclusiveness provoked further opposition. His imprudent remarks about Empress Eudoxia and his reception of the Tall* Brothers, Egyptian monks accused of Origenism*, served to mobilize his enemies. Deposed by the Synod of Oak* (403), he was quickly reinstated. Despite popular support, John was again deposed and banished, and he died in exile in Armenia*.

Well trained in the classical tradition, John Chrysostom was one of the most eloquent Christian orators in late antiquity and is admired among classical scholars for his elegant prose. Most of John's writings are sermons on books of the Bible or in honor of saints and treatises on practical Christian living. In exegesis* he leaned toward the literal and historical interpretation of the Bible favored in Antioch* rather than the allegorical* interpretation emphasized by the Alexandrian* school. Yet John was deeply concerned with the application of the biblical text to Christians' spiritual and moral lives. He condemned luxury and abuses of wealth and emphasized charitable giving and the needs of the poor.

John's sermons also reflect the political issues and theological controversies that marked the late 4th c. Soon after his ordination, he faced a great civic upheaval as the citizens of Antioch destroyed imperial statues in protest against the imposition of new taxes. In a series of sermons, John both rebuked the people for their acts of violence and consoled them in the face of probable imperial repercussions. He preached a series of sermons against radical Arian* Christians in the city and another series, Against Judaizing Christians, warning against participation in Jewish festivals and observances. The inflammatory rhetoric of these sermons helped promote anti-Jewish attitudes during the Middle Ages and beyond.

The most prolific of the Greek fathers, John is best known as a preacher* and exegete. Besides his many letters and treatises, more than 900 of his homilies are extant. His sermons began to be translated into Latin soon after his death; he was the most popular Eastern Christian writer in the medieval West. John also wrote an influential treatise, On the Priesthood, the first full-fledged treatment of Christian ministry. In Byzantium his name was attached to the Constantinopolitan liturgy* in honor of his liturgical reforms. With Basil* the Great and Gregory* of Nazianzus, he is counted among the three holy hierarchs for his leadership of the church.

ANDREA STERK

John Climacus (c525–606), or John of the Ladder, revered as a saint* by Roman Catholic, Oriental Orthodox, and Eastern Orthodox churches. A monk, he lived for 20 years as an ascetic* hermit* at the foot of Mount Sinai, studying the lives of saints. After becoming abbot*, John wrote the Climax (or Ladder) of Divine Ascent describing the 30 steps of spiritual progression in monastic life, reaching dispassionateness (apatheia) as the ultimate contemplative and mystical good, which became a classic for Eastern Orthodox monastic life.

John of the Cross (1542–91), mystical* theologian and founder, with Teresa* of Ávila, of the Discalced Carmelites*. Born into a poor family in Old Castile, he entered the Carmelite house of Medina (1563) and studied theology. Ordained a priest (1567), he met Teresa, a prioress of a Carmelite convent in Ávila, who sought his assistance in spreading a new form of contemplative monastic lifestyle. Juan de Santo Matía adopted a new name, Juan de la Cruz, John of the Cross (1568).

He served as master of the Discalced (barefoot) Carmelite College in Alcalá and as confessor of Teresa's convent (1571–77). The reformist spirit sparked by Teresa and John's collaboration was resented by the Calced Carmelites, who incarcerated John for nine months (1577–78) in their monastery – a harbinger of the separation between Calced and Discalced Carmelites (1579–80). When, after Teresa's death, the provincial Nicolás Doria imposed additional ascetic strictures on the Discalced Nuns, John opposed him and was banished (1591) and died.

John's writings, treasures of Renaissance Spanish literature and of Western Christianity, ironically juxtapose a mystical imagination and apophatic* wonder with medieval Scholastic philosophy and thus represent a unique contribution to Western theology. Active submission to the Supreme Lover, the source of life and love's energy and longing, lies at the center of John's mystical contemplation. The Spiritual Canticle, The Dark Night of the Soul, and The Living Flame of Love, perhaps his best-known works, show the influence of Teresa of Ávila; both see the process of purgation, illumination, and union as the trajectory of the human soul seeking union with God. The Spiritual Canticle also displays an indebtedness to Bernard* of Clairvaux; both writers see in Song* of Songs a canonical blueprint for the journey of the soul seeking union with the Divine. John's dedication to describing "God's mysterious ways upon the human soul" has left an indelible mark on subsequent Catholic theology. Beatified (1675) and canonized (1726), he was made a doctor of the church (1926). PAUL CHANG-HA LIM played a prominent role in the fiscal administration of Syria during the 7th c., a period of political change, and he himself served under the caliph in Damascus. He became a monk (early 8th c.) in or near Jerusalem.

John was the first Christian to write about Islam* with direct knowledge of it (see Islam and Christianity Cluster: Introductory Entries and In the Middle East), but he primarily defended the Greek patristic tradition of the ecumenical* councils against those who, having found relative freedom under the Muslim yoke, rejected it. He served as a defender of conciliar orthodoxy while among the monks of the Holy Land and gained great renown as a preacher. He is still regarded as one of the greatest Byzantine hymnographers.

Apart from his polemical works, his works epitomized the Greek patristic tradition and became a vehicle for monastic meditation. These included a handbook (Dialectica) that focused on logic and the technical language of Greek theology; a "century" on heresies* – 80 chapters of an epitome of Epiphanius's* Panarion, supplemented by 20 chapters of John's own composition, the last of which was on Islam; and a "century" summarizing the essential points of the Christian faith (On the Orthodox Faith, or Expositio fidei) on the doctrines of God* and the Trinity*, creation* (including a great deal of astronomical, geographical, physiological, and psychological learning), Christology*, and various points concerned with Christian worship, the sacraments*, icons*, and the last things (see Eschatology Cluster). This concluding treatise was translated into many languages, including Latin, in which form it provided valuable access to Greek patristic theology for the Scholastics and later Western theologians up to Schleiermacher*.

John also wrote three treatises (including On the Divine Images) against Byzantine Iconoclasm* (under Leo* V), which contained a classical defense of the place of icons* in Christian worship, based principally on the doctrine of the Incarnation*. This was translated into Slavonic in the early modern period and provided an Orthodox defense of religious painting against Calvinist Protestantism. ANDREW LOUTH

John of Ephesus (c507–89), also known as John of Asia. An energetic ascetic* leader of the Miaphysites*; founder and archimandrite* of the monastery at Sycae near Constantinople. Of Northern Mesopotamian origin, ordained as a deacon, and titular bishop of Ephesus (though he never resided there), he was an important historian and a major leader of the persecuted “underground” church organized by Jacob* Baradaeus. KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

John Paul II, Pope (1978–2005), born Karol Wojtyła (1920) in Wadowice, Poland, educated at Jagellonian University, at the secret seminary housed in the archbishop’s palace during World War II, and in Rome after World War II. He wrote poetry, a number of plays, and some theatrical criticism. His philosophical doctoral dissertation was later published as The Acting Person. He taught for a time at the University of Lublin and was made assistant bishop, then archbishop of Cracow (1963). The first non-Italian pope* since 1522, he had the second longest pontificate in history, marked by a somewhat conservative theology combined with a vigorous defense of human* rights. He produced a large number of encyclicals*, including three on Catholic social doctrine (see Social Encyclicals), and gave support to the Polish trade union Solidarity as it successfully confronted the Communist regime. He traveled more than any pope before him, and was the first pope to enter a synagogue* and visit a Muslim country. His final years were marred by ill health, perhaps exacerbated by a wound from an assassination attempt (1981). More than 4 million people attended his lying-in-state; a large number of world leaders attended his funeral. Moves were made to declare him a saint shortly after his death. MICHAEL J. WALSH

John Scholasticos (c503–77), patriarch of Constantinople (from 565). Theologian and jurist, he compiled (c545) the earliest preserved version of the nomocanon that combined both canons of the church and imperial laws, reflecting the close relationship between the Eastern Orthodox* Church and the state.

John Scotus Eriugena, or Erigena (c810–c877). “Scotus” indicates that he was Irish, “Erigena” that he was born in Ireland. In Ireland he learned Greek and became acquainted with philosophy and theology; he went to France, probably because Ireland was vulnerable during the Viking raids, and became a resident scholar in the court of Charles the Bald at Laon. He seems never to have become either a monk or a cleric; thus he was free from certain kinds of ecclesiastical discipline and could be bolder in his philosophical speculation than others who were subject to such discipline. At the request of Charles, he translated the writings of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite, two works by Maximus* the Confessor, and On the Making of Man by Gregory* of Nyssa. His Periphyseon, or On the Division of Nature, is a daring speculative work. During the controversy over predestination* aroused by Gottschalk*, he defended freedom* in a highly speculative way.

John XXIII, Pope (1958–63), born Angelo Giuseppe Roncalli (1881) into a large peasant family in Sotto il Monte; studied in Bergamo and Rome; after ordination became secretary to the bishop of Bergamo. During World War I, he was a hospital orderly, then a chaplain, and entered the papal diplomatic service, going to Bulgaria*, Turkey*, and Greece* before being sent to Paris (1944). He was named cardinal (1955) and shortly afterward patriarch of Venice. After his election as pope* (1958), he summoned a general council (Second Vatican* Council) to update the Roman Catholic Church’s theology and mission. He greatly supported the movement for human* rights (see his encyclical* Pacem in Terris*, 1963) and Christian unity. His stances had a great impact, even on the Soviet Union, leading to his receiving in audience the son-in-law of the Soviet Communist Party’s general secretary. He was beatified* in 2000.

MICHAEL J. WALSH

Jonah, Book of, a popular biblical narrative, is complex and problematic. Who was the prophet? Is the story historical? When was it written? For what purpose? Is the present ending genuine? Why did Jonah start by running away? Why was he angry at the end? What are we to make of his being swallowed by a “whale”? Of his speaking Assyrian? Of a five-word (in Hebrew) discourse producing a massive conversion of a wicked empire? Of a tree growing in one night?

Jonah ben Amittai was an obscure prophet in the 8th c. BCE (2 Kgs 14:25; but is this verse decisive for dating the Book of Jonah?). The extraordinary events reported in Jonah are seen as divine interventions (cf. 3 Macc 6:8; Josephus*, Judean Antiquities, Book 9, 10:2). But modern scholars emphasize the fantastic elements of the document, its late linguistic features, and its anthological composition, and suggest the 4th–3rd c. BCE as a date. Indeed, the Book of Jonah interprets earlier traditions and is itself interpreted. The Gospels (Matt 12:38–41, 16:1–4; Luke 11:29–32) speak of “the sign of Jonah,” in which one recognizes Jesus’ message, death, and resurrection (cf. Christian sarcophagi and catacombs*).

Read symbolically – for the church fathers, Jonah is a type of the Messiah* (see Typology) – would the book denounce Israel's "narrowness" regarding the nations (see Gentiles)? Jonah refuses to "evangelize" Israel's notorious oppressors and is incensed by their conversion, which shames Israel's obduracy. Spared by God, Nineveh will destroy Israel in 721. Does God's universalistic justice* amount to a historic injustice? The book balks at giving a definitive answer and ends on a question mark (4:9–11).

ANDRÉ LACOCQUE

Joncoux, Françoise-Marguerite de (1668–1715), Jansenist* activist, spiritual writer. Born in Paris, Joncoux defended the Jansenist cause persecuted by Louis XIV. In the publication process, she was a link between theologians, such as Pasquier Quesnel, exiled in the Netherlands, and the Parisian Jansenist world, where she hosted gatherings that included theologians like Jacques-Joseph Duguet. She collaborated on the Histoire abrégée du jansénisme (1697) and, with Quesnel, on the Histoire du cas de conscience (1703). Speaking out for Port-Royal, she coordinated attempts to save the convent before its destruction (1709). She spent her last years fighting the anti-Jansenist bull Unigenitus (1713).

MITA CHOUDHURY

Jordan. The Hashemite kingdom of Jordan, whose royal family successfully steers a balanced political course in the Middle East, guarantees its minority of Christians (about 4% of the population) freedom of worship and freedom of conversion – a socially difficult issue in most countries with a Muslim majority.

The majority of Christians in Jordan belong to the Greek Orthodox* and Greek-Catholic (Melkite*) churches; smaller groups belong to the Syriac* Orthodox Church or the Armenian* Apostolic Church, or are Roman Catholics and Protestants. Christianity seems to be growing, partly because of the increasing number of Evangelical* (especially Seventh-day Adventist*), Pentecostal*, and Charismatic* converts, but also because of the immigration of a considerable number of Christians from Iraq*, mainly from the Chaldean* Church.

Christianity has been present in the region at least since the 4th c. (when the area around Mount Nebo, near Madaba, became an important site of pilgrimage). Western Protestant and Catholic missions put their mark on the Christian landscape in the 19th c., mainly winning over Orthodox Christians to Uniatism* (Melkites) or Protestantism, but also converting smaller groups of Muslim Bedouins. From 1948 the Jordanian royal family acted as protectors of the holy places in Jerusalem and Bethlehem. Israel's occupation of the "West Bank" and East Jerusalem made this more difficult and caused many Palestinians – including many Orthodox, and Lutheran Christians – to migrate to Jordan.

More than in other Middle Eastern countries, there is an official dialogue between Muslims and Christians (see Dialogue, Interfaith), supported by the royal family (cf. the Royal Institute for Inter-Faith Studies, Amman). This is part of a general atmosphere of mutual tolerance and acceptance, often attributed to the shared tribal background of Christians and Muslims. See Islam and Christianity Cluster: In the Middle East.

Statistics: Population (2000): 6.7 million (M). Christians, 0.27 M, 4.1% (Orthodox, 2.0%; Roman Catholics, 0.7%; independents, 1.2%; Protestants, 0.2%; Anglicans, 0.1%); Muslims, 93.5%; atheists, nonreligious, 2.5%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

HELEEN L. MURRE-VAN DEN BERG

Joseph, Husband of Mary, the mother of Jesus, was praised as a just and righteous man, a son of David (Matt 1:19–20; cf. Luke 1:27, 2:4). An angel of the Lord visited him three times, guiding him to take Mary as his wife, to travel to Egypt for safety, and to take his family to Israel (Matt 1:20, 2:13, 2:19). A carpenter (Matt 13:55), Joseph remains obscure, although he is discussed in apocryphal* writings: the Gospel of James, the Gospel of the Nativity of the Virgin Mary, the Story of Joseph the Carpenter, and the Life of the Virgin and Death of Joseph. The Gospel of Mark does not mention him.

JEFFERY C. DAVIS

Joseph, Son of Jacob and Rachel, sold into slavery by his brothers, eventually rising to power in Egypt as a result of his ability to interpret dreams (Gen 37, 39–50). The Dead* Sea Scrolls view Joseph as the ideal person. Justin* Martyr, Tertullian*, and Irenaeus* identify Joseph as a type of Christ; Ambrose* devoted an entire book to this concept (see Typology). Athanasius* considers Joseph to be a model of godly faithfulness*. Joseph's story significantly exemplifies the providence of God* (e.g. Gen 45:5, 45:7–8, 50:20) and presents an example of one who resists temptation (Gen 39). The NT recognizes Joseph as a person of faith* (Heb 11:22).

JEFFRY C. DAVIS

Josephus, Flavius (37–c100), Judean priest, statesman, soldier, historian, immersed in Greek culture. His writings were exploited by Christian writers for background to the NT and theological proof of divine wrath* against Israel. He served as a general in the war against Rome, was captured (67), and was eventually freed because he predicted that Vespasian and Titus would become emperors (69). After Jerusalem's fall (70), he traveled to Rome with Titus (71) and there wrote Judean War (70s), Judean Antiquities with Life (93/94), and Against Apion.

Writing against the backdrop of celebration by the Flavian dynasty (69–96) of victory in Judea, Josephus challenged the image of his nation as rebellious by showing its admirable character. His presentation of the causes and course of the war and the nation's origins and age-old constitution dismisses hostile accounts of these. The old picture of Josephus as Flavian mouthpiece is not defensible.

Josephus's works were preserved in Christian circles, as a companion to the Gospels. Origen* and Eusebius* quoted his portrait of Jerusalem's* sufferings, allegedly fulfilling gospel predictions of woe in retribution for the city's rejection of Jesus; his references to Jesus*, James*, and John* the Baptist; and his information about conditions in Judea* and Galilee*. Known not to be a Christian, Josephus was valued as a reliable, independent witness of Jerusalem's fall and as the unquestioned authority on NT background. See also HEGESIPPUS (PSEUDO-).

Joshua, Book of, presents Israel's conquest and occupation of the land of Canaan as having taken place in obedience to divine commands and in fulfillment of divine promises.

Joshua underwent a complex process of composition, during which diverse materials and traditions were assembled, edited, and expanded over time for inclusion within the Deuteronomistic* History (7th–6th c. BCE).

The book constructs a sense of Israelite identity by rendering its story in the distinctive idiom of Deuteronomy*. It accentuates God's initiative in choosing Israel, fighting its battles, and giving it the land. It also demonstrates that the unity of Israel, obedience to the commandments of Moses, and separation from other peoples are essential to the achievement of God's promises. This depiction is undercut, however, by a counternarrative that recounts internal squabbles, transgressions of the commandments, agreements with the indigenous peoples, and failure to occupy their lands.

The intricate interplay between divine grace* and human obedience configures the book's plot, which portrays God's faithfulness and power while exemplifying the vigorous faith* called for in response. Its account of divinely ordained conquest, however, confronts the reader with disturbing questions of war*, ethnic violence*, oppression*, and dispossession – and God's* implication in them.

Early Christian interpreters saw Joshua as a foreshadowing of the work of Christ (Heb 4:8–9; Barnabas* 12:8–9) or read the book as an allegory* of the war against sin* or evil*. During the era of Western colonialism*, Joshua influenced the construction of national mythologies of election and destiny, and the legitimization of programs of militarism, dispossession, and ethnic cleansing.

DANIEL HAWK

Josiah, king of Judah (640–609 BCE). While renovating the Temple in Jerusalem, workers found a “book of the Torah*” (2 Kgs 22:8), probably Deuteronomy*. Following its commands, Josiah destroyed all places of Canaanite (and syncretistic*?) worship and centralized the sacrifices in Jerusalem. Christian interpreters through the centuries have seen Josiah as a significant example of a ruler concerned with the purification of religion (see Erastianism).

Jovinian (d c405), a monk who argued that virginity* is not a higher state than marriage*, attacked the belief that some modes of life gain a higher heavenly reward, and shared Helvidius's* denial of the perpetual virginity of Mary. He was condemned as a heretic* by synods in Rome (392) and Milan (393).

Juana Inés de la Cruz, Sister. See ASBAJE Y RAMÍREZ, JUANA INÉS DE.

Jubilee, Year of, presented in Lev 25, comes at the end of a cycle of seven sabbatical years (the 50th year, 25:11), when all Israelites enslaved for debt are set free and returned to their families, and the lands that had been taken over by others are returned to the original families. The Jubilee reflects a theologically significant socioeconomic perspective. “The land shall not be sold in perpetuity, for the land is mine [God]; with me you are but aliens and tenants” (25:23). As resident aliens before God (see Refugees as a Theological Concept and an Ethical Issue) and as God’s freed slaves (freed from Egypt; 25:42, 55), Israelites are not to make slaves* of each other (25:39, 42); those enslaved for debt should be freed. Although there is no evidence that the Jubilee system was ever implemented, its themes of liberation* and restoration were emphasized by the prophets (e.g. Isa 35, 42, 58, 61) and shaped the hope* for the messianic redemption* and restoration* and the challenge for justice* to the oppressed* – including, in the NT, Jesus’ proclamation of the Kingdom*, most explicitly in Luke 4:16–30. Contemporary Christians struggling for justice* for the economically oppressed underscore the importance of the Jubilee view of the land*, just as Liberation* theologians call for the liberation and restoration of the oppressed.

DANIEL PATTE

Jubilees, Book of, Jewish OT pseudepigraphon (early 2nd c. BCE.; Qumran fragments confirm its antiquity). Ascribed to Moses and recounting biblical history from creation until the giving of the Law, this history is divided into periods of 50 years (“Jubilees”) and enriched with many apocryphal traditions. Once an important source of Byzantine chronology, the Book of Jubilees is now fully preserved only in the Ethiopian* Church and provides examples of retold sacred history and typology*. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. JOHANNES TROMP

Judah, fourth son of Jacob* and Leah*; also, the tribe descended from Judah and the territory occupied by this tribe in Southern Palestine, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean, where it encountered the Philistines*. After the division of the kingdom, the southern portion (including the territory of Benjamin) was called Judah. This usage continued after the Exile*; hence the inhabitants were called Jews, and their religion Judaism*.

Ancient Judaism, the New Testament, and Early Christianity. Christianity arose as a messianic movement within Palestinian Judaism. Jesus and his disciples were Jews, at home in the teachings, practices, experiences, and hopes of their people. Understanding the rise of Christianity requires taking into account the writings and archeological remains of contemporary Jewish religion and culture, and scrutinizing how the NT writers adopted, transformed, or discarded their Jewish heritage.

First-century Judaism was diverse, indeed a plurality of “Judaisms,” including those of the Sadducees*, Pharisees*, Essenes*, and other apocalyptic* groups. Yet these diverse groups had common elements. Central to the Jews’ self-identity was their belief in their election*: the one true God had chosen them and accepted them into a unique relationship of reciprocal fidelity (faithfulness; see Faith #1). Their vocation* – their responsibilities within this covenant* – was laid out in the divinely revealed Torah* (“instruction” and “Law” – much more than simply a legal code; see Law), and they believed that their God would reward and punish their obedience and disobedience. By the turn of the era, most Jews accepted as the authoritative repository of sacred tradition most of what was becoming the HB, also available in Greek translation, the Septuagint* (LXX). The Jerusalem Temple was a major religious institution, a place where priests offered daily sacrifices* for the nation, people brought sacrifices of thanksgiving for blessings received, and other sacrifices atoned for sin.

These points of commonality, however, were expressed in a cultural, intellectual, social, and religious pluralism; and there were outright sectarian* dissenters, among whom the Jesus movement can be placed. Although most biblical texts applied the notion of election to the nation as a whole, some Jews such as the Qumran* Essenes* and other Apocalyptic Jews limited the terms "Israel" and "the chosen" to their own group. For them Torah was their particular revealed interpretation of the Mosaic laws, and since they alone could properly obey divine law, only they would receive divine blessing and salvation* from sin* and evil* (viewed as a power, in a dualistic perspective; see Apocalypticism Cluster: Beginnings in Judaism and Christianity).

In these apocalyptic sectarian groups, the view of the nature of blessing and salvation varied widely and stood in sharp contrast to that of other strands of Judaism, for which blessing might be experienced as a prosperous and happy life and salvation was not really an appropriate concept. In the midst of suffering and unjust death, Apocalyptic Jews anticipated blessing and salvation in a resurrection* or a blessed existence in heaven*. The agent of salvation might be God, an angel, a heavenly figure called the "Son* of man," or the anointed king (Messiah*) in a restored Davidic dynasty. The Qumran Essenes and parts of 1 Enoch* rejected the viability of the Temple cult and criticized its priesthood. A true high priest, the anointed one of Aaron, had yet to appear. One could atone for sin through almsgiving and other righteous deeds and through rituals of self-abasement and purification.

Such beliefs were expressed in a wide variety of sectarian writings. Noteworthy are the apocalyptic* books, which claimed to transmit revelations that a notable figure of the past (Enoch*, Daniel*, Moses*, or Ezra*) received from a heavenly revealer. Beliefs constituted communities of like-minded people, often persecuted minorities, who gathered to reinforce their beliefs and pursue a God-pleasing lifestyle. Some groups (e.g. the Essenes, and the authors and readers of 1 Enoch), claiming revelation through visions or inspired interpretation of Scripture*, believed that the end-time and the moment of their deliverance was near.

Early Christianity is best viewed as such a sectarian movement. Inspired by the revelatory appearances of the risen Jesus, and informed by their own interpretation of Scripture, the earliest disciples announced that the end of the age was at hand and that Jesus would return from heaven as God's judge. Alongside their belief in resurrection (of Jesus and later of Christians), they drew many of their symbols, institutions, and practices from their Jewish context, not least the identity, titles, and functions applied to Jesus. Even their belief that non-Jews (Gentiles*) could become members of God's people has a Jewish parallel (1 Enoch, based on prophetic texts of the HB). But whether non-Jews were bound to obey the Torah was vigorously debated. Some Christians continued to observe the Torah's prescriptions into the 2nd c. (see Ebionites; Judaizers; Nazarenes, Gospel of the). Others, like Paul*, strongly opposed the necessity of Torah obedience for Gentile Christians (although he left open the possibility of Torah obedience for Jewish Christians). Still others, like Matthew*, sought a middle ground. Essential to the 1st-c. church was the conviction that Jesus of Nazareth, crucified and raised from the dead, variously identified as Christ (Messiah), Son of man, Son* of God, or Lord*, was the end-time agent of God's beneficent activity. Strands of early Christianity espoused a supersessionist* perspective, understanding themselves to be the new Israel that replaced the old Israel as God's chosen; these Christians excluded from their community Jews who continued to find their religious center in the Torah rather than in Jesus; they interpreted the Roman destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple (70 CE) as God's judgment on the nation that largely had not accepted Jesus as Christ. Yet, the only witness to the history of earliest Christianity, the NT, is striking for its Jewish character, even as the Gospels express antipathy toward Jews who did not believe in Jesus as Christ. See also DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

Judaism and Christianity: Christian Views. Christianity grew out of Jewish monotheism* and the traditions of Judaism as they existed 2,000 years ago.

Although Jesus* of Nazareth came to be understood as the founder of Christianity, he did not intend to start a new religion. Jesus was a practicing Jew, and he died as one. His original followers were practicing Jews. Following Jewish traditions, Jesus' teachings emphasized love* of one's neighbor, the need for repentance*, and liberation* for the oppressed*. Although he rejected violence, Jesus suffered a violent death when Pontius Pilate*, the Roman governor of Palestine, executed him as an expedient way to stop the political upheaval that Jesus and his followers might cause. Roman, not Jewish, power put Jesus to death by crucifixion*.

Jesus' death left his followers dismayed and scattered. Jesus probably would have been a mere footnote to history if his Jewish disciples had not come to believe that Jesus had been resurrected from death, that he was the Messiah* promised in Jewish tradition, and that he was the Son* of God.

Most Jews did not share these beliefs. Nevertheless, Paul*, with his Jewish prophetic view of mission to Gentiles (non-Jews), and others had greater success in sharing the Christian faith with the Gentiles of the Mediterranean world. When the Romans destroyed Jerusalem (70 CE), the small, struggling sect within Judaism was on its way to becoming the Christian religion that would gain cultural dominance in Western civilization.

The divorce between Christianity and Judaism was not a happy one. Although Christianity's power grew in the West, especially from the 4th c., Jewish belief and practice persisted as counter-testimony to Christianity's most basic claims. Christians could not accept the Jewish interpretation of events surrounding Jesus of Nazareth. Christians embraced what Jews rejected: that Jesus is Lord*, the Messiah, and that the revelation given to the Jewish patriarchs, Abraham*, Isaac*, and Jacob*, to Moses*, and to the prophets prefigured and was fulfilled in Jesus. Thus Christianity historically understood itself to be the religion God intended Judaism to be, but, allegedly owing to a failure of understanding or will, the Jews were incapable of receiving God's most precious gift, Jesus as Lord.

A structured, official Christian position toward Jews and Judaism eventually emerged, which scholars identified as a "teaching of contempt." This adversus Judaeos literature (patristic writings directed against the Jews and Judaism; 2nd to 6th c.) began with Apologists*, such as Justin* Martyr (Dialogue with Trypho) and Tertullian* (Adversus Judaeos) and continued with other church fathers such as John* Chrysostom (Orations against the Jews) and Augustine* (although later in his life he adopted a more positive view of Judaism). This anti-Judaism teaching of contempt achieved ever greater influence as Christian authority and Roman power joined hands, leading to an essentially Christian civilization in the West.

The anti-Judaic teaching of contempt, vestiges of which remain, pivots around supersessionism (Lat supersedere, "to sit above," "to replace"). Supersessionism's defining convictions include the following: God's revelation in Jesus Christ surpasses the revelation to Israel; the NT fulfills the OT; Judaism is an overly legalistic religion; Christians replace the Jews as God's people; Jews neither heeded the prophets' warnings nor understood the prophecies about Jesus; and the Jews were Christ killers, guilty of the crime of deicide.

Contemporary Christianity strives to repudiate any "teaching of contempt" toward Jews and Judaism, but this change in attitude took place only after European Jewry was nearly destroyed in the Holocaust* unleashed by Nazi Germany and its allies. As Christians came to realize that their tradition's anti-Jewish hostility implicated Christianity in the Holocaust, much-needed reform of Christian understanding about the Jewish tradition got under way. That reformation remains a work in progress. Supersessionism is in question, but it has not been eradicated. Yet Christian-Jewish relations in the 21st c. are arguably the best they have been for two millennia. See also ANTI-JEWISH, ANTI-JUDAISM; ANTI-SEMITISM; HOLOCAUST, JEWISH (OR SHOAH); SUPERSESSIONISM.

JOHN K. ROTH

Judaism and Christianity: Jewish Views.

Christianity and Judaism have a unique relationship, not least because Jesus was born, lived, and died a Jew. The first Christians were Jews, and it was centuries later that Christianity and Judaism parted ways. By the completion of the Talmud (c500), Judaism and Christianity had diverged (see Birkath ha-Minim) and Jewish* Christianity ceased to exist. Nevertheless, Christians and Jews remained (and remain) intricately connected through their claim to follow the same Scriptures*. What Christians call “Old* Testament” and Jews “Tanakh” is mostly the same, although they interpret Scripture quite differently – thus the aphorism “Jews and Christians are divided by a common Bible.”

The main theological divide concerns Christian claims about the divinity of Jesus*. Gradually the church came to view Judaism as the outdated people of Israel, which had been replaced by the new and true people of Israel, the church. Yet many Christians in the early centuries attended synagogue services. Church leaders (e.g. John* Chrysostom, c350–407) complained bitterly about their attendance and delivered vitriolic sermons against Judaism (creating a literary genre, adversus Judaeos), insisting that Jews did not understand the OT. Augustine* (354–430) portrayed Jews as children of Cain*, whose dispersion was God’s punishment; yet Jews served as witnesses to Christian truth and were not to be harmed.

Once Christianity was established as the official religion of the Roman Empire (late 4th c.), the Jews’ situation became more difficult. However, this was a gradual process, because the energy of Christian Europe was directed toward defeating pagans and Christian heretics. Nevertheless, the Justinian* Code (529–53) removed many Jewish rights and legitimized the closure of synagogues* as well as forced baptisms (despite some church opposition).

Judaism was a minority in both the Islamic world and Christendom*; Jews thus asked themselves why God allowed these faiths to flourish. One view was that Christianity was a form of idolatry*, perhaps not in the full biblical sense but because of inherited patterns of idolatrous worship. Another approach categorized Christianity in terms of the Noachide laws (see Noah), which formulated moral standards without a demand for conversion to Judaism. Judah ha-Levi (1075–1141) and Maimonides* (1135–1204) viewed Christianity as preparing the way for nations to worship the God of Israel and thus redemption*. Menahem ha’-Meiri (1249–1316) even argued that Christianity should be understood as a form of monotheism* and coined the phrase “nations bound by the ways of religion” to relax certain rabbinic laws and allow for a more fruitful interaction between Jews and Christians.

From c1100, as Christendom became more homogeneous, Jews were seen as one of the last “different” groups. Jews were accused of the ritual murder of Christian children, host* desecration, and causing the Black Death, all such accusations usually leading to group executions. Dominicans* and Franciscans* were fiercely anti-Jewish and implemented the Inquisition*, burned thousands of Jewish books (Paris, 1240), preached conversionist sermons at which Jewish attendance was compelled, held enforced public disputations (Paris, 1240; Barcelona, 1263), accused Jews of “blood libel” (using human blood in rituals, 1246, 1475), and promoted the wearing of a distinctive badge by Jews (authorized by the Fourth Lateran Council, 1215). By the 16th c., Jews had been expelled from most of Western Europe.

Jews therefore viewed the Reformation* as a positive development, partly because it diverted Christian attention away from Judaism and partly because the Protestant return to the HB contributed to a rise in messianic fervor among Jews. Despite its early promise, however, the Reformation continued the Christian “teaching of contempt.”

A shift in Jewish attitudes toward Christianity can be noted following the Enlightenment* and Jewish emancipation. Reform Judaism figures such as Abraham Geiger (1810–74) embraced the Jewishness of Jesus, and even some Orthodox Jews argued that Jesus embodied the essence of Judaism. It was not a huge step for Martin Buber* (1878–1965) to call Jesus his “elder brother.”

At the same time, Jews continued to hold negative views of Christianity as a result of continuing anti-Jewish prejudice and the rise of anti-Semitism*. The Enlightenment doctrine that, while society could be remade, certain persons were beyond redemption provided the basis for modern racism* and reached a crescendo during the Nazi* period and the Holocaust*. The rise of Nazism, the Holocaust*, and especially the failure of the churches from 1933 to 1945 resulted in anger toward and distrust of Christianity.

The reassessment of Christian attitudes toward Judaism in modern times – e.g. in the writings of James Parkes (1896–1981) and Robert Travers Herford (1860–1950) – and after the Holocaust slowly brought about deep-seated theological changes. Consideration of the Roman Catholic Church’s “teaching of contempt” for the Jewish people was placed on the Second Vatican Council’s agenda by Pope John* XXIII (1881–1963) at the urging of Jules Isaac (1877–1963) and resulted in Nos-stra Aetate (1965). Its insistence that “Jews should not be presented as rejected...by God” was a significant turning point for the Roman Catholic Church. When Pope John* Paul II (1920–2005) led the Vatican to recognize the state of Israel* (1994) and made a pilgrimage to the Holy Land (2000), he overturned centuries of teaching that tied Jewish eviction from their land* to their sinful rejection of Christ. Yet the Church was still not seen as guilty of any error or wrongdoing.

Since 1970 mainline Protestant churches have adopted positive views of Judaism and rejected supersessionism*. The Evangelical Church of the Rhineland’s 1980 document asserted that Jews were permanently elected as God’s people and that the church was taken into this covenant* with God through Jesus Christ the Jew.

The change in modern Jewish attitudes toward Christianity took place more slowly, partly owing to suspicion about Christian motives and the legacy of the “teaching of contempt.” Nevertheless, the publication of Dabru Emet (2000), a cross-denominational statement exploring the place of Christianity in Jewish terms, represents the most positive portrait of Christianity in many centuries. However, for many Jews, Christianity is unimportant to their Jewish identity, except in their opposition to anti-Semitism and support for the state of Israel.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Interactions

Judaism and Christianity in North America. In the predominantly Christian North American countries (in 2007, Christians constituted c80% of 300 million residents in the USA, 95% of 107 million in Mexico*, 70% of 33 million in Canada*), there are about 6.4 million Jews (slightly more than 2% of the population) in the USA (a total that rivals the Jewish population of Israel*), between 40,000 and 50,000 Jews in Mexico, and about 330,000 Jews (1% of the population) in Canada. Most North American Jews have ancestors who fled European anti-Semitism and persecution.

Christianity’s dominance in North America originated from 15th- to 16th-c. European colonization*. Roman Catholicism was especially strong in Spanish territories that became modern-day Mexico and the southwestern United States; in Maryland, one of England’s Atlantic colonies; and in northern regions controlled by France until the 18th-c. British conquest that eventually brought Canada into existence. Protestant Christianity achieved hegemony in most of the 13 British colonies that declared their independence from England (1776) and created the USA by framing and ratifying a federal constitution (1787 and 1789, respectively).

The earliest North American Jews included so-called conversos. Forcibly converted to Christianity during the Inquisition, they went to Nueva España (present-day Mexico) in the 16th c., where, despite persecution, many secretly maintained their Jewish traditions. Other early Jewish arrivals in North America were Spanish-Portuguese Jews who fled from Brazil to Dutch New Amsterdam (1654). Governor Peter Stuyvesant sought to bar them from the colony, but his superiors at the Dutch West India Company overruled him. In 1658 a Jewish group from Barbados established a community in Newport, Rhode Island, where Roger Williams's* leadership fostered an unusual degree of religious toleration. George Washington, the first US president, was welcomed at Newport's Touro Synagogue (1790). His response underscored the notion that the US government "gives to bigotry no sanction, to persecution no assistance."

Washington's words are engraved in the United States Holocaust* Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., but anti-Semitism* akin to Stuyvesant's 17th-c. hostility has not disappeared. In 2006, for example, more than 900 anti-Semitic incidents were reported in Canada, the highest level in 25 years. In another 2006 report, the American Jewish Committee found that 26% of American Jews took anti-Semitism to be a "very serious problem" in the USA. Another 65% identified it as "somewhat of a problem," while less than 10% stated that anti-Semitism was "not a problem at all." JOHN K. ROTH

Judaism and Christianity in Western Europe.

While Christianity has long been the dominant religion in Europe, Jews have also lived in one European country or another for much of the past 2,000 years. The Christianization of the Roman Empire put Jews in the precarious situation of a minority, although at first their economic activity was not restricted and they could be found in all professions. However, hostile and popular prejudice against Jews grew, later fed by the "blood libel," which originated in England with the case of William of Norwich (1144) when Jews were falsely accused of reenacting the Crucifixion by murdering a Christian child on Easter. During the Crusades*, mob violence inspired by Christian preaching prevailed and Jews suffered; they were expelled from the guilds, and their professional opportunities were greatly diminished. With the Roman Catholic Church prohibition of usury* by Christians, making loans with interest and pawnbroking became the main occupation of Jews.

There were exceptions, such as the convivencia (living together), i.e. the relatively harmonious coexistence of Jews, Christians, and Muslims in medieval Spain* and Portugal*. However, the later medieval period (13th–15th c.) was characterized primarily by the widespread expulsion of Jews, signaling the social decline of the Jewish communities in Western Europe. The center of Jewish life gravitated to Eastern Europe and Turkey. In Paris in 1242, a "Talmud trial" took place and 24 cartloads of the Talmud were burned, marking the decline of Talmudic study, which had been stimulated by scholars such as Rashi; this culminated in the expulsion of French Jews in 1394, although the Jews of Avignon, known as "the pope's Jews," were spared a similar fate by papal intervention and flourished.

The Reformation* led to more positive attitudes toward Jews among Christians. The humanist tradition emphasized the enduring qualities of Jewish religious teaching, although the ensuing religious wars also gave rise to anti-Jewish violence, partly inspired by Luther's* tractate On the Jews and Their Lies (1543), but there were smaller philo-Semitic Christian reform movements, such as that of the Anabaptists*.

Modernity* and the Enlightenment* brought the equalization of the civil status of Jews with that of Christians, but many Jews sought equality with Christians through baptism. The poet Heinrich Heine, for example, saw his baptismal certificate as an "entry ticket to society."

During the 19th c., some Jews took their place in European high society, but there was also an increase in anti-Semitism, demonstrated by the Dreyfus affair, the trial and court-martial for treason of French Jewish captain Alfred Dreyfus (1859–1935), found guilty by anti-Semitic army officers on the basis of forged documents and banished to life imprisonment. The affair motivated Theodor Herzl to write The Jewish State in 1896 and eventually led to the 1905 law separating church* and state in France*.

An influx in Western Europe of impoverished Jewish refugees* fleeing from persecution in Russia increased the Jewish population, e.g. in the UK, from about 25,000 in 1881 to 350,000 in 1914. Even before the rise of the Nazis, some British Christians, such as James Parkes, recognized Christian responsibility for anti-Semitism* and organized dialogue began. Many British Jewish leaders and some Christians were strong supporters of Zionism.

The destruction of European Jewry from 1933 to 1945 resulted in an awareness among Christians of the immensity of the burden of guilt that the Christian Church carried not only for its general silence, with some noble exceptions, but also because of its many centuries of “teaching of contempt” toward Jews and Judaism.

Through soul searching, many Christians in Europe began the painful process of reexamining Christian sources and institutions. Notably the Vatican, the World* Council of Churches, and most Protestant denominations have issued declarations against the perpetuation of anti-Jewish teaching. The Holocaust* not only caused Christianity to reassess its relationship with Judaism but also stirred greater Jewish interest in Christianity and Jewish participation in dialogue*, exemplified perhaps by Chief Rabbi Sir Jonathan Sacks’ contribution through numerous influential books and lectures.

Dangers of division and violence remain, including a potential spillover from Middle East conflicts involving Israel and divisions resulting from the efforts of some Christians to convert Jews. Yet there are friendly relations between many leaders of Jewish and Christian communities and between local churches and synagogues. See also HOLOCAUST, JEWISH (OR SHOAH); ISRAEL.

Judaizers (from Gk Ioudaizo, Gal 2:14, “to live like Jews”), Jewish Christians (more precisely, followers of Christ of Jewish origin) for whom the observance of the Law of Moses (circumcision, dietary laws, etc.) was a necessary part of being a follower of Christ Jesus, whether one was Jewish or Gentile in origin. They were welcomed by at least some of the (Gentile) Galatians. Some Jewish Christians – among whom were Peter*, James*, and primarily James’s followers in Jerusalem (whom Paul, another Jewish Christian, opposed, Gal 2; in contrast to Acts 10–11) – refused to eat with Gentiles who did not observe the Law. Addressed at the “Council of Jerusalem” (Gal 2:1–10; Acts 18:22 [or Acts 15, or 11:30]), this issue was not truly resolved, as ongoing conflicts suggest. With the disappearance of the Christian community in Jerusalem during the Jewish–Roman war (67–70), the issue lost significance rather than being addressed, even though Jewish Christians are still mentioned by Ignatius* of Antioch and Justin* Martyr (early 2nd c.) and formed two major movements: the Nazarenes* and the Ebionites*. Yet addressing this issue might have helped with the question of the relationship between Judaism* and Christianity.

DANIEL PATTE

Judas, Gospel of, a 2nd-c. Gnostic* “revelation dialogue” between Jesus and his disciples, known by Irenaeus* but discovered only recently in a damaged Coptic manuscript and published (2006). Its major themes concern the transcendental realm, various false spiritual leaders, the origin of the cosmos, the creation and destiny of humanity, and the threat of the stars. Jesus, the revealer of right knowledge, frequently criticizes his disciples for misunderstanding. The only disciple who understands Jesus’ teaching is Judas Iscariot, who also hands him over to the authorities. Some scholars assume that this is because of his demonic character; others maintain that Judas is Jesus’ favorite disciple, who helps him escape his earthly body and conquer the powers of Hades.

ANTTI MARJANEN

Judas Iscariot, one of Jesus’ disciples. In the canonical Gospels, Judas is last in the lists of disciples (Mark 3:19; Matt 10:4; Luke 6:16) – the treasurer of the group (in John 12:6). Iscariot may indicate Judas’s hometown (“man from Karioth”). Judas handed Jesus over to Jewish authorities, identifying him with a kiss. Although his motivation remains ambiguous in Mark (14:10), in Matthew Judas acts out of love for money (26:15). In Luke (6:16, 22:3) and John (6:71, 13:2, 13:27), Judas is an agent of the devil*, consciously betraying his master. In Matthew (27:5), Judas repents and hangs himself. According to Luke, Judas bought land with the money of betrayal, fell, and died (Acts 1:18). According to Papias* (2nd c.), Judas swelled so much that he became wider than a carriage and finally burst.

The noncanonical Gospel of Judas* presents Judas as the disciple who best understands Jesus' teaching but who also turns him in to Jewish authorities. Scholars debate whether the text pictures him as Jesus' favorite disciple or as a demonic agent of the archons.

ANTTI MARJANEN

Jude, an apostolic letter of exhortation to Christians from the fictive author, Jude, a brother of Jesus (Mark 6:3) and James*, leader of Jewish Christians in Jerusalem (Acts 21:18). Christians must reject teachers who undermine traditional Christian beliefs. Its rhetorical style and polemic against heresy*, a development predicted by prophets and apostles, suggest a Greek-speaking author writing to second- and third-generation Christians. Examples of God punishing the unfaithful are taken from both Jewish Scriptures and traditions associated with Enoch*. If God "delivered his people out of Egypt, but later destroyed those who did not believe and the angels who did not keep their positions" (Jude 5–6), disloyal Christians can expect the same. 2 Peter* adopted Jude's warnings to bolster expectations of divine judgment*.

PHEME PERKINS

Judge, God as, God as the source of all human obligations, whether natural or revealed (see Law); the arbiter who judges human responsibility and guilt; the one who can justify* sinners* by declaring or making them righteous* (see Atonement); the one who denounces human, social, and ecological injustices that distort creation* (see Justice, Christian Theological Views and Practice, Cluster).

Judges, Book of, is a collection of stories about Israel's tribal period, when military leaders called "judges" ruled after Joshua's conquest of Canaan and before Israel became a monarchy (c1250–1020 BCE).

Judges is part of the Deuteronomistic* History (Joshua* to 2 Kings*), which was compiled from oral and written sources during the Babylonian Exile (6th c. BCE). This history tries to give a theological rationale for this traumatic event.

The rationale given in Judges is a disintegrating cycle of apostasy*, oppression*, repentance*, and liberation*. The Israelites demonstrate their lack of faithfulness* to God by worshipping the Canaanite god Baal and goddess Astarte. God dispatches a foreign oppressor. Israel cries out, and God sends a judge as deliverer. Peace rules the land until the judge dies and the cycle begins again. Religious and social chaos marks the end of the book: "There was no king in Israel; all the people did what was right in their own eyes" (Judg 21:25).

Although the book seems to be about male heroes, their decline is often expressed through their fractured relationships with women. Inter-marriage with foreign women seduces Israel into worshipping their gods, setting the theme for the book. Barak refuses to fight unless Deborah* accompanies him (Judg 4–5). The tyrant Abimelech is dishonored when a woman kills him (9). Jephthah gains military victory at the price of his daughter's life (11). Samson's* romantic entanglements with foreign women lead to his downfall (14–16). At the book's end, a Levite's wife is betrayed, gang-raped, and dismembered, and 400 more women are seized and raped to replenish a tribe, which atrocity sparks a civil war (19–21).

Judges is almost absent in the Christian lectionaries. However, the narrative power of its stories over the Christian imagination is evident in Western art (Rembrandt, Rubens, Doré), literature (Milton*), and music (Handel*, Saint-Saëns).

GALE A. YEE

Judgment, the act of distinguishing good from evil*. Whether it is the weighing of the heart in the Egyptian Book of the Dead, scrutiny of the naked soul* in Plato's Gorgias (525), or the meditations of an anxious psalmist, it is clear that the idea antedates Christianity. Belief in future judgment colors one's life. For John (3:18), those who do not believe are "judged already" or "condemned already," and Augustine* (City of God 20, 1) insists that God has been judging since the beginning of the world: by banishing the first parents from paradise* and casting the rebellious angels* from heaven*. Moreover, God judges the acts of individuals during their lives sometimes visibly, sometimes not, with punishment imposed either now or after death*. This judgment is a corollary to Providence: supervision includes chastisement (see Habakkuk, Book of). The visible punishment in this life harkens back to Deuteronomy's* threats against those who are disobedient. The Nicene*, Athanasian*, and Apostles'* Creeds agree on Christ's* coming to judge the living and the dead.

The very fact that a judgment is needed presupposes that, from God's perspective, something is wrong. The Bible presents various criteria for passing judgment. "For all of us must appear before the judgment seat of Christ [the eschatological* Judgment], so that each may receive compensation for what has been done in the body, whether good or evil" (2 Cor 5:10; also Rev 20:12–13). This Judgment concerns the way people treated “the least of these who are members of [Christ’s] family” (Matt 25:40, 45, NRSV), as well as the good or evil words they uttered (Matt 12:37). In Romans* the Law is inscribed in the heart, thoughts accuse and defend, and the conscience testifies. Thus “God will judge the secret thoughts of all” (Rom 2:15–16). Through the conscience, divine judgment supervises individual human judgment of moral options.

Some metaphors represent the idea of judgment: the separation of wheat from chaff, goats from sheep; cutting the vine from the root; inscription (or not) in the book of life. The Shepherd of Hermas (early 2nd c.) relates a vision in which a designer trims stones to fit a church under construction and casts away those that do not fit. Using an image from Zoroastrian eschatology, Pope Gregory I (d604) referred to a bridge over which souls pass insofar as their virtues* permit them to do so. If successful, they attain green meadows; if not, they fall into a stinking stream. Byzantine illuminators adapted the story of Jacob’s* ladder. The Judgment scenes on the tympana or inside the west walls of medieval churches portray Christ the Judge on his throne, right hand upraised to welcome the blessed, left hand turned down to repel the damned. Often (e.g. at Autun), the archangel Michael holds a scale, in whose pans he weighs the good and wicked deeds of each at the final reckoning. A competing idea locates judgment at a person’s death, during which one is assigned to heaven*, hell*, or purgatory*. In a popular image of individual judgment, angels* and demons* compete for the soul as it leaves the body at death.

Metaphors signifying judgment sometimes acquired literal application through penitential practices such as almsgiving*, charity* work, pilgrimages*, and crusades*. Eventually these penances could be commuted by the endowment of land or revenues, the subsidization of Masses in chantries*, or the purchase of indulgences*. Although Scholastic theologians insisted there could be no direct exchange of donations for credit in God’s eyes, the practices were widespread.

The Reformers’ insistence that works counted for nothing beside faith* and the free bestowal of grace* received some impetus from objections to these practices. For them predestination* makes divine judgment not a historical or lifelong process, but an aspect of eternal knowledge and will that is divine and, from a human, time-bound perspective, “prior” to creation. God’s freedom to save or damn, to make vessels for glory or for destruction (cf. Rom 9:21–23), is independent of any human effort. Human life, however, is still under the inscrutable judgment of God. See also DAMNATION; ETERNITY; HELL; PURGATORY; SALVATION; SON OF MAN.

ALAN E. BERNSTEIN

Judith, Deuterocanonical Book. With a name that means “Jewish woman” or “female Judean,” the character Judith has been read as an idealized embodiment of the Jewish nation. Like the “Judea Capta” images on Roman coins, the widowed Judith seems to represent the nation in the form of a bereft woman. Yet Judith is a childless widow* who does not weep for her husband or his unborn offspring. Ascetic* and pious, Judith fasts* more or less all the time, refuses all suitors, and successfully keeps the lascivious Holofernes at bay until she can decapitate him. Her bodily boundaries are represented as imperiled, as are the nation’s, but by vigilantly defending her own body, Judith single-handedly defends the boundaries of the nation as well. Taken up by European art of recent centuries as a story of the nation imperiled, the book has an ambiguous message about gender roles and women who break them. Judith accomplishes what none of the male council can do, but she does so by the powers emanating from her great beauty as much as by her wits and courage. See also BODY.

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Julian the Apostate (332–63), Roman emperor (361–63), nephew of Constantine* (emperor, 306–37), cousin of Constantius II (emperor, 337–61). Following the massacre of his family, he was educated under the forced tutelage of clergy in Constantinople and Cappadocia. Although he was baptized and served as a reader in the church, he also studied the classical tradition and became more sympathetic to it than to Christianity. Since he was technically a Christian, he was an “apostate” in Christian eyes. To cleanse himself of baptism*, he was initiated into the Eleusinian and Mithraic mysteries*. He was named Caesar in 355 and scored military successes in Gaul. Proclaimed emperor by the army in 360, he became sole ruler upon Constantius’s death in 361. He excluded Christians from teaching positions, encouraged traditional sacrifices, promised to rebuild the Temple in Jerusalem, and wrote diatribes against the “Galileans.” By letting all exiled bishops return, he increased Christian dissension, but he also made possible the reconciliation of conflicting parties in the disputes over the Trinity* at the Council of Alexandria* (362). He was killed in 363 during a campaign against the Persians.

EUGENE TESELLE

Julian Calendar. See CALENDARS.

Julian of Eclanum (c381–c454), Pelagian theologian, often depicted as a champion of independent inquiry in the face of dogmatism. When Pope Zosimus condemned Pelagianism* (418), Julian led the resistance. Zosimus excommunicated* him and 17 other bishops in Italy and Illyria (419). Emphasizing the permanent goodness of human nature, Julian accused Augustine* of Manichaeism* in asserting original* sin and called for a council to resolve the issues. But the excommunication was not lifted, despite his appeal in 439 to Pope Sixtus III (probably a repentant Pelagian).

Julian of Norwich (1343–c1416), theologian, visionary, anchorite* (by 1394), who lived in a cell in the Church of St. Julian in Norwich, England. Near death in 1373, Julian experienced a series of visions of Christ's Passion that she recorded in the first book written by an Englishwoman. She produced a short text, the Showings, a few years after the event; sometime after 1393, following two decades of intense meditation on the theological significance of her visions, she dictated a much longer version, Revelations of Divine Love.

Although it is unknown whether Julian was a recluse at the time of her visionary experience, she already had a reputation for sanctity (mentioned in the *Book of Margery Kempe) and led an intensely devotional life. As she wrote in Revelations of Divine Love (Chap. 2), she had previously "asked for three gifts from God: (i) to understand his passion; (ii) to suffer physically while still a young woman of thirty; and (iii) to have as God's gift three wounds...namely, the wound of true contrition*, the wound of genuine compassion*, and the wound of sincere longing for God" (see Faith #5). A year later, after paralysis resulting from a sudden illness and reception of the last rites, Julian experienced over the course of one day 15 visions about Christ's Passion, the doctrine of sin*, and the Trinity*. A 16th vision of the devil* attempting to frighten her took place in her sleep that night. Scholars have noted Julian's distinction between "ghostly sights" and "bodily sights" as a means to distinguish her visions from the suspect "corporeal" visions that could, according to medieval understanding, as easily be given by the devil as by God.

Julian's work is remarkable because it records the development of her theology from an intense visionary experience of the Passion to a Trinitarian theology in which she explores Jesus' role as the mother of humanity (see Motherhood). This development is apparent when one compares the two versions of the text. In the short text, Showings, Julian draws her authority from personal details about herself and her family that stamp her work as a record of an individual's visionary experience; but in Revelations of Divine Love, she omits personal references in favor of greater graphic detail about the Passion as well as extensive theological reflection on the Trinity (as Johnson shows). Julian notes the difference between the content of the vision and the revelation* of its meaning over her lifetime: "I... began to understand that every revelation was full of deep secrets. . . . The first quality is the literal meaning of the words as I then received them; the second is the inner significance that I have discovered since; the third is the whole revelation itself, which from beginning to end – cover[s] the contents of this book" (Revelations of Divine Love, Chap. 51). Julian offers a model of a visionary turned theologian (the transition between experience and doctrine) and is an important source of information about the religious options open to women in late medieval England.

Julian's most notable theological contribution stems from her consideration of the role of Jesus in the Trinity as a result of his role on earth in his Passion. For example, in Revelations of Divine Love (Chaps. 16, 17), Julian dwells on the state of Christ's flesh as it slowly desiccated. "I saw his dear face, dry, bloodless, and pallid... then, dead, it turned a blue color, gradually changing to a brownish blue, as the flesh continued to die. . . . At first, when the flesh was still fresh and bleeding... I could see that the dear skin and tender flesh... seemed about to drop off, heavy and loose... sagging like a cloth." Meditation on the events of Jesus' life and death was a late medieval phenomenon. But Julian was distinctive in moving from physical details to theological explorations, rather than focusing on the narrative of Christ's life alone. She attributes "fatherhood, motherhood, and lordship" to the Trinity, then posits that an understanding of the Trinity comes through a threefold process: an attention to anthropology* and human predicaments; and the revelation that "the great power of the Trinity is our Father, the deep wisdom our Mother, and the great love our Lord" (Revelations of Divine Love, Chap. 58). Julian unites the themes of the humanity of Christ and his role as mother in the Trinity by representing the compassion that led to Jesus' sacrifice as his mothering, nurturing quality: "But we make our humble complaint to our beloved Mother, and he sprinkles us with his precious blood. . . . And this sweet and lovely work he will never cease from doing until all his beloved children are born and delivered" (Revelations of Divine Love, Chap. 63).

JESSICA A. BOON

Juliana of Liège (c1192–1258). As an advocate of inaugurating a feast of Corpus* Christi, she experienced much opposition. A member and then superior of an Augustinian* convent near Liège, she was forced to leave because of her beliefs, becoming a recluse in the city. She gained the support of the archdeacon of Liège, the future pope Urban IV. The feast was observed once in Liège (1246), but she experienced much opposition and was exiled. Urban IV instituted the feast of Corpus Christi in 1246, after her death.

Junia (mid-1st c.), designated an apostle* and, with Andronicus, "outstanding among the apostles" by Paul (Rom 16:7). She was Paul's compatriot (a Jewess), imprisoned like Paul, and a Christian prior to Paul. Confirmed to be a woman by Origen (c185–254) and into the 12th c., and a wise woman with the "title of apostle" by John* Chrysostom (c349–407), she was canonized in Constantinople (608; feast day, May 17 in Eastern Orthodoxy*; her feast day has been officially observed in various Episcopal* dioceses since 1984).

Junia became a foil for gender issues. Giles* of Rome (c1245–1316) called Andronicus and Junia "men," and "Junia" became "Junias" (male) in critical editions of the Greek NT from 1927 to 1998, after which the name "Junia" was restored. She was a man in Luther's Bible; English translations normally read "Junia" until the late 19th c., then "Junias" until the late 1980s, after which "Junia" became dominant. The editorial change to "Junias" was supposedly justified grammatically by its designation as a contraction of the common name Junianus; but "Junias" has not been found to exist anywhere, nor could "Junianus" be contracted to "Junias." Grammatically, "outstanding among the apostles" signifies "prominent apostles," and not "well known to the apostles," as is often suggested when Junia is acknowledged to be a woman. Most often it was because of the bias that an apostle could not be a woman that Junia was turned into a male. See also BIBLE TRANSLATIONS CLUSTER. ELDON JAY EPP

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in Eastern Orthodox Christianity. Beyond varied understandings of justice, the Eastern Orthodox* Church tradition fundamentally holds that true justice has its source in God. God's justice is inherent in the Divine Nature, and is therefore complete and perfect. In the created world, only approximations of this justice can be comprehended or achieved.

In human terms, justice is not one of many virtues, but "the good" in itself, the harmony by which all elements of virtue are integrated in an appropriate way.

According to Scripture, a portion of Christ's mission is "to proclaim justice" (Matt 12:18); it is a sacred duty to "proclaim justice" (Heb 11:32), and it is evil to "neglect justice" (Luke 11:42). For Basil* (4th c.) human justice seeks to emulate divine justice, both as a means of rectifying the injustice in human relations (epanorthotike) and as a means of retribution (antapodotike), even though justice is difficult to comprehend and achieve (dys-theoriton). Because of “passions” (human imperfection expressed in sinful conditions and actions), it is a constant struggle to achieve justice, to give to all their due, and to reduce injustice, especially by challenging the powerful or attending to the needy (Homily 12.8).

In the past, challenging powerful political authorities took the form of written counsel on governance, which was directed primarily to the Byzantine emperors. Thus for the deacon Agapetos, “equity” was a key element of justice; rulers should keep their “mind fixed on equity . . . exemplifying humanity as a quality that is God-like” (Advice and Counsel, Chap. 40). Rulers should exercise justice on behalf of the weak, fatherless, poor*, widows*, and strangers*. Rulers are not above the law*; they are morally obligated to follow it themselves, thus conveying to the governed the importance of just behavior by all. Considerations of the parallel obligations of the rulers and the ruled are a condition for governing justly. The amount of power that rulers exercise ought to be in proportion to what is needed for the good of the governed. The goal of the rulers’ exercise of justice is to help the governed “advance in things good and not evil” (Chap. 46).

Eastern Orthodox Christians recognize all the aspects of justice that various philosophies identify: harmony, divine* command, natural* law, mutual agreement, and civil and economic treatment, coupled with the exercise of mercy* and compassion* (humanity). In Eastern Orthodoxy, all these aspects of justice are integrated into a holistic perception of the human sphere that reflects its origin and its roots in divine justice, i.e. in the Triune God.

STANLEY S. HARAKAS

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in Western Christianity. In Western Christian discussions of the question of justice, we can discern a trajectory, starting from Greek and Hebrew terms and concepts, which successively emphasized interhuman justice as divine command; the just individual; justice as a divine attribute over against sinful humanity; forensic justice in the nominalist* tradition; and a recovery of the sense of interhuman justice as the claim of the divine.

Interhuman Justice. The literature of ancient Israel, especially the Prophets* and the Psalms*, insisted on tsedeq and mishpat (Hebrew terms for “justice”) as the claim and command of the Divine. These terms function in parallel to indicate the imperative of interhuman, distributive justice (tsedeq) and the divine intervention to establish that justice through the vindication of the wrongly accused or the violated and vulnerable (mishpat). The denunciations of the absence of justice take the form of condemnations of the unbridled avarice and arrogance of the powerful.

From Interhuman Justice to the Just Individual. While the social and public character of the OT concern with justice is relatively noncontroversial, the NT reference to dikaioσύνη (translated as both “justice” and “righteousness”) has less often been associated with social relationships than with the individual’s relation to God.

Plato and Aristotle presented justice as the ideal characteristic of the good society or constitution, as well as the designation of the ideal character of the human being. Thus dike is the theme of Plato’s Republic, in which the ideal society and the appropriate character of the (aristocratic) human person are correlated. While social (interhuman) and individual justice were similar during the period of the city-state (a good city consists of good individuals), the emergence of the empire relegated the hope* for a just social order to the messianism characteristic of emergent forms of Judaism and Christianity, while the just person (apart from the social order) was the theme of Stoicism* and related movements.

Distributive Justice and the Just Individual. Patristic theologians like Basil* and Chrysostom*, relying on the Gospels*, insisted on a redistribution of wealth* as a condition of divinely mandated distributive justice (focusing on social justice). But Alexandrian* Christianity inherited the emphasis on justice as the attribute of a good person. This ran afoul of the growing sense of human incapacity for justice, especially in Augustine* and his heirs. Thus while God was just, humans could not be. The theme of retributive justice (God's just punishment* of sinful* humanity) became the background for an attempt to reconcile divine justice with mercy*.

Forensic or Nominal Justice. The idea of forensic or nominal justice responds to the problem of the apparent contradiction between justice and mercy through the notion that the judge may pronounce the verdict that a guilty person is innocent or at least will be regarded as if innocent (see Atonement #2). This appears to be a counterfactual claim that rests on the judge's sovereign power to declare the guilty innocent. This is accompanied by the claim that the innocent one (the Son or Christ) suffers and dies in the place of the guilty so that the guilty can be pronounced innocent or just (righteous*) and in that sense "justified." This apparent double violation of simple justice has not gone unnoticed in the theological traditions (Abelard* or recent feminist* criticism of substitutionary atonement). The declaration that those who are guilty (unrighteous) are nevertheless innocent may also cut the nerve of the claims of interhuman justice and indeed promote injustice, as seemed to happen in Lutheran Germany* during the Holocaust* or Catholic Latin* America during the reign of the death squads.

The Recovery of Interhuman Justice. The recovery of the understanding of justice as interhuman (rather than as forensic or nominal justification*) is found in the Social* Gospel and in modern social* papal encyclicals and is most vigorously recovered in Latin American Liberation* theology. The work of Miranda in rereading the Bible from the standpoint of the divine claim of justice that can be actualized only as the commitment to the welfare of the other, especially the most vulnerable, draws on the Prophets and Psalms and also on Paul* and even John*. Justification is the call to become an agent of justice and love (see Justification, Theological Views and Practices, Cluster).

In more recent European thought, especially in the work of Derrida but also in that of Agamben and Badiou, justice is understood in Pauline fashion to be "outside the law," which nonetheless impels the law* toward an approximation to justice, even if this always fails to correspond to the claim and call of justice. Justice is understood to be social justice that takes the form of welcoming and making an individual commitment to the other. This European recovery of justice outside the law occurs through a reading of Paul outside the confines of Christianity proper and is correlative to the awareness of the new global situation as one of empire that has certain features in common with the imperial context of Pauline counter-imperial thought and practice.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in Africa. The African worldview, generally speaking, is infused with religion. The earth is a creation of God, known in Africa by many names, the one God in control of the universe and all that it contains (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster: In Africa), while human beings are children of God and deities are agents of God. In African myths, folktales, and proverbs, commonly God is actively involved with human beings, urging justice, respect, and compassion* among them. When a person is cruel, selfish, unkind, oppressive, exploitative, or callous toward others, the Akan of Ghana* say, "That one is no human being"; the Zulu of South* Africa say that such a person does not have ubuntu i.e. has no humanity. The Luyia of Kenya* prefer to forget such a person and prohibit naming children of the next generation after this person.

People of Africa, a huge continent, have developed a spirituality shaped by Africa's primal religious imagination (African* Religion, also called African Traditional Religion), Christianity, and Islam*; each of these traditions grounds social justice in the nature of God. The Islamic zakat (almsgiving) has its roots in the righteousness of God, which God also enjoins on human beings who are God's stewards on earth. To be an African Muslim, one must adhere to this God-centered view of social justice. Similarly, in the Bible, a holy book for many Africans, several prophets, especially Isaiah*, Amos*, and Micah*, speak of social justice. Isaiah 58 is one of the most pungent denunciations of social injustice, as are Chaps. 1–5 of Amos (God commands in Amos 5:24, "Let justice run down like water and righteousness as a mighty stream"). The biblical teaching protects the weak: widows*, children*, the sick, and all who are vulnerable. In the narration of Jesus' life, in which he is portrayed as one devoted to the vulnerable and to overcoming opponents, Mark says, "The common people heard him gladly" (Mark 12:37, King James Version). Social justice, from the Christian perspective, is anchored in the affirmation that God is righteous and requires right dealings among human beings.

In Africa, one finds that African Religion, Islam, and Christianity all teach that the religious basis of life is the nature of God as one who requires just dealings among human beings as a way of life. Social justice is not benevolence; it is a demonstration of our humanity. It is with these shared views that African believers can confront the manifestations of injustice and violence ever present in Africa as elsewhere. See also RECONCILIATION AS A CHRISTIAN PRAXIS.

MUSIMBI KANYORO

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in Asia: The Philippines. Legal or forensic justice is formally enshrined in the nation's laws, but substantive justice in the sense of having real and meaningful access to the requisites of a decent human existence is the justice for which Filipino peoples long. This longing has driven Philippine history since the awakening of Philippine nationhood.

Centuries of struggle against colonial* and domestic oppression* provide the matrix for the specific understanding and practice of justice in the Philippines. Christian evangelization of the Philippines took place under the auspices of Spanish* colonialism (three and a half centuries) and US imperialism (half a century). The struggle for land* and democracy* forms the core of the struggle against the colonial and church authorities. More recently, it has come to include the aspirations of other marginalized* segments of society. Justice is served to the extent that the goals of the struggle are achieved; there goals are, for peasants and fishers, procuring land and fishing grounds; for workers and employees, decent wages and working conditions; for indigenous peoples, ownership of ancestral land; for marginalized women and children, social services; and for all the people, freedom from foreign domination.

Justice and human* rights are closely related in the context of a struggle against foreign domination and domestic oppression. Most victims of human* rights violations by agents of the state are perceived to be involved in one way or another with antigovernment forces, both legal and underground. A very significant number of these victims come from the ranks of religious, priests, pastors, nuns, and lay workers.

The biblical view of justice was introduced in the midst of the anti-Spanish struggle. Soon after, biblical images began to surface in the rhetoric of peasant uprisings. Quasi-religious political organizations formed the core of movements seeking justice from the Spanish colonial authorities. Religious views of justice pervaded the ideology* of the late-19th-c. national revolution. It was in the name of justice biblically understood that priests, religious, and other church workers formed the Christians for National Liberation, which joined a Communist-led insurgency in 1972 that continues to the present.

EVERETT MENDOZA

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in the Caribbean Islands. It is sobering to acknowledge that domination, oppression*, and colonization* came to the Caribbean with the arrival of the Christian Church. Missionaries came with the colonizers, were often paid by them, and sought to fulfill their wishes. The presence of “the colonizer and the colonized” brought to the fore issues of justice, freedom, and identity, from two perspectives.

From the perspective of the planter class and the majority of the missionaries, issues of justice, freedom, and identity were conceived of in terms of a plantation ethic that included slavery*. From the master class’s point of view, justice meant peace* without conflict. Peace as an expression of a just society is not a far-fetched or unrealistic goal, yet it requires changing perspective.

Slave narratives suggest that the master class really wanted peace without justice. For the enslaved peoples, justice meant freedom* (and liberation*); the master class overlooked the fact that peace was predicated on an admission that a change was needed because something had gone amiss. A peaceful community is a community that addresses a wrong that needs to be made right.

The problem was that peace as envisioned by the planter class did not lead to the creation of a just society. The missionaries did not understand this problem either, as they often proclaimed peace without justice, as they declared the master class to be at peace with God, without understanding that such “peace with God” includes being in conflict with oppressive* orders (see Justification, Theological Views and Practices, Cluster).

The enslaved community understood justice in terms of freedom. In many instances, freedom meant a change of geographical place; it meant returning home to Africa; being reunited with the ancestors as well as going back to the forests in Africa. The slaves’ understanding of hell* was separation from place and community: “Way down yonder by myself I couldn’t hear no’body pray.” Freedom meant the ability to make decisions about running away and to take responsibility for one’s destiny.

The Caribbean adage “out of many people one people” expresses a vision of a just community; an identity beyond masters and slaves; a new humanity beyond race and class, in which human worth lies in relationship to God; a just society in which peace and freedom are a reality.

NOEL LEO ERSKINE

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in Latin America.

Latin American theologians note that justice has a clear ethical and theological dimension, as it seeks to construct equitable and family-like interhuman relations and to struggle against oppression*. Justice is directly tied to God, who “works vindication and justice for all who are oppressed” (Ps 103:6) and who acts as “the go’el of Israel,” the next of kin, protector, and redeemer of the widow*, the orphan, the foreigner* (Ps 146:7, 9, 68:5; Zech 7:10). Injustice is sin*, the negation of God’s will of justice, as the prophets repeat again and again, because knowing God, authentic worship*, and the practice of justice are interconnected (Jer 22; Mic 6:6–8; Isa 58:6–7) and because the practice of justice prolongs God’s liberating* act; it is being faithful to the covenant* between God and the people. Thus in the Bible, justice is synonymous with salvation* and redemption*.

Latin American theologians also emphasize that Jesus’ mission is in continuity with this prophetic tradition. In Jesus’ teaching, the Kingdom* of God and its justice are inseparable (see Sermon on the Mount), although this is often obscured by English translations, which render all the terms for “justice” (e.g. dikaio syne) and “injustice” (e.g. adikia) by terms referring to individual morality (e.g. “righteousness” and “wickedness”). Similarly, despite many English translations, Paul speaks of those who practice injustice (often translated “wickedness”) as hindering the truth and justice of God (Rom 1:18) and of salvation as “justification,” which is a manifestation of the justice of God that results in “graced lives.” “For the kingdom of God is . . . justice [dikaio syne] and peace and joy from the Holy Spirit” (Rom 14:17).

Latin American theology prolongs the prophetic tradition of the Bible; the practice of justice is a dimension of the life and the mission of the community of faith (see Latin American Theologies). Following Jesus, the faith community is gathered for the sake of the Kingdom of God, both in its ecclesial life and in social services, in order to practice justice and peace and to preserve the integrity of the creation. To practice justice is to struggle for the ongoing satisfaction of people's fundamental needs: food, housing, work, and education; to struggle for human* rights for those who are excluded and impoverished; to struggle for gender equity; to struggle to take care of the creation, our home; and to struggle against every form of systemic violence*, while remembering those, e.g. Bishop Romero*, who gave their lives in the struggle for justice.

VICTORIO ARAYA GUILLÉN

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in North America. The issue of justice includes questions of distribution, reparation, retribution, and restoration. In the North American context, economic distributive justice has been a primary theoretical focus, although contemporary Christian discussions also include reparation, making amends for past wrongs, reconciling opposing parties, and restoring community.

Christian ethicists draw on Liberation* theologies to emphasize the gap between rich and poor* and the need for redistribution of goods and services. Roman Catholic ethicists link justice to questions of common good and human* rights; the bishops' statement on the US economy* ("Economic Justice for All," 1985) has been highly influential. Protestants stress the biblical bases of justice: justice encompasses both specific commandments and fundamental claims to "right relation." Justice requires redistribution of power, analyses of oppression*, and action for liberation. Christian approaches to justice incorporate global concerns: balance of trade, remission of debts, women's rights, and North-South relations.

Christians also utilize philosophical theories: John Rawls's "difference principle," Martha Nussbaum's "capabilities theory," and Iris Marion Young's "five faces of oppression" are influential theoretical constructs, as is the "communitarian" approach of Michael Walzer.

The legacy of slavery* and racism* in the USA makes racial justice a particular concern. Womanist* and Mujerista* (Latino/a) approaches to justice attempt to take seriously the tangled web of race, class, and sex, although all agree that formulating an adequate theoretical perspective is difficult. Christians have also debated justice for gay, lesbian, transgender, and bisexual people. In addition to theoretical concerns, justice praxis has included advocating for the liberation of prisoners, for an end to selected wars*, and for equal rights and empowerment of women, those with disabilities, and other oppressed groups.

KAREN LEBACQZ

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in North America: Latino/a. Justice, the main concern of social* ethics*, involves claims about how available social goods and services are to be distributed along with responsibilities and social burdens. For Latinos/as, at the heart of talk about justice is the question of the legitimate criteria used to determine how distribution ought to take place. From a theological point of view, justice concerns are dealt with in relation to God as the source and ground of the good and of the meaning of human life; just relationships in society express our view of the fitting relationship with God and God's creation.

From a Latino/a point of view, justice has to do with the creation of relationships that enable people to fulfill their humanity and to generate and sustain caring communities of mutual support involving a fair exchange of the available social goods and services. Beyond procedural notions of justice, Latinos/as claim that the well-being of the poor* and marginal* provides the standard by which to judge the objectivity, impartiality, and fairness of all social institutions and procedures of justice. The theological concern for the poor and marginal is given precedence over philosophical and scientific notions of justice. Religiously grounded notions of justice take precedence over rationally grounded notions of justice, and indeed are alone to provide the core motivation of love, care, and compassion that initiates and sustains a radical commitment to justice.

The church, called to be faithful to the memory of Jesus and his mission, is given the vocation to move forward the cause of justice among the poor. Nevertheless, the church has opted to ally itself with the powerful and wealthy and has contributed to the unjust state of affairs that has led to massive human poverty. To reestablish its true mission*, the church must become a church of and for the poor. This preferential* option for the poor takes the concrete forms of social and political advocacy and of solidarity with the struggles by which the poor, the marginal, and the voiceless seek their liberation. The church must contribute to the struggle to socialize wealth and democratize power so that “the least of these” and, through them, all of us might be able to fulfill our humanity. This entails a radical transformation of society and of our way of being. In this new society, service to the Other gives our individual and collective power, wealth, and freedom their reason for being.

ISMAEL GARCÍA

Justice, Theological Views and Practices, in North America: Womanist.

Womanists*, compelled to expose evils* perpetrated against all humans, define justice-making as a communal, religious engagement. Justice, a moral virtue, concerns fairness, equal distribution, retribution amid wrongdoing, and an impartial treatment of all persons in all settings. Thus justice is philosophy and praxis, thought and action. Justice arises from biblical traditions requiring social activism and life-empowering witness, a praxis opposing evil and suffering (Clarice Martin). Justice-making necessitates human participation with God*, to interpret Law* and Scripture* with the aim of securing equality.

Thus justice calls for opposing social and ecclesial systems that place yokes of injustice on women: pathological degradation, silencing, dismissing, or ignoring them (Frances E. Wood). Antithetical to Jesus’ teachings, injustice ignores the dehumanization of slaves*, the plantation’s misogyny, and the present-day patriarchy* in church and society. Womanist justice involves seeking and loving righteousness, kindness, and walking humbly with God.

Black women, committed to scrutinizing multifaceted, systemic oppression*, have long had a race-gender-class consciousness; they have formed social clubs that valued connections between critical self-understanding of, and socioeconomic response to, oppressive realities, which they internally addressed with self-help and economic self-determination (Marcia Riggs). Against injustice, they embodied a Black* Liberationist* ethic that required action toward collective advancement, because God’s justice required them to respond to institutionalized moral evil* with social responsibility.

Womanist justice ethics rejects suffering* as God’s will (Emilie Townes). Suffering is unscrutinized, cyclical, static, unmetabolized pain; by contrast, pain is a recognized, named experience used for transformation (Audre Lorde). Thus for Townes, by moving from a reactive posture about suffering to a transformative posture of pain, one engages in liberative messages of love* and resurrection*.

Womanist justice engages with alternative sources of empowerment: resisting sin and evil, by using power from the periphery (Rosita Mathews). Womanist justice denounces naive biblicism, idealism without critical knowledge of actual experience, and dogmatic moralism; by remembering and retelling the stories of those who have suffered and overcome, Womanist justice pursues a recentering, redemptive resistance that redefines Black women’s realities toward transformation (M. Shawn Copeland).

Womanist justice seeks wisdom* through cultural artifacts: music, art, and literature that examine ideas of the Divine and the benevolence of beauty amid evil within an African holistic, religiocultural worldview that provides renewal and healing* power. These cultural artifacts afford collective exorcism*: they name and expose oppression through stories of coded communication allowing a platform for “speaking truth to power” (as Quakers* say): birthing just engagement. See also WOMANIST AND AFRICAN AMERICAN THEOLOGIES. CHERYL A. KIRK-DUGGAN

1) Introductory Entries

Justification, a Central Doctrine for Western Christianity. Paul* is the most important source of the Christian doctrine of justification, which adopts the OT understanding of reality as both forensic and at the same time efficacious, as both a demanding challenge and the appropriate response. It represents the center of his theology, especially in Galatians and Romans, although this is contested by the “new perspective on Paul” (see Paul, the Apostle). An intensive revival of Paul was initiated by Augustine*, who asserted against Pelagius* the sovereignty of divine grace* and contested the freedom* of the human will* to accept or reject grace. Thomas Aquinas* adopted his position in that he excluded any necessary and active human cooperation in preparation for grace. By contrast, late medieval theologians such as Gabriel Biel* enunciated the thesis that God does not deny grace to those who do what they can.

Luther* passionately opposed this thesis, citing Paul above all; he saw the turning point in his own life and theology in his discovery of the “correct” understanding of Rom 1:16–17, according to which God’s righteousness makes the ungodly righteous (Rom 4:5). This happens only through the Word (solo verbo), only through grace (sola gratia), only through Christ (solo Christo), only through faith* (sola fide); the forensic declaration of righteousness (or justification) through the promise of grace makes one who is effectively embraced by this promise into a new* creature (2 Cor 5:17). This means that the Creator validates God’s own justice toward the creature, taking it into the realm of God’s righteousness* and away from the realm of sin*; thereby God restores righteousness. In faith, which is not a human work (see Faith #6), not even a human deed, but solely the work of God by which God comes to the creature (fides adventitia, Gal 3:23, 25), the creature justifies God and accepts God’s care. In this sense, the righteousness of faith is iustitia passiva: the righteousness given and imparted by God in Christ (iustitia aliena), which I lose if I try to bring it reflexively into what I possess by myself. The passivity of the righteousness of faith does not mean denial of good works; actually it releases one for higher activity, indeed freeing one for the highest activity of all, the love* through which faith manifests its energy (“faith working through love,” Gal 5:6). Faith by its own nature brings forth good works; but faith is not grounded in these good works and the believer is not justified through them. Thus Luther’s radical understanding of justification leads to a new understanding of ethics*: ethos is relieved of soteriological* burdens and is freed to care genuinely for the world and its actual needs. The person who is justified solely through faith is reconstituted as a responsible, ek-centric, eschatological agent (Joest): addressed by the accusing and convicting law and by the liberating gospel, and challenged to answer, one lives in faith outside oneself (extra se), only in God and in love directed toward one's neighbors and their sorrows and joys (conclusion of the Treatise on Christian Freedom, 1520). This ek-centric being consists in a vertical relation to the Creator and a horizontal relation to fellow creatures; one becomes what one already is, the image* of God. Looking only on oneself, one sees oneself only as a sinner; looking on Christ, one sees oneself as fully righteous (simul iustus et peccator, "both righteous and sinner").

The epoch-making significance of Luther for theology, church history, and indeed world history consists in his understanding of all of theology as a doctrine of justification; the correlation between sinful humans and the justifying God is the criterion for structuring all theological motifs. The Council of Trent* opposed Luther's doctrine of justification at decisive points. In Protestantism the dominant position of justification as the criterion and center of theology became less clear, as it already was for Calvin, and even for Lutherans during the debates with Reformed* and Arminians* about the "process of salvation" (ordo salutis*). In Pietism* (then Arminianism and Methodism*) self-examination became important for gaining certitude about justification; faith was no longer, as in Luther, a looking away from self and toward Christ. Schleiermacher* moved regeneration, inclusion into living communion with Christ, to the center of piety. Later in the 19th c. various attempts were made to renew the Lutheran doctrine of justification – energetically by Ritschl*, who, however, eliminated the doctrine of God's wrath that was so decisive for Luther. Martin Kähler made the most persuasive attempt, presenting all of systematic theology (apologetics, dogmatics, and ethics) as a doctrine of justification. In the 20th c., his student Tillich* tried to vindicate the doctrine of justification within the modern horizon, as the answer to the question about the meaning of life in the face of meaninglessness. The Luther renaissance rediscovered the significance of the doctrine of justification as a basic criterion of the distinction between Rome and Wittenberg and sought to bring its centrality to recognition. Whether the "Common Declaration on Justification" (1999) can overcome the division between Roman Catholics and Lutherans is debated.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Justification, Theological Views and Practices, in Africa. Africans view human misbehavior against God's order as the disruption of proper interaction and communion not only with God, but also with fellow humans and with departed relatives (ancestors*). According to African philosophy, one's life and religion are inseparable from the community, from which one receives maturity, identity, justice, and survival.

Upon conversion, African Christians spontaneously applied this traditional perspective to their understanding of justification by asking: How does justification affect human relationship? How does it help me be a gracious neighbor to my fellow humans regardless of gender, nationality, color, religious, and ideological affiliation (Kahakwa)? They found that justification addresses structural sins related to social, economic, cultural, and religious factors. Thus instead of limiting justification to the vertical relationship between individuals and God – following the "spiritualized" understanding of sins*, faith*, grace*, and justification of both mission Christianity and post-mission Christianity – Africans conceive of justification as encompassing all horizontal relationships. It entails being God's gracious instrument of powerful liberation for the oppressed* and victimized.

Justification involves liberation* and freedom*, along with the gospel of Jesus, who identified himself with the poor*, the deprived, and the marginalized* (Luke 4:18).

For different denominations in Africa, justification with both its vertical and horizontal dimensions is demanded by a faith in the Trinity* that calls Christians to interact with the Triune God. Justification necessarily encompasses all interactions with fellow humans and departed relatives who join hands in addressing people's problems and needs, in liberating them from oppressive and unjust systems and powers that threaten their lives. Sinners are justified with and for others (Greive).

SYLVESTER KAHAKWA

Justification, Theological Views and Practices, in Asia. Theologians in Asia emphasize the social implications of "justification," because doctrine or faith (see Faith #3) has ethical implications. In the Asian context of religious, cultural, and ethnic pluralism*, of widespread poverty*, oppressive* social* systems, globalization*, and violence*, justification involves the affirmation of God's acceptance of all people, of the equality of all; justification calls people to accept one another irrespective of differences of caste*, color, gender, and/or creed. God's inclusive and embracing love* and grace* endow all people with inherent dignity given that they are created in God's image. God's inclusive love, also revealed in Jesus Christ, works among all people, calling them to repent* and return to God. All those who respond in faith are accepted by God and "justified," and thereby associated with the human quest and struggle for justice and liberation, both grounded in God's divine nature (see Ordo Salutis). The works of a righteous or justified person stem from obedience to covenant* regulations and result in justice*, a good and upright life, the preservation of peace*, and a guarantee of the prosperity* of the community as a whole. Asian Christian teaching on justification emphasizes a call to solidarity or communion with the poor, oppressed, and stigmatized in their struggles for dignity and humanity. Through this solidarity, the good news of the gospel is being shared.

MONICA JYOTSNA MELANCHTHON

Justification, Theological Views and Practices, in Australia. Justification (however understood) is widely believed to be the reward for self-effort in Australia*, because self-reliance is a dominant ethos. Many experienced Christianity as oppressive and life denying in the early colonies: a man believed that only he and his mates could be relied on. This attitude has remained as Australia has prospered.

Justification as a reward for self-effort was attacked by many Protestant clergy (while accusing Catholics of such teaching). Yet "deeds, not creeds" has remained pervasive in the churches. Thus, paradoxically, rationalist* and separatist* trends in the (traditionally Evangelical) Anglican Diocese of Sydney have fostered a climate of spiritual "effort" in its circle of influence.

Making room for justification "by grace*," the end of the 20th c. saw the "Protestant work ethic" and workaholism questioned, and indigenous and orthodox Protestant perspectives heard. "Being" became as significant as "doing," and spiritual disciplines* were defined more in relational* than in "rule-of-life" terms. A renewed appreciation of grace* in Roman Catholic, mainline Protestant, and Pentecostal churches was a source of ecumenical* convergence that fostered spiritual life in which faith*, grace, and works are integrated and related to corporate as well as personal life – as in the Australian Lutheran–Roman Catholic agreement on justification.

CHARLES SHERLOCK

Justification, Theological Views and Practices, in Latin America. In Latin America, it is impossible to understand justification without considering the reality of exclusion, injustice, and structural* evil and sin*. In that case, justification cannot be a synonym of "forgiveness of sin by grace*," i.e. without accountability or, from the victims' perspective, with impunity (see Forgiveness, Christian Discourses of). Rather, justification is through grace in the sense that it comes from God and occurs as a response to structural sin (see Grace of God Cluster: Latin American Perspective). Sin is generated by human beings through unjust practices that imprison the truth in injustice (Rom 1:18) and turn them into victims as well as into victimizers, accomplices of this sin. Through justification, God's justice* actually becomes present to liberate us from the logic of sin that dehumanizes both victims and victimizers. While grace rehabilitates us, with the goal of making us a new* creation despite our sins, justification calls us to practice justice* with freedom, dignity, and honesty, following Jesus. If sin leaves visible deadly marks, justification should also leave a visible mark: the radiance of a life as a new creation, displayed by those who, here and now in our historical context, have been resurrected, as Jesus was.

ELSA TAMEZ

Justification, Theological Views and Practices, in North America. The radical teaching of Luther* and the Reformers about "justification by grace*, through faith*" – salvation as a sheer gift of God's grace, appropriated by faith and not earned by our "works" – was perennially misunderstood by their contemporaries and in subsequent (including North American Protestant) history by two recurrent deviations.

1. Thinking that human justification before God is a "given" that frees believers from any personal obligations. Bonhoeffer*, most influential for mainline North American Christians, criticized this assumption, calling it "cheap grace."
2. In response to this "cheapening," reintroducing "works righteousness" through the back door, in the declaration of unwarranted grace, by adding "faithfulness" (see Faith #1) and moral and legal requirements for the "faithful." This, although not the intention of Calvin's "third use of the law," typified much of the Calvinism* so formative in North American Christian history.

The more taxing contemporary hurdle for this central Protestant teaching is linguistic: the language of "justification," fraught with legalistic overtones and almost inextricably bound up with the guilt consciousness of earlier epochs, is barely understood in a society whose typical anxiety is related not to guilt but to the loss of meaning. In his sermon "You Are Accepted," Tillich* suggested a provocative way of translating justification theology into this contemporary idiom.

DOUGLAS JOHN HALL

Justification, Theological Views and Practices, in North America: Latino/a.

Since Hispanic Americans belong to different theological traditions, they profess diverse interpretations of justification. Protestants, emphasizing the radical nature of human sinfulness* and of God's transcendence, understand justification as a gift beyond human possibilities and completely undeserved. Roman Catholics see God as immanent within history and see justification as God's restoring or revitalizing those powers that are part of our nature; justification is part of the process by which, with the assistance of the Holy* Spirit, we continue to grow spiritually and morally toward the righteousness that prepares us to live in God's Kingdom*.

Latino(a) theologians, pressed to announce the good news to their communities of the marginal* and poor*, sought new forms of ecumenism that brought different churches closer to each other in a common understanding in which justification is closely associated with justice*. For the poor, justification is no longer merely being comforted. By being justified, they are empowered to lead lives of disciplined commitment and sacrifice for a new order and a new humanity. For the powerful, justification is a call to become accountable to the poor. In both cases, the justified are empowered to engage in the political task of living life for the sake of others, whether by God's grace alone or by God's restoration of our powers, to live more authentic lives, seeking right relationships with God, creation, and others.

ISMAEL GARCÍA

Justification, Theological Views and Practices, in Western Europe: Feminist. Justification constituted a special challenge to Feminist theologians, since it presupposes specific understandings of creation*, sin*, and freedom* that are often gender biased.

Feminist theologians have diversely emphasized justification as a liberating power through its connotation of human equality (since this doctrine affirms that God accepts everybody regardless of differences) or as a source of hope* in a sinful world. Like other Liberation* theologians, they also linked justification to a concern for justice*. Thus they are wary of spiritual interpretations of justification that make a sharp distinction between the individual before God and interhuman relationships. In such cases, the doctrine of justification no longer provides means to resist women's subordination and other forms of oppression*; it risks condoning these conditions and disregarding concerns for non-human life forms (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster: Ecofeminist Theology). Instead, a feminist view of justification emphasizes the connections between the spiritual and the social dimensions of life. It offers a critique of interpretations that neglect the value of all creation and structural* evil and sin, sometimes by exploring the relation of justification to grace* and new* creation. It also balances a positive view of individual freedom (autonomy*) with a sense of relationality*.

CRISTINA GRENHOLM

Justina, legendary 4th-c. character in the Acts of Saints Cyprian and Justina. She converts the magician Cyprian, who has been hired to cast a spell on her. He becomes a bishop and ordains her a deacon*. According to various versions, during a period of persecution* of Christians in Damascus or Nicomedia under either Decius* or Diocletian*, they are tried and executed together, she first because he fears that she will weaken in the face of death and lapse*. Cyprian is sometimes confused with Cyprian* of Carthage. Gregory* Nazianzen (Orat. 18 [24]) mentions the fact that the two Cyprians are confused, but does not refer to Justina. Cyprian has become the center of the legend, although in the original story Justina converts him. See also DEACONESS.

CAROLYN OSIEK

Justinian (c483–565). As Roman emperor (527–65) and before, during the reign of his uncle, Justin, he pursued a Westpolitik, reconquering areas in Africa, Italy*, and Spain* that had been governed by the Arian* Christian Goths*, seeking better relations with the popes in Rome, and ending the Acacian* schism. To Christianize the Roman Empire, he closed the philosophical schools in Athens (529), forced many to be baptized, and built many churches, including the impressive Hagia Sophia (Constantinople, 538). He sponsored the Justinian* Code and its classic differentiation between church and state (and their harmony).

Conflict persisted in the East between Chalcedonians* and Miaphysites* (or Monophysites*). Perhaps by mutual agreement, Justinian cultivated the Chalcedonians, who were allied with the West, while his wife, Theodora*, supported a clandestine non-Chalcedonian church in Egypt* and Syria* (see Jacob Baradai, or Baradaeus; Orthodox Churches, Oriental, Cluster: Coptic Orthodox Church). In a futile attempt to placate the Miaphysites*, Justinian condemned the “Three* Chapters,” intimidating Pope Vigilius and causing a schism with large segments of the Western Church.

EUGENE TESELLE

Justinian, Code of, a collection of Roman laws compiled by the order of Justinian*, containing all imperial laws from the reign of Hadrian; published between 529 and 534. It incorporated the Theodosian Code (438) and two 4th-c. collections on which the latter had been based (Codex Gregorianus and Codex Hermogenianus). In addition to the Code itself, the Corpus Iuris Civilis included the Digest (selections from classical jurists), the Institutes (a training manual), and the Novellae (laws issued after 534). This formed the law of the Byzantine* Empire. Much attention is given to religion. While Justinian differentiated between church and state, he desired a “harmony” (symphonia) between them; he governed the “externals” of the church's life and penalized all (including Jews and heretics*) who did not follow orthodoxy* as he saw it. The Corpus was studied in the West after 1170, especially in Bologna. The legal profession found it more useful than the older Germanic and feudal law in a commercial society, and increasingly it became the law of the Holy* Roman Empire in Germany. Its methods and principles also influenced canon* law after Gratian*. Most European law codes, except in England, were built on its tradition.

EUGENE TESELLE

Justin Martyr (c100–c165), philosopher and martyr (in Rome), Christian Apologist*. Born of pagan parents in Neapolis, Samaria, he describes exploring various philosophies and converting to Christianity. He wrote his two apologies, one to the emperor and one to the Senate, during stays in Rome (c40–50; c155–65). In his Dialogue with Trypho, a Jewish scholar, Justin argues that the new* covenant with Gentiles has superseded* the old covenant with Israel, that Jesus is both the Messiah* and the preexisting Logos* of God’s self-revelation in Scriptures (in Judaism and Christianity Cluster, see Christian Views; Jewish Views). His (lost) writing against Marcion* and Gnosticism* probably influenced Irenaeus*, Tertullian*, and Hippolytus*. Thus he responded to the three major stimuli to the development of theology: apologetics, controversy with Jews, and opposition to heresies*.

He established the framework for the Christian doctrine of the Logos. The Word, uttered by God for the sake of creation, is the Platonists* “intelligible world,” giving form to matter by becoming the World Soul*. This Word illuminates all people, including Greek philosophers, but only in a partial and fragmentary way; the Word becomes fully present in Jesus Christ, who enables people to know God, lead virtuous lives, and defy demons* worshipped in pagan religions. The pagan philosopher Celsus* (c180) attacked Christianity, perhaps in response to Justin’s arguments.

EUGENE TESELLE

Kagawa, Toyohiko (1888–1960), Christian social reformer in Japan; born in Kobe, brought up and baptized in Tokushima by a US Presbyterian missionary, H. W. Myers (1904). He studied in Presbyterian institutions: Meiji Gakuin (1905–7) and Kobe Theological Seminary (1907–11). Pulmonary tuberculosis (eventually fatal) led him to devote himself to serving and evangelizing the underprivileged in Kobe (1909), where he kept his residence (despite further study at Princeton Theological Seminary, 1914–17, and a trip to Tokyo to help the victims of the Kanto great earthquake in 1923). Throughout his life, he made significant contributions to the improvement of social conditions by helping to create labor, farmer, and consumer unions. In the 1930s, he developed the “Kingdom* of God Movement,” a nationwide evangelistic movement partly influenced by the US Social* Gospel, based on his conviction that Jesus’ love consists in redeeming underprivileged people. After the war, he contributed to the founding of the Socialist Party of Japan (1945) and social movements, while undertaking extensive evangelistic tours in Japan, Europe, and the USA. His collaboration with the wartime Japanese army and the discriminatory descriptions of “the poor” in his book, Study on the Psychology of the Poor (1915), have been severely criticized. His autobiographical novel, Crossing the Death Line (1920), was a best seller.

NOZOMU MIYAHARA

Kairos (Gk “right time”), a divinely assigned time or period; an opportune or special time (of fulfillment of prophecies, of the Kingdom*; Mark 1:15, par.); or a time of crisis. “Kairos theologies” are contextual* Liberation* theologies developed in a time of crisis by spiritual communities themselves rather than by theologians; an example is The Kairos Document written in Soweto (South* Africa, 1985).

Kant, Immanuel (1724–1804), last major Enlightenment* philosopher; taught at the University of Königsberg, Germany. There is some debate whether Königsberg Pietism* influenced his philosophy. Kant’s Critique of Pure Reason (A, 1781; B, 1787) changed the course of modern thought through its “Copernican revolution” in philosophy.

Just as Copernicus* explained the heavens’ apparent movement by postulating the movement of the spectator, so Kant explained the possibility of our knowledge of objects by postulating that objects must conform to the mind (B, xvi). Because our capacity for receiving impressions is constituted in a certain way, the way objects are received must conform to this constitution. The forms in which the “matter of sensibility” (sensible intuition) is received can thereby be known a priori, since they are given through the mode in which we are affected by objects. The two pure forms of sensible intuition are space and time; through them appearances are ordered in certain relations. Furthermore, experience must itself conform to the concepts (categories) of understanding, which provide rules necessary for unifying the manifold of intuition if experience is to be possible. Through these concepts, the mind actively synthesizes the data of intuition and gives it unity. The two fundamental sources of human knowledge are sensibility and understanding; both are necessary for cognition. Objects are given through sensibility (receptivity); they are thought through understanding (spontaneity). Kant notes, “Thoughts without content are empty; intuitions without concepts are blind” (A, 51; B, 75). Consequently, (1) we can never transcend the limits of possible experience, because the content of all thought is given through sensibility. (2) We have knowledge only of phenomena (objects as experienced), not of things-in-themselves. (3) We have no “theoretical knowledge” of God* or the soul*. Kant found it “necessary to deny knowledge to make room for faith*” (B, xxx). Theoretical reason cannot provide definite answers regarding the questions concerning God, freedom*, or immortality*.

Kant’s ethics reflect the moral outlook of an enlightened citizen of the world. In the Critique of Practical Reason (1788); he argued that, even though we cannot affirm the existence of God, freedom, and immortality from a “theoretical” point of view, their existence must be posited from a “practical” one. Contra Hume* (1711–76), who believed that reason could determine only the means to ends already desired, Kant argued that if morality is to be possible, pure “practical reason” must be able to determine the “necessary ends” of the rational will. Not only can pure practical reason establish “what morality unconditionally demands” (action in accordance with the categorical imperative), pure practical reason is also sufficient to determine the will. And if we can be moved to act purely out of respect for the moral law, we must be transcendentally free (see Deontic, Deontological Ethics). Morality cannot be derived from religion. Action in accordance with morality because God commands it is heteronomy* and contradicts all genuine morality. Rather, God and immortality are objects of a practical faith. The individual committed to morality must hope* that God exists and that God’s duration is endless. Kant’s Religion within the Bounds of Reason Alone (1793, 1794) explains Christianity in terms of practical reason. Kant tackles the problem of radical evil* (the corruption of the fundamental principle or disposition guiding all a person’s actions) and how to understand the redemptive* work of Christ. The historical Jesus* is understood to be an exemplar of an ideal archetype already lying within our reason; only through such an archetype can any historical person be known as good. It is the individual who must effect the change from an evil disposition to a good one; faith in expiation* effected by another cannot be the ground of an individual’s conversion*. Only the individual already committed to a good course of life can have genuine faith in God and God’s forgiveness*.

JACQUELINE MARIÑA

Käsemann, Ernst (1906–98), NT scholar, influenced by both Bultmann* and Barth*, but critical of both. His 1956 “Old Marburgers Lecture” stressed (against Bultmann) that faith* is possible only when one takes history* seriously, especially the history of Jesus, since the earthly and the exalted Lord are identical (see Jesus, Quest for the Historical).

After completing studies in Bonn, Tübingen, and Marburg (he wrote his dissertation under Bultmann, 1931), a pastorate in the Ruhr, and war service, he became a professor of NT in Mainz (1946–51), Göttingen (1951–59), and Tübingen (1959–71). His life context* profoundly influenced his scholarship and approach. Käsemann was committed to the theological significance of the NT and to its opposition to all totalitarian regimes (including Nazi Germany*). For Käsemann, apocalyptic* was the mother of all Christian theology; eschatology* and the theology of the cross* are decisive for the NT and theology. Human existence is not autonomous* but conditioned by which “lord” one serves. The lordship of Christ is primary and leads to corporate rather than individualistic existence.

Following Adolf Schlatter, Käsemann interprets Paul and Romans under the unifying theme of righteousness/justice. The righteousness/justice of God is both gift and salvation-creating power, because in and with the gift comes the lordship of Christ from which it is inseparable. Abraham was the prototype of faith* (as opposed to a model of faithfulness, when one presupposes an understanding of faith as a piety characterized by works). Justification* by faith as a theology of the cross is a polemical doctrine calling for a faithfulness to the covenant* (in relation to Judaism*) and to the creation*.

Käsemann’s wide-ranging research also included the quest for the historical Jesus, hymnic and creedal elements in early traditions, the Lord’s* Supper, “early catholicism” in the NT, diversity in NT theologies, and the history* of religions. As a radical critic of both church and society, Käsemann fought to demonstrate faithfulness to the gospel as the final arbiter of life and truth.

WILLIAM S. CAMPBELL

Kazakhstan, Kazakstan. Christianity in Kazakhstan has had a checkered history, with alternating periods of flourishing and decline. From the 6th c., the Church* of the East maintained several metropolitan sees in the Central Asian region, with Christians living in the south and southeast part of present-day Kazakhstan. The closest metropolitan sees were those of Samarkand (Uzbekistan) and Nawakat (Kyrgyzstan), and there was a local center in Taraz (Dzambul). The decline of central Mongol power (late 14th c.), accompanied by military raids, plague, famine, and the conversion of many local rulers to Islam*, caused a steep decline in the number of Christians. When the region became part of Czarist Russia (18th c.), emigrants introduced Russian* Orthodox* and Ukrainian* Orthodox Christianity; proselytization among the local population was discouraged by the government. A variety of Protestant (Lutheran, Baptist, Mennonite) and Catholic communities were introduced in the 19th c., mainly via German settlers. Further Christian growth was hampered by the Soviet regime (most of the 20th c.), which placed numerous restrictions on religious activities, although they were less severe than in other parts of the Soviet Union.

After independence (1991), many Russians left the country, causing a significant drop in the number of orthodox Christians, which constituted the large majority of Kazakhstan Christians. This decline was not compensated by the growth of Baptist and Pentecostal*/Charismatic* churches, although accurate assessments of their missionary activities and successes are hard to come by, partly because these churches are wary of attracting unwanted attention from the government. Traditional Protestantism has experienced a decline, whereas Roman Catholicism continues to grow. A majority of the population adheres to Islam; the Muslim community has grown in the wake of recent reawakening processes following the demise of the Soviet atheist ideology. Conversion* activities among this part of the population are looked upon with suspicion. Several laws impose strict state control of all religious communities (including Muslim and Christian communities), but their effects on Jehovah's* Witnesses have been especially severe. Nevertheless, freedom of religion is generally granted to religious organizations that register with the government; failure to register, however, is punished by fines and short jail sentences. Socially, it is often difficult for those from Muslim backgrounds to convert to Christianity, but less so than in other Central Asian states.

Statistics: Population (2000): 16 million. Muslims, 42.7%; atheists and nonreligious, 40.2%; Christians, 16.7% (Orthodox, 8.6%; independents, 4.0%; Roman Catholics, 3.1%; Protestants, 0.2%). (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

HELEEN L. MURRE-VAN DEN BERG

Keble, John (1792–1866), educated at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, elected a fellow at Oriel College, Oxford (1811, at the age of 19), a tutor there from 1817 to 1823. Widely recognized as a poet because of his book The Christian Year: Thoughts in Verse for the Sundays and Holydays (1827), he was elected professor of poetry at Oxford (1831). His "Assize Sermon" of July 14, 1833 (published as National Apostasy, 1833), warned against the increasing control of the church by secular authorities (see Church and State Cluster: Introductory Entry) and was credited with having initiated the Oxford* Movement, in which he played a leading role. He served as vicar of Hursley (1836–66).

PETER C. ERB

Kempe, Margery (c1373–c1438), visionary, cataphatic* mystic*, considered a model of medieval lay sanctity. In her Book, a dictated autobiography that was lost until 1934, she describes a life of constant compunction, devotion to the humanity of Christ, and "sanctification of the ordinary" (Pellegrin).

Born in Bishop's Lynn, England, she received permission from her husband, John, to live chastely (1413) and went on pilgrimages* in England, the Holy Land, Assisi, and Rome (1413–15). She was tried on suspicion of Lollardy* (1417). A priest revised the illegible manuscript of Book I (1436) and transcribed Book II (1438).

Kempe lived a publicly devout life, gaining both supporters (including Julian* of Norwich) and detractors owing to her vociferous weeping during Mass, frequent fasting, return to virginal white clothes after choosing continence, claims to have received revelation, and uncontrollable "roaring" at every thought of Jesus. Watson interprets her "imitation* of Christ" as a form of public ministry (Watson). Frequently dismissed by modern scholars of mysticism as hysterical, Kempe is championed by scholars studying the thesis that "bodiliness provides access to the sacred" (Lochrie; Bynum; see Body). Given her era's restrictions on female preaching and its concerns with heresy*, Kempe's insistence on her extreme spirituality as a married, nonreligious woman is unique. JESSICA A. BOON

Kenosis, Kenotic Christology. "Kenosis," emptying, is a Greek word in the "Christ hymn" (Phil 2:7–13) that Paul may have taken from an earlier source: Christ, "who was in the form of God, emptied himself, taking the form of a slave," embracing human vulnerability; therefore, God exalted him and bestowed on him the title of Lord. The sequence of emptying and exaltation has been emphasized in later theology as the "two states" of the incarnate* Christ and a model to be followed by Christians. In Russian Christianity, there is a "kenotic" tradition of monasticism, humbly serving others (see Monasticism Cluster: In the Russian and Ukrainian Tradition; Sketic Monasticism). During the 19th c., a "kenotic" movement in theology asserted that the second person of the Trinity* emptied himself to the extent of giving up divine knowledge and power, living in a vulnerable human mode until his exaltation. For Bulgakov* the relations between the persons of the Trinity are best understood in terms of kenosis as a movement of self-giving and self-receiving that has the capacity to overflow and reflect itself in the creation of the world. More broadly, Hegel's* suggestion that the historical process involves a divine self-emptying has been suggestive to many theologians. A more moderate version of this kenotic theology is that God, rather than being impassible*, sympathizes with the human condition and suffers with it.

Kenotic Christology has implications for Christian life, suggesting that it not be limited to autonomous* and relational* modes of life, but also be heteronomous* and thus kenotic, when, like the persons of the Trinity, believers are involved in a movement of self-giving and self-receiving – a mode of life that is problematical for some Feminist* theologians, because it reinforces customary views about the role of women, but that is affirmed by others (Coakley; Grenholm).

EUGENE TESELLE and DANIEL PATTE

Kenotic Monasticism, Russian style of monastic life based on the Gospels and emphasizing humility and charity. It originated in Kiev with the "cave monasteries" founded by Antonii in imitation of Mount Athos* and the "above-ground" monastery of Feodosii in imitation of the Studios* in Constantinople. It was further developed among the "non-possessors" (including Nil Sorsky) in the trans-Volga region. Monks engaged in works of charity and spiritual guidance of laypeople. Father Zossima in Dostoyevsky's* The Brothers Karamazov belongs to this tradition. See also NIL SORSKY.

Kenya. The Republic of Kenya has a secular constitution, which recognizes and appreciates the constructive role of religion in society. This constitutional position has provided space for religious communities to contribute to basic social services such as medical care (see Health, Healing, and Christianity Cluster: In Africa: African Traditional Practices and Christianity), schooling (see Educational Practices as Christian Service Cluster: In Africa), relief, and rehabilitation (see Poverty Cluster: Poverty, Theology, and Ethics: African Views). Christianity is the most influential religion in Kenya, although it is manifested in a wide spectrum of denominations: Orthodox, Roman Catholic, Episcopal/Anglican, Presbyterian, Congregational, Evangelical, Charismatic, Baptist, and Pentecostal. This diverse expression of ecclesial identities is rooted in the history of Christian missions in Kenya. As early as 1914, more than 35 missionary societies were competing for African converts in the Kenya colony, which was at that time under the British Empire. Similar diversity characterizes the expressions of Islam* and Vedic religions (see Hinduism and Christianity Cluster) in Kenya.

Roman Catholicism has the largest number of adherents. The Portuguese arrived in 1498 (Vasco da Gama visited Mombasa en route to India*) and settled at Mombasa and Malindi during the 16th and 17th c. (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). But the small Christian community established by Augustinian* friars disappeared when the Portuguese were driven out of East Africa by the Arabs (1693), who established a sultanate until the colonization of East Africa by Britain (late 19th c.). The Catholic mission started again with the arrival of Holy Ghost priests (1889), and Catholicism grew rapidly throughout the country. By 1948, 8% of the population claimed to be Roman Catholic. Growth was even more rapid immediately after World War II: the percentage of Roman Catholics reached 20% in 1962, then continued to increase at a slower pace (23% in 2000). The struggle for the Roman Catholic Church is the slow progress in indigenous vocations (in 2000 less than half of priests were African). In an effort to overcome this limitation, missionary agencies from all over the world have established novitiates and seminaries in and around Nairobi. The Catholic University of Eastern Africa (based in Nairobi) is one of the largest private tertiary institutions in this region. It has constituent colleges owned and managed by various religious orders, including those of the Jesuits*, Marists, Dominicans*, Franciscans*, and Capuchins*, as well as that of the Maryknoll* missionaries.

Numerically, Anglicanism* is the next most influential denomination, with 30 dioceses and 3 archbishoprics. The Anglican Church of Kenya was introduced through the Church Missionary Society (CMS), closely associated with the 19th-c. Evangelical* revivals* in Britain. Since the late 1920s, the East African Revival Movement has played a significant role in Kenya. The Anglican Church of Kenya (with about 3 million members in 2000) has hundreds of sponsored primary and secondary schools, all under the patronage of the respective bishops in whose jurisdiction the schools are located (see Anglicanism Cluster: In Africa: Eastern and Western Africa). The Presbyterian Church (with c0.6 million members) also has a strong influence, especially in Central Kenya among the Kikuyu. The influence of the Methodist Church is significant in Eastern Kenya and on the coast (notably among the Meru). The Africa Inland Church (which originated from the interdenominational Africa Inland Mission in 1875 and became autonomous in 1971) is the largest "independent" church (c1.5 million members), with most of its members in the Rift Valley. A wide range of African* Instituted Churches attract adherents in most parts of Kenya, both in rural areas and in urban centers. New Pentecostal, Evangelical, and Charismatic churches have been introduced in urban centers, attracting adherents among the schooled elite, especially the youth.

Demographic Features. More than 70% of Kenya's population is under 25 years of age. Anyone on a casual visit to any church on a Sunday morning will notice the dynamism and youthfulness of Kenyan Christianity irrespective of denomination. Young people are greatly influenced by the mass media* – newspapers, magazines, radio, television, the Internet*, and advertising – the content of which is increasingly shaped by the vested interests of transnational corporations. Most pastors have great difficulty responding to the needs of young people, having been trained in formal ecclesiastical structures, with which youth are uncomfortable. One of the consequences of this challenge is that young people are increasingly joining Charismatic* and neo-Pentecostal initiatives that are transient and highly mobile. To retain the youth, formal Christian denominations seek to recruit younger pastors.

Ecclesiastical Features. Kenyan Christianity is both dynamic and diverse, ranging from conservative to highly innovative. Liturgically, the prayer books and hymnals inherited from the colonial period are still used in some congregations, while some congregations in the same denomination have undertaken innovative initiatives in worship and social service. Open-door immigration policies tend to encourage the introduction of ideas and experiments from various parts of the world, with the consequence that Kenyan Christianity reflects liturgical influences from all the continents.

Social Impact. Through denominationally sponsored schools, colleges, and hospitals, Kenyan Christianity has had a very strong social impact. Most members of the Kenyan elite have been schooled and have served in a denominationally sponsored institution. This impact is often taken for granted, particularly because of the secular emphasis of the Kenyan civil service. Many civil servants have prominent leadership roles in the congregations where they worship on Sundays, but their church leadership roles do not necessarily influence their conduct at work as civil servants during the week. This inconsistency has persisted since the colonial era and is indicative of a form of Christianity that has yet to permeate the cultural identity of African Christians. John V. Taylor described this form of Christianity as "classroom religion," which is practiced as long as the adherents are in the classroom or in the cathedral, but is suspended when they are back home.

Kenyan Christianity has had a strong political influence throughout Kenya's history. During the colonial period, some African converts to Christianity supported the nationalist struggles against colonialism* and imperialism, while others identified themselves as loyalists together with the missionaries. Others identified themselves with Christ and refused to participate in partisan politics. More recently, some church leaders have become outspoken advocates of political liberalization, while others support the status quo. During the 1990s, the Inter-Religious Forum led by the National Council of Churches of Kenya became the most visible expression of alternative political stances at a time when political dissent was frowned on. Thus Kenyan Christianity has been identified with both transformative and conservative political tendencies.

Ecumenical Relations. Kenyan Christianity embraced the modern ecumenical movement as early as 1908, two years before the Edinburgh* World Missionary Conference (1910). Progressive missionaries met at Kikuyu to form the Alliance of Missionary Societies. Through that alliance, many ecumenical initiatives were facilitated, including the Alliance Boys High School, the Alliance Girls High School, and St. Paul's United Theological College. Despite this long history, however, there has been no real support for the attempt to develop a united church (1960s); this initiative did not go beyond the drafting of a united liturgy between the Anglicans, Lutherans, Presbyterians, and Methodists. Christian denominations seem to be content to continue worshipping within their denominational cocoons.

Missionary Outreach. The older denominations have not been involved in missionary outreach outside their diocesan localities. However, "Christian initiatives" led by young people include a strong concern to travel outside of Kenya to proclaim the gospel. Many young Kenyans have been sent for short periods to Ethiopia*, Sudan*, Tanzania*, Uganda*, Rwanda*, Burundi*, Democratic Republic of Congo*, Europe, and North America. This concern for missionary outreach among young people coincides with their international exposure through schooling and their interactions through the mass media and the Internet. The success of these initiatives can also be explained in terms of the availability of surplus capital, which comes from their salaries as well as from planned fund-raising.

Kenyan Christianity is generally self-centered with regard to interfaith relations. Whenever there is a serious national crisis, church leaders convene and invite leaders from other faiths for consultation. They may issue a communiqué addressed to the political elite. However, such occasional meetings and consultations have not yet coalesced into an initiative to form a permanent interfaith forum.

Future Prospects. Kenyan Christianity is outwardly dynamic and vibrant. At the same time, the forces of secularization* and urbanization are strong. It is difficult to predict the impact of these processes on Kenyan churches and Christian communities. Whereas secularization in Europe and North America was facilitated by industrialization, the process of secularization in Kenya (as elsewhere in tropical Africa) is advancing without industrialization. Most young people moving into urban centers from the rural areas live in informal settlements without formal employment and without basic social amenities. With Christians living under such conditions, the development of predictable ecclesial structures is difficult. Thus Christianity in Kenyan informal urban settlements is a great challenge to ecclesiology as it has been formally taught in theological institutions, although transient and highly mobile Charismatic and neo-Pentecostal initiatives and African* Instituted Churches seek to address these situations.

The African Church will come of age when it becomes self-critical and moves beyond self-congratulation. This process has begun. Many excellent research monographs on Kenyan Christianity have been written by Kenyan students in universities, theological colleges, and pastoral institutes in Kenya. Yet these monographs are neither published nor codified, remaining in archives and known only in the small circle where they originated. Bringing them into the public domain will be an important step in helping the African Church to become self-critical. African theologians can then interact among themselves, learning from one another and critically evaluating the North Atlantic intellectual heritage and methodology in which they have received their academic formation. In this way, African theology can find an important role in an African Church in the process of coming of age, at a time when the demographic center of gravity of global Christianity has shifted from the North Atlantic to the rest of the world, including tropical Africa. See also RECONSTRUCTION, AFRICAN THEOLOGIES OF; THEOLOGICAL EDUCATION CLUSTER: IN AFRICA: ISSUES IT FACES; THEOLOGY AS HUMAN UNDERTAKING CLUSTER: AFRICAN WOMEN THEOLOGIANS DOING THEOLOGY: MAKING CONNECTIONS.

It diverged from Wesleyan Methodism* regarding what happens in believers' hearts at the moment of sanctification*. In contrast to the Wesleyans' Arminianism*, the Calvinistic Keswick Movement held that the sanctified are not made holy but are victorious over sin*, which remains in their hearts, and thus are in constant need of grace*.

Kierkegaard, Søren Aabye (1813–55), Danish writer, theologian, philosopher. Born in Copenhagen, he graduated in theology (1840) and defended his thesis, On the Concept of Irony (1841). In 1840 he became engaged to Regine Olsen (1822–1904). The engagement, dissolved after only 11 months, had a lasting influence on his life and authorship.

Kierkegaard wrote approximately 40 books and pamphlets and a similar number of newspaper articles. Approximately half of his publications were written under various pseudonyms. The other half, edifying discourses, were published in his own name.

Kierkegaard's impact on Christian theology is multifarious. In The Concept of Anxiety (1844), his pseudonym, Vigilius Haufniensis, revises the traditional doctrine of original* sin* going back to Augustine*. Kierkegaard emphasizes that sin always enters the world through the concrete sin of each individual; thus sin must not be understood as a hereditary deformity of human nature.

In Philosophical Fragments (1844), under the pseudonym Johannes Climacus, Kierkegaard sharpens his understanding of faith* and Christianity. He takes as his point of departure Socrates*, who presupposes that truth is posited within the human being and can be reached in an immanent way. As an alternative, Climacus claims that Christianity presupposes that one is in a state of sin because of one's own guilt, and therefore it is not possible to relate to the truth by oneself, but only through transcendence. From this thought stems Kierkegaard's understanding of God as the absolute paradox*, which he fully developed in Concluding Unscientific Postscript (1846), also by Climacus.

Paradox is a key concept in Kierkegaard's attempt to interpret Christianity as a contradictory unity of time* and eternity*, which defies discursive understanding. The Christian paradox is that the infinite God has become a finite human being at a certain point in history and as such has suffered death on the cross. Kierkegaard's view of paradox is also found in his doctrine of "the stages," a theory about the relation between the three spheres of existence: the aesthetic*, the ethical*, and the religious. In the religious stage, the ethical commitment is combined with faith in a personal God who not only demands obedience (religiousness A), but also forgives in Christ the person's disobedience or sin (religiousness B, or the paradoxical religiousness). The transition from religiousness A to religiousness B happens by a leap.

After 1846 Kierkegaard radicalizes his understanding of Christianity and stresses that suffering*, martyrdom*, and imitation* are essential signs of true Christianity. Works of Love (1847) analyzes the relation between human love* and love of one's neighbor, and represents Kierkegaard's contribution to Christian ethics. But already in Works of Love, the radicalization of his view of Christianity and his critique of "Christendom*," the notion of Christianity as a cultural artifact, are visible. In The Sickness unto Death (1849) by Anti-Climacus, Kierkegaard continues his reflections on sin beyond The Concept of Anxiety by analyzing key concepts like despair and offense as constitutive of true Christianity. In Practice in Christianity (1850), by Anti-Climacus, Kierkegaard sharpens his view and draws a dividing line between the false triumphant church and the true struggling church.

In February 1854, Professor H. L. Martensen's declaration at the funeral service of Bishop J. P. Mynster that Mynster was a martyr gave rise to Kierkegaard's attack on the Danish Church. In a newspaper article in December 1854, Kierkegaard severely criticized Mynster as the representative of the official church; during the following months, he extended his attack to include every pastor in the Danish Church. Inwardness is an essential part of Kierkegaard's description of existence; it is often put on the same footing as appropriation and redoubling. "Redoubling" means that one should exist according to what one believes, even if this results in a collision with the world, a collision that could end in martyrdom rather than in a comfortable position as a vicar. Kierkegaard accuses Mynster and all the pastors of the Danish Church of lacking inwardness, whereby they "make a fool out of God" by only "pretending" to be Christians. In 1855 Kierkegaard published his own series of pamphlets, The Moment. After the publication of the ninth volume, he suddenly collapsed in the street and died on November 11.

Kierkegaard's emphasis on the responsibility of the individual for his or her own life has had an enormous impact on French existentialism*, whereas his religious thought has been taken up primarily in German, Danish, and later North American contexts, with the early Barth*, Bultmann*, and Tillich* being the most famous of those influenced by him. Kimbugu, Simon (c1887–1951), whose teaching led to the creation of "the Church of Jesus Christ on Earth by the Prophet Simon Kimbugu," or Kimbuguism*. Born in Nkamba (Bas-Congo, Republic of Congo* [Congo-Brazzaville]) to non-Christian parents, who named him “Kimbangu” (one who reveals hidden things), he was raised by his Christian aunt near a Baptist Missionary Society station, where he was educated. Baptized (1915), married to Marie Mwilu (with whom he had three children, Charles Kisolokele, Salomon Dialungana-Kiangani, and Joseph Diangienda [or Diangenda]), he became a catechist in his native village while continuing to care for his fields. According to Kimbanguist sources, in repeated visions (from 1918) Kimbangu heard himself being called and sent by Jesus as an “apostle” to his brothers and sisters, because of the unfaithfulness of the church. After he finally accepted his calling, Kimbangu’s mission started on April 6, 1921, when through prayer and the laying on of hands, he healed a woman. This and other instances of healing (see Health, Healing, and Christianity Cluster: In Africa: African Traditional Practices and Christianity), together with his preaching (in the Kikongo language), soon brought crowds to Nkamba; a revival* had begun. From then on, people called Simon Kimbangu ngunza (prophet) and mvuluzi (messiah, savior). With seven collaborators (“disciples”), Kimbangu preached repentance*, conversion to Jesus, love* for God and neighbors, God’s judgment*, forgiveness*, and liberation* from all evil* through Jesus Christ. He called his followers to receive the Kingdom* of God, which had been taken away from unfaithful servants (the European missionaries; cf. Matt 21:33–43). Emphasizing the authority of the Bible, he asked his followers to reject alcohol, tobacco, dancing, fetishism, sorcery, and polygamy*. Since Kimbangu was leading a revival movement within the Baptist Church, he sent those who wished to be baptized* to that church rather than baptizing himself. He did not want to found a church. Yet Catholic and Protestant catechism schools were deserted by his followers.

Kimbangu’s preaching, strongly Africanized, emphasized that some biblical texts, including the parables and Exodus, directly addressed Africans and the fundamental issues of their lives, and called for their liberation. At first, he emphasized spiritual liberation, but he soon concerned himself with political liberation as well, prophesying about independence, a time when “blacks will become whites, and whites blacks.” On October 1921, Kimbangu was arrested, brought before a military court, and publicly condemned to death for threatening national security and for preaching about a “new God” who would be worshipped in a national Black church. However, King Albert commuted his sentence to life in prison, where he died on October 12, 1951.

JEAN-CLAUDE LOBA-MKOLE

Kimbanguism began as a 1921 revival movement that arose out of the preaching and ministry in Bas-Congo of Simon Kimbangu (see Kimbangu, Simon), a Congolese Baptist catechist, and that gave rise to the Church of Jesus Christ on Earth by the Prophet Simon Kimbangu (Église de Jésus Christ sur la terre par son envoyé spécial Simon Kimbangu; EJCSK), a member of the World* Council of Churches.

Several years after Kimbangu’s death in prison (1951), his disciples met in Matadi-Mayo (1958). Joseph Diangienda (1918–92), Kimbangu’s youngest son, became the spiritual leader of the Church (assisted by his elder brothers, Charles Kisolokele and Salomon Dialungana-Kiangani) and began organizing it (1959). (The spiritual leader of the hierarchical and centralized EJCSK must be a descendant of Simon Kimbangu.) The EJCSK is trinitarian*, although it symbolizes the Trinity in an African way (symbolized as African persons; God is black). Its spirituality is charismatic*. Its pastors include both men and women. Women are ordained pastors because of the example set by Mama Mwilu, Kimbangu’s wife, who led the revival movement while her husband was in jail, and because the Holy* Spirit inspires women as well as men.

With its 15 million members, the EJCSK is an important Christian presence, besides Catholicism and Protestantism, in the Democratic Republic of Congo*, Republic of the Congo* (Congo-Brazzaville), and Angola*; it is a missionary church in other parts of Africa and Madagascar, as well as in Europe and North America. Following Kimbangu’s teaching, the EJCSK is financially independent, so as to avoid any dependence on Western churches. Its members support the church through nsinsani, an African socioeconomic communal practice of mutual aid (whereby different groups compete to meet the needs of the Church and its mission).

Kimbanguism has generated two kinds of theology: an oral theology and a more systematic written theology. The oral theology is expressed in inspired hymns, African melodies, spontaneous prayers, and sermons that make use of African illustrations, proverbs, and wisdom teachings. This theology is totally inculturated*. All the key themes of the gospel of Jesus Christ emphasized in Baptist churches (e.g. repentance, faith, grace, love) are expressed in hymns, prayers, and sermons, alongside Kimbanguist history and theology. Following Kimbangu, preachers do not hesitate to underscore the liberation* message of all the parts of the Bible and to identify (typologically*) the people of Israel under slavery with the persecuted Kimbanguists (under Belgium colonialist power); to interpret the Exodus as both revivalist spiritual liberation and political independence; and to identify the Pharisees, who opposed Jesus, with the white missionaries of the colonial period. The “black race” (like the “lost sheep” [Luke 15:4–6] and those brought to the king’s banquet from the streets [Matt 22:1–14]) is an important Kimbanguist theological theme. Kimbangu had proposed such biblical interpretations. Joseph Diangienda further pondered the origin of black humanity, its ongoing pauperization and suffering, and its place in the history of salvation. From this perspective, hymns and sermons evoke the problem of evil and envision not only Adam and Eve, but also God as black: “For we too are his offspring” (Acts 17:28), created in God’s image. Thus the black race is divine and blessed, but this blessing became a curse because of “original* sin*,” which for Kimbanguists is sorcery and “black magic”; the church must be freed from these through rituals of repentance (such as the repentance ritual in which people covered themselves with sackcloth and ashes [following Jonah 3:6], a ritual led in December 1992 by Salomon Dialungana-Kiangani, the brother and successor of Joseph Diangienda).

The written Kimbanguist theology was developed especially in 1965–1971 in preparation for admission to the World* Council of Churches and the Conference of the Churches of All Africa. The resulting 1977 document spelled out the Kimbanguist views on all the main theological topics, from creation to the Trinity, salvation, the sacraments, liturgy, ethical issues, and ecclesiology, clarifying the African inculturation of many aspects of the Kimbanguist oral theology that might seem alarming. For instance, during the celebration of the Lord’s* Supper, the Body of Christ is an African cake (made with corn, potato, and banana) and the Blood of Christ is honey mixed with holy water. Salvation* is conditional, in that grace and faith must be complemented by the “fruits of faith,” namely good deeds. The Kingdom, from an African Millennialist* perspective, is still completely in the future. The “communion of saints,” those who overcame Satan, include Kimbangu. The EJCSK believes in the Trinity, yet the Trinity is symbolized by Simon Kimbangu’s three sons, paths to the trinitarian God. Regarding gospel and culture*, the EJCSK respects the culture and identity of each ethnic group.

King, Martin Luther, Jr. (1929–68), African American Baptist clergyman, theologian, civil* rights leader. Born in Atlanta, Georgia, King, a descendant of generations of clergymen, was steeped in the traditions of the Ebenezer Baptist Church and Southern Black Baptist Protestantism. He graduated from Morehouse College (1948), Crozer Theological Seminary (1951), and Boston University (1955, Ph.D., philosophical theology). Doubts surfaced as King moved through his studies, compelling him to reject much of the Christian fundamentalism* of his church heritage in favor of biblical and theological liberalism (see Liberal Theology). The shift in King’s thinking became glaringly evident when he was introduced to historical-critical biblical studies and embraced insights from Boston Personalism* and the Social* Gospel of Walter Rauschenbusch* and others. While serving as pastor of the Dexter Avenue Baptist Church in Montgomery, Alabama (1954), he was catapulted to leadership of the Montgomery bus boycott (1955–56). King was involved in the founding of the Southern* Christian Leadership Conference (SCLC, 1957), a civil rights organization led by ministers and rooted in the Black church. Returning to Atlanta (1960), he used the Ebenezer Baptist Church as a platform for his civil rights activities. Drawing on the teachings of Jesus and the nonviolent* philosophy of Mohandas K. Gandhi, King led church-centered civil rights campaigns in many US cities, including Albany, Georgia (1961–62), Birmingham, Alabama (1963), Washington, D.C. (1963), St. Augustine, Florida (1964), Selma, Alabama (1965), Chicago (1966–67), and Memphis, Tennessee (1968). In these and other campaigns, he elevated the politics of civil disobedience and nonviolent confrontation to unprecedented levels, without compromising what he saw as the essential core of traditional Christian truths and values. He applied the biblical principles of love* and justice* in a determined effort to eliminate racial oppression*, economic exploitation, war*, and human destruction. Although best known as a pastor and civil rights leader, King was a polished academic who combined theological liberalism, biblical piety, and sociopolitical analysis in a manner that suited the changing political, intellectual, and cultural climate of the 1950s and 1960s. His six books and numerous essays advance the major themes in his thought, namely the personal God of love and reason, the redemptive power of love and nonviolence, the sacredness of the human personality, the moral obligation to resist evil, the beloved community as the highest human ideal, and the social mission of the church. See also CIVIL RIGHTS MOVEMENT. LEWIS V. 1) Introductory Entry

Kingdom of God, the Concept of, in the New Testament (Gk basileia tou theou; basileia ton ouranon [Kingdom of Heaven; Matthew]), at the core of Jesus' teaching, is a symbolic figure that, by definition (see Symbolism), "represents connections between individual, community, and ultimate reality." Its significance varies in the NT and throughout history according to the ways the figure is constructed and represented, namely in parables*.

The Kingdom as the Reign of God is envisioned as the ideal people of God over whom God reigns, especially when the Kingdom figure is constructed as a prolongation of the covenant* and the wisdom* tradition. This ideal community submits to God's authority as king, walks humbly with God, loves the neighbor, and exemplifies God's justice in a new family-like egalitarian community, a "kin-dom." "Your kingdom come" points to the establishment of the kin-dom/kingdom by believers who do God's will; thus while its full realization will take place in the future, pockets of the kin-dom are already found. Most directly expressed by Luke's presentation of the parables*, this view of the Kingdom is found throughout history in all movements striving to establish a new social order, e.g. the Social* Gospel.

The Kingdom as the Eschatological Empire of God is envisioned as the age to come, which will bring to an end the evil*, demonic* empires of the present age, when the figure is constructed in an apocalyptic* perspective, as a future reality on earth although it is seemingly conceived as a present reality in heaven ("Your kingdom come. Your will be done, on earth as it is in heaven"; Matt 6:10). As an eschatological* promise (e.g. Matt. 5:3–12) of a new order to be established by God in an imminent future, the proclamation of the coming of God's Kingdom (basileia) is a potent source for judgment of the status quo, which in NT times was the empire or kingdom (basileia) of Rome and of satanic or demonic powers that keep people in bondage. This is most directly expressed by Matthew's presentation of the parables* read in light of the coming Judgment*.

The Kingdom as God's Series of Powerful Kingly Interventions is envisioned when the figure of the Kingdom is constructed as an ongoing and decisive prolongation of God's powerful activity in history, following the type* of God acting as king (Heb malek) when freeing Israel from Egypt in Exod 15:11–18, or of God's kingly activity (Heb malkuth) or mighty deeds in Ps 145:11–12. In the end-time (Jesus' ministry and beyond), one can see God's ongoing kingly interventions, which are a mystery that is by definition beyond understanding (Mark 4:11). One experiences and encounters these kingly activities of God when one reads the parables as pointing toward this mystery, as the Gospels of Mark and Thomas do in different ways. See also PARABLE.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Kingdom of God, the Concept of, in Africa. The Lord's* Prayer, well known and often recited in African Christianity, requests that "Your kingdom come." "Kingdom" is understood by many ordinary African Christians in spatial terms, similar to earthly kingdoms, the only difference being that God's Kingdom is in heaven. It is accessible only at death when one is a baptized member of a church here on earth. The Kingdom of God is conceived of as a spiritual realm. This is the popular understanding usually found in missionary churches in Africa.

A political version of the Kingdom was presented by Ghana's first president, Kwame Nkrumah, when he said, "Seek ye first the political kingdom and the rest shall be added unto you." He put "political kingdom" where Jesus had "Kingdom of God or Heaven" (cf. Matt 6:33). This "materialist" reading of the gospel texts about the Kingdom contrasted sharply with the missionary churches' teaching.

In between these two views, a third view has emerged: a so-called liberation view of the Kingdom. Here the focus is on the Reign of God as the abundant life that African people need today as they begin the third millennium. Therefore, the Kingdom or Reign of God is understood as liberation* from sin*, i.e. from any form of oppression* – cultural, economic, political, or social; as the promotion and establishment of socioeconomic justice*, democratic governance, and human* rights; and as the realization of full uMunthu or Ubuntu (humanness) as seen in the face of Christ.

Harvey Sindima comments, "To pray for God's kingdom to come is to ask God to intervene in human history and establish divine rule, that is, to liberate people bound by socio-economic and political powers – this advent of God into history is liberation." Sindima continues by arguing that this petition asks God to set in motion a resistance movement against the current social, political, and economic order, which by its very nature is oppressive* because it is permeated by sin; and encourages Christians not to surrender to the current powers or become immobilized by fear, but to become instruments of God in bringing about a new order of justice.

AUGUSTINE MUSOPOLE

Kingdom of God, the Concept of, in Asia. The concept of "Kingdom of God" occupies a central place in Asian theologies of liberation*, such as those of Choan-Seng Song, Aloysius Pieris, Michael Amaladoss, Peter Phan, Minjung* theology (Korea), Homeland theology (Taiwan), theology of struggle (the Philippines), Dalit* theology (India), and Asian Feminist* theology. These theologies argue that the primary mission of the church is to proclaim and bear witness to the Reign of God, and not simply to save souls and plant the church. The symbol of the Reign of God allows Asians to overcome the pronounced individualism of their religions and ethics and to view salvation* as necessarily comprising the sociopolitical, economic, and cultural dimensions of human existence. It requires Asian Christians to commit themselves to the "preferential" option for the poor,* to join with those who are oppressed* in their struggle for human* rights and freedom*, and to identify and fight against the forces that enslave their fellow Asians (e.g. communism, neocapitalism, sex tourism, human labor trafficking, ecological destruction). Furthermore, it enables Asian to recognize the gratuitousness of God's gift of salvation* over against the common emphasis on earning merit. Finally, the symbol of Kingdom of God directs Asian attention away from the golden age of a mythic past and turns it toward the eschatological* end-time (eschaton), when the risen Christ himself will "come again" to judge the living and the dead and to bring the Reign of God to ultimate fulfillment. PETER C. PHAN Kingdom of God, the Concept of, in North America: Latino/a. Latino/a Christians emphasize the political relevance of the Kingdom but disagree as to the locus of the political.

For some the political for which the Kingdom is relevant is the all-encompassing public dimension of life. In the OT, God's rule is manifest in Israel's history and awaits full establishment through the coming of the Messiah. The NT claims that the fullness of the Kingdom will ultimately be established by God in the future, yet also claims that God's power and sovereignty were present in history through Christ's acts of healing and liberating the poor, the sick, and the needy. The community of faith gets a glimpse of life in the Kingdom when it acts in ways fitting the Kingdom that "is and is not yet." The establishment of the Kingdom is a gift from God, and not a human achievement. Thus Latino/a Christians use the image of the Kingdom to motivate the faith community and people of goodwill to commit themselves to the tasks of reforming the present distribution of power, wealth, social positions, and social services and of empowering the poor* and marginalized* to achieve fullness of life. The Kingdom is a standard of love* and justice* that calls for more inclusive and harmonious social and political communities.

Other Latino/a Christians, with a narrower definition of the political, limit the Kingdom to the quality of life that ought to be maintained within the church as a loving, caring, and egalitarian community. The church's task is not so much to transform the world as to witness to the world a better way of living. This view of the Kingdom had an ambiguous political history. Whenever the church claimed to be the only true representative of the Kingdom, it tended to curtail all other legitimate claims of justice* and social reform.

Still other Latino/a Christians have argued that the normative vision of the Kingdom transcends history. It enables the church to denounce the evils and shortcomings of our present social and communal life, but it is not continuous with this life; we cannot bring our world in harmony with the Kingdom.

In all cases, Latino/a Christians see the Kingdom as transforming life through denunciatory judgments and acts of mercy; and as the vantage point from which the meaning and purpose of history can be perceived.

ISMAEL GARCÍA

Kingdom of God, the Concept of, in the Western World.

A question commonly raised in the West has been: How is the Kingdom of God related to the kingdoms of this world, which are always in some tension with it? Augustine* differentiated the earthly city from the city of God. Luther* spoke of two* kingdoms or two realms in which human life takes place. Are the Kingdom of God and the kingdoms of this world opposed? Or in tension with each other? Or parallel? Or can earthly life be transformed by the Reign of God? Answers vary with the degree of optimism about the current situation and about possibilities for transformation through human or divine action.

These questions show that the Western tradition has privileged, among the views just listed, the view of the Kingdom as the ideal community over which God rules and which submits to God's authority, loves the neighbor, and exemplifies God's justice in a new family-like egalitarian community. Thus it is appropriate to speak of it as the "Reign of God" or as the "kingdom" – to avoid patriarchal* or kyriarchal* connotations.

The Reign of God as the central theme of Jesus' preaching was also revived in 19th- to 20th-c. liberal* theology as an eschatological* notion, oriented toward the future. While God was regarded as always sovereign, God's rule has not taken full effect. But there is hope* for God's effective rule. Just what this future might be is not clear from the texts, and conflicts of interpretation have multiplied.

Kingdom of God in the Eastern Orthodox Tradition: Kingdom and Wilderness.

In the Eastern Orthodox tradition, the Kingdom of God and the eschatological fulfillment of creation* to become a new* creation have been associated with wilderness. Wilderness is the site of the integration of the material and spiritual realms, whereupon both realms are fulfilled in an embodiment of the new creation and Kingdom of God, fulfilling all cultural histories. Wilderness is a place of repentance*, illumination, and theosis*. St. Catherine's monastery in the Sinai Desert was established close to where Moses* spoke with God and is where John* Climacus wrote his Ladder of Divine Ascent. From the wilderness, Isaac the Syrian stated that theosis is burning compassion for all creatures, even demons*. In contemporary Orthodox theology, wilderness also provides insights into how the evolution of the material realm is brought into union with the spiritual realm. The ecological* dynamics of the nested natural systems of wilderness can be outlined by noting that within it each human being is potentially a microcosm reflexively aware of nature as a whole and of the Holy* Spirit, which makes possible this awareness (see Ecology and Christianity Cluster: Eastern Orthodoxy Perspective). The indwelling of the Holy Spirit in individual human creatures enables responsible and compassionate communion with all of nature to fulfill our creative capability and thus become a new* creation, God's Kingdom.

Furthermore, from this perspective, the sin* of Adam* is understood to be the denial of death* that arose as human individuals emerged as the first creatures conscious of death as an existential reality. As evolutionary* biology indicates, the purpose of individuation is to allow death, and the purpose of both individuation and death is to allow evolution of new life. Accordingly, from the Orthodox perspective of the Kingdom, the evolutionary dynamics of wilderness over the 4 billion years of the evolution of life can be seen to be a cosmic Eucharist* in which created beings come to the door of the new* creation – a door opened by Jesus Christ to fulfill all cultural histories, enabling all to discover the meaning of life in communion with, and in self-sacrificial compassion for, all of creation. The contemporary struggle for sustainable development and global social justice*, inspired by the Holy* Spirit, is the cosmic Eucharist, a liturgy in which we ourselves participate. See also TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE.

Kingdom or Reign of Christ. In the NT, Jesus is called Lord because of his resurrection and exaltation (Rom 1:4; Phil 2:11; Acts 2:36). In the infancy narratives, he is said to be the inheritor of David's kingship (Matt 2:2; Luke 1:32–33). Yet Jesus' rule is not always equated with God's. The OT verse most commonly quoted in the NT is Ps 110:1: "Sit here at my right hand until I make your enemies your footstool." Paul anticipates that Christ will "deliver the kingdom to God the Father" (1 Cor 15:24), after which Christ will also be subject to God (1 Cor 15:28). In the 4th c., Photinus* emphasized this as part of his allegedly modalist* view of the Trinity* and was condemned by several councils; this is the reason for the words "of his reign there will be no end" in the Niceno*-Constantinopolitan Creed.

Augustine*, who adhered to the doctrine expressed in this creed, still asserted that the Reign of Christ has different characteristics than the Reign of God. He equated the millennium* with Christ's reigning in the hearts of the faithful as they struggle against inward and outward temptations (De civ. Dei XX.8–9). It is similar, then, to the Reign of the Holy* Spirit, described by Paul as "groaning in travail" (Rom 8:12–25). This perspective is adopted by many contemporary theologians who see the present as a time of struggle and hope* rather than one of triumph.

King James Authorized Version. See BIBLE TRANSLATION CLUSTER.

Kings, 1–2, Books of (3–4 Kingdoms in the Septuagint*), are the last components of the Former Prophets (in the Jewish Bible), which also include Joshua*, Judges*, and 1–2 Samuel*. Traditionally ascribed to Jeremiah*, most scholars now consider 1–2 Kings to be part of the Deuteronomistic* History, which spans the Former Prophets, with an initial edition during King Josiah's reign (late 7th c. BCE), updated during or just after the Exile (for other scholars, the time of the books' entire composition). 1–2 Kings narrates the succession of David* by Solomon*, the building of the Temple*, Solomon's apostasy, the division of the kingdom into Israel (Northern) and Judah (Southern). Continuing apostasy leads to the destruction of Israel by Assyria and then of Judah by Babylon, despite Josiah's reforms.

1–2 Kings addresses a dispersed Judean population, justifying the Exile. The theme of royal obedience to divine law is central. Significant, too, are the exclusivity of worship in Jerusalem, the fulfillment of the covenant* curses for apostasy, and the role of prophecy as warnings and predictions of divine judgment. Thus dynastic promises to David are portrayed as conditional. The ending of the book, narrating the release of the imprisoned king Jehoiachin, is highly enigmatic. It intimates that the dynasty is not entirely defunct, although the degree to which a monarchic restoration is envisioned is probably minimal at best.

Often considered a direct historical source, 1–2 Kings is a literary and ideological document demonstrating the continuing relevance of Israelite religion and identity as a defense against assimilation. It ensures the sacrality of Jerusalem* as a holy site despite the loss of the Temple. The Northern Kingdom's fall is depicted in such a way that Judah becomes the continuing focal point of "Israelite" identity. This plays not only into the later distinction between Samaritans and Jews, but also into the legends of the "lost tribes of Israel." Jewish tradition looks to 1–2 Kings in recollection of former national glory and independence, whereas the fall of the Temple is commemorated on the solemn occasion of Tisha B'ab, "Ninth of Ab" (usually in August). Along with the rest of the Former Prophets, Kings provides perspectives on the nature of political power and the relationship between national fortunes and the divine will. Its theme of exile helped solidify later Jewish identity as a people in diaspora*.

Kirchentag, annual gathering of all Protestant churches in Germany, with significant lay participation. It is marked by three historical phases: from 1848 to 1872, inspired by Wichern*'s speech at the founding of the Inner* Mission (1848), the Kirchentag functioned as an alternative to the spirit of the 1848 revolutions in Germany; from 1919 to 1930, it was an official gathering of the German Evangelical Church, with nationalistic emphasis; and from 1949 to the present, continuing the heritage of the Confessing* Church, it was ecumenical and concerned with the renewal of church and society, uniting Protestants in East and West Germany until the Berlin Wall was built (1961) and supporting the peace movement of the 1980s.

Kirishitans and Hidden Christians in Japan. "Kirishitan" is the Japanese pronunciation of the Portuguese Christão. The history of Christians in Japan* has three stages: (1) from 1549 (Francis* Xavier's introduction of Roman Catholic Christianity) to 1644 (the martyrdom of Manshiyo Konishi, the last missionary in Japan); (2) from 1644 to 1873, the proscription of Christianity (lifted in 1873); and (3) from 1873 until today.

1. 1549–1644. When the Catholic missionaries pursued evangelism, Japanese language and customs often impeded conversion. Some local rulers, like Sumitada Oomura, showed an interest in Christianity partly because of the potential benefits of trade relations with the missionaries' countries; others, like Ukon Takayama, adopted the Christian faith themselves and were baptized, and mass conversion in their territory often followed.

2. 1644–1873. The shogunate isolation policy led to the persistent persecution, martyrdom, and banishment of Kirishitans and missionaries. Thus some Kirishitans formed underground groups, called confraria or companhia, to pass their teachings and rituals on to future generations. Kirishitans, now called Sempuku (underground) Kirishitans, covertly maintained their faith at the risk of their life without any teaching priests.

3. 1873–Today. When Christianity was once again tolerated, some Kirishitans returned to the Roman Catholic Church and were called Fukkatsu, or "resurrected," Kirishitans by Francisque Marnas (1896). Others, called Kakure, or "hidden," Kirishitans (although they did not need to hide as before), maintained their form of Christian faith, which had been syncretistically fused (some would say, inculturated) with local conventional religions and customs, including Buddhism* and Shintoism*. The Catholic Church tended to call them Harare, or "separate," Kirishitans, because they separated themselves from the Church. Today a few hundred Kakure Kirishitan households remain, mainly in Nagasaki Prefecture, with their particular oratio, relics, tombstones, rituals, and literature.

Knox, John (c1514–72). Leading Scottish and British Reformer and icon of Protestant Scotland, he had a British and European perspective. His most significant contributions were the Protestant triumph during Scotland's Reformation crisis of 1559–60 and his tenure as Edinburgh's minister, 1560–72, which placed him at the heart of the kingdom's affairs. On her return, he vigorously opposed Mary, queen of Scots, regarding private Mass (1561) and supported her deposition in 1567. While his outspoken preaching made him the leading voice in the first years of the Church of Scotland* (the Kirk), its organization was largely the work of others. Knox's History of the Reformation (1587) became the model for Scottish Presbyterian historiography, and his 1558 resistance tracts, including The First Blast, influenced European political thought. He had previously served as minister (1549–53) within the Edwardian Church of England* and Marian exile congregations* (1554–59), and remained in close contact with Elizabethan Puritans*. His ecclesiological and theological views, especially on predestination*, were influenced by his friends John Calvin* and Theodore Beza*.

Knox regarded himself as a preacher and prophet offering a black-and-white, apocalyptic* view of the world, where Protestants battled against Antichrist*, which they identified with the papacy. In God's cause, it was legitimate to resist "ungodly" rulers. One of the main attributes of Christian commonwealth was to maintain purity in worship and avoid idolatry*, with a strict adherence to the principle that nothing lacking scriptural warrant was acceptable. Knox was a forerunner of Scottish covenant* thought, teaching that by openly accepting Protestantism, a kingdom entered into covenant with God, parallel to the experience of OT Israel.

Knox's part authorship and his authority shaped the fundamental texts of the Scottish Reformation – the Geneva* Bible, the Book* of Common Order, the Scottish Confession of Faith, and the First Book of Discipline – which together helped mold the character of the nation's Kirk and people. The Scottish Reformer, he was also regarded as a founding father of the Reformed* tradition and of English Nonconformity*. In Scottish contemporary thinking, he personifies the country's Reformation and the adoption of an uncompromising Protestant stance, and is sometimes unfairly caricatured as a killjoy and woman hater.

Knox's surviving writings are found in Laing's Works (1846–64); they comprise his History, his resistance tracts, First Blast of the Trumpet, Letter to the Regent, Appellation to the Nobility, Letter to Commonalty (1558), and other polemical, devotional, and theological tracts, as well as his liturgical and ecclesiastical papers and letters (1548–72).

Korea, North. Liberation from the Japanese colonial occupation (1905–45), the subsequent division of the Korean Peninsula, and the occupation of the North by the Soviet Union brought about drastic changes for Christian communities in North Korea. Until 1948 Christianity was vibrant and dynamic; the churches were centers of the anti-Japanese independence movement. But the establishment of the pro-Soviet Communist government of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (1948) had a disastrous impact on the Christian communities that opposed the atheist ideology of Communism and the government's antireligious policies and land reforms. Tens of thousands of North Korean Christians, including church leaders, fled to the South.

When the Korean War broke out (1950), hundreds of dissident Christian leaders were imprisoned and executed without trial, and most church buildings were either destroyed or confiscated. Even though the Federation of Korean Christians was organized in 1946 (a pro-Communist government organization), no Christian activities were known until 1972, when the North and South governments began a process of peace and reconciliation. The Pyongyang Theological Seminary, the only institution for pastoral training, opened in 1972. By 1992 two state-sponsored Protestant congregations (the Pongsu Church and the Chilgol Church, built respectively in 1988 and 1992) and one Roman Catholic parish (Changchun Catholic Church) were under the supervision of the Federation of Korean Christians and held regular worship services. Although their members number less than 1,000, they serve as a conduit between the tightly closed Korean society and the Western world. Leaders of the Federation of Korean Christians attended various meetings that addressed the peaceful reunification of Korea. These were organized by international ecumenical bodies such as the World* Council of Churches, which in turn sent delegates to North Korea in the 1980s and 1990s, along with thousands of Christian leaders (from, e.g., US and Canadian churches) and members of humanitarian relief organizations (including some from South Korea).

The majority of Christians (only about 10,000 in the early 1990s) worship in house* churches, where 10–15 persons regularly meet for Sunday services. They use Bibles (OT and NT) published in North Korea since 1984 (reprinting the South Korean Catholic–Protestant common translation) and a hymnal (a slightly revised 1939 hymnal). Yet young people under the age of 18 are prohibited by law from participating in worship services. The three-year theological school admits fewer than 10 students a year, selected among college graduates. As of 2009, nearly 90 seminary graduates were active in the churches.

As a state-sponsored religious organization, the Federation of Korean Christians must have a theology that accommodates the state ideology* of juche (self-reliance) framed by an atheistic humanism of a Feuerbach* type. Yet it is possible that indigenous contextual theologies will emerge in North Korea.

DAVID KWANG-SUN SUH

Korea, South. Christianity in Korea is marked by a twofold tension. Since 1950 it has grown from a tiny minority proclaiming a gospel of justice* and empowerment for the weak to a powerful movement emphasizing personal salvation* and a gospel of prosperity*. Second, it has gained distinctive features through its interactions with Shamanism*, Buddhism* and Confucianism*, even as it contributed to the modernization and westernization of Korea.

Late 18th and 19th Century: Implantation of Catholicism. Christianity was first introduced in Korea in the 17th century by young Confucian Silhak scholars who studied Christian literature brought from China. It was in Beijing that the first Korean, Yi Sung Hun, was baptized; returning to Korea in 1784 he founded a Catholic church. Catholicism quickly spread, despite harsh persecutions due primarily to the Christians' refusal to observe ancestral* rites. For Confucians, this was a clear evidence that western culture and religion desecrated Korean culture; ultimately Taewongun (regent, 1864–

73) outlawed foreign cultures and religions. Persecution ceased after the Japanese invasion in 1876 and the treaty with the United States in 1882. During the bicentennial commemoration of Korean Catholicism (in 1984), Pope John Paul II canonized 103 Korean martyrs – starting with Kim DaeGon (1822–46). Korean Catholics played an important role in the struggle against political and economic oppression through the 1970s and 1980s.

Late 19th Century: Early US Protestant Missions. These missions began with Horace Allen, a US doctor and Presbyterian missionary, who had been transferred from China to Korea in 1884 and provided health* services for the imperial court. In 1885 another Presbyterian, Horace G. Underwood, and a Methodist, Henry G. Appenzeller, came to Korea. Protestant missions maintained a balance between evangelism*, social welfare, and educational* programs, building medical clinics and Christian schools. Besides the establishment of churches, the fruits of this missionary work included social reforms led by Koreans trained in Protestant mission schools, the empowerment of disenfranchised people, and the opening of Korean society to Western culture.

Starting in 1890, Samuel Moffett established a different form of Protestantism in Pyongyang, now the capital city of North Korea. His teaching was focused on repentance* and personal salvation*, appealing to Koreans' spiritual hunger for freedom but not explicitly confronting the social issues resulting from Japan's brutal rule over Korea. In fact, the American Board for Foreign Missions and the US government instructed missionaries in Korea not to engage in politics. Korean churches were nevertheless viewed as anti-Japanese through their association with the West and the USA; many Christians actively participated in the independence movement in 1919 and resisted, with Moffett and other missionaries, the Japanese imposition of Shinto* shrine worship in the 1930s.

1945–1960: After the Liberation of Korea. Following much political upheaval, a US-backed government headed by Syngman Rhee, a US-educated Methodist, was established in South Korea in 1948. The Korean War in 1950 brought a large number of North Korean Christians to the South. Since then South Korean Protestantism has tended to side with anti-Communist ideologies, reinforcing the governments' policies against the Communism of North Korea.

After 1960: The Rapid Growth of Christianity.

Christians increased from 18.3% of the population in 1970 to 40.8% in 2000. This growth took place while the country was undergoing rapid industrialization; several military coups supported the economic exploitation of the masses by government-supported conglomerates. Most of the Protestant churches remained silent about this political and economic situation. Implicitly supporting the dictatorial governments by leading prayer breakfasts for the presidents, pastors of megachurches* taught and preached the blessings of economic and spiritual success and upward social mobility. The charismatic* services with their exuberant expressions of faith and their appeal to the Prosperity Gospel were viewed as a return to the enthusiasm of the early church. Yet this success-oriented faith and charismatic practice are also an inculturation* of Christianity reflecting traditional Korean Shamanistic* religious practices.

This period witnessed a rash of divisions and subdivisions of Protestant churches. Fully one-third of Protestants are members of churches that have seceded from the main denominations or of the hundreds of independent denominations in Korea. These divisions, caused mostly by leadership conflicts, reflect a conception of the church* strongly influenced by the Confucian hierarchical culture. Church communities separate themselves from very similar ones in order to maintain their own family-like authority structures. In most Korean Protestant congregations, the pastor is the “big father” (the patriarch); the elders are the “second fathers” (sharing and extending the authority of the patriarch); the anointed deacons are “big hands” (overseers to whom authority has been delegated in a specific domain); non-anointed deacons are “workers” (bearing authority through their work for the family); all other members, including women and children, are ordinary family members. Each congregation remains in a denomination only insofar as its authority structure is respected. Each denomination has founded its own theological school where pastors are trained to assume authority over congregations. Graduating pastors are in competition with each other to prove their authority by founding new congregations of the denomination.

Women’s leadership in the church is either denied or very limited in this hierarchical culture: women are ordained in only a few denominations. Nevertheless, women’s role in Korean churches cannot be underestimated. More than 50% of members are women; their sacrificial faith is often viewed as an example of Christian discipleship*, and women have developed safe spaces within the churches for the free exercise of their faith and upward social mobility. Feminists and advocacy groups for women’s rights actively assume more leadership roles in both church and society.

Christian social witness, comparable to that of the early Protestant missionaries, did not disappear altogether despite the prevalence of the Prosperity Gospel and personal salvation. Minjung* theology is a response to the political and economic oppression of the “people” (minjung). In the Gospel of Justice Movement, Christian students, professors, and pastors repeatedly protest against oppressive social and economic policies of the government.

Charismatic early-morning prayer services that begin at 4 o’clock everyday are a typical Korean ritual practice influenced by Buddhism and Shamanism. Buddhist temples have early-morning services. Shamanism has highly emotional rituals before sunrise. In their own charismatic early-morning prayer services, Christians pray for the success and prosperity of their family, their particular church, and the nation, often in prayer houses in beautiful mountain settings.

The most important theological issues for the 19 million Christians in South Korea include bearing witness to the gospel as the good news of justice* and peace* in the midst of division between North and South Korea and huge economic disparities between the haves and the have-nots. How does preaching the Prosperity Gospel address the needs of the poor and the marginalized*? Do churches contribute to the cycle of poverty* through their implicit support of the present economic system? A second issue concerns the lack of interfaith dialogue, for exclusive claims of salvation ignore the many ties between Christianity and other religions in Korea. Finally, the numerous divisions in Korean Protestantism raise important issues concerning the relationship between Christian and cultural structures of authority.

Statistics: Population (2000): 46.8 million (M). Christians, 19 M, 40.8% (Protestants, 12.3 M; Roman Catholics, 3.7 M; independents, 2 M; marginal Christians, 0.8); Shamanists, 7.2 M, 15.6%; Buddhists, 7.2 M, 15.3%; new religionists, 7.1 M, 15.2%; Confucianists, 5.1 M, 11.1%. Krapf, Johann Ludwig (1810–81), a German from Leipzig, the pioneer missionary to the east coast of Africa (1844) sponsored by the Church Missionary Society (CMS; see Anglicanism Cluster: In Africa: Eastern and Western Africa). After unsuccessful missionary work in Ethiopia*, he spread the Anglican faith to the interior from a base at the coastal town of Mombasa. Despite a great commitment to evangelization, Kraft and his colleague, Johannes Rebmann, were much more preoccupied with anthropological, language, and geographical documentation. Krapf's greatest achievement was laying the foundation for the development of Kiswahili. He wrote the Kiswahili Grammar and Kiswahili Dictionary, the first of their kind. Kiswahili has become the lingua franca of Eastern, Central, and Southern Africa and one of the official languages of the African Union; it is now spoken by at least 200 million people. It is taught in Western Africa at the University of Ghana, and a version of Microsoft Word exists in Kiswahili.

Krapf learned the designation of Mount "Kenya" (which he spelled "Kenia") from his Kamba guides and made it a European designation for the mountain and the region.

Kulturkampf (German, "culture war"), Bismarck's legislation against the Roman Catholic Church in Germany (1871–87), which included governmental control of education*, withholding of financial assistance from the Church, and the expulsion of religious* orders. Kuyper, Abraham (1837–1920), Dutch religious and political leader. After studying literature, philosophy, and theology at Leiden University (doctorate in theology, 1863), Kuyper was sent to his first parish at Beesd, where, in response to his parishioners' Calvinistic piety, he began to reassess the rationalistic modernism of his theological training. After assuming the pulpit in Amsterdam (1870), Kuyper protested anemic theological liberalism and sought to provide a genuine orthodox Calvinist alternative. Consequently, he was increasingly uncomfortable with the monarchy's role vis-à-vis the church and became a vociferous proponent of the separation of church* and state in the Netherlands. His influence further grew when he began writing for the Herald (1871) and then founded his own paper, the Standard (1872). He began a long political career (1874) as a member of the Second Chamber of Parliament (founding the Anti-Revolutionary Party, 1879) and prime minister (1901–5).

Ecclesially and theologically, Kuyper was responsible for the secession of the more historically Reformed faction from the Dutch Reformed Church (1886). He founded the Free University of Amsterdam (1880) to further combat the zeitgeist of philosophical and theological liberalism*. His perspectives on the comprehensive lordship of Christ, with a distinct emphasis on "common grace," deeply influenced Dutch Calvinism. See also REFORMED CHURCHES.

PAUL CHANG-HA LIM

Kyrgyzstan, Kirghizia. In Kyrgyzstan, Christianity has had a long but largely unwritten history. Under Mongol rule (13th–14th c.), probably building on an earlier Christian presence (6th c.), a metropolitan see of the Church* of the East existed in Nawakat, and the existence of Christian settlements west and southwest of Issy Köl Lake is attested to. Although Christianity took root among local populations, many nomadic peoples remained faithful to Shamanistic* traditions, which today still complement official (Sunni) Islam*, the dominant religion.

After the decline of central Mongol power and the conversion of local rulers to Islam, Christianity disappeared from the region, only to return with the advent of Russian power. Russian* and Ukrainian* Orthodoxy* remain important, although independence from Russia (1991) led to Russian out-migration. The descendants of German settlers make up the majority of the small Protestant (Lutheran, Baptist, Mennonite) and Roman Catholic communities in Kyrgyzstan. Religious freedom accompanying the fall of the Soviet Union encouraged Evangelical and Pentecostal missionaries from various national backgrounds to enter Kyrgyzstan and evangelize the local population. Their activities met with modest success, both among nominal Christians of Russian or German backgrounds and among those of Sunni Kyrgyz or Uzbek descent. This evangelization effort caused unrest, especially in the orthodox Muslim regions of the south, where official adherence to Islam grew considerably after the atheist policies of the Soviet government were abandoned. The government of Kyrgyzstan upholds freedom of religion, including freedom of conversion, although new communities focusing on converting Muslims are often wary of official registration and prefer to gather clandestinely in private homes.

Statistics: Population (2000): 4.7 million. Muslim: 60.8%; atheists and nonreligious, 27.9%; Christians, 10.4% (Orthodox, 7.7%, independents, 1.5%; Roman Catholics and Protestants, less than 1%). (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

Kyriarchy. A term introduced by Feminist* theologians, “kyriarchy” designates a sociopolitical reality as hierarchically structured; it includes relations of class, race, and religion in addition to gender, indicating the multiple layers of oppression* and domination. See also ANDROCENTRISM; PATRIARCHY AND CHRISTIANITY; SEXISM.

Kyrie Eleison (Gk for “Lord, have mercy”), a brief prayer used in the liturgy in the East by the 4th c. It was soon adopted, without being translated, in the West.

Kyrios (Gk equivalent of Heb Adonai, “Lord”). In the Septuagint* (reflecting the usage in the HB), the term refers to God; in the Gospels, to Jesus, both as a counter to the kyrios (emperor = lord) in Rome and as a title of respect, “master.”

Labadists trace their lineage to Jean de Labadie (1610–74), who proceeded from ministry as a Jesuit, to secular priest, to Reformed pastor/teacher in Geneva and Middleburg, where his separatist tendencies led to expulsion from the Dutch Synod. His disciples, organized into a separatist community of the regenerate, modeled a cloistered life that was authoritarian and pneumatic (charismatic*) in nature and included a community of goods. The principal community settled in Wiewert (Netherlands), where it survived into the 18th c. Labadist communities briefly existed in Surinam and Maryland. Labadism provided a stimulus for Pietism* in the German territorial churches.

Labarum, the standard designed by Constantine*, carried by a select group of soldiers. It was probably an adaptation of the cavalry standard, modified with the Chi-Rho* monogram surrounded by a wreath of gold and precious stones.

Labor, Theologies of. Theologies of labor describe the meaning of human work in light of God's* work as creator, redeemer, and sustainer of the world. Although the term came into prominent use in the 19th and 20th c., theologies of labor are as old as the varied Christian traditions themselves.

The Bible. Biblical understandings of labor vary, although each assumes the necessity and value of work. In Genesis work is portrayed as one of God's own activities (Gen 2:1–3; Exod 20:11) and one of God's intentions for human beings, as Adam is instructed to till the garden and maintain it (Gen 2:15). With its slavery* in a foreign land (Exod 5), however, Israel experiences the dehumanization of backbreaking work. A vision of humane work emerges in Israel's journey to the Promised Land: Sabbath* rest and the Jubilee* year, where debts are forgiven (Lev 25). In the NT, God's blessing of manual labor is exemplified by Jesus' identity as a carpenter (Mark 6:3) and reflected in Jesus' parables* and preaching about laborers. In John's vision of the New Jerusalem at the conclusion of the Scriptures, work does not disappear, but is redeemed in a city renewed by God (Rev 21).

Monasticism*. Monastic traditions within the church have long upheld the centrality of work in Christian life. Manual labor glorifies God and prevents sloth and laziness. The Rule of St. Benedict* (6th c.) exhorts monks to work at specified hours of the day, a tradition that continues in contemporary monasteries and is integral to modern understandings of the workday.

Vocation. Protestant Reformers Luther* and Calvin* argued for an expanded understanding of work as vocation*. In their eyes, all human labor necessary for survival and flourishing is the result of a divine calling. Labor is an expression of thanks to God. Some, such as Weber*, have argued that this vision of vocation assumes that industriousness is a sign of God's election* (see Protestant Ethic).

Labor as Co-creative. Several recent theologies of labor argue that human work adds worth to God's creation. In Laborem Exercens, John* Paul II extols work for its capacity to transform the world. When our work honors persons in constructing something new, we participate in the redemption* of the world. Echoes of this perspective can be found in the Charismatic*-inspired theology of Miroslav Volf, although each is also aware of the dehumanizing aspects of work in both capitalism and communism (see Economy and Christianity Cluster).

The Modern Labor Movement. In the midst of industrialization and urban poverty*, Leo* XIII's encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891; see Social Encyclicals) promoted the unionization of workers and the practice of collective bargaining. Pope John Paul's 1983 meeting with Lech Walesa, leader of the banned Polish labor union, signaled renewed engagement of Catholic social teaching with the labor movement. Latin American Liberation* theologians, however, have been the most forceful exponents of workers' rights. The "preferential* option for the poor" implies that the advancement of God's Kingdom* is evident in the struggles for justice* among the working classes. In Protestant thought, Rauschenbusch* (1861–1916) represents a watershed. His expression of the “Social* Gospel” includes criticism of child labor and unrestrained corporate profit at the expense of workers. Contemporary Womanist* theologian Joan Martin incorporates remembrances of slavery* in her theological ethics and articulation of workers’ rights.

The Legacy of Christian Reflection on Labor. In an age of globalization*, in which lower-class workers on one continent are subject to upper-class management decisions on another, it is essential for theologies of labor to address the ambiguity surrounding work. Even though labor is one way in which people can praise God, it frequently becomes a curse because of greed and injustice. One possibility for a vision of humane labor includes reflection on the doctrine of the Trinity*. In this doctrine, Christians address God’s work for the world: labors that are shared among the triune persons, not “owned” by one at the expense of another; labors that celebrate the distinctiveness of each person’s work and stress the interdependence of persons. In this divine economy*, we witness abundance, where gifts and work are given to all, rather than scarcity, where work is hoarded so that others go without. Another resource for reflection is Christian liturgy*. Etymologically, “liturgy” means “work of the people.” In the Eucharist*, Christians encounter the risen Christ in bread baked with human hands and wine pressed by human labor. Remembering that the Communion* elements stem from the labor of agricultural workers (often migrant workers), the celebration of Communion links human labor to the work of Christ that sustains the world.

Labyrinth (Gk), or maze (Old English), built in churches at least since the 4th c., is an intricate winding path moving toward a center; sometimes it splits into two or more paths, thereby causing confusion – an appropriation of the classical Greek tradition linked with Theseus’s slaying of the Minotaur. In churches in North Africa (4th–5th c.), labyrinths had a Roman rectangular design oriented from west to east, symbolically moving from sin* to salvation*. In the medieval West, labyrinths were first drawn in manuscripts but were later built of stone in the floors of cathedrals and churches, opposite the altar*. In Chartres and its region, they were circular, whereas in Reims, they were octagonal; in both cases, they were partitioned into four quarters by the cross*.

As Craig Wright documented, each path advanced and then regressed, suggesting salvation’s* ordered complexity, gradually overcoming sin and dissonance. At the center was a representation of the Minotaur (Satan); Christ enters the labyrinth, conquers Satan, and frees the imprisoned souls*. Worshippers, retracing with Christ the path that goes through sin and death, are freed from hell*, given new life, and empowered to move through purgatory* to heaven*. From the perspective of God’s wisdom* and providence*, a seemingly complex and confusing path has order. Contemporary labyrinths, which emphasize the latter aspect, are aids to individual meditation and “centering.”

Lacordaire, Henri-Dominique (1802–61). A French lawyer and skeptic, he converted (1824), entered a seminary, and was ordained (1827). Always sympathetic to liberal politics, he became a contributor to Lamennais’s* L’Avenir (1830) and made with him a dramatic pilgrimage to Rome (1831) to ask the pope to support liberal politics; instead, they were condemned. In 1835 he began his conférences in Notre Dame. Seeing the religious* orders as the key to the revival of Catholicism in France, he joined the Dominican* order (1840), reintroduced it in France (1843), and organized the Dominican Third* Order of teachers (1852). He enthusiastically greeted the French Revolution (1848) and was elected a deputy to the National Assembly. After the coups of Louis Napoleon (1851, 1852), he concentrated on church life, but was frustrated by internal divisions in the Dominican order.

Lactantius (c250–c325), Christian educator and Apologist*. Born in Africa, where he studied rhetoric and literature and taught Latin rhetoric at Diocletian’s* court in Nicomedia, he was converted to Christianity. When persecution broke out (303), he lost his post, left Nicomedia, and wrote his Divine Institutes (305–10), a defense of the Christian faith using non-Christian resources and arguing for tolerance. At the court of Constantine* in Trier (310), he formally presented the Institutes, one source of Constantine’s policy of religious toleration (involving a new definition of “religion”). On the Deaths of the Persecutors (313–15) describes the gruesome deaths of several emperors, including Nero*, Domitian*, Decius*, and Diocletian*. See also RELIGION AS A CONCEPT AND CHRISTIANITY.

Laicization. Beyond its application to the laity, “laicity” acquired additional connotations in France*, its (former) colonies, and Latin America, where the term means strict separation of state and religion. Under such circumstances, “laicization” means legal secularization or disestablishment of religious institutions – especially schools, so as to free public education from religious interference. See also ANTICLERICALISM; SECULARISM AND SECULARIZATION.

Laity, Theology of. The term “laity” refers to the “people of God,” specifically those who are neither clergy* nor religious*. A theology of laity is concerned with recovering the active role and responsibilities of laypersons in both the church and the world. Although there have been differentiated roles in the church since NT times, for its first 150 years Christianity did not always make a clear distinction between clergy* and laity. However, a distinction between Christian people as a whole and church leadership had emerged by the late 2nd c. This distinction became hard and fast by the fifth century, as the laity were gradually reduced to passive recipients of clerical ministrations. During the Middle Ages, the Lay Piety Movement was a protest or at least an alternative to this state of affairs (see the present cluster: Laity and the Lay Piety Movement During The Middle Ages).

Theologies of the Laity Emerging out of the Reformation. The Reformers further challenged the separation of clergy and laity. Luther* underscored the biblical teaching on the priesthood* of all believers (1 Pet 2: 9–10). He insisted that all Christians are priests by virtue of their baptism* and held that no other priesthood ought to be granted a separate ontological status. The Catholic* Renewal’s reaction to the Reformers led to an even more restrictive view of the laity, eventually culminating in Pope Pius* X’s declaration in Veementer Nos (1906) that the church was an “unequal society” composed of two ranks, clergy and laity, the primary obligation of the latter being to docilely follow their pastors.

An Orthodox Theology of the Laity. Eastern Christianity’s theology of the laity is grounded in the Divine* Liturgy. Since baptism* initiates the believer into the distinctive ordo of the Christian assembly, the laity are defined, not passively, but by their active participation in Christian worship (see the present cluster: Laity and Their Ministries in Eastern Orthodoxy).

Mid-20th-Century Theologies of the Laity. In the mid-20th c., a number of Catholic theologians sought an alternative to the largely passive and reductive theology of the laity dominant at the time. Karl Rahner* defined the laity by the full integration of the life of the world into their Christian existence. Marie-Dominique Chenu described the task of the laity as that of consecrating the world to Christ. Yves Congar was the first theologian to apply the threefold office of Christ – priest, prophet, and king – to the laity by virtue of their baptism. As priests the laity are called to make their ordinary lives a living sacrifice to God. As prophets the laity receive God’s Word, penetrate its depths, apply it to their life in the world, and participate in handing it on in the life of the church. Their kingly office is fulfilled through their exercise of Christian service in the world. Congar's thought had a major influence on the Second Vatican* Council's more positive teaching on the laity. The Council saw the distinctive participation of the laity in the Roman Catholic Church's mission grounded in the "secular character" of the laity. This secular character recognized the typical (but not exclusive) orientation of the layperson to the world.

Post-Conciliar Theologies of the Laity.

John* Paul II endorsed Vatican II's positive teaching on the laity, combining the Council's typological view (that the laity are secular given their ordinary involvement in the world) with its theological interpretation of the laity's secularity (that they embody in a particular way the Church's mission to the world). He also affirmed the possibility of lay ministry, even as certain official documents during his pontificate expressed concern that lay ministry might undermine priestly ministry.

After the Council, Congar questioned the helpfulness of the lay-clergy distinction, wondering whether it ought to be replaced by a focus on the relationship between community and ministries in service of the community. Finally, a number of contemporary theologians, particularly from the Two-thirds World, have questioned whether the laity-clergy language remains helpful. The entire church ought to be considered in terms of its secularity, i.e. its mission to be a sacrament* of the Reign of God in its mission to the world.

RICHARD R. GAILLARDETZ

Laity and the Lay Piety Movement during the Middle Ages, an outgrowth of the Gregorian Reform (11th c.; see Gregory VII, Pope). By attacking abuses by the clergy, and especially by urging the laity to boycott unworthy priests, the popes encouraged lay participation. A new wave of wandering preachers, of whom Norbert* of Xanten is the best known, encouraged poverty* in imitation of Jesus' earliest followers (Matt 10:9–10). Many viewed the Gospels as the true "rule*," and baptism* as authorizing poverty and simplicity, a welcome alternative to the wealthy church of the bishops and abbots. The movement took three forms: encouraging a worthy clergy; bypassing clergy and sacraments in mysticism*; and founding alternative organizations.

The most extensive new movement was that of the Waldenses*, who conflicted with the church because their laity preached. The Humiliati, centered in Milan, were acknowledged by the Roman Catholic Church on condition that they form three orders: clergy leading the canonical life, laity leading the religious* life in communities, and married persons with families. This pattern of three orders was adapted in the mendicant* orders, which were also part of the background of the "Radical Reformation," especially the Anabaptists*. The Beguines* and Beghards, in Northern Europe (13th c.), were similarly required to become third* orders of Franciscans* or Dominicans*.

Laity and Lay Catholic Organizations in Mexico. Since the colonial period, the laity in Mexico* have been organized in brotherhoods and sisterhoods according to their social class and status. Inspired by the social* encyclical Rerum Novarum (1891), these lay organizations were involved in social action through Catholic congresses, agricultural weeks, and social weeks, and initiated the National Confederation of Catholic Circles of Workers and other movements.

During the Mexican Revolution (1910), lay organizations – including the National Catholic Party, the Catholic Association of Mexican Youth, the Union of Catholic Women, the National Union of Parents, the National Confederation of Catholic Students, the National Confederation of Catholic Workers, the Congregations of Mary, the Nocturnal Adoration Movement, and the Knights of Columbus – became active defenders of Roman Catholicism against the anticlericalism of the government. They formed the National League for the Defense of Religious Liberty. Together they defended their faith and their church against the “evil government” (1926–29) through the Popular Union, the Women’s Brigades of Joan of Arc, and armed peasant groups called the Cristeros (who led armed resistance against the government).

To end the armed uprising of the Cristeros, in 1929 certain bishops went along with the government’s policy of politically neutralizing lay organizations by co-opting them into Mexican Catholic* Action (ACM). Some laypersons continued the armed fight, while others founded other movements (e.g. the Legion, the Base) that later became political parties. In 1939 even members of the ACM and of student movements participated in the formation of the antigovernment party, Political National Action.

In the 1940s, the bishops’ pastoral action aimed at the Mexican elites led to the formation of new lay organizations, including the Social Union of Mexican Businessmen and subsequently Opus* Dei and Regnum Christi. Anti-Communist groups were also formed at that time. In the larger population, a notable movement was the Mexican Social Secretariat led by Fr. Pedro Velásquez, who later (1960s) headed the campaign “Christianity yes, Communism no” with the Conference of National Organizations; yet the focus of this campaign changed from anti-Communism to social initiatives. The bishops created the National Council of Laypersons, while civic groups such as the National Association of Women, Integral Human Development, and Pro-Life defended Catholic morality.

The Second Vatican* Council, the theology of liberation*, the Latin American Episcopal Conference (CELAM*, Consejo Episcopal Latinoamericano) in Medellín* (1968), and the massacre of students during the 1968 movement together drove a wedge between religious and civil authorities and between the organizations belonging to the Mexican Social Secretariat and those related to the Mexican Bishops’ Conference. These events inspired the formation of Base* Ecclesial Communities (CEBs), the movement “Christians for Socialism,” and the Movement of Christians Committed to the Popular Struggle (1980s) and its various centers supporting the poor. At the end of the 20th c., there were efforts to promote a dialogue between conservative and progressive lay movements. See also CATHOLIC ACTION; MEXICO.

RAQUEL PASTOR

Laity and Their Ministries in Eastern Orthodoxy.

“One Christian is no Christian.” Eastern Orthodoxy asserts that the entire body of the faithful, both clergy and laypersons, comprises the laity, or “people of God” (Laos tou Theou) (1 Cor 12: 27; Eph 2:22, 1 Pet 2:9). Every baptized member of the Orthodox Church is a complete member and “co-worker” with God in the process of the salvation* of the world (1 Cor 3:9), thus enjoying a full share in the royal (leadership), prophetic (teaching), and priestly (offering) ministry of Christ. There is a proper differentiation between the general priesthood of believers established through baptism* and the particular priesthood of the pastoral office. Unfortunately, tension exists in some places between the legitimate responsibilities of clergy and laypersons. Orthodox theologians identify the essential responsibilities of each while promoting the avoidance of the dangers of “clericalism” on the one side and of “congregationalism” on the other.

Every gift* is meant ultimately to be shared. Vocations* to intercessory prayer*, good works and charitable* acts, marriage*, family* life, monasticism*, formulating theology, education*, ministries of healing*, spiritual* direction, care for the earth (ecology*), mission* and witness, hymnography and music*, philanthropy and stewardship, advocacy for the vulnerable, administration, writing and publishing, iconography* and the arts, pastoral* care and leadership are but some of the many areas in which laypersons may serve today. At the heart of every vocation, lay and ordained, is the call to holiness*. Gregory* of Nyssa urges responding to this call by emulating “peacemakers*”, “who reveal in their own lives the characteristics of God’s activity. This work he also directs for you. Namely, to cast out hatred and abolish war, to exterminate envy and banish strife, to get rid of hypocrisy, and to extinguish from within resentment of injuries which linger in the heart" (On the Beatitudes, Homily 7).

Laity and Their Ministries in Scandinavia: Parish Boards. Such boards were introduced in Scandinavia during the transformation of the Lutheran state churches into Folk* churches (from 1850). During the 17th and 18th c., a lay ministry as "assistant of the pastor" was introduced, but was never popular because the main task was limited to church discipline*. Parish boards (since 1862) have been very popular. Because the Swedish Church kept most of the property owned by the medieval Roman Catholic Church, the parish boards and the boards at the diocesan and national levels have been dominated by members of political parties. In Norway (from 1920) and especially in Denmark (from 1903), parish board members have been recruited from among church members of all kinds, including a great number of Culture* Christians. Should the boards be primarily administrative bodies, acting on behalf of the state and/or local society, or should their function be the ministry of all believers? This has been a long-standing debate. The legitimacy of the boards has also been questioned, since only 10–20% of church members participate in the elections. Nevertheless, the boards have catalyzed good relationships between local people and parish churches in Scandinavia.

Laity and Their Participation in Worship. In the NT, the church is called the people (laos) of God (1 Pet 2:9; cf. Exod 19:6). While the earliest church was highly participatory (cf. 1 Cor 12, 14, esp. 14:26), leadership came to be concentrated in the clergy*; the role of the laity was to say "Amen" or make brief responses. The Lay* Piety Movement in the Middle Ages emphasized that baptism* itself is a qualification for Christian leadership; Protestantism* emphasized the priesthood* of all believers and gave the clergy a functional rather than a hieratic status; and the Second Vatican* Council directed that the laity have a role in worship.

Lambeth Articles, an appendix (1595) to the Thirty*-nine Articles (1571). Calvinistic in theology, written by William Whitaker (Cambridge) to settle a controversy over predestination*, approved by John Whitgift, archbishop of Canterbury, and prelates gathered at Lambeth Palace, the articles were not sanctioned by Queen Elizabeth; thus their status was that of an "explanation" of points already established.

Lambeth Conferences are meetings of bishops* from throughout the Anglican Communion, convened by the archbishop of Canterbury of the time, usually at 10-year intervals. They originated with a request to Archbishop Longley from Canadian bishops in 1865 that the diocesan bishops be brought together from around the world to redress a South African situation that was seen as a scandal in the Communion. The bishop of Natal, William Colenso*, had been convicted of Modernist* "heresy" by an ecclesiastical court in South Africa, but had been confirmed in his episcopate by the Privy Council in London. Longley convened a conference of the Anglican bishops worldwide, though without Colenso, at Lambeth in 1867. Once gathered, the bishops discussed Natal and deplored Colenso's confirmation.

Thereafter, the conferences were convened on a regular basis, and the approximately 10-year cycle continued, except during the two world wars. The conferences are convened by the archbishop of Canterbury, at his own discretion. Until the formation of the Anglican Consultative Council (ACC) in 1971, it was arguable that the archbishop's invitation list for the Lambeth Conference alone constituted the Anglican Communion and decided its limits. Since 1968 the conferences have been widened to include first theological consultants, then the members of the ACC, and, in 1998, all serving bishops. Recent conferences have been serviced by the ACC office in London. In 1978 a conference of bishops' wives was held alongside the Lambeth Conference – and by 1998 this included a sprinkling of women bishops' husbands.

From the start, the concept of a "conference" was that it would not have conciliar powers, but would carry only the moral or spiritual weight of any findings the members reached. Thus the constitutional autonomy of the Anglican provinces was respected. Nevertheless, the conferences have at intervals set down important markers, such as the “Lambeth* Quadrilateral” (1888), the “Appeal to All Christian People” (1920), the launch of the Decade of Evangelism (1988), and a strong resolution on homosexual relationships (1998). This resolution anticipated a decade of widening splits in the Anglican Communion over the issue of homosexual relationships, precipitated most notably by the consecration in 2003 of an actively homosexual presbyter as bishop of New Hampshire in the Episcopal Church (USA). The archbishop of Canterbury, Rowan Williams, did not invite this bishop to the 2008 Lambeth Conference, but in several African and other provinces, the invitations to the other US bishops who had supported the New Hampshire appointment were viewed as provocatively divisive. Overall about 25% of those invited from around the world declined to attend; an informal alternative “Gathering for the Anglican Future Conference” was held in Jerusalem. At the Lambeth Conference itself, for the first time there was no plenary resolution; the focus was on fellowship, mutual support, and engagement.

BISHOP COLIN O. BUCHANAN

Lambeth Quadrilateral. Following an initiative by the American House of Bishops at the general convention in Chicago (1886), the 1888 Lambeth Conference set forth the “Lambeth Quadrilateral,” which defined the minimum standard for Anglicans to adopt when uniting with other ecclesiastical bodies. The four “sides” of the Quadrilateral were as follows:

1. The Holy Scriptures* as the rule and ultimate standard of faith;
2. The Nicene* and Apostles’* Creeds as sufficient statements of the Christian faith;
3. The two sacraments – baptism* and the Lord’s* Supper – ministered with unfailing use of Christ’s words of institution and of the elements ordained by him;
4. The historic episcopate locally adapted.

Further Lambeth Conferences (1920, 1948, 1958, 1998) reaffirmed the Quadrilateral, exhibiting subtle variations without change of substance.

Lamb of God (Agnus Dei), NT metaphor for Christ (John 1:29, Rev 5:12), linking him with the Passover* lamb (1 Cor 5:7; 1 Pet 1:19), suggesting that the cross* is a Passover sacrifice, Christ suffering without complaint (Isa 53:7). In Revelation* the Lamb who had been slain becomes powerful (5:6–14), unleashing vengeance (Chap. 6), conquering all enemies, becoming king of kings (17:14).

Lamennais, Félicité Robert de (1782–1854), priest (1816), leader of French Catholic conservatism, advocate of the separation of church* and state, but later advocate of liberalism and social reform. In his Essay on Indifference in Matters of Religion (1818–23), he developed an argument espousing the authority of the community as the source of truth – a position later condemned as “traditionalism*.” He became an ally of the Ultramontanists*, advocating papal authority against the compromises of the Gallican* bishops and emphasizing the church’s freedom from the state, which led him to champion freedom of religion and the press and other “liberal” causes. This sentiment was fomenting in other Catholic countries, especially Belgium* and Poland*, both of which were seeking political independence, and “Mennaisians” could also be found in Britain and the USA.

In 1831 Lamennais made a disappointing pilgrimage to Rome to ask the pope to heed the signs of the times, to which the pope responded by condemning civil liberties and the separation of church* and state. His Words of a Believer (1834), also condemned by the pope, looked beyond the church with an apocalyptic vision of transformation by God. Lamennais, asserting his individuality, drifted away from the church, although his liberal vision of a church freed from political ties was perhaps realized in the 1905 secularization* laws in France.

Lamentabili*, decree of the Holy Office (July 3, 1907), under Pope Pius* X, condemning 65 propositions drawn from the writings of the Modernists*. It was followed by the encyclical Pascendi (September 8, 1907), which also condemned the Modernists.

Lamentations, Book of, one of the Megilloth*, portrays a community enduring the devastating collapse of its life-defining worlds: the nation’s defeat, the Temple’s destruction, the monarchy’s downfall, and the people’s exile. Lamentations’ five poems, with their rich diversity, are held together by the acrostic device in Chaps. 1–4 and the use of 22 verses (the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet) in Chap. 5.

The Septuagint* ascribes authorship to Jeremiah*, but modern scholarship commonly rejects this tradition. The historical context of Lamentations was probably a time shortly after the Exile (587 BCE).

The theological traditions of David's divine chosenness and of Zion's inviolability are shattered by Israel's historical experience. The cause of the disaster remains in question. Is it the people's sin? God's punishment? The enemies' cruelty? All are parts of the theological explanation.

Personified as a bereaved mother, Jerusalem laments the loss of her children. This literary genre parallels Sumerian city laments. God is both a violent and destructive enemy (Chaps. 1–2) and a merciful God to whom suffering people address petitions (Chap. 3). Lamentations resists a simple resolution of this tension between the two views of God and defies any closing. The final prayer is open-ended, anticipating God's new initiative in the midst of human enigmatic suffering*.

Lamentations helps Judeo-Christian communities to give lament a place in their religious life. It has been used in Jewish worship at annual commemorations of the Temple's destruction (Tisha be Av), in Christian Lent and Holy Week liturgies, and in services following disasters.

The first Lancaster Schools were established in Chichester, 1810 for boys and 1812 for girls. Interest in this style of teaching spread, as indicated by the opening of a school by Czar Alexander in Kishinev (1824). Imprisoned for debt in England, Lancaster moved to Land, Theological Perspectives and Praxis of Indigenous Peoples in India, Other Asian Countries, and North America. In the biblical tradition, the term "land" combines economics, politics, history, sociology, ethnicity, tradition, identity, and spirituality. "Land" refers to a special relationship between God, humans, and land. It is more than just a habitat or a political boundary; it is the basis of social organization, economic systems, and cultural identification. The creation stories maintain that land is not only sacred but also co-creator with the Creator: "Let the earth bring forth..." (Gen 1:24). Together with land as a partner, God nurtures, sustains, and gives life to all beings. The land owns people and gives them an identity. The land is also a temple in and through which people become one with the sacred power. In the Jubilee* tradition, political, economic, and social justice* and liberation* also apply to the land.

Like the Israelites, many communities, particularly indigenous people around the world, affirm that it is the land that owns people and gives them an identity. Their religious systems, ceremonies, rituals, festivals, and dances are all centered on and deeply rooted in the land itself. Like the HB, indigenous people's myths* and rhetoric speak of the land as belonging to the Creator. Villages, clans, and individuals may own the land, but within the wider understanding that the land belongs to the Creator, the ultimate owner of land. Thus the land belongs to all equally, and all have equal rights and freedom to live on it, and no one can claim it exclusively for him- or herself, nor can one sell it as though it were one's exclusive property*. Land means survival and life. Land is people's identity and spirituality.

Christian theology has not given adequate attention to this important component of life. First, from a scientific perspective, the physical world was merely viewed as the sum total of many material components and energies. Humans believe they can understand, predict, and control everything in it. We are separate from, and think we are masters of, all created things, including the land (see Science and Christian Theology). Second, for several Christian theologians, the natural world is understood within a hierarchical structure, created by God. In this hierarchy of creatures, humans are the highest, having ultimate right over the land and its resources. Intellectual or rational nature is superior to the rest of creation. Theology is thus primarily about God and humans. The land is merely a "theater" for the actualization of God's plan of salvation. The land has no history and is not redeemed; it is merely used. Humanity alone is redeemed in Jesus Christ.

In the history of Christianity, different voices have communicated a theology of land. But these voices have remained muffled. In recent years, indigenous theologians, along with other theologians (including ecofeminists*, Process* theo-gians, and the "Justice, Peace and Integrity of Creation" Program of the World* Council of Churches) have sought to correct this dualistic*, anthropocentric, androcentric*, and hierarchical view of reality by developing a theological methodology from the perspective of land. Drawing on resources from their own traditions, some indigenous theologians (e.g. George Tinker, Yangkahao Vashum) have articulated a central and crucial theological perspective in a quest for justice and liberation from the perspective of "land." Since culture, religion, history, spirituality, and even the Supreme Being cannot be envisioned without "land" or "space," "land" is not merely a justice issue alongside other justice concerns. It is foundational to a theological self-understanding out of which liberation, justice, and peace will naturally and necessarily flow (see Liberation Theologies Cluster: In North America: Native American.) Poverty*, oppression*, ethnic conflicts, and identity issues cannot be understood so long as they are not related to the integrity of the land. Justice toward the land is the key to liberation, human dignity, and fullness of life.

When justice is present in the land, the fields and forests and all living things will dance and sing for joy (Ps 96: 11–13). Authentic liberation can be experienced only in harmony with the land. This is the context for considering and taking part in struggles for economic* justice against the exploitation of humans, for human dignity and human* rights against the political oppression* of humans, and for peace and justice in relations between humans and nature against the industrial destruction of the environment. Issues concerning identity, hunger, disease, illiteracy, culture, and religion are intrinsically related to the land. This methodological and theological priority of justice toward the land is essential not only because of the "earth-centered" worldview and tradition of indigenous people, but because of the present-day ecological crisis and misuse of resources that threaten the survival of many people around the world. See also ECOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Land, Theological Perspectives and Praxis, in Africa. Land politics is a sensitive issue in Africa owing to its political, economic, and sociocultural connotations. Colonial and postcolonial wars were fought primarily over land and boundaries. An infrequently discussed issue is the relation of land to economic* justice* pertaining to mineral wealth. Other issues related to land politics are gender imbalance and racial and class discrimination regarding landownership. Instead of treating land as a gift from God, all land has been converted into a commodity for a few in Africa. The history of land dispossession is simple. Before the arrival of the European colonialists in the 16th c. (indigenous black Africans had land. They had socioeconomic systems and rules in place that governed their land administration and conservation. Now many indigenous black Africans are dispossessed and landless, while the descendants of Europeans own vast pieces of land and mineral wealth therein, such as gold and diamonds.

Role of Labor and Survival. In many biblical traditions, Christians who participate in the liberation* struggle in Africa often refer to the story of Naboth's vineyard (I Kgs 22:1–19). The land that used to be a resource for the livelihood and sustenance of families who occupied the African land from time immemorial was taken away and converted to produce commodities and is accessible to only a few elite landowners. Indigenous Africans who used to own land collectively (a common practice) were turned into landless farmworkers. In view of this continuing land dispossession, the African Churches are faced with the challenge of standing in solidarity with landless poor while wrestling with its own dual identity crisis. Indeed, most often the churches are both "landed" (the churches of landowners) and "landless" (without land themselves and churches of landless people). The churches seek to amplify the voice of the voiceless and strengthen the resilience of local landless communities against dispossessing and oppressive forces.

Communal Dimension. The African concept of landownership can be likened to a circle of seated people (Zulu, indilinga) in which no one is above another and all are treated and viewed as equal custodians of this gift of land from God or ancestors* and as having an equal duty to preserve the land for the next generation(s). Thus land is designated not as a possession but as an "inheritance"; the connection between the social unit and the land is inalienable and endures to perpetuity.

Although most land dispossessions occurred through the barrels of guns, most dispossessed communities in Africa now hope to have their land restored to them, although through the market that prioritizes individual ownership and profit making (e.g. South Africa's "willing seller/willing buyer" approach to land reform).

As most societies or communities in Africa are patriarchal and landownership is governed through customary laws, gender imbalances are prominent. While customary laws can provide poor households with greater access to land and security, they too are in need of reform. In many African countries, women are prevented from owning and inheriting land, because their property rights are often tied to their social relations with men. For example, some customary land registrations require women to receive authorization from their husbands to independently acquire a land title. This is especially problematical for women who are unmarried, widowed, or divorced, and can limit women's ability to grow food for their families. Strengthening women's rights will require working with both state and customary laws.

Ecological Issues. According to the indigenous African concept of relationship between humankind and land, people do not own land but rather belong to the land. Those who use the land are expected to respect it and the One who has given it as a gift. The use of harmful agricultural chemicals such as pesticides and genetically modified seeds is generally unacceptable in African traditional agricultural practices. A recent spate of exclusive housing development projects on arable land is becoming an issue of concern among many land activists, as projects of this type result in a scarcity of arable land.

Land is a gift from God that can be used to reconcile divided communities, restore dignity, and bring about sustainable development and livelihood to the millions of marginalized, landless, and poor indigenous Africans. See also ECOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

THULANI NDLAZI

Land, Theological Perspectives and Praxis, in Latin America. In the theologies of the global peripheries, especially in Brazil* and other Latin American countries, land is one of the central themes of a spirituality* closely tied to the struggle for life and to the defense of human* rights and of territories threatened by the globalizing economical model.

Land as a Site of Exploitation, Banishment, and Suffering in Latin America. In Latin America, colonization* under the cross and sword made the land a site of exploitation. Colonization followed the “civilizing logic” that exploits social classes, creates poor and oppressed people, and exploits and marginalizes territory and nature, exhausting the land’s resources. The way of life and the cultures of the original peoples were disrupted and corrupted by the wholesale slaughter of people and animals. Land as a site of banishment and suffering was reinforced by the massive kidnapping of African peoples to be used as slaves in the Americas.

Land as Mother Earth, the Site of life, in Latin American Traditions. By contrast, according to the religions of the original peoples, the land is “Mother Earth” (Pachamama in the Aymara and Quechua languages, Olokuadule in the Kuna language, or Papa Egoró in the Embera language), a sacred and alive territory, the source of life, which cannot be bought or sold and which is inherited from the ancestors*. The land is the site of life. It unites the visible with the invisible world, the community with its ancestors, and is the root and support of culture*. In the Guarani tradition (see Paraguay), this experience is translated into the search for the Land without Evil (Terra Sem Males), a search that embodies both resistance and utopia. Through the “tore ritual,” the Kiriri indigenous people of northeastern Brazil celebrate the struggle to defend the territory (Mother Earth) against large economic projects, affirming the land as holy ground where the “enchancements” and all knowledge live.

In the Afro-American religions in Brazil, axé, the sacred power, is contained and transmitted in the elements and substances of the natural world, animal, vegetal, or mineral, related to each other either through water – sweet or salty – or through land and forest. Nana, the orixa (intermediary between the Creator and creatures) of land and water, is the humid womb that contains all forms of life.

The Afro-Brazilian communities that have survived from the time of the quilombolas (descendants of slaves that escaped from plantations) find in their religion a vital source of resistance and struggle for the land they have occupied since their struggle against slavery*.

The Land and Latin American Theology. Throughout the history of Latin America, many Christians (e.g. Bartolomé de las* Casas, Antonio Valdivieso, Toribio de Mogrovejo) struggled for the rights of the peoples of the land; today many Christians, both men and women, are dying once again as they defend “terra,” a term that in the Romance languages means both “land” and “earth” (as well as “soil”). For Latin* American theology, the conflict between possession of the land (terra) and life on earth (terra) is highly significant.

In Latin America, the deepest motivation of those who struggled for independence and took part in social revolutions was always the defense of the liberated land; there was strong participation by farmers and landless farmworkers. Such resistance and liberation movements shaped a Liberation theology that goes beyond national and property* issues. This theology affirms that the land is a collective household: the land of God, the land of brothers and sisters. The Christian farmers’ popular theology redefines ways of living on earth (terra) and with the land (terra); it is a religiosity associated both with the land and with the farmers’ struggle, their rituals of resistance, and their celebrations of the land. Celebrating terra is both an expression of Latin American spirituality* and a form of revolutionary struggle. God is revealed both in the created world (terra as the earth) and in the struggle for the land (terra as the land that people farm as a means of survival). In its perspective on the land/earth (terra), Latin American Liberation* theology combines the theologies of creation*, of nature, and of social struggle.

Rereading the Teaching of the Bible about the Land in Latin America. From the perspective of Latin America, one can readily appreciate the way the biblical story of Genesis plays on the different connotations of the terms for “earth,” “land,” and “soil” (Heb eretz, adam), since “terra” has all these connotations. Land or earth is created by God and creates in relation to God’s work. From the land (terra as soil, as part of creation), we are created; through the land, we re-create ourselves in the multiple forms of sustenance and pleasure, occupation and territory, as the traditions of the original peoples of Latin America also affirm.

“Land” is always more than the land that a farmer cultivates. Land places a diversity of beings in relation to each other: water and sky, trees and minerals, animals and vegetation (Gen 1). As a condition of human existence, the ordering of land is a part of the organization of the human family through the vital materiality of productive and reproductive work (Gen 2). Yet as it is appropriated by humans, the land becomes and is the site of conflicts and projects (Gen 3), of disputes among human groups and among models of economic occupation (Gen 4), including that which distinguishes between city and country. This conflict over land occupation motivates and explains the human drama of death, revenge, and disaster. As the site of human activities, the land is the place in which human groups search for living and working space.

Deserts, valleys, and mountains are subjects of mythical and historical narratives in the biblical tradition, just as other traditions associate deities with ecogeo-graphical features. Shaped by competing economic projects, the land appropriated by empires becomes a site of oppression and exploitation of human labor (Exod 1), while enslaved groups organize themselves and go in search of the Promised* Land (Exod 3). These migratory waves, stimulated by hunger, war, and military and economic control of the land, are also processes of organization and resistance of social groups against hegemonic powers and processes of struggle to achieve other models of occupation of the land, and of labor and power.

As a promise and as a project, the land binds together different ethnic groups, forges societies (Josh 9), and shapes social structures and forms of labor, distribution, and consumption. Territorial control, privileged economic relations, agricultural production, and access to water, wood, and minerals (1 Sam 8) reflect the role of land in tribal, national, and imperial conflict. Absent from metaphysical, essentialist, and idealistic theological systems, because it is “merely material,” a redeemed land is nevertheless prophesied in eschatological and futurist visions.

Consequently, in Latin American popular Christianity, the land is a reason for and a promise of life; it organizes the faithful around the defense of a territory and a model of communal occupation, a life to be fully accomplished in eschatological time. The land articulates the conflict of classes and the ecological struggle through the organization of peasant movements in the defense of territories, in the occupation of lands controlled by the great landed estates of the latifundium and agribusiness, depriving traditional populations of land and reducing them to the status of landless farmworkers or slave laborers.

Associated with the feminine “mother earth,” the struggle for the liberation of land and water*, the defense of the environment, and agro-ecology are also a struggle against patriarchal* and sexist* violence and against the domination of women that is extended to the land through a model of development that subordinates the reproduction of life to progress and profit. In sum the popular reading of the Bible in Latin America reinstates the land as God's promise, by interpreting it from the perspective of the experience of the Exodus and from that of the Jesus* movement and its concern for the oppressed. See also ECOLOGY AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

NANCY CARDOSO PEREIRA

Landázuri Ricketts, Juan (1913–97). Archbishop of Lima, Peru (1955–90), and president of the Peruvian National Episcopal Conference (1955–88), he played a decisive role in transforming a conservative church into a progressive and pluralistic one. Born in Arequipa, he entered the Franciscan* order. As archbishop he followed a policy of diversity within unity. He reinforced the social orientation of the Roman Catholic Church and worked in harmony with the reformist military government of General Velasco (1968–75). Named a cardinal in 1962, he played important roles at Vatican II and the episcopal conferences of Medellín* (1968) and Puebla (1979). See also PERU.

Landmarkism, a movement originating in the Southern* Baptist Convention in the mid-19th c., but eventually breaking away from it. Its distinctive ecclesiology (sometime called "Baptist successionism"; cf. Apostolicity and Apostolic Succession) claims that the Baptist churches, with their believer* baptism and local congregational* church government, are the NT church, and that its continuity (though usually concealed) has been maintained through the centuries.

Langton, Stephen (c1155–1228), archbishop of Canterbury; born in Lincolnshire, studied and taught in Paris. Langton was influential as a preacher, theologian, moralist, and biblical commentator. He delineated the chapter divisions of the Bible (still in use with some modifications), prepared a standard text of the Vulgate*, and wrote the hymn Veni Sancte Spiritus. He was created a cardinal, then appointed archbishop of Canterbury by Innocent* III (1206–7). When King John kept Langton from occupying his see, the pope excommunicated the king and placed England and Wales under an interdict* (1208–14); this was ended by John's submission, after which the kingdom was made a papal fief, an act Langton opposed. He supported the barons who sought to reaffirm English traditions concerning the government and the church, but he also functioned as a mediator when John was forced to sign the Magna Carta (1215). The pope criticized this document as a threat to kingship and to the Fourth Crusade*, and suspended Langton for declining to excommunicate the barons (1215–18). Restored by a new pope and with a new king, Langton initiated improvements in education, discipline, and pastoral care, implementing the decrees of the Fourth Lateran* Council of 1215. In a dramatic confirmation of the freedom of the church, he presided over the transfer of the relics of his predecessor, the martyred Becket*, on the 50th anniversary of his death (1220).

Laodicea, city in the Phrygian Lycus Valley, Asia Minor. (1) Mentioned in Colossians*, indicating that a church had been established there during Paul's missions; (2) one of the "seven churches" in Rev 3:14.

Lapsed (Lat lapsi, "the fallen"), Christians who denied the faith during persecution*; readmitting them to the church became a serious issue during the Decian* persecution (see Cyprian).

Las Casas, Bartolomé de (1484–1566), a Spanish missionary, nicknamed "the Apostle of the Indies" for his indefatigable defense of the human* rights and dignity of indigenous peoples. He was the first European to denounce the economic, political, and cultural injustice of colonialism* in Latin America.

Born in Seville and trained as a lawyer, Las Casas traveled to Hispaniola (1502), where he witnessed much Spanish brutality against the native people. After studying for ordination in Rome (1507), he returned to the Caribbean in order to resist exploitation by the conquistadors. He celebrated his first Mass in the Americas (rather than in Spain) in 1510, symbolizing his commitment to combating injustice. Las Casas forsook his own ownership of "Indians" and his business holdings (1514), decrying the systemic evil of colonization and oppression of the indigenous peoples – including the encomienda system (forced labor in return for protection and instruction in the Christian faith). Although he tried to help the indigenous peoples, he failed to oppose the importation of slaves from Africa. He carried out an unsuccessful experiment, a "benign colony" (Venezuela, 1519–22, a precursor of the egalitarian "Jesuit reductions," where numerous natives lived together with Jesuit* clergy) designed to protect native peoples from the Spanish settlers. Following this failure, Las Casas joined the Dominicans* (1522), continuing his role as defender of indigenous people and making several trips to the Spanish royal court for this purpose.

His articulate defense of "Indian" human rights in debates – especially, against Juan Ginés de Sepúlveda's claim that indigenous people were inferior beings (1550, Valladolid, Spain) – complemented his written work chronicling both the native peoples' civility and humanity and the Spaniards' cruelty and depravity: The Devastation of the Indies: A Brief Account; The Only Way of Drawing All Peoples to the True Religion; In Defense of the Indians; and the History of the Indies.

Lateran Councils, four general councils of the Western, Latin Church held in Rome in 1123, 1139, 1179, and 1215. As a part of the medieval papal revolution, they were different from the collaborative eight general councils of the first millennium under imperial leadership.

Lateran I (1123) ratified the Concordat of Worms*, allowing secular lords to invest bishops with signs of civil authority, making the selection of bishops relatively independent, and reserving for church officials the investing of symbols of spiritual authority. Lateran II (1139) focused on heresy*, which would be of even greater concern at later medieval councils. Lateran III (1179) legislated that cardinals* play the leading role in papal elections and permitted a two-thirds majority, not unanimity, for election. The council singled out the Cathars*, or Albigensians*, as heretics.

Lateran IV (1215) was the largest and most prestigious of the medieval councils, touching nearly every issue impacting medieval society and religion. The council upheld Lateran III's grant of the crusader's* indulgence* and privileges to those who fought heretics and stipulated penalties for recalcitrant heretics – including unlicensed, wandering preachers – and for secular authorities and laypeople who failed to root them out. A bishop who failed to investigate and excommunicate heretics was subject to deposition. The council required Jews* and Muslims* to dress distinctively (without providing specifics), prohibited Jews from serving in public office, and mandated that Jews remain indoors on Palm* Sunday. Lateran IV was the first general council to use the scholastic word "transubstantiation"* to describe the ancient Catholic belief that bread and wine were fully and substantially changed into Christ's Body and Blood. It mandated what came to be called "Easter duty": the confession of sins and reception of the Eucharist* at least once a year. Unknowingly anticipating Luther's* criticisms, Lateran IV cautioned against the sale of indulgences* and false relics*.

CHRISTOPHER M. BELLITTO

Lateran Treaty (1929), concordat* in which the Kingdom of Italy* recognized the Vatican City as a sovereign state (the Holy See* similarly recognized Italy, giving up all claims to Rome and the former Papal* States). Its provisions favoring the Roman Catholic Church were significantly modified in 1984.

Latin, Ecclesiastical, began to appear in early Christian societies between the 2nd and 4th c. Some regard ecclesiastical Latin as a decadent form of classical Latin; however, recent scholarship has acknowledged its linguistic sophistication. Differences between classical and ecclesiastical Latin arose from several factors, including the ecclesiastical need for a larger and more precise theological vocabulary and a desire to make the translation of Greek Christian sources, particularly inspired texts, more literal than was possible with classical Latin. The pronunciation system of ecclesiastical Latin, as primarily preserved within the Roman Catholic Church, is somewhat different from that of classical Latin.

Latin American Literature (Spanish) and Christianity. Christianity has always been present in Latin American literature, beginning with the accounts of those who chronicled their adventures in the Indies, through the songs and poems of Juana Inés de Asbaje* y Ramírez (1651–95, Mexico), to the most recent hymns by Ernesto Cardinal. But the literary presence of Christianity is more a cultural environment than a biblical/theological reflection or testimony.

In the 19th c., historic novels were written, especially for the Catholic and ecclesiastic culture of the colonial capitals: Mexico*, Lima (Peru*), and Cartagena de Indias (Colombia*). Some featured priests' sermons or the excesses of the Inquisition*, e.g. Monja y casada, virgen y mártir (1868, Nun and married woman, virgin and martyr) by the Mexican Vicente Riva Palacio (1832–96) and El Pecado Del Siglo (1869; The sin of the century) by the Mexican José Tomás de Cuellar (1830–94). Others portray traditional customs; e.g. Peruvian Traditions by Ricardo Palm (1833–1919) recounts the founding of convents and the adventures of members of religious orders (nuns, monks, brothers) in their missionary work, and tells the stories of infamous excommunications. Other novels, e.g. Cumandá, o, un drama entre salvajes (Cumandá, or a drama among savages) by the Ecuadorian Juan León Mera (1832–94), sought to portray Christianity, and specifically Roman Catholicism, as a religion that was superior to others.

In the 20th c., Christian themes are more visible in poetry, e.g. in the poems of the Chilean Gabriela Mistral (1889–1957) and the Peruvian Cesar Vallejo (1892–1938), who express their religious experience at times in mystical* ways and at times in deeply rebellious ways. Novels are infused with the traditions and beliefs of Christendom*, especially its dark sides, support indigenous traditions, and denounce the many methods of evangelism or mission* that fail to respect indigenous people, their religious customs, and their gods. More recent novelists denounce the ecclesiastical institution, its rigor, fanaticism, and intolerance; they are often centered on the figure of the priest, who navigates among diverse political factions, seeking among them his evangelical vocation. The works of the Guatemalan Miguel Angel Asturias (1899–1974), from the Leyendas de Guatemala (1930; Legends of Guatemala), which describes Mayan civilization before the Spanish Conquest, to his largely autobiographical last novel, Viernes de dolores (1972, Friday of Our Lady of Sorrows) are good examples. Among the works of the Mexican Agustín Yañez (1904–80), Al filo del agua (1947; The Edge of the Storm, 1963) is particularly notable for its allusions to biblical texts. Another such book is El Cristo de espaldas (1952, The backward Christ) by the Colombian Eduardo Caballero Calderón (1910–93).

In Latin American literature in Spanish, there are works that reflect Liberation* theology as well as distinctive works, such as the brilliant novel El Signo del Pez (1987, The sign of the fish) by the Colombian Germán Espinosa (1938–2007), which re-creates the world of Jesus of Nazareth. See also BRAZILIAN LITERATURE (PORTUGUESE), CHRISTIANITY IN.

CARMIÑA NAVIA VELASCO

Latin American Theologies. In thinking about Latin American theologies, it is fundamental to keep in mind the cultural complexity and dynamism of this subcontinent, in which religiosity is both hidden and manifest, both within and outside the prevailing Roman Catholicism.

Many scholars in Mexico, the Caribbean, and Central and South America question the very concept of “Latin America,” for it often obscures the diversity of indigenous languages and faith expressions, the African spiritualities, and the non-Iberian European and Asian influences.

The contours of early Latin American theologies can be glimpsed paradigmatically in the work of Felipe Waman Puma de Ayala (born c1550 in Peru*) and Sister Juana Inés de Asbaje* y Ramírez (b1651 in Mexico*). They were not officially theologians of the church, but both made implicit and explicit use of theological categories. Their works exhibit three features that repeatedly appeared in later theologies: (1) a fundamental awareness of the tragedy that faith in a God of justice* can be utilized to sanction injustice; (2) the ability to carry out theological reflection on the margins of hegemonic discourses; and (3) an aesthetic creativity not limited to deductive reasoning. Inasmuch as their writings allowed them to transcend a given place and time, they came to occupy a paradoxical place of relative symbolic privilege, as is the case with those contemporary Latin American theologians whose works are published and distributed beyond their immediate circles. Most Latin American theologians, however, are virtually unknown, although they produce theology in many forms: as academic articles and monographs, but also as pamphlets, Bible studies, sermons, radio programs, Weblogs, plays, and artwork. In Clodovis Boff’s words, these theologies are at once professional, pastoral, and popular. Ideological and financial obstacles affect the circulation of theological knowledge, although valiant attempts are being made to socialize theological production, as in the work of the Teologanda collective led by Virginia R. Azcuy, which has been mapping out and making known “theologies made by women” in all areas of the subcontinent.

Early Latin American Liberation theologians, both Protestant and Roman Catholic, such as Rubem Alves, Hugo Assmann, Gustavo Gutiérrez, José Míguez Bonino, Leonardo Boff, and Jon Sobrino continue to exert an influence. Their most significant contributions include the insistence on the centrality of the poor* for God; the use of the social sciences as a tool for interpreting reality; the epistemological weight of the theologian’s social location; the development of a liberating biblical hermeneutic accessible to all; the centrality for Christology of Jesus’ earthly ministry (see Christologies Cluster: In Latin America); and an insistence that the church needs to withdraw from the pursuit of privilege and engage in the prophetic denunciation of injustice. Two strands have coexisted in these theologies from the beginning: the frank celebration of the symbols and practices of popular* religiosity (Juan Carlos Scannone) and the need for a "liberation of theology" that exercises ideological* suspicion, especially of its own idolatrous* tendencies (Juan Luis Segundo). Protestant theologies have tended to be more in tune with the latter; however, Pentecostals* and Charismatics* continue to incorporate and transform aspects of popular religiosity, in particular those that have to do with bodily healing*.

The "new way of doing theology" proposed by the first Protestant and Roman Catholic Liberation theologians required its practitioners to pay close attention to liberating praxis and to the "signs of the times;" this necessarily led to the diversification of the movement. In a memorable 1977 conference in Mexico City, James Cone demanded where the people of color were among Latin American theologians, whereupon Dora Valentín stood up and added, "And where are the women of all ethnicities among the theologians?" In response, one might mention the feminist liberationist method of Elsa Támez, the indigenous theologies of Eleazar Hernández and Aiban Wagua, the Afro-Latin American feminist hermeneutics of Silvia Regina de Lima Silva and Maricel Mena López, and the ecofeminist moral theology of Ivone Gebara.

Not all theological strands in Latin America belong to the genealogy of Liberation theology: in many Roman Catholic seminaries, neo-Thomism* continues to be the most influential voice; Evangelicals and Pentecostals often give priority to individual piety, while others (e.g. Fraternidad Teológica Latinoamericana) draw on Anabaptist* and Pietistic* traditions to arrive at a theology focused on holistic mission*. Still, the questions placed at the heart of the theological discussion by Liberation theologians cannot easily be ignored: all forms of Latin American theology face the challenge of the earth itself crying out for justice*. What Jon Sobrino calls "honesty with reality" is demanded by the complexities of a subcontinent where hope* and despair, natural resources and an unequal distribution of wealth, land* and landlessness, fertility and desertification, life and death continually pressure theologians to come to grips with the palpable implications of their faith commitments. See also LIBERATION THEOLOGIES CLUSTER: LIBERATION AND THEOLOGY; PREFERENTIAL OPTION FOR THE POOR.

NANCY ELIZABETH BEDFORD

Latino/a Theologies, an articulation of Hispanic theologies that emerged during the 1960s. Hispanics, owing to their location in the United States, are heirs of indigenous, African, Asian, and various European cultures, including that of medieval Catholic Spain. They are white, black, and everything in between. They are Catholics, Protestants, worshippers of Orisha (African quasi-deities), Jews, Muslims, atheists, spiritualists, and followers of Amerindian religious traditions. There is no typical Hispanic, no normative, unifying, or monolithic Latino/a theology; there is a plurality of Latino/a theologies related by a common theological methodology.

Hispanic religious identity has been described in terms of mestizaje (mixture; see Mestizos). For US Latinos/as, the borderlands are not solely a geographic location; they are also a social location of mestizaje in which Latinos/as attempt to construct their theological perspectives. Because of the US cultural views of the "nature of race," both Hispanic/Latino/a Catholics and Protestants find abuse and neglect within their own denominations. The comunidad (community) serves as a resource to counter this abuse, becoming an important unifying factor in the new mestizaje in the USA. Operating from the perspective of exiles, aliens, and outsiders, Latino/a theologies develop into a study of God from the margins of Euro-American power and privilege. Their theological methodology seeks "truth" as an ongoing process called teología de conjunto (collaborative theology), the coming together of the community of believers to work collectively in seeking theological precepts.

The spirituality* of Latinos/as is a dynamic grassroots religion practiced in lo cotidiano (the everyday); it stresses home devotional practices, such as worshipping at home altars, praying to saints, or taking promesas (vows). This popular* religion (devotional piety), a part of the shared cultural roots emerging from different traditions, is where individual and communal feelings find religious symbols and actions that make sense of the world and provide a concrete point of contact with the Divine in the midst of daily life.

Latina Feminist and Mujerista theologies follow a similar theological methodology with, in addition, concerns for the sexism* prevalent in Hispanic culture and the lack of race and class analysis by North American feminists.

The ethos of the cultural and social contexts of the Latino/a community affects what is theologically important to Hispanics. Their cultural context shapes popular religious manifestations. In their social location, the concepts of family* (an important social institution) and justice* (with praxis, action, as the central tenet) powerfully inform what the comunidad deems to be important. See also FEMINIST THEOLOGY CLUSTER: IN NORTH AMERICA: LATINA and IN NORTH AMERICA: MUJERISTA.

MIGUEL A. DE LA TORRE

Latitudinarianism, the name applied in 17th-c. England to Anglican clergy who conformed with episcopacy and the Book of Common* Prayer but regarded them as matters of human ordering rather than divine command. Calling these "things indifferent" (see Adiaphora, Adiaphorists), they affirmed much "latitude" in applying the church doctrines. Among the Cambridge* Platonists, to whom this label was originally given, this stance was linked with scientific* thought and rationality, easily lending itself to indifferentism or skepticism and to individualism.

Latria, the Latin term for "worship," based on the Greek; the worship of God alone (contrast with Dulia).

Latter-day Saints, Church of Jesus Christ of. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints emerged in the 19th c. out of a Restoration* rather than a Reformation* ideology. Joseph Smith* organized the Latter-day Saints in Fayette, New York, in 1830, shortly after he produced the Book of Mormon*, which, he claimed, he received from the angel Moroni and translated from an ancient record.

Latter-day Saints under Smith's Leadership. Smith reported that God the Father and Jesus Christ appeared to him, telling him that all Christian churches had departed from the truth and that he should join none of them. The Book of Mormon* offers evidence of Smith's stature as God's designated prophet, empowered to effect a complete restoration of gospel truths, priesthood authority, and church organization.

Smith gathered converts in Kirtland, Ohio (1831–38), and other locations in Missouri (1831–38), and later (1839) transformed the village of Commerce, Illinois, into the thriving church center of Nauvoo, a virtually independent theocratic city-state. Assisted by a "Quorum of Twelve Apostles," Smith led a people and a city teeming with refugees expelled from Missouri and converts from the East and from England. Mormons administered local courts, municipal offices, and a powerful militia.

Latter-day Saints under Young's Leadership. Smith was murdered in 1844, and most Saints rallied around Brigham Young*, who led thousands of exiles to the Salt Lake Valley. They colonized the West, practiced polygamy* from 1852 to the turn of the century, and swelled with converts; they continued to immigrate to Utah until the "gathering" stopped around 1900.

Latter-day Saints Today and Their Theological Views. Envisioned as the final incarnation of Christ's church, the Latter-day Saints preach the centrality of Christ and his atoning* sacrifice in the soul's* progression from pre-mortal existence through earthly incarnation and toward celestial glory. Through faith in Christ's atonement and by obedience to his laws and ordinances, such exalted men and women, married or "sealed" together for eternity, become like God, enjoying eternal life and a continuing posterity. In addition to the Book of Mormon*, the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price contain revelations and ancient writings revealed to Smith and his successors and, along with the Bible, constitute the Latter-day Saints' canon of scripture.

Mormons support a vigorous missionary effort (some 60,000 self-supporting missionaries serve for 18–24 months), subscribe to a stringent health code (no coffee, tea, alcohol, or tobacco), commit themselves to a life of chastity (no pre- or extramarital sex), and are expected to contribute 10% of their gross income to the Church. These demands, coupled with a history of "gathering" (that frequently overwhelmed and threatened old settlers) and recurrent oppression, combine to produce a Mormon culture that is intensely cohesive. At the same time, hundreds of thousands of annual converts make the group's constitution dynamic and fluid.

Organizationally, the church is hierarchical and centralized. From headquarters in Salt Lake City, a prophet and two counselors receive "continuing revelation" to lead the Church. Next in authority are the Quorum of Twelve Apostles and several Quorums of Seventy, all of whom, as worldwide or "general" authorities, preside over a membership that has been growing at a prodigious rate (from 3.1 million in 1970 to 8 million in 1995, according to World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001). More than half of their members live outside the USA, and that proportion will continue to increase because Mormon conversion rates are the highest in Latin America and Africa.

Smaller bodies of Mormons include the "Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints" (claiming direct continuity with Joseph Smith; centered in Independence, Missouri), "Temple Lot," "Bickertonites," and "Strangites." See also MORMON, BOOK OF; MORMON WORSHIP; SMITH, JOSEPH; YOUNG, BRIGHAM. TERRY L GIVENS

Latvia. Lutheranism is the traditional official faith in Latvia, but in Southeast Latvia Roman Catholicism prevails as a more "popular" faith, and Russian Orthodoxy is important because of the high percentage of Russians in Latvia. There have been attempts to revive the national indigenous religion.

Latvians and Estonians were conquered by crusading orders of Teutonic* Knights (12th c.). In the aftermath of the Reformation*, the ruling German landowning class adopted Lutheranism and controlled the clergy and peasantry. After Latvia was gradually absorbed into the Russian Empire (18th c.), Latvians experienced a "dual" (Lutheran/Orthodox) occupation (19th c.).

Following a period of independence (1920–40), Latvia became part of the Soviet Union; anyone who practiced religion was persecuted. In contrast to the situation in Lithuania*, in Latvia Soviet rule was more overtly dominated by the Russians, and there was little national or religious dissent. There was some involvement of the churches in the process leading to Latvian independence (1991), but as in most post-Communist countries, since independence both internal and external problems have prevented the churches from playing an active public or political role; these include a lack of resources, expertise, and experience; internal debate; and a new environment of pluralism and secularization*.

During the Communist period, the established denominations tended toward authoritarianism and doctrinal and ritual conservatism as a result of enforced isolation from developments in Europe and the wider world and a "fortress mentality" in the face of persecution and aggressive atheism*. In the post-Communist period, this conservatism has been both reinforced and challenged by the influx of Western Protestant missionaries and "new religious movements." The Latvian Lutheran Church has reacted against the perceived liberalism of Lutheranism in the wider world, e.g. by rejecting the ordination of women*.

There is an unofficial distinction between traditional and nontraditional religions, with the former enjoying privileges such as the right to teach religion in schools, a right that other social groups have challenged. There are also some potential problems of discrimination connected to the registration of religious communities. However, under the Religion Law of 1995, there are no serious restrictions on religious freedom, and Latvia complies with the standards of the European Union, which it joined in 2004.

Statistics: Population (2000): 2.3 million (M). Christians, 1970: 1.2 M, 51%; 2000: 1.6 M, 67% (Protestants, 0.56; Orthodox, 0.55; Roman Catholics, 0.49; independents, 0.12); nonreligious, 0.76 M, 32%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

PHILIP WALTERS

Laud, William (1573–1645), archbishop of Canterbury. Matriculated (1589) and was then a fellow (1593) at St. John's College, Oxford; its substantial Catholic leanings had a formative influence on Laud's liturgical sensibilities and theological trajectory. Laud argued (1602) for the perpetual continuity of the church, posited the indispensable nature of diocesan bishops (1604), and remained an avowed opponent of Calvinist* theology. Throughout Laud's career, both at Oxford and at Canterbury, rumblings were heard that he was too close to being Roman Catholic and bent on disfiguring the Protestant identity of the Church of England.

Appointed bishop of St. David's (1621), Bath and Wells (1626), and London (1628), before becoming the chancellor at Oxford University, Laud was poised to become the archbishop of Canterbury (1633) under Charles I. With the authority to reconfigure the shape and identity of the Church of England, and convinced that the Puritan* factions were inimical to the unity of the Church, Laud began to implement draconian policies, which further alienated the Puritans. He emphasized the beauty of holiness, a sacramentarian piety focused on the Eucharist*, deliberately turning away from the sermon-focused piety of the Calvinist puritans.

During the personal rule of Charles I (1629–40), Laud's power was both bolstered and hotly challenged. He was impeached by the Commons during the Long Parliament and brought to the Tower of London (1641). He was tried (1644) and executed (January 1645) on the charge of popery.

PAUL CHANG-HA LIM

Lauds (literally "praise"), ancient morning prayer of the church; originated in Judaism. After Vatican* II, it became increasingly popular in Roman Catholic parishes as it was in Anglican churches after the Reformation.

Lausanne Movement. With a focus on evangelization (evangelism*) and a nondenominational rather than ecumenical* emphasis, the Lausanne Movement is in many respects the counterpart of the World* Council of Churches, which is based in Geneva. Both independent mission organizations and Evangelical churches participate in the Lausanne Movement. It grew out of a World Congress on Evangelism held in Berlin (1966) at the initiative of Billy Graham. A subsequent International Congress on World Evangelization in Lausanne (1974) drafted the Lausanne Covenant with six emphases: “the authority of Scripture*; the nature of evangelism; Christian social responsibility; the urgency of world missions*; the problems of culture*; and spiritual warfare.” Numerous conferences (global, regional, topical) have been held since then.

Lavra (Gk for “alley”), or laura, among 4th-c. Palestinian monks, a row or cluster of monastic cells around a common center, including a church for gathering for worship. Later, any Greek and Russian monastic community without a formal cenobite* organization. See also MARTHANA.

Law. In the OT, the term torah (instruction) refers to narrative instruction, social regulation, and directives concerning, e.g., temples, vestments, and liturgies. In Judaism “Torah” refers to the Pentateuch, which contains relatively little material that would be termed “legal” in the later Roman sense. Reducing the “OT Law” to the legal codes found in the Torah is a later Christian innovation. On this assumption, the paradigm for this legal material is the giving of the Decalogue* at Sinai, into which much of the remaining legal material is assimilated.

In the NT, the term nomos often has the wider Torah in view. However, for many interpreters, Paul* often restricts nomos to mosaic legal codes that do not apply to Gentiles*. In Paul’s terms, the love of neighbor “fulfills” or completes the Law. The Gospels* tend to contrast the way of Jesus with the “Law of Moses” or to emphasize compassion* instead of compliance with legal codes.

As Western Christianity took over both the judicial functions and the legal assumptions of the Roman Empire, it tended to emphasize the “positive law” of legislation or decree. This resulted in the codes of Justinian* and Theodosius* as the basis of church-sanctioned law; subsequently, OT Law was most often understood according to the same pattern. When linked with the Greek view of law as the order that governs the cosmos, this produced a view of “natural* law” that grounds moral* law.

The Reformation* regarded law as that which the human cannot fulfill (because of sin*). Thus law first indicates the need for salvation* “apart from the Law” (through the gospel of grace*) and for punishing criminal behavior (murder, theft) in a fallen world. The Reformed tradition also found in the legal and covenantal traditions of the Torah the basis for a “third use of the Law” that would govern Christian communities and commonwealths. Radical* Reformation movements maintained that the Law is fulfilled by love of the neighbor (Paul) or through interhuman justice* and mercy* (Gospels).

More recent European discussion has emphasized the justice* that is heterogeneous to law yet indissociable from it, a justice to be understood in terms of radical welcome of the other (Derrida). Agamben noted that messianic movements (in Judaism*, Christianity, and Islam*) maintain that law is both consummated and abrogated with the coming of the Messiah and emphasize the violence of the law in contrast to a justice, which, like love*, cannot be coerced.

Laying on of Hands is a gesture used in many religions. For Christians, it has biblical roots in both the OT and NT. Spanning centuries and cultures, it continues to carry different meanings depending on context and tradition.

In the OT, the laying on of hands was a gesture concerned with setting things, animals, and people apart, sanctifying them for sacrifice or consecrating them; it was also a gesture of blessing*. To these practices, the NT added the laying on of hands for healing* and initiation.

In Christian liturgical history (as attested from the early 3rd c.), the laying on of hands continued to be used for healing and initiation (with or without anointing) and, in addition, was practiced during ordinations* of all ranks and for reconciling penitents. It was also used for marriage* in Eastern Orthodox Christian rites (from the 4th c.) and later in the Latin-speaking church (from the 10th c.).

There are a variety of theological interpretations of the laying on of hands, even when joined to a verbal prayer. However, it is often seen as a way of imparting or transferring something, as in the act of blessing*, especially as conferring the Holy Spirit, highlighting the role of the third person of the Trinity* in liturgical rites.

Lazarus, (1) the beggar in Jesus' parable (Luke 16:19–31); the name was later used for any beggar. (2) Mary and Martha's brother, who was resurrected (John 11:1–44).

Leah, older daughter of Laban. By deception she became Jacob's* first wife and bore him six sons: Reuben, Simeon, Levi*, Judah*, Issachar, and Zebulun.

Leaven, sourdough or yeast that ferments dough, causing it to rise and making it lighter. As a metaphor for an inconspicuous potency that brings impressive results, it is used positively in Jesus' parable of the leaven (Matt 13:33 = Luke 13:21), comparing leaven to the Kingdom* of God working quietly but inevitably. Elsewhere it is used negatively to suggest a sinful influence (e.g. Jesus warns against "the leaven of the Pharisees," Mark 8:15, par.) or an impurity contrasted with Passover, the feast of "unleavened bread" (1 Cor 5:6–8). Passover was called the feast of unleavened bread because eating leavened bread, and even the presence of leaven in one's house, was and still is prohibited for practicing Jews during Passover as a reenactment of Exod 12:15–20 (before leaving Egypt, the Israelites did not have time to leaven their bread).

Lebanon. Although no recent statistics on Lebanon's religious communities are available, the almost 40% that is usually attributed to the Christian population is the highest percentage of Christians in any Middle Eastern country. Politically, their influence is even more pronounced, because since the conclusion of the civil war (1975–89), exactly half of the 128 seats of Parliament are reserved for Christians. Of these, half are taken by politicians belonging to the Maronite* Church, the largest Christian community in the country. The president also comes from this group. Maronite and Christian dominance in the political and economic structures of Lebanon contributed to the outbreak of the civil war, as did the disrupting influences of regional power politics involving Israel*, Syria*, and the Palestinians*. A Christian majority had been purposely created by the French during the League of Nations mandate period, was confirmed by the 1932 census, which showed 51% Christians vs. 49% Muslims, and was institutionalized during independence in 1942. However, the politicization of religious communities, the accompanying negotiations over representation, and the increase of Muslims vis-à-vis Christians created a rather unstable political entity.

The focus on the political aspects of the religious communities has obscured many other aspects of Christianity in Lebanon, among which are its rich liturgy and its denominational variety alongside numerous formal and informal interconnections in social institutions, education, and daily life. In addition to the Maronite Church, which has long-standing relationships with the Roman Catholic Church, the Greek Orthodox* and Greek Catholic churches are important elements of Lebanese Christianity; the Gregorian Armenian* and Armenian Catholic churches have also long been present. In the 20th c., Syriac Orthodox* and Syriac Catholic as well as Assyrian* and Chaldean* churches were established by refugees from Turkey*, Iraq*, and Iran*. Starting in the 16th c., missionaries strengthened and modernized Catholicism, whereas in the 19th c., North Americans helped create Protestant churches. Together with more recent Pentecostal* denominations, these constitute a small minority, but the Maronite Church has been especially influenced by the Charismatic* Movement. Western missionaries were instrumental in the establishment of a number of famous educational institutions, such as the (Protestant) American University of Beirut and (Roman Catholic) Université de St. Joseph. Whereas many of their Christian and Muslim graduates have contributed to Lebanon's lively Arabic literary and scholarly scene, the use of English and French as languages of education have also contributed to a strong Western focus of many of Lebanon's educated elites. See also ISLAM AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN THE MIDDLE EAST: LEBANON.

Lectionary, “lessons” (portions of Scripture*) to be read on specific days in the church year (from the 4th c.). A three-year “common lectionary” is now used by Roman Catholic, Orthodox, Anglican, and mainline Protestant churches.

Lecturer, a preacher appointed by a parish to provide regular sermons. The Puritans* used such appointments to install preachers with their own views, and the Long Parliament encouraged this practice, but it was halted by the Act of Uniformity (1662).

Lee, Ann (1736–84), evangelist and founder of the United Society of Believers in Christ’s Second Appearance (Shakers*). Born in England, she had a difficult marriage marked by the deaths of infant children. She emigrated to the British colonies in North America (1774) and was the leader of the Shakers until her death. In the Millennialist* milieu of late-18th-c. England, Lee joined the Shaking Quakers, who predicted the imminent return of Christ. When she emigrated to North America, she proclaimed a message that combined Millennialism and Perfectionism*. She claimed that the millennium had come in her church. The millennium was marked by the direct experience of the Holy* Spirit – a source of authority more important to Lee than Scripture or traditional creeds – and by moral perfection, particularly exhibited through compulsory celibacy*. Celibacy, however, did not signal the erasure of gender differences. To bolster her spiritual authority, “Mother Ann” (as her followers called her) used feminine imagery, speaking of the labor she undertook for her followers. Later Shakers claimed that Lee herself was the second coming of Jesus. The Shaker Movement survived Lee’s death and reached its heyday in the mid-19th c. SARAH JOHNSON

Lee, Jarena (1783–?), born in Cape May, New Jersey; the first authorized (1819) female preacher in the African* Methodist Episcopal (AME) Church. After she informed Bishop Richard Allen* that the Lord had revealed to her that she must preach the gospel, he replied that the AME Church’s Discipline did not allow for women preachers. Lee responded, “O how careful ought we to be, lest through our by-laws of church government and discipline, we bring into disrepute even the word of life. And why should it be thought impossible, heterodox, or improper for a woman to preach seeing the Savior died for the woman as well as for the man?” Lee’s apologetic appeals for women’s equality did not succeed, but her spiritual gifts and skills did. Years later, Bishop Allen was so moved by Lee’s spontaneous “exhortation” during a worship service that he “rose up in the assembly, and related that [she] had called upon him eight years before, asking to be permitted to preach, and that he had put [her] off; but that he now as much believed that [she] was called to that work, as any of the preachers present.” Although Lee still experienced hostility in her ministry, she enjoyed a fruitful career (at least until the late 1840s) as an itinerant preacher, activist, and author. See also AFRICAN AMERICAN CLUSTER: HOLINESS; AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL (AME) CHURCH. Lefèvre d’Etaples, Jacques (c1470–1536). Viewed as the first French humanist, he wrote commentaries on Aristotle, then on early Christian writings, medieval mystic literature, and Nicholas* of Cusa. As vicar general in the Diocese of Meaux with responsibility for evangelism*, he insisted on a return to the Bible, teaching himself the Psalms, Paul’s letters, and the Gospels. Suspected of heresy* by the Faculty of Theology of Paris, he took refuge in Strasbourg (1525), apparently adhering to Protestant ideas. Back in France under the protection of Marguerite* of Navarre, sister of King Francis I of France, he did not express his personal religious views and devoted himself to the first translation of the entire Bible in French.

Leme Cintra, Sebastião (1882–1942), archbishop of Olinda and Recife (1916–21), coadjutor archbishop (1921–30), and cardinal archbishop of Rio de Janeiro (1930–42), is considered a crusader for Brazilian neo-Christendom. As director of the conservative Romanization process, he claimed a central role for the Roman Catholic Church in such important areas as politics (creation of the Catholic Electoral League) and education (foundation of Rio de Janeiro’s Catholic University). He also fought to improve church and state relations, which was difficult after 1889, when a secular republican regime was proclaimed (see Laicization). During Vargas’s presidency (1930–45), when both the Roman Catholic Church and the state had similar objectives, including fighting Communism and maintaining social order, Dom Leme established an efficient collaboration with the federal government, which led to the semiofficial recognition of Roman Catholicism. See also CHURCH AND STATE RELATIONS

Lent, the 40-day period (Quadragesima) during which believers prepare themselves for Holy Week through fasting, prayer, penitence, almsgiving, and self-denial. In the Western churches, Lent begins on Ash Wednesday and ends on Holy Saturday (the six Sundays of the period, each of which commemorates the Resurrection, are not fasting days, and thus are not counted). In the Eastern Orthodox* churches, the “Great Lent” (or “Great Fast”) begins on Clean Monday (Sundays are included in the 40 days) and ends on the Friday before Palm Sunday (Holy Week being a distinct period of fasting). The Great Fast is contrasted to the Nativity Fast, the 40-day fast before Christmas. See also LITURGICAL YEAR.

Leo I, Pope (440–61), possibly born in Rome, a saint and doctor of the church, one of two popes to be called “the Great.” Leo was a particularly influential deacon. His election occurred while he was on a diplomatic mission to Gaul. He rapidly asserted his authority over the Church in Rome and Christians in the West. When Eutyches* appealed to him during a dispute with the patriarch of Constantinople over the nature of Christ, Leo addressed a document, now known as “The Tome,” to the patriarch, a document that played a crucial role in the decision-making process at the Council of Chalcedon* (451). Leo persuaded Attila the Hun not to attack Rome (452), and although he failed similarly to dissuade the Vandal* Genserich, he did convince him not to set fire to it or to massacre its inhabitants. See also POPES, ROMAN CATHOLIC, AND THE PAPACY.

Leo XIII, Pope (1878–1903), born Gioacchino Vincenzo Pecci (1810) in Carpineto. After his ordination (1837), he served as nuncio* in Belgium, became bishop* of Perugia (1846) and a cardinal* (1853). He was appointed camerlengo (chamberlain) of the Roman Catholic Church (1877), which impressed the cardinal electors. Because Leo was ill, it was thought that his pontificate would not be a long one; in fact, however, his was the third longest pontificate in papal history. Determined to win back the Papal States, he tried unsuccessfully to win allies against the Kingdom of Italy. He encouraged the study of Thomas Aquinas*, opened the Vatican archives to scholars, and issued a number of encyclicals*, especially on church*–state relations, most significantly Rerum Novarum* (1891), known as “the workers’ charter.” He condemned “Americanism” and declared Anglican orders invalid (the bull* Apostolicae Curae, 1896), though he desired the reconversion of England to Roman Catholicism. See also POPES, ROMAN CATHOLIC, AND THE PAPACY.

Leonine Sacramentary, the earliest surviving volume containing prayers for the Mass* in the Roman Rite. The early-7th-c. manuscript is attributed to Leo* I, but it also draws on later materials.

Leontius of Byzantium (6th c.), defender of the Christology* of the Council of Chalcedon*. He argued that this council found the golden mean between the Monophysites*, who thought that one hypostasis* implies one nature (a misunderstanding of Miaphysitism*), and the Nestorians*, who thought that two natures imply two hypostases. To show how Christ can have two natures in one hypostasis, he used the notion of enhypostasia: a nature can be real by “subsisting in” a hypostasis shared with another nature. This can be interpreted in several ways, as D. B. Evans and B. E. Daley have shown. Leontius may have had Origenist leanings; if so, Jesus’ creaturely life would be absorbed into the person of the Word through knowledge and will. After the Second Council of Constantinople* in 553, it was understood to mean that the divine Word assumed an individual “humanity” but not a “man.”

Leontius of Jerusalem (6th c.), author of two writings, one against the Monophysites* (the polemical name given to Miaphysites*) and one against the Nestorians*, that were formerly ascribed to Leontius* of Byzantium. He was the more clearly “neo-Chalcedonian” of the two, interpreting the Christology of the Council of Chalcedon* in the light of the writings of Cyril* of Alexandria; thus Christ is the divine Word* acting through a complete humanity.

Lesotho. The history of Christianity in Lesotho goes back to 1833 when King Moshoeshoe I (1786–1870), the founder of the Basotho nation, invited three Paris Evangelical Missionary Society missionaries in the hope that they would help him establish his sovereignty in the Mohokare (Caledon) Valley. Moshoeshoe also wanted a footing in the “new world” being established around his frontiers by the Afrikaners (Boers) and the British (as noted by Moshoeshoe’s biographer, Thompson).

When Roman Catholic missionaries made a request to found a mission in Lesotho, Moshoeshoe gladly assented (1862). The first Catholic mission began in Tloutle (Roma). The Roman Catholic missionaries were followed by the Anglicans* (1867).

As of the early 21st c., most Basothos were Christian. The Roman Catholic Church is the largest church; all of its leaders and priests are Basotho. The Lesotho Evangelical Church is the largest Protestant church and the first major church to ordain women as ministers and evangelists. The Anglican Church is much smaller.

A large number of smaller churches and spiritual movements are active in Lesotho. They include the Methodist Church of Southern Africa, the African Methodist Episcopal Church, the Apostolic Faith Mission, Assemblies of God, Seventh-day Adventists, and numerous Pentecostal*, Charismatic* and Evangelical churches – all of whose leadership is local, contributing to the lives of Basotho. Other religious groups have gradually gained a small but significant membership of committed followers: Baha'i*, Jehovah's* Witnesses, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter*-day Saints (Mormons), and Islam*.

The Christian Council of Lesotho, an ecumenical body (since the mid-1960s), began the process of ecumenical dialogue with some success, breaking down the barriers among churches and cooperating in the fight against the HIV/AIDS pandemic.

Christians from most if not all these churches follow a number of African* religious customs and rituals, often contrary to official church teachings.

Statistics: Population (2000): 2.1 million (M). Christians, 1.95 M, 91.0% (Roman Catholics, 0.80 M; Protestants, 0.28 M; members of African Instituted Churches and other independents, 0.25 M; Anglicans, 0.1 M); African Religionists, 0.17 M, 7.7%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

TEFETSO HENRY MOTHIBE

Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim (1729–81), major figure in the German Enlightenment*, proponent of religious tolerance. His plays were performed in Berlin and Hamburg; as a critic, he dealt with issues of dramatic theory. While serving as the librarian at Wolfenbüttel, he published fragments from H. S. Reimarus, one of the first historical critics of the Bible, and engaged in his own biblical criticism. His view of religion emphasized universal morality apart from historical revelation; this was dramatized in Nathan the Wise (1779) and advocated program-matically in The Education of the Human Race (1780), where he wrote the well-known dictum that “accidental truths of history cannot prove necessary truths of reason.” In this work, he also gave currency to the theory of three ages and the eternal gospel, linked with Joachim* of Fiore.

Leta, a presbytera according to an inscription from 4th- to 5th-c. Tropea, Calabria: “Sacred to her good memory. Leta the presbytera lived forty years, eight months and nine days. Her husband made [this monument]. She preceded him in peace on the day before the Ides of May.” What she did is unclear, but she certainly was not simply the wife of a presbyter*, since her husband gives no indication of holding that office. The inscription coincides well with the letter of Gelasius*, bishop of Rome (494), complaining of the admission of women to sacred ministry at the altar in South Italy. See also FLAVIA VITALIA.

Leuenberg Agreement, a statement adopted by the major Lutheran and Reformed* churches in Europe (1973), formulating a common position on points that had divided them at the time of the Reformation* (Christology*, the Lord's* Supper, and predestination*) and declaring that the doctrinal condemnations of the past no longer apply. They formed the Leuenberg Church Fellowship, renamed the Community of Protestant Churches in Europe (2003).

Levinas, Emmanuel (1906–95), a Lithuanian Jew who lived and worked in France; a hermeneutical* phenomenologist* and moral philosopher. As the latter, he sought to identify the ground of unconditional responsibility to and for the other. As a phenomenologist, he located this not in some transcendent reality such as Plato's Good or the biblical God but in intentionality, the immediate experience the self has of itself and its world as meaningful. But for him intentionality is reversed. Meaning does not arise as I confer it by my gaze or speech. It arises rather from the gaze and the voice of the other, by which I find myself identified as the one called to categorical obligation and infinite responsibility.

As a hermeneutical phenomenologist, Levinas does not pretend to occupy the view from nowhere but rather inhabits a specific site within the history of traditions. His reflection arises within the horizon of his understanding of Jewish traditions, and for this reason “the other to whom and for whom I am responsible is most specifically the widow, the orphan, and the stranger."

Levinas offers his critique of Christianity largely through his critique of Kierkegaard*. For Kierkegaard, God is the middle term between me and my neighbor. It is because God commands me to love my neighbor as I love myself and, through the acts of creation* and redemption*, gives me good reason to do so that I am a responsible self. By contrast Levinas insists that the neighbor is always the middle term between me and God. My only relations to God come through the face and voice of the neighbor.

Levinas fears that unless the ethical* relation is given priority over the God relation, the self will become self-centered, so concerned with its own salvation* (eternal happiness) that an all too possibly violent amorality will supplant ethical responsibility. By focusing on texts in which Kierkegaard develops the God relation and completely ignoring his major ethical treatise, Works of Love, Levinas fails to notice that love of God and love of neighbor are as inseparable for Kierkegaard (and Christianity) as they are for Levinas (and Judaism*). Nevertheless, Levinas provides a prophetic warning against a danger to which every theistic religion is vulnerable: allowing religious interest in personal or collective happiness to lead to the neglect of the neighbor's needs or to violent oppression* of the weak.

MEROLD WESTPHAL

Levites, one of the 12 tribes of Israel*, given the role of maintaining the Temple, leading worship, and performing sacrifices.

Leviticus is the third of the five books of the Torah*, the Pentateuch* (also called the Five Books of Moses). The Hebrew name is wayyiqra', "He called," according to the first Hebrew word of the book. Leviticus is the Latin form of the Greek levitikon, which connotes "priestly."

Leviticus is the central book of the Pentateuch. The narratives in the first two books, Genesis* and Exodus*, are concerned with Israel until it arrives at Sinai; in the last two books, Numbers* and Deuteronomy*, Israel continues on its way to the Promised* Land. Leviticus stands in between, and the events it portrays are located in Sinai. It is written in the language of the "priestly" (P) level (or source) of the Pentateuch.

From inside the Tent of Meeting (1:1), God gives Moses all "the commandments for the people of Israel" (26:46, 27:34). The first part of Leviticus (1–16) concentrates on sacrifices*. Chapters 1–7 contain the rules about performing the following sacrifices: burnt offering (1), grain offering (2), peace or well-being offering (3), sin offering, or purification offering (4:1–5:13), and guilt offering (5:14–26[6:7]) (there are minor changes in 6:1[8]–7:38). In Chaps. 8 and 9, Moses installs Aaron and his sons as the first priests, who then perform their first sacrifices. The cultic rules culminate in the Day of Atonement (Chap. 16): once a year Aaron (i.e. the high priest) shall make atonement* for the sanctuary, the Tent of Meeting, the priests, and the whole people of Israel (16:33, 34).

The second part of Leviticus (17–26), often called the "Holiness Code," is less structured; it is dominated by the theme of holiness* (e.g. 19:2, 20:26), as earlier, in Chaps. 11–15 (cf. 11:44, 45). There are commandments on keeping away from unclean animals (11), the cleansing of bodily impurity (12–15), sexual and family matters (18, 20), cultic rules (17, 22, 23), and special commandments for priests (21).

Chapter 26 summarizes both the Book of Leviticus and the divine lawgiving from Sinai. The central term is "covenant*." God will keep the covenant as long as Israel keeps God's commandments (vv. 1–13), and God will retract it when Israel breaks God's laws (vv. 14–39), but ultimately God will remember it (vv. 40–45).

The cultic laws in Leviticus are given for the Temple, which no longer exists. But the ethical laws are still observed by the Jewish people today. Of particular relevance is the Day of Atonement (Lev 16).

ROLF RENDTORFF

Lewis, C. S. (Clive Staples) (1898–1963), literary scholar, novelist, spiritual writer, Christian apologist. Born in Northern Ireland, studied philosophy and English literature at Oxford, was a fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford (1925–54) and then chair of medieval and Renaissance literature at Cambridge (1954). He converted from atheism* to theism* (1929) and then to Christianity (1931) under the influence of friends like J. R. R. Tolkien and Hugo Dyson. He became the founding president of the Oxford Socratic Club (1942), where issues related to Christianity were debated.

His main apologetic works were written between 1941 and 1947, a period dominated both by World War II and, intellectually, by starkly naturalistic* philosophical movements, such as logical positivism*. His most famous apologetic book, Mere Christianity (1952), originated as series of radio talks on the BBC during the war. His vigorous and creative arguments for the supernatural along with his accessible style made him one of the most widely read 20th-c. authors and arguably the most influential apologist of his era, especially among Protestant Evangelicals*. He also authored several novels with spiritual and moral themes, including the famous children's series The Chronicles of Narnia, which was made into several motion pictures.

JERRY WALLS

Liberalism in Christian Theology and Ethics describes a movement that began in the early 19th c. in response to the challenges of modern culture and continues to the present day. It seeks a mediation between faith* and reason*, God and world, tradition and culture*, to avoid the undesirable alternatives of authoritarian dogmatism and aggressive secularism*. This mediation is never settled and must be rethought by each new generation.

The word “liberal” (Lat liberalis) designates something that is free (liber), open-minded, and generous. Theologically, to be liberal means to be free from the constraints of dogmatic orthodoxy and to employ critical methods (historical, literary, philosophical, psychological, sociological) that belong to a broader intellectual life. It also indicates that the subject matter of theology is freedom* itself, understood to be a reference to God (as the radically free One), to human beings (created in the image of the divine freedom), and to God's activity in the world (a gracious liberality).

Liberalism is oriented toward experience, both individual and collective, as a source of religious faith* and practice. It works in tandem with the resources of Scripture* and tradition* and the criteria of rationality* to form relative judgments about truth, being, and goodness. Experience in all its forms, including emotion and feeling, connects persons with what is real, objective, and abiding. Some liberal thinkers supplement the experiential element with a visionary or spiritual dimension, which entails an awareness of the mystery* beneath the real. The mystery can be articulated in negative or positive form; the emphasis may fall on mystical fragments or a theological system.

Most liberal thinkers are committed to a prophetic, culturally transformative theology. This is the ethical mandate of late-19th-c. liberalism, radicalized by postmodern critiques of culture, society, and politics. Whereas “culture* Protestantism” was once considered a temptation of liberals – an accommodation to the values and interests of a culture oriented toward material progress – liberal thinkers have learned from the culture critiques of neo-orthodoxy* and from liberation* struggles related to race, class, gender, and sexual orientation. Liberalism is committed to the realization of God's Kingdom* or “freedom project” in history*, knowing that such a realization is always unfinished and subject to tragic distortions.

PETER C. HODGSON

Liberal Theology refers to several movements in modern theology. Although few theologians labeled themselves “liberal,” the term can be appropriately applied to those who have accepted Enlightenment* thought, particularly the principle of criticism of tradition, authority, and dogma. In some countries, holding such a critical attitude was considered a subversive political act. W. M. L. de Wette, for instance, lost his post in Berlin (1819) for espousing liberal causes. Protestants widely accepted liberal methods from the 19th c., but with a few notable exceptions, it was not until the Second Vatican* Council that Roman Catholic theology began to adopt a moderate critical approach to Scripture and tradition (see Bible Interpretation Cluster: History of).

Liberal theology has strong national characteristics. In Germany it emerged from the critical questioning of tradition* (late 18th c.). While most German theology remained anti-liberal, a number of figures accepted the principles of the Enlightenment, including Friedrich Schleiermacher*. Later theologians, including Otto Pfleiderer, who drew on the system of Hegel* and sought a reconciliation of all thought, were also labeled liberals. Others, notably Adolf von Harnack*, sought to reduce Christianity to its purest essence, removing the accretions of the past. In the eyes of their opponents, who derided them as “culture* Protestants,” some liberals, including Harnack and Ernst Troeltsch*, were regarded as overoptimistic about technological progress*. This charge became particularly common after World War I, when liberal theology quickly lost its preeminence.

In England, with its liberal political tradition, many theologians accepted forms of liberalism. A number adopted a belief in progress through education*, producing the notorious Essays and Reviews (1860), which called for critical study of the Bible. Later English liberals tended toward apologetics, seeking reconciliation between modern thought and religion.

Others, like John Robinson, preferred the term “radical” and were closer to German dialectical theology than to either liberal tradition. In the USA, a number of seminaries (most important, Union Theological Seminary in New York) adopted liberal methods. In Chicago, under the influence of Shailer Mathews, the Divinity School adopted a close interplay of sociology*, history*, and theology. Such liberalism was criticized by theologians like Reinhold Niebuhr*, who sought to revitalize Christian orthodoxy.

In more recent years, many theological movements, including Radical* Orthodoxy, have been deeply critical of the Enlightenment and liberal theology, regarding both as a compromise between secular thought forms and the truths of Christianity. Others see little alternative to liberalism for the survival of a culturally relevant Christianity.

1) Introductory Entry

Liberation Theologies: Liberation and Theology. The great theological treatises have not given attention to the theme of liberation. However, in the past decades, theologians have begun to reflect on liberation from a theological perspective, seeing liberation as the essence of faith* itself. Theologies of liberation have contributed most to this Christian truth; but the church also sees liberation as central to the evangelical message (as the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith affirmed in Libertatis Conscientia). Proclaiming the gospel is proclaiming liberation.

In the HB, the aspirations for liberation of the people of Israel in Egypt, and subsequently in Babylonia, as well as for liberation from oppression* during the time of the judges, show the importance of liberation in the biblical tradition. Liberation comes as a faith experience in which one knows that God* is merciful and attentive to the cries of the oppressed. In the OT, the verbs “liberate,” “save,” “rescue,” and “have well-being” are translations of the same Hebrew root (yasha); the choice of the English equivalent varies with the passage. Similarly in the NT, the Greek verb sozo means “liberate,” “save,” or “heal,” according to the context. Other roots, whose literal meaning is “release” or “liberate,” connote “redeem,” “save,” or “rescue.” This signals that salvation* cannot be reduced to an abstraction, a thought, or a feeling. Salvation also relates to concrete sociocultural realities. When there is liberation, the saving presence of God is experienced. Liberation amplifies the traditional concept of salvation by opening it up to a profound and integral experience for humans, especially for those who suffer economic*, gender*, racial*, or sexual*-orientation oppression*. God is revealed as liberator and savior. Two questions must be raised: Liberation from what? Liberation for what?

Liberation from What? Paul emphasizes liberation from sin*, the law*, and death*. Closer examination of this teaching shows that liberation from sin includes liberation from structural sin – manifested in unjust economic systems and sinful sociocultural relations, which affect people, the environment, and even individuals' intimate relationships. Therefore, liberation involves both personal and collective transformations. Liberation from sin is also liberation from death* and the law, because death is the product of sin, which is legitimated by the law when the law is followed blindly and placed above the human being. One is liberated from all that oppresses, harms, marginalizes, or kills humans and their habitat and from all that contributes to this destructive oppression, including, eventually, the law. Life is God's supreme gift; therefore, life as liberation from death is central.

Liberation for What? Liberation is a process in which God and human beings participate. Sin prompts divine salvation in the form of liberation, and humans are challenged by historic reality to carry out the task of liberation as God's sons and daughters obedient to the message of the Kingdom*. Liberation makes us free to liberate others who suffer from injustices of any kind. Before being freed, one cannot free others. The practice of liberation demands a process of personal conversion* that simultaneously unites one with the others in a collective process of historic transformation toward justice.

This theological reading does not allow freedom to be spiritualized, as often happens in an unjustly structured society. Liberation and liberty must remain tied together to prevent the concept of liberty from becoming abstract. Indeed, there is no justice* without liberty, but there cannot be full freedom unless there is liberation with justice. Full liberation will happen when there is a perfect communion between humans among themselves, with nature, and with God. Meanwhile, it will always be a process.

Liberation Theologies in Asia. In South Asia, a liberation paradigm is consciously adopted by theologians from marginal groups, such as the Dalits*, Adivasis* ("tribals," indigenous people), fish workers, and women. For these South Asian Christians, theology is not a systematic explication of timeless truths, nor is it a matter of applying a prefabricated system of ideas to a situation. It is a reflection on the articulation of faith* experience of people as they try to overcome unjust and oppressive forces that dehumanize them, be they caste* structure or economic* exploitation and patriarchy*. The primary objective of theological reflection is to help people in their struggle for justice* and freedom*.

Liberative praxis* is the method of doing theology. Emphasizing praxis does not mean rejecting theory. On the contrary, South Asian Christians assert that rigorous theoretical reflection should emerge from practice that is oriented toward transformation. Unlike Latin American and other liberation theologians who found Marxist analysis to be a useful tool for understanding poverty and marginalization, South Asian liberation theologians have recourse to cultural and religious analysis. These types of analysis allow them not only to grasp their situation as oppressed people deprived of freedom, but also to construct a theology that sustains them in their struggle. They appropriate for themselves liberative and humanistic visions and values in their Adivasi or Dalit culture* that have been suppressed by the dominant culture and its symbol system. Therefore, in their struggle against historical as well as contemporary processes of domination, the Dalits and indigenous groups have become conscious of their identity as people. Cultural realities like pathos and symbols like drums, which evoke a feeling of community, are frequently employed by theologians. Adivasi theologians are involved in an effort to reclaim the eco-centric "tribal" worldview for developing a contextual theology. A. P. Nirmal, a Dalit, describes Dalit theology as a "counter-theology" in relation to dominant theologies. Understandably, protest is a characteristic of this theology, but at the same time, it is integral to people's ongoing search for identity and their struggle for justice*.

Scripture*, the Bible as the testimony of men and women who have experienced God's freedom, is now read and interpreted in relation to the experiences of marginal groups. Christ, the liberator, has a special appeal. Jesus is in solidarity with the crucified of this world. This has provided a bridge, and not a barrier, to oppressed people of other faiths.

Liberation Theologies in the Caribbean Islands. Caribbean churches have been slow to warm up to Liberation theology. One of the reasons is the view that over generations the "church fathers" have handed down church teaching, thereby making the churches' theology a received theology. Therefore, the task of the church is not to create a new theology but to preserve the received theology. With their long colonial history, many islanders have been reared to look to the metropolis for an answer to their problems. Similarly, Christian islanders look to Europe and North America for doctrinal standards and teaching, whether they are members of the mainline churches (established by colonial powers or with their blessing) or of the relatively new churches, including the many Pentecostal* or Charismatic* churches. The fact that Karl Marx's name is often associated with Liberation theology further convinced many church leaders that this theology does not come from God.

However, a noticeable shift is starting to take place among some church leaders, in part as a result of the work of theological schools in the region. Early pathfinders, including Idris Hamid and Robert Cuthbert of Trinidad, Dale Bisnauth of Guyana, Lewin Williams of Jamaica, and Ophelia Ortega of Cuba, have begun to make a substantial difference in the church's relationship to Liberation theology. For instance, Robert Cuthbert, a leader of the Moravian Church in Jamaica (1980s), changed the Church's relationship to the land* by insisting that the Church, one of the country's largest landowners, cultivate its land to provide food for the masses of people.

The church has made progress in taking sides with the poor* and actively changing ecclesial practice to accommodate the poor, but it has not made the same kind of progress in issues raised by Womanist* and Feminist* theologies. Women are still not widely accepted into positions of church leadership and are subordinate to men in their roles in the church, which in this respect lags behind secular institutions. Similarly, the churches have not had much open discussion of gay rights (see Gay and Lesbian Theologies).

Even more important, Caribbean theologians have not been in conversation with indigenous expressions of religion. What would it mean for the church in Trinidad to engage the Shango religion, or for the church in Cuba* to engage Sante-ria, and the church in Jamaica* Rastafari*? A Caribbean Liberation theology must not only seek to relate the Bible to church doctrine and practice but actively address issues that affect "the least of these."

Liberation Theologies in North America: Native American. Speaking of Latin American Liberation theology, Vine Deloria, Jr., argued that Liberation theology is as oppressive to Indian peoples as are the old dogmatic theologies of the colonial missionary movement. Both are equally rooted in the Euro-Western conceptual framework that privileges individualism and holds indigenous peoples in bondage to these ways of thinking – even about liberation. All Christian theology, says Cherokee scholar Andrea Smith, even Liberation theology, is "complicit in the missionization and genocide of Native peoples." Even Liberation theology's "option for the poor" is ultimately based on a worldview of radical individualism and of material production and consumption that divides people according to class structures that are alien to the value system of Native nations. Rather than be lumped by Liberation theology with a class of other people (the poor), Indian people simply want their peoplehood recognized as discrete nations with valid cultures.

Because the modern state needs to homogenize culture in either its capitalist or socialist version, Deloria argues, the invention of Liberation theology was an absolute necessity for controlling the minds of minorities. Thus genuine liberation will require Indian people to take seriously their own communitarian value systems and epistemology rather than to adopt Euro-Western individualist paradigms of thinking.

The classic liberationist radical interpretation of Jesus fails to work for Indian people, simply because historically the proclamation of Jesus was an integral part of the colonial conquest, which entailed totally displacing centuries-old religious and cultural traditions and replacing them with a one-size-fits-all Euro-Western Jesus. Historically for Indian peoples, Jesus has always meant bondage, not liberation.

Besides recalling the history of violence against Indians perpetrated by Euro-Christians, Robert Warrior underscores the longer Judeo-Christian history of glorified conquest. The Exodus story was already a narrative about the conquest of indigenous peoples (the Canaanites) by Israel, and for the Puritans* this story was replayed in North America with Indians in the role of the Canaanites and the Puritans as the grateful recipients of the new promised land. This has made it very difficult or even impossible for Indians to redeem this story as liberatory.

Thus, consistent with Deloria, Liberation theology for Indian people who are serious about freedom and independence may require saying a firm "no" to Jesus and Christianity and adopting a different starting point – namely, reclaiming the ceremonial structures that promoted peace, harmony, and balance for millennia and the values that accompanied them. See also LAND, THEOLOGICAL PERSPECTIVES AND PRAXIS, CLUSTER: OF INDIGENOUS PEOPLES IN INDIA, OTHER ASIAN COUNTRIES, AND NORTH AMERICA.

GEORGE E. "TINK" TINKER

Liberation Theologies in North America: Womanist. Womanist* theology, organic to Black women's experiences, their activities in societies, and their faith communities, is global, ecumenical, interfaith, and at root Liberation theology.

Delores S. Williams notes that "faith seeking understanding" is liturgical, dialogical, and pedagogical. "Womanist," the term derived by Alice Walker from "womanish," denotes women of African descent who are audacious, outrageous, in charge, and responsible. Womanist emancipatory theology engages God-talk and human relationships with God amid hope, engenders mutuality and community, honors the image* of God (imago Dei) in everyone, champions basic human goodness, and focuses on liberation amid lived fragmentation. This epistemology questions the quality of life, stewardship, and decision making within sociopolitical, cultural contexts.

Womanist thought includes traditional theology, Bible and/or other sacred texts, ethics, and context. Yet it also transcends the limits of these fields and engages creative imagination to achieve personal becoming, communal solidarity, health, and justice. In analysis and lived experience, Womanist theology understands salvation* to be ultimate freedom. Enslavement is antithetical to salvation* (see Slavery and the Church through the Centuries). This liberative view engages hope* that acknowledges abuse, pain, violence, and separation and engenders courage to move from endurance to total well-being. This hope liberates as it challenges oppressive paradigms, institutions, and symbols that deny love and health. Womanist Liberation theology sees global social structures that shape Black women's lives while asking about God; sees how Black women engage God; and sees how they must reject a God mired in abusive, establishment ideologies that care nothing for Black women.

Womanist Liberation theology is a field of study and a way of incarnated life. People from various contexts do womanist analysis when they ask how oppression affects one's view of self, the world, and God. To live womanism is to be Black, female, and poor. Womanist Liberation theology tests the limits of freedom – from the use of symbols, storytelling, listening to and analyzing the stories of others, to personal relationships. It is dynamic and relational, requiring that one question cultural systems of classism, sexism, heterosexism, racism, ageism, and ableism: beliefs, belief practices, and those disconnects indicating hypocrisy. Liberation theology seeks to liberate the total person. Such theology requires rigorous self-assessment in which, like Katie Cannon, one develops critical, methodological tools and frameworks to challenge various inherited religious traditions in collusion with androcentric patriarchy. Amid this critique, these tools serve as catalysts for rebellious, revolutionary acts to overcome oppressive realities. Rebellion emerges from our ethical analysis; from this analysis emerges a reflective, Womanist liberation theology. See also ETHICS AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: AS ETHIC OF RISK AND WOMANIST ETHICS; WOMANIST AND AFRICAN AMERICAN THEOLOGIES. CHERYL A. Liberation Theologies in the South Pacific. In this relatively unknown region of the world, Liberation theology has made its mark in a unique way. When Liberation theologies were evolving during the 1970s, many of the South Pacific nations were agitating for political independence from colonial powers. Because the traditional cultures of the South Pacific make no separation between religion and politics, it was commonly church leaders who were the pioneers in political independence and who subsequently became their nation's first political leaders. Liberation theology and its categories provided a powerful theological framework for understanding the movement toward political independence as the work of a God who is on the side of the colonized, is committed to their struggles, and promises liberation in the form of independence.

Since independence was achieved in many of the South Pacific island nations, indigenous theologies emphasizing decolonization have developed. This has been most clearly represented in the articulation of "coconut theology," in the mushrooming interest in the relationship between the gospel and local cultures*, and in theological reflection on personal experience among the young generation of South Pacific theologians.

However, Liberation theology remains a powerful theme in those situations where a struggle against oppressive* powers remains a reality. This takes two general forms: a political struggle against colonizing powers (e.g. the struggles of Kanaks in New Caledonia, indigenous people in West Papua, and Aborigines in Australia) and a struggle for emancipation against oppressive cultural powers. In the latter category, women in the South Pacific are becoming an increasingly vocal group, developing a distinctive form of Liberation theology, evoking images of the womb and birthing as they deal with the heritage of their own cultural oppression. On a wider regional level, issues of justice* and peace* continue to be a major theme of leaders across the South Pacific.

RANDALL PRIOR

Liber de Causis, treatise made up of extracts from Proclus's* Elements of Theology, compiled by an Arab scholar and translated into Latin (12th c.). It was ascribed to Aristotle, but when Proclus's work was translated into Latin (1268), Thomas* Aquinas recognized that this was its source.

Liberia, one of only two countries (with Sierra Leone) specifically founded by an imperial power to repatriate and resettle its slaves*, was established by the USA (Sierra* Leone by Great Britain).

The American Colonization Society was launched in 1816 by both wealthy slave owners who wanted to remove freed slaves from the USA and committed abolitionists, who thought that a settlement for freed slaves in Africa would enhance their campaign. These white upper-class men, including James Monroe (after whom the Liberian capital, Monrovia, is named), Bushrod Washington, Andrew Jackson, Francis Scott Key, and Henry Clay (presiding), met in Washington, D.C., raised money, and lobbied Congress, which finally (1819) awarded them $100,000 for the resettlement of former slaves in Liberia.

The first ship, the Elizabeth, arrived in Liberia from New York in early 1820, with 88 former slaves and 3 white male agents of the American Colonization Society; the agents soon died of yellow fever, as did 22 former slaves. Thereafter, more former slaves settled in Liberia. Joseph Jenkin Roberts became the first non-white governor of Liberia (1842), and when the legislature declared Liberia a republic, he became its first president (1847). However, it took more than five generations for Liberia to elect a president of indigenous African descent. Indigenous Liberians were excluded from national leadership, despite their demographic majority, a factor that contributed to social, cultural, religious, political, and economic conflict.

Cultural and religious plurality was already prevalent. Since the 12th c., Islam had blended with the African cultural and religious heritage. Multiethnic diversity was taken for granted. The former slaves were Christians, primarily members of the African* Methodist Episcopal Church, African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, Christian Methodist Episcopal Church, and the Liberia Baptist Missionary and Educational Convention. Later Roman Catholic and mainline US Protestant denominations (Episcopal, Lutheran, Presbyterian, United Methodist) established local branches in Liberia. During the 20th c., Pentecostal and Charismatic churches were introduced; among them were the Little White Chapel, New Apostolic Church, Redeemed Fellowship International Church, Three Brothers Ministries of Faith Church, United Church of God in Christ, United Pentecostal Churches of Christ, and Don Stewart Christ Pentecostal Church. African Instituted Churches, including Church of the Lord (Aladura) and the Church of Prophet William Wade Harris, also have adherents in Liberia.

The political conflicts and civil war of the late 20th to early 21st c. resulted from unresolved tensions and grievances of the indigenous people of Liberia, which were based primarily on the resettlement of former US slaves without consultation with the local population. Such conflicts cannot be resolved militarily. The Inter-Faith Mediation Committee of Liberia (later called Inter-Religious Council of Liberia), which includes both Christians and Muslims, played a significant role in mediation and reconciliation* by seeking to diffuse the tragic civil war through the religious frames of reference of both communities and individuals. In 2003 the All* Africa Conference of Churches awarded the Archbishop Desmond Tutu Peace Prize to the Inter-Faith Mediation Committee of Liberia. Under Ellen Johnson Sirleaf, the first woman elected president in Africa, Liberia is struggling to establish new social norms, despite its tension-loaded history.

Liberty. Often used synonymously with “freedom*,” “liberty” has distinctive connotations: (1) a morally neutral freedom of choice (while freedom is the willing of what is good); (2) a natural* or civil* right to be respected by the state; (3) a goal to be sought, through liberation* from captivity or oppression*.

Life of Adam and Eve, an OT pseudepigraphon ascribed to Moses, which relates the story of the first sin* (cf. Gen 3–4), embellished with much apocryphal material. Its main themes are the inevitability of death*, as well as the justified hope for continued existence after death and for eschatological resurrection. Scholarly opinion differs on whether it is of Jewish or Christian provenance; it dates from somewhere between the 1st and 4th c. CE. See also PSEUDEPIGRAPHIA. JOHANNES TROMP

Life and Work Movement, ecumenical* movement organized by Nathan Söderblom, archbishop of the Lutheran Church of Sweden*, to formulate a unified Christian response to the economic, social, and moral crisis resulting from World War I. A first conference (Stockholm, 1925), in which Protestant and Orthodox* churches participated, used the phrase “life and work” to indicate that “the Christian way of life” is “the world’s greatest need.” These hopes were frustrated by the rise of totalitarian regimes (1929–33). A second conference (Oxford, 1937) sought to relate the Christian hope* for the Kingdom* of God to the church’s responsibility in the world and (with the Faith* and Order Movement) led to the formation of the World* Council of Churches. See also UNITED CHURCH OF CHRIST IN THE UNITED STATES.

Liguori, Alphonsus (1696–1787), canonized (1839), declared a doctor* of the church (1871), and the patron of confessors and moralists (1950). After a brief career in law, he was ordained (1726) and led an extraordinary pastoral, literary, and theological life. His strongly affective emphasis on the Incarnation* set the tone for Catholic spirituality* that prevails to this day. His hymns are still sung in Italy (e.g. Tu scende dalle Stelle). His Theologia Moralis (1753–79), a guide to the pastoral* direction of conscience, is central in the history of moral* theology. He founded a religious community (1732), whose members are now called Redemptorists (CSsR), to evangelize the most abandoned.

Lima, Alceu Amoroso (1893–1983, pseudonym Tristão de Athayde), essayist, literary critic, and university professor, was the most influential intellectual layperson in Brazilian Roman Catholicism. Converted in 1928, he occupied a leading position among Brazilian laity until his death. During this long trajectory, Amoroso Lima underwent a substantial change in his religious identity. This shift, inspired by French thinkers like Maritain*, Congar, and Mounier, began in the 1940s and drove him from a conservative model of faith to a liberal catholic ecclesiology. Because of that change, Amoroso Lima gave enthusiastic support to the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65) and was a tough critic of the Brazilian dictatorship (1964–85).

Limbo (Lat limbus, “edge”), “borderline” state of souls* whose only punishment is an inability to enjoy the beatific vision of God. In popular Roman Catholic theology since the Middle Ages, this is the state of unbaptized infants. This is not, however, an official doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church.

Liminality (from Lat limen, “threshold”), a ritual process in which the “structure” of society is negated by the “anti-structure” of communitas, the ritual space. See also HETERONOMY.

Litany, a series of petitions with a repeated response by the congregation, e.g. “Have mercy” or “Deliver us.”

Litany of the Saints, prayer to the Trinity*, Mary*, and a list of angels and patriarchs, prophets and apostles, martyrs, and saints.

Literal Interpretation of the Bible, usually contrasted with allegorical* interpretation, which finds a “spiritual” meaning different from the literal meaning of the words. Literal interpretation acknowledges that some words are used metaphorically, that a parable* does not refer to an actual event, and that narrated events may also have typological* meaning (anticipating future events that are the fulfillment of Scripture as promise or prophecy). Today, Evangelicals* and fundamentalists* claim that literal interpretation uncovers “the only true meaning” of the text. This assertion presupposes a choice of certain aspects of the text as most significant and a specific view of Scripture* and its role (usually its moral teaching, when Scripture is read as a “lamp to my feet” or “rule of the community”).

Lithuania. As in Poland*, Roman Catholicism has been a major element in shaping and preserving Lithuanian national identity over the centuries. In 1387 Lithuania, the last non-Christian state in Europe, concluded an alliance with Poland that led to the acceptance of Christianity. From the Reformation until the late 18th c., the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth rivaled Russia* politically in the area from the Baltic to the Black Sea; thus the Catholic faith rivaled Russian Orthodoxy. Successive partitions of Poland (late 18th c.) led to the country's becoming a part of the Russian Empire, but Catholicism remained strong among the Lithuanian peasantry and became linked with the growth of Lithuanian nationalism (19th c.). After Lithuania gained independence in 1920, the Roman Catholic Church became the state church, claiming 85% of the population.

During World War II, Lithuania became a part of the Soviet Union; it was unique among Soviet republics in that it was predominantly Roman Catholic. From the beginning, the Church was harshly persecuted: clergy were executed or deported, Church property confiscated, religious education prohibited (and later severely limited), religious orders abolished, and priests closely monitored. Nevertheless, the Church played a major role in defending religious, national, and civil rights; 81 volumes of the clandestine Chronicle of the Lithuanian Catholic Church (1972–89) have been printed.

Lithuania was the first Soviet republic to declare its independence (1990). Church attendance reached a high point over the next three years, but then began to decline again. As in most post-Communist countries since independence, an active public role for the churches has been hampered by both internal and external problems: lack of resources, expertise, and experience; internal debate; and a new and unfamiliar environment of pluralism and secularization*. Social and welfare work and religious education in schools have been areas of expansion. The Roman Catholic Church remained the most trusted social institution in the late 1990s.

During the Communist period, the established denominations tended toward authoritarianism and doctrinal and ritual conservatism as a result of enforced isolation from developments in Europe and the wider world and a “fortress mentality” in the face of persecution and aggressive atheism*. In the post-Communist period, this conservatism has been both reinforced and challenged by an influx of Western Protestant missionaries and new religious movements.

Although more than 70% of Lithuanians still considered themselves Catholics in 2005, only 10–15% regularly attended church. The 1992 Constitution explicitly rules out the creation of a state religion, but the Religion Law of 1995 deemed certain long-established faiths “traditional” and granted them some privileges, including state aid for the restoration of their buildings and the right to teach religion in state schools. As a result of agreements between the state and the Vatican (2000), the Roman Catholic Church enjoys some informal recognition. However, there are no serious restrictions on religious freedom, and Lithuania complies with the standards of the European Union, which it joined in 2004.

Statistics: Population (2000): 3.7 million (M). Christians, 3.2 M, 88% (Roman Catholics, 3.1 M; Orthodox, 0.11 M; Protestants, 0.04 M; independents, 0.03); nonreligious, 0.44 M, 12%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

PHILIP WALTERS

Liturgical Colors, colors used for paraments, vestments, and hangings at specific times of the church year. The practice of using specific colors originated among the Augustinian* canons in Jerusalem (12th c.) and gradually became standardized; it is now widespread among all Western churches. Although there are some variations, the standard colors are as follows: purple during the penitential seasons of Advent* and Lent*; white during the festivals of Christ

(e.g. Christmas* and Easter*) and on Trinity* Sunday; red on Pentecost* and the feasts of apostles and martyrs; and green during the “ordinary times” of spiritual growth between Epiphany and Lent, and between Trinity Sunday and Advent.

Liturgical Movement (the) promoted the 20th-c. renewal of worship within the Roman Catholic Church, paving the way for the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65) and influencing liturgical renewal within other churches.

Until recently, many thought that the movement began in 1833 with the refounding of the Benedictine* monastery of Solesmes by Prosper Guéranger (d1875). But Guéranger opposed liturgical creativity and advocated a strict adherence to the Roman celebration of Mass* and the Divine* Office. More recent scholarship claims that the movement was founded by the Belgian Benedictine Lambert Beauduin (d1960) of Mont César during a national Catholic labor conference in Malines (1909). Beauduin was convinced that liturgy was foundational for Christian social activism, and thus the Liturgical Movement in Belgium was marked by a strong pastoral concern that emphasized the social dimension of Christian worship.

In Germany the movement centered around the monastery of Maria Laach. It was led by Benedictine abbot Ildefons Herwegen, Odo Casel, OSB (d1948), and diocesan priest Romano Guardini (d1968); important contributions were made by Aemeliana Löhr (d1972) and other German women. The German Liturgical Movement was more intellectual and academic than the movement in Belgium. Very soon the movement took hold in Austria under the leadership of Augustinian Pius Parsch (d1954) and in France with the 1943 founding of the Centre de Pastorale Liturgique and the important periodical La Maison-Dieu (from 1945). The US Liturgical Movement was founded in Collegeville, Minnesota, by a monk of St. John’s Abbey, Virgil Michel (d1938), a student of Beauduin’s at Sant’Anselmo in Rome. Like its Belgian forebear, the US movement registered a strong social consciousness and substantial lay involvement.

Before Vatican II, the Liturgical Movement did not seem to have taken root in Africa, Asia, or Latin America. The possible exception was Brazil where, from their monastery in Rio, German Benedictine monks published the Folheto liturgico (a pamphlet given out at Sunday services that helped people better appreciate the Mass) and devoted themselves to other pastoral concerns (in the 1930s). Beyond the Liturgical Movement itself, Vatican II opened a wave of liturgical innovations, e.g. in Latin America (in Base* Ecclesial Communities and popular* expressions of Christianity) and in Africa (especially in the Congo* [now Democratic Republic of the Congo]), with the development of the Zairian or Congolese Rite – officially approved in 1988 – possibly under the influence of the Belgian Liturgical Movement.

Liturgical Year, or Christian year, refers to the cycle of annual Christian feasts in celebration of God’s acts of salvation* as manifested in the mystery* of Jesus Christ, from the creation* up to Pentecost* and the expected second* coming of Christ. The foundation of the liturgical year is the weekly Sunday celebration, commemorating Jesus’ suffering, death, and resurrection (especially in the Eucharist*); the highlight of the year is the celebration of Easter*. The liturgical year is structurally defined by two categories of feasts: the temporal cycle (marked primarily by Advent*, Christmas*, Lent*, Easter, and Pentecost) and the sanctoral cycle (feasts of saints*).

The Temporal Cycle is centered on Easter and Christmas. The celebration of Easter, originally lasting one day, has been extended to three days, the Triduum sacrum (from Good* Friday to Easter Sunday). It is preceded by a time of preparation, either Quadragesima (Lent), a 40-day period of fasting and prayer in preparation for Holy Week (the dates of which are calculated differently in the Western and Eastern churches), or Septuagesima, a 70-day period including Lent and a 30-day pre-Lent season (no longer observed except in the Lutheran Church). Easter is followed by Eastertide, culminating in Pentecost*. In the Byzantine tradition, the celebration of Easter, including Lent and Eastertide, dominates.

A cycle of feasts is also centered around Christmas*, starting with a period of preparation (Advent* or Nativity fast in Eastern churches) and leading to Christmastide, which ends on the Sunday after Epiphany*. In the Western tradition, the celebration of Advent and Christmas is considered the beginning of the liturgical year.

These two principal cycles are followed by a series of Sundays (“ordinary time”) that are connected neither to each other nor to any particular theme.

Sometimes the feast cycles overlap one another because the Easter cycle based on the lunar year cannot be synchronized with the other feasts that are based on the solar year. Moreover, Sunday corresponds to neither the lunar nor the solar calendar because the seven-day week does not have an astronomic reference.

The Sanctoral Cycle includes the calendar of saints. On the anniversary of the death of a saint, his or her birth into heaven is celebrated; thus the date of death is referred to as dies natalis (birthday), a sharing in the mystery of Easter, as the saint is united with the resurrected Christ. In addition, during the Middle Ages, “devotional feasts,” such as Trinity Sunday and Corpus* Christi, were celebrated.

Despite the cyclic concept of time and the cyclic order of feasts, the liturgical year is not a cycle that repeatedly returns to its starting point. By connecting the course of time with events from the history of salvation and through anamnesis* (remembrance), feasts are put in historical perspective: the remembrance of God’s acts of salvation in the past is celebrated in the present from the perspective of the future: the second coming of Christ. The historical and eschatological* perspectives provide the cyclic perception of time with a linear dimension. The image of a spiral makes it easier to understand this connection between the cyclic and linear.

The liturgical year made sense for centuries because, in the Northern Hemisphere, it is linked with the seasons (Easter–Spring, Pentecost–Summer, Advent–Fall, Christmas–Winter); moreover, many feasts originated in an agricultural setting. But the liturgical year loses this connection with the seasons in the Southern Hemisphere (where a large percentage of Christians now live). In the Northern Hemisphere, secularization* and industrial, technological, and social developments have also resulted in a decline in the plausibility of the liturgical year. The feasts have become separated from their agricultural origin. For centuries the social calendar had been influenced by the liturgical year. Now the socioeconomic agenda and the leisure culture have become increasingly determinant, and the liturgical feasts have become secular “leisure days” rather than holy days or “holydays.” See also CALENDARS.

Liturgies, History of. Christian worship has always comprised different traditions, developing and influencing each other in various social, cultural, linguistic, and ecclesial contexts. The fluid and diverse practices of the early church gradually coalesced into common patterns, with more fixed elements (see Worship Cluster: In Early Christianity). Eventually this led to the formation of several liturgical “families,” or rites. As Paul Bradshaw has shown, this formation was not a divergence from a single “Ur-text,” which never existed; rather, commonality developed out of more varied early practices. The major centers of Antioch, Alexandria, and Rome – as well as Jerusalem and Constantinople in the 4th c. – were most prominent in influencing practice elsewhere.

By the end of the patristic period, liturgical traditions in the East included the Byzantine, Alexandrian (Coptic* and Ethiopian*), Greek-speaking West Syriac, Syriac-speaking East Syriac*, and Armenian*, all of which are maintained in various Eastern churches today.

In the West, besides the Roman Rite, there existed the Milanese (Ambrosian*), Gallican*, Celtic*, and Hispanic (eventually “Mozarabic”) rites. The differences among them were not only based on language and culture; each also underwent its own liturgical evolution, with its own liturgical forms. In Eucharistic* prayers, e.g., Antiochene and Alexandrian forms have distinct structures. Common elements, like the *sanctus, one or two epicleses, institution narrative, *anamnesis, and offering, were inserted at different points. The Roman prayer, the Roman canon of the Mass, was even more fundamentally distinctive in its structure and content – it had a variable first section (the “preface”) – and in other Western rites there were a number of variable elements throughout the prayer.

In late antiquity and into the Middle Ages, both East and West experienced a significant synthesis of practices from different regions. The Byzantine Rite as we know it (see Divine Liturgy of the Orthodox Churches) emerged from two great syntheses of “cathedral,” urban monastic*, and Palestinian monastic practices in Constantinople, which Robert F. Taft has called the “Studite” and “neo-Sabaitic” syntheses, after the Studios* Monastery and the Sabas Monastery. In the West, the Roman Rite underwent major transformation in the wake of Carolingian* liturgical reforms. Seeking liturgical unity in his empire, Charlemagne* suppressed the more prolix and ornate Gallican and Celtic liturgies, attempting to impose the more austere Roman liturgy. The effect, however, was a synthesis of Gallican and Roman liturgical material, which was later imported back into Rome. It is this complex Roman–Gallican hybrid, and not simply the Roman Rite of antiquity, that eventually supplanted most of the non-Roman Western rites and became the late medieval “Roman Rite.”

The Reformation* increased the diversity in Western Christian worship, as Reformers and the traditions following them developed different liturgical forms over time. James White has identified nine traditions in the wide range of Protestant worship practices (from the 16th to the 20th c.): Lutheran, Anglican, Reformed, Anabaptist, Separatist or Puritan, Methodist, Quaker, “Frontier,” and Pentecostal. These traditions vary widely in their departure from late medieval Catholic practice, the allowance made for liturgical practices without explicit biblical warrant, the use of ceremonial, and the adherence to fixed forms or insistence on spontaneity. Both the traditions that emerged in the 16th c. and those that emerged later were affected by successive developments in church and society. Movements in spirituality and church life, such as Methodism*, Pietism*, the Great* Awakening, Anglo-Catholicism, global missionary activity, ecumenism*, and the modern Liturgical* Movement, had an impact on worship, as did cultural currents like the Enlightenment* and romanticism*.

Roman Catholic worship in the same period was theoretically much more fixed. The Council of Trent* and the Catholic* Renewal introduced a thorough liturgical reform, with a very strong emphasis on standardization, unification, and centralization of official liturgical books. Nonetheless, Tridentine uniformity should not be exaggerated. Roman Catholic worship was strongly affected by baroque European culture and tensions over inculturation* in “mission lands,” such as the Chinese* rites controversy. Medieval forms of popular devotional piety, like Eucharistic* adoration* and benediction, were supplemented by newer, highly emotional forms (such as devotion to the Sacred Heart or newer Marian devotions; see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster) in reaction to the rationalism* of the Enlightenment. Concern for catechesis* led to developments in preaching*, which was often more moral or doctrinal than biblical or liturgical, but affected liturgical practice. Starting with the 19th-c. establishment of the Benedictine* monastery of Solesmes (France), historically informed revival and reform of liturgical practice led to the growth of the Liturgical* Movement. In Roman Catholic practice, this culminated in the liturgical reforms of the Second Vatican* Council, with an emphasis on Scripture, grounding liturgical forms in early sources, and aggiornamento (updating), paying attention to the social and cultural context of the modern world and to its pastoral needs. The shared efforts of the Liturgical Movement in Western churches, which relied on the same historical sources, led to an “ecumenical convergence,” with increasingly similar forms in modern worship books, although greater diversity is arising once again, from a more complex and varied appropriation of history in a postmodern and global context. See also INCULTURATION CLUSTER; MISSION CLUSTER: IN AFRICA.

Liturgy (Gk, leitourgia), originally meaning a public duty, a service to the state undertaken by a citizen, has come to designate a public “service to God” – a “work of the people” for God’s sake (e.g. praising God or sanctifying* parts of human existence, such as the hours of the day and night) and thus a worship service*, as well as the whole complex of worship services, all the rites, ceremonies, prayers, and sacraments of the church, in contrast to private devotions. See also LABOR, THEOLOGIES OF.

Liturgy of the Hours. Whether celebrated communally or in private, its purpose is to sanctify the hours of the day and night with fixed times of prayer. Like their Jewish forebears, early Christians gathered in the morning to give thanks to God for the light of a new day and in the evening to ask forgiveness and protection for the coming night. Early church sources (e.g. Clement* of Alexandria, Origen*, Tertullian*, Cyprian*) refer to praying at other times as well, such as at midday, before meals, before retiring, and briefly during the night. This tradition of praying at fixed times began as a practice among the laity* and was only gradually taken over by monastics*. Lay participation in the liturgy of the hours was especially evident in the popular “Cathedral Office,” which grew in the 4th c. mostly in the East, although Ambrose* attests to the presence of this liturgy in Milan. The Cathedral Office was celebrated in the presence of the bishop and included processions, the use of candles and incense, and the singing of psalms by the assembly. With the 6th-c. advent of Benedictine* monasticism in the West, the liturgy of the hours became the property of monasteries and other religious communities, thanks especially to the use of Latin, which few laypeople were able to grasp. And with the clerical obligation to pray the Divine* Office, it became privatized and clericalized. Over the centuries, there were various revisions of the Roman Office, especially in 1568 with the Roman Breviary (office book of the clergy) of Pius V. Vatican* II's attention to the liturgy of the hours focused largely on reforming the Breviary rather than attempting to revive the traditional Cathedral Office for popular usage. Nonetheless, both Trent* and Vatican II encouraged Sunday vespers in parishes, but with rather unimpressive results. Anglican churches and chapels have been far more successful at sustaining the tradition of morning and evening prayer, especially in the tradition of evensong, which contains elements of both Roman vespers* (evening prayer) and compline* (night prayer).

Livingstone, David (1812–73), missionary, explorer, publicist. Born in Scotland, died in Chief Chitambo's village in Zambia*; trained in science and medicine before being ordained by the London Missionary Society. He arrived in South Africa* in 1841 and left in 1852, seeking, as a pioneer traveler, to open up Africa north of the Limpopo to the gospel and to "development." He gained fame for his missions, yet was deeply misunderstood, and his memory was misused in the era of the "scramble for Africa" (see Berlin Conference). Although he alerted the Christian world to the horrors of the Swahili and Portuguese slave* trade, his passionate belief in racial equality was ignored in the enormous body of literature about him that was produced shortly after his death.

Llull, Ramon (1232–1316), lay philosopher and theologian, largely self-educated. Scion of a wealthy Majorcan family, he underwent a "conversion* to penitence" around 1263, then devoted his life to constant travel, promoting the evangelization of non-Christians (especially Jews and Muslims), undertaking private missionary campaigns, and perfecting a "great universal art," elaborated in more than 300 Arabic, Catalan, and Latin writings, through which he sought to demonstrate the truth of Catholic doctrine. Llull taught his "great art" (published as the multiple-volume Ars magna, 1305–8) in Paris and convinced the Council of Vienne (1311) to support the study of Oriental languages at major European universities. He died returning from a missionary journey to Tunis.

Devoted to the ideals of both the Dominican* and Franciscan* orders, Llull was the preeminent lay evangelist of his era. His major mystical* writing (Book of the Lover and the Beloved) remains widely admired, as does his promotion of interfaith dialogue. Adaptations of his "great art" enjoyed tremendous popularity during the Renaissance. Despite occasional official opposition to his teachings, Llull's example of devotion and sacrifice – along with his reputation as a polymath and his alleged martyrdom – has ensured his veneration in Spain to this day.

Locke, John (1632–1704), censor in moral philosophy, Christ Church, Oxford (1663–64); secretary to Sir Walter Vane in Cleves (1665–66), then to Anthony Ashley Cooper; official posts on either side of exile in Holland (1683–89).

Locke lived through turbulent times: the English civil war (1642–46, 1648), the execution of Charles I (1649), the restoration of the monarchy (1660), the laws against Dissenters, the Glorious Revolution (1688), and the Toleration Act (1689).

In his Essay (1689), Locke discusses the origin and extent of human knowledge, ("grounds and degrees of belief, opinion, and assent"). He holds that our ideas are derived from experience (they are not innate); knowledge results from the operation of reason* upon ideas. God-given reason is supplemented by revelation* – God's illuminating of the mind with otherwise inaccessible information. By faith we assent to revealed propositions that are above, but not against, reason. In Paraphrases (posthumous), Locke discusses faith* in terms of trust. The Bible contains "infallible truths" as well as mysteries* beyond comprehension. It checks the enthusiasts'* claims to direct illumination by the Holy* Spirit.

Locke's opinion that intuited ethical principles have the demonstrative certainty of mathematics gradually weakened. Fortunately, those who accept Jesus as king and savior receive authoritative moral principles from him. Children should learn morality from the Bible. As to our capacity for moral action, a willed act is free only if we have the power to perform it.

Initially opposed to religious toleration, he later advocated the toleration of orthodox Protestant Dissenters*, but not of Roman Catholics (deemed subservient to a foreign power) or atheists (perceived as repudiating the fount of morality, God).

For Locke adherence to the doctrine "Jesus is the Messiah" was sufficient to designate the subscriber a Christian, although Christians need additional beliefs. His reticence with respect to the Trinity* led some to brand him a Socinian (follower of Socinus*). ALAN P. F. SELL

Logos (Gk for "word," applied to the second person of the Trinity*; cf. John 1:1 and 14). Philo* of Alexandria had already spoken of the Word of God as a distinct entity and interpreted God's speaking in Gen 1 as the uttering of this Word for the purpose of giving form to the created world. The 2nd-c. Apologists* adopted this understanding of the Word as a mediating principle between an unchangeable God and the changeable world. The Logos was also understood to be the source of both human intelligence and the "natural law*" of conscience. See also REVELATION; WORD OF GOD.

Loisy, Alfred (1857–1940), French Modernist* biblical scholar. Educated at the Institut Catholique in Paris, he became a protégé of the historian Louis Duchesne and specialized in the study of the Bible. He taught at the Institut Catholique (1881–93) but was dismissed and directed to confine himself to study of "Oriental languages." He continued his critical studies of early Christianity from the perspective of history* of religion (e.g. comparing the development of Christian rituals as "Christian mysteries" with pagan mystery* religions) and advocated what he saw as a new apologetic for Catholicism, based on the ongoing formulation of doctrine. The publication of The Essence of Christianity by Adolf van Harnack* (1900) gave him the opportunity to publish his views, in the form of a reply to Harnack, in The Gospel and the Church (1902). Pope Leo* XIII did not respond, but his successor Pius* X placed his works on the Index Librorum Prohibitorum* (List of prohibited books, 1903). Loisy became part of the Modernist* movement, organized chiefly by Friedrich von* Hügel. Pius X condemned Modernism in its various aspects in the decree *Lamentabili and the encyclical *Pascendi (both 1907). By this time, Loisy had left the Roman Catholic Church. He became a professor of the history of religions at the Collège de France (1909) and continued to publish works of scholarship as well as several retrospective analyses of the disputes that had surrounded him.

Lollardy (also Wycliffism) remains England's only native "heresy*." It originated in Oxford c1380 among the followers of John Wyclif* (d1384). Influenced by Wyclif's increasingly realist* (vs. nominalist*) later theology, Lollard texts are characterized by polemical arguments against clerical endowments, fraternal orders, priestly confession*, indulgences*, pilgrimages*, a professional priesthood, and transubstantiation*. Early Lollard writings in English, including a translation of the Bible (see Bible Translations Cluster: English Translations), a gospel commentary, and a sermon cycle, are distinguished by their academic erudition. Lollard texts often skirt Donatism*, and worship and education were practiced in informal conventicles. Trial records show that women often advanced in these secret groups as teachers or preachers. In 1382 several Oxford Lollards, John Aston, Philip Repingdon, and Nicholas Hereford, were disciplined and Lollard conclusions condemned. (Hereford later recanted, becoming a bishop and Lollard inquisitor.) Virtually all Lollard texts remain anonymous; an exception is William Thorpe's biographical narrative (dated 1407). Members of the gentry often protected Lollards through the early 15th c. Persecution increased under Archbishop Thomas Arundel of Canterbury after 1400. The death penalty was authorized for heresy* in 1401, and in 1409 biblical translation in English was prohibited. Persecutions continued until the 1520s.

Lombards, a Germanic people that, together with other Germanic people (Goths*, Vandals*), embraced Arian Christianity, the moderate "homoian" Arianism* of Ulfila* and other Arian missionaries. When they invaded Northern Italy* (568–605), unlike the Goths* who preceded them, Lombard rulers minimized in their governmental administration the role of the churches. As a result, Latin-speaking Christians could begin to reassert their church identity as distinct from the Arianism of the rulers. See also ARIANISM and ITALY

LORD. In translations of the OT, the capitalized term "LORD" is used for the tetragrammaton* in the original Hebrew text; it is used out of respect for the Jewish tradition of not speaking or writing the name of God. In the NT, "Lord," a translation of *Kyrios, is used for Jesus.

Lord's Day, Christian name for Sunday (Rev 1:10). For Sabbatarians*, the term underscores their advocacy of making Sunday a day of rest like the Sabbath*.

Lord's Prayer, the prayer taught by Jesus to his disciples (Matt 6:9–13; Luke 11:2–4). The longer, Matthaean version is the one used by Christians of all traditions. In early catechesis*, it was taught (along with the Apostles'* Creed) to catechumens shortly before their baptism. It is still used as a model when instructions about prayer are being given. As a communal prayer (its origin, as its opening words, "Our Father," indicate), it is commonly recited in worship services of most Christian traditions.

Lord's Supper, a title for the Eucharist*, especially among Lutherans* and other Protestants who, following Zwingli*, understand it to be primarily a memorial, based on Paul (1 Cor 11:20, 25). See also COMMUNION.

Lossky, Vladimir (1903–58), son of the renowned Russian philosopher Nicholas Lossky; exiled from Russia (1923), eventually settled in Paris, studied at the Sorbonne with the medievalist Étienne Gilson. Lossky's earliest published work on the apophaticism* of Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite, related to his posthumously published dissertation on Meister Eckhart*, was formative for his understanding of Eastern Orthodox* theology. Theology for Lossky begins with the event of divine-human communion in the Incarnation*, which reveals that knowledge of God is an experience of mystical* communion with God, or theosis*. Theology is thus inherently apophatic; it cannot be reduced to logical propositions established by reason*. Apophaticism is not simply naming what God is not. An apophatic mode of doing theology is necessary to lead one to true knowledge of God as a mystical union beyond reason. Because it is apophatic, theology is antinomic: it necessarily affirms the nonopposition of opposites (rather than attempting to resolve the opposition; see Paradox). Lossky was particularly instrumental in establishing the centrality of the neo-Palamite distinction (see Gregory Palamas) between the essence and energies of God in contemporary Orthodox theology. His Trinitarian theology of personhood in terms of uniqueness and freedom also had an influence on contemporary theologies of the Trinity in Eastern Orthodoxy, especially on the thought of the Greek theologians Christos Yannaras, and John Zizioulas.

ARISTOTLE PAPANIKOLAOU

Louis I, "the Pious" (778–840), Charlemagne's third son, who succeeded his father upon Charlemagne's death (814). He sponsored the monastic* reforms of Benedict of Aniane; his decrees (816–17) brought greater uniformity to both Benedictine* monasticism and the life of canons* regular. During his reign, the "Carolingian* renaissance" gained new force. He sponsored the mission of Ansgar* to Denmark* and Sweden*, and the composition of the Heliand as a way of inculturating Christianity into German culture.

Family rivalries led to his doing public penance* twice (voluntarily, 822; imposed, 833). His reign is a prime example of "political Augustinianism," a political (mis)application of Augustine's view of the superiority of spiritual to temporal authority; papal actions in these years prepared the way for the investiture* controversy (11th c.).

Louis IX (1214–70), king of France, son of Louis VIII and Blanche of Castile, declared a saint (1297). He succeeded his father (1226) under his mother's regency. Following his marriage to Margaret of Provence (1234), he gradually asserted his personal rule, most clearly by deciding, against his mother's advice, to go on a crusade* (1248) – a disastrous expedition ending with his capture, which confirmed his sense of unworthiness. He reformed the kingdom in order to strengthen it; preferring negotiations to war, he strongly defended royal interests, while remaining deeply religious. With the intention of leading another crusade, he moved first to Tunis in the hope of converting its ruler but died of illness soon after his arrival.

Lourdes, small town in the French Pyrenees where Bernadette Soubirous, a 14-year-old shepherdess, experienced a series of apparitions of the Virgin Mary in 1858. The Lady (Aquéro) told Bernadette (in patois), "I am the Immaculate* Conception." Marian visions, not uncommon in 19th-c. Europe, occurred almost invariably among poor and uneducated people like Bernadette. The Lourdes site rapidly established itself as the most famous Marian shrine and became an international pilgrimage* center. The Virgin appeared to Bernadette (canonized, 1933) by a fountain in a grotto, and the alleged healing properties of the water were the main attraction for pilgrims, many of whom claimed to have been miraculously cured. See also FÁTIMA; MARY, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER.

JAMES F. MCMILLAN

Love has always been considered central in Christian faith. It refers both to the nature of God and to the orientation and quality of Christian discipleship*. The Bible confronts Jews and Christians with the divine command to love God, other humans, and their own selves. Thus in both traditions, love is more than feeling, emotion, and passing sensation. It involves the acceptance of God's gift of loving relationship and covenant*; a willingness to develop faithful relations with God, other people, God's creation, and one's own emerging self; and a desire* for transcendence and transformation of both self and other. Like apophatic* Western mysticism*, Quietism*, and the Holiness* Movement, Eastern Orthodoxy* emphasizes love as the link between the human and the divine, leading to is distinctive doctrine of theosis* (divinization, human transformation). Love is the quality of eternal relations.

The Christian praxis of love developed in response both to particular interpretations of biblical notions and traditions and to changing views of human nature and its potential in spiritual, cultural, and intellectual contexts.

The Hebrew Scriptures use a number of expressions for God's love and care for people and their relations to God, friends, and strangers in Israel. By contrast the Septuagint* and the NT express God's love mostly through the Greek term *agape, and sometimes through philia (friendship*), but never through eros. This term would have invited confusion with the Greek god of love, Eros, and related notions of cosmic power, fertility, lust, and temptation. The terminological distinction between agape and eros gained additional significance when Christian love was further developed in contrast to other traditions and notions of love.

The Synoptic Gospels quote Jesus' confirmation of Israel's dual love command (Deut 6.5–6; Lev 19.18) and thus emphasize that Jesus' proclamation of the command to love God, neighbor, and enemy was firmly in line with Jewish praxis. However, the Gospels differ in terms of their exploration of love's horizon. While Luke's good Samaritan story identifies every person as neighbor, the Gospel of John and his letters limit the horizon of love to the Johannine community itself, even as they offer the deepest reflections on God as love (1 John 4). The Pauline letters praise love as God's gift to the church for dealing with conflict and otherness and for promoting an intimate spiritual relationship between Christ and his disciples.

Under the influence of Neoplatonist* anthropology, Christian thinkers have understood love ultimately as God-given eternal fulfillment beyond bodily constraints, worldly limitations, and human sinfulness. Hence Augustine* (354–430) identified one form of true love that alone deserves our full praise and desire, namely God's love. God alone can love. When we love one another, it is in reality God who loves in us. Mystics* in and beyond Christianity have approached the mystical nature of love in terms of union between God and the human soul*.

The reassessment of human agency in medieval Europe promoted new attitudes toward the human potential for love in Scholastic philosophy and theology. Thomas Aquinas* (1225–74) considered friendship* to be granted to us by God as the highest manifestation of divine love. Love (Lat caritas) is one of the three theological virtues* (with faith* and hope*). In the God-given light of love, human beings are able to love God and the human other.

Luther* (1483–1546) and the Protestant Reformation affirmed love as God's free gift and rejected any claim that humanity transcends sinful nature on its own. Human love is never free of self-interest, even when directed to God. True love comes only from God. However, as a result of divine grace*, human beings can and ought to love their neighbors by attending to their genuine and concrete needs.

Both the dichotomy between divine and human love and the praxis character of love were further explored in modern Christianity (e.g. by Kierkegaard*). Agape-love coming from above was sharply distinguished from worldly love and desire* (cf. Nygren*). Accordingly, romantic love was rejected as misguided desire and human projection.

More recently, Christian thinkers, attentive to the need to reassess human emotions, the erotic quality of desire, and the human body* as divinely created for love, have begun to explore the unity and complexity of love in new ways. Now personal and social neglect of love and violations of love are considered sinful, but sexuality, the body, and other natural foundations of human love, partnership, and community are no longer considered sinful.

Recent Western trends of idealizing the human body, however, complicate efforts to relate love and body and love and sexuality more adequately. Feminist* insights into the interdependence of love and self have brought into question the indispensability of self-sacrifice in Christian love. It is not the self that must be overcome, but the ego. Moreover, reconsidering the social and political dimensions of love has increased attention toward the eschatological* nature of love: Christian love is neither a mere object of faith, nor an occasion for isolated acts of charity*; rather, guided by the Holy* Spirit, it initiates a praxis of personal, ecclesial, and universal transformation.

Love Feast, the Eucharist* or Lord's* Supper, often called the *agape in the early church.

Low Christologies emphasize Jesus' humanity, which was the original experience of the disciples*. It is a feature of many early Christologies, especially those called Adoptionist*, and a characteristic of many modern Christologies that are based on the so-called historical Jesus* or are concerned to avoid excessive claims about Jesus. See also CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER; HIGH CHRISTOLOGIES.

Low Church Party, the group in the Church of England that gives a "low" place to the episcopate, priesthood, and sacraments, in a manner similar to that of the Puritan* party of the 16th and 17th c. Loyola, Ignatius. See IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA.

Lucaris, Cyril (1572–1637), patriarch of Alexandria (1601–20), then of Constantinople (1620–37). Born in Crete (under Venetian control), he studied in Venice and Padua. While attending the Synod of Brest*-Litovsk (1596), he became suspicious of Rome and the Jesuits* and turned toward Calvinist* theology, which he tried to synthesize with Orthodoxy*. He sent priests to study in the West, corresponded with leading Anglicans and Lutherans, and gave the Codex Alexandrinus (the most valuable early-5th-c. Greek manuscript of the OT and NT) to Charles I of England. His Western sympathies led to his being deposed several times, but he was restored through the efforts of the Dutch and British ambassadors. The sultan had him put to death on suspicion of being involved in an anti-Turkish plot. His Confession of Faith (1629) was condemned after his death for its Western and Calvinistic bias; in its place, the confessions of Peter Mogila* (1638) and Dositheus* of Jerusalem (1672) became the most widely approved summaries of Orthodox doctrine.

Lucian of Antioch (d312), presbyter in Antioch, martyr. He revised the text of the Greek Bible, and the "Lucianic text" became the accepted one in most of the Eastern Church. Arius* and his allies, who held a subordinationist* view of the second person of the Trinity*, regarded themselves as followers of Lucian; his status as a martyr enhanced the Arians' position. The second of the four creeds adopted by the Council of Antioch* (341) was said to be his.

Lucifer (from Lat lux, "light," and ferre, "to bring"; "bringer of light"), a name given to the Devil*, the prince of demons, viewed as a fallen angel (like a fallen star; Isa 14:12). The use of this name was popularized in works such as Dante's* Inferno and Milton's* Paradise Lost.

Luis de Granada (c1504–88), Dominican* preacher, writer, mystic*; born in Granada, Spain, to poor parents. After his father's death, his mother had to work as a laundress at a Dominican convent, probably the Convento de Santa Cruz recently founded by Ferdinand and Isabella*. Luis entered this priory (1524) and was later given a fellowship at the Colegio de San Gregorio at Valladolid (1529), where he was an outstanding student until 1534. Sometime afterward he was elected prior of the Convento of Escala Coeli near Cordoba and set about the task of reforming it. He gained the reputation of being a fluent and confident preacher, even as he spent several hours a day in solitary prayer away from the community. Based for a time in Badajoz, he composed his most famous work, The Guide for Sinners (Guía de Peccadores, 1555), then moved to Portugal (1557 until his death) as the provincial of the Portuguese Dominicans and the confessor of Queen Catherine. During this period, he wrote several additional books expressing a fiery enthusiasm for the Christian life in a gentle and charming style, particularly describing the revelation of Christ in the natural world. His writings continue to be read today in Roman Catholic spiritual circles.

PETER TYLER

Luke, Gospel of, one of the four Gospels of the NT. Literary comparison indicates that the author, named Luke, most likely knew the Gospel of Mark and another source (Q*) shared with Matthew. The Gospel of Luke includes much material otherwise unknown, such as the narratives of Jesus' birth and childhood and parables like those of the good Samaritan and the prodigal son. It was written in the late 1st c., some time before the writing of the Acts of the Apostles.

Luke mastered the literary conventions of his time; his work represents a Christianity both deeply embedded in Jewish tradition and defending itself on Greco-Roman grounds. Luke sees the person and mission of Jesus as a fulfillment of prophecies; the infancy narratives are permeated with references to the sacred texts of the Jews. God's history with his people is marked by a recurrent pattern of promise and fulfillment. Jesus' mission is to restore the people of God as it continues toward its universal purpose as promised to Abraham. Luke does not hold a supersessionist* view. While reaching out to the Gentiles and including them without requiring them to comply with Jewish tradition, he supports the special role of the Jewish people. The Jews, however, become divided over Jesus when he calls for a reversal of social distinctions and status, as predicted by Mary in the Magnificat (1:46–55).

Women are portrayed as acting and speaking in their own right, and Luke's composition features gender complementarity as part of more comprehensive patterns of parallelisms.

Good news is proclaimed to the poor, but the primary targets of the Gospel of Luke are the rich and prominent. They are called to meet the needs of others without expecting anything in return. The many meals depicted in this gospel refer not only to nourishment but to social interaction and community with those held in contempt by elite society. Conventional practices of reciprocity are redesigned to promote a provocative inclusive practice. In the end, only God's justice* will balance the accounts but the end-time is not imminent. Eschatological excitement is tempered by a moral and philosophical discourse aimed at conversion and perseverance. Luke also intensifies an ethos of voluntary abandonment to support an ascetic* lifestyle marked by sexual renunciation, even reinterpreting the virgin motherhood of Mary as a motherhood constituted by the fruitful reception of the Word of God, which in the Gospel of Luke is characteristic of a disciple*.

Luther, Martin (1483–1546), German Protestant Reformer, theologian, translator of Scripture. He initiated the Reformation* and influenced other Reformers, even when they disagreed with him. Luther was born and died in Eisleben, Germany, but spent most of his life as a professor of biblical interpretation at the University of Wittenberg. In 1505 he became an Augustinian* monk but left the order after he was excommunicated in 1521. Four years later, he married Katharina von Bora, a former nun, and they had six children. Although he was the acknowledged leader of the Lutheran Movement, his only official position was the academic chair he received in 1512 and held until his death.

Luther did not intend to leave the Roman Church or to start a reformation. As an earnest monk and teacher of Scripture, however, he began to question three features of medieval religion that led to irresolvable conflict with the papacy*: the Scholastic* theology in which he was trained; practices like indulgences* and praying to saints*, for which he could find no warrant in Scripture*; and papal claims to supreme authority in the church.

During his early lectures, Luther stumbled over Rom 1:16–17. He could not understand how the righteousness* of God could be revealed as good news (gospel), since the Nominalist* theology he had studied defined God's righteousness as the standard by which God judged sinners. In a moment of inspiration, which Luther described as "entering paradise through open gates," he decided with the help of Augustine* that Paul* intended that the righteousness of God be understood as a gift received through faith*. In academic debates (1516, 1517), Luther criticized the medieval notion that one could merit* grace* and salvation*, and the authority of Scholastic theology gave way to the Bible and Augustine.

Luther's discovery also led him to question the medieval piety in which he was raised. Indulgences were based on a theology that presupposed that contrite sinners* had to earn forgiveness by acts of penance* that made up for (satisfied) their sin. Since the purpose of indulgences was to release people from having to perform this satisfaction, for Luther they were superfluous once he was convinced that forgiveness was received in faith. Furthermore people no longer needed to pray to Mary and the saints since Christ was the only savior and object of faith. In a provocative set of 95 theses prepared for academic debate in 1517, Luther questioned not only the need for indulgences but also the power of the papacy to grant a full (plenary) indulgence that claimed to forgive sin in exchange for a contribution to the building of St. Peter's basilica in Rome.

This criticism of papal power initiated the conflict with Rome. During a crucial debate with John Eck at Leipzig in 1519, Luther rejected the traditional biblical basis for the divine origin of papal authority in Matt 16 and John 21. After persisting with his critical views and insisting that the authority of Scripture* remained "lord even over the pope," he was threatened with excommunication* (1520); in 1521 he was both excommunicated and declared an outlaw in Germany.

Owing to the protection of his immediate overlord, Elector Frederick of Saxony, Luther escaped capture and execution and returned in 1522 to his teaching duties in Wittenberg. By that time, Luther found himself the leader of a popular movement that was called evangelical* because it was based on the good news that salvation* was mediated by faith in Christ alone and not by any merit to be gained through religious activity. This principle, often called justification by faith, meant that the work of Christ was the sufficient basis of salvation and did not need to be supplemented by other works like satisfaction, invocation of saints, private masses, monastic vows, or fasting (see Justification, Theological Views and Practices, Cluster: A Central Doctrine for Western Christianity.) Accordingly, Luther and his colleagues had to construct a new Protestant piety that required an expansion and refinement of his theology. Redefining the sacramental life of the church proved to be especially controversial. In The Babylonian Captivity of the Church (1520), Luther had argued that only baptism* and the Lord's* Supper met the biblical standard for a sacrament*: commanded by Christ, joined with a promise, and requiring a material element. The medieval Mass*, understood to be a sacrifice offered to God, was replaced by the Lord's Supper as a means through which Christ bestowed the promised gift of forgiveness*. This promise was first applied to believers during baptism and remained valid for the forgiveness of all their sins* (not only original* sin) for as long as they recalled that promise in faith. Most Reformers, however, rejected Luther's sacramental views. Neither Ulrich Zwingli* nor the Anabaptists* believed that forgiveness of sin and regeneration occurred during baptism; the Anabaptists, moreover, rejected the baptism of infants and small children. Zwingli also rejected Luther's literal interpretation of the words of institution at the Lord's Supper, arguing that the Body and Blood of Christ were not really present in the sacrament. That disagreement, sealed in Marburg in 1529, led to the rise of separate Lutheran and Reformed churches.

Luther's main goal as a Reformer was to put in place a Christian way of living that was more biblical and Christ-centered than medieval piety. His template for that life was explained in Freedom of a Christian (1520): through faith Christians were the freest of all people and subject to none, but through love* they were servants of everyone and subject to all. After 1521 his work was dedicated to the nurture of that faith and love: he translated the Bible into German; wrote hymns and services of worship in German; composed the catechisms*; taught a new generation of pastors and found them parishes; wrote pamphlets on marriage, education, war and peace, and business ethics; and defended his movement politically and theologically. When he died in 1546, he still did not know whether the German Reformation would survive.

Luther's theology shaped the confessions of Lutheran churches around the world and became a prominent current of modern religious thought, but his authority has been mostly indirect and unofficial. Three of his writings acquired the status of Lutheran confessions in the *Book of Concord (1580). Most influential is the Small Catechism (1529), but the Augsburg Confession* (1530), authored mainly by his closest colleague, Philip Melancthon*, is acknowledged as the founding document of Lutheranism.

Luther's works include the following: lectures on Psalms, Romans, Galatians, and Hebrews (1513–21), Galatians (1531), and Genesis (1535–45); programmatic treatises of 1520: The Papacy at Rome, To the Christian Nobility, The Babylonian Captivity of the Church, and Freedom of a Christian; controversial and theological works: Against Latomus (examination of sin, grace, and faith, 1521), Bondage of the Will (1525) against Erasmus*, Confession concerning Christ's Supper (1528), Schmal-kaldic Articles (1537), and Councils and the Churches (ecclesiology 1539); works on reform and education: Estate of Marriage (1522), Temporal Authority (1523), To the City Councils of Germany (schools, 1524), German Mass (1526), The Large Catechism and The Small Catechism (1529); a German translation of the NT (1522) and prefaces to books in the German Bible; hymns, sermons, and letters; and prefaces to his collected German (1539) and Latin (1545) works.

SCOTT H. HENDRIX

Lutheran Churches and Their Theologies. Lutheran churches throughout the world claim continuity with the apostolic church. As "Lutheran," however, they trace their beginnings to the Reformation* initiated by Martin Luther*. It was not Luther's purpose to break from the Roman Catholic Church, and surely not to establish a denomination named after himself. Yet his proposals regarding the substance of the basic Christian message and church renewal set off a movement that in time was institutionalized.

In complicated ways that involved the Emperor Charles* V (1500–58), royalty and politicians in the German and Nordic states, popes*, and countless theologians of various points of view, the Lutheran Movement grew up alongside both the Roman Catholic Church and a number of other Reformation bodies. It soon lost its provisional character and a denomination was born.

Lutheran church bodies throughout the world have taken various paths. A state* church system characterized parts of Europe, and vestiges of that system remain in several countries. Lutheran churches in North and South America started as churches of immigrants. Lutheran churches in Asia and Africa are children of missions from Europe and North America. At the end of 2006, there were more than 200 Lutheran church bodies throughout the world, with a total membership of more than 70 million persons. Of these churches, 140 form the Lutheran* World Federation, which has a total membership of more than 66 million. The Lutheran churches outside the Federation, with more than 3 million members, led by the American Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (see the present cluster: Lutheranism in the United States: Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod) are generally biblicist and noncumenical.

Luther's original proposals were first fleshed out in the Augsburg* Confession, a document of 28 articles written by his colleague Philipp Melancthon* (1497–1560), signed by nine German territorial rulers, and presented to Charles V (1530). This confession found no agreement among the theologians of the Roman Catholic Church, and thus the complex process by which Lutheran churches came into being was begun. Consistently, these churches have retained the Augsburg Confession as their standard of faith and theology. In 1580 The Book of Concord, a formidable 700-page collection of seven “Lutheran” documents following the three “ecumenical creeds” (Apostles, Nicene*, and Athanasian*) was agreed to and Lutherans attained something like unity. Many Lutheran churches today continue to hold The Book of Concord as binding in its totality.

Thus Lutheran theology is always to be described as confessional. That theology has, to be sure, developed historically and contextually* as new circumstances and cultures have been encountered. Holding that a nonconfessional Christianity is a contradiction in terms, Lutherans find in the 16th-c. confessions an authoritative theological exposition of what is and what is not “Lutheran.”

The original proposal of the Lutheran Reformation as developed in these confessions was that the Christian gospel should be seen in accordance with the Bible as God’s gracious offer of unmerited salvation* in Jesus Christ, the message of “justification* by grace* through faith*” (see Justification, Theological Views and Practices, Cluster: A Central Doctrine for Western Christianity). This, Lutherans hold, is “the article by which the church stands or falls.” The famous hallmarks of Luther’s cause were sola gratia (by grace alone), sola fide (by faith alone), and sola scriptura (by Scripture* alone). This basic understanding was accompanied by other calls for reform: to give both the bread and wine in the Mass*, to conduct the Mass and to provide the Bible in local languages, to allow priests to marry, and to provide for great freedom in church government. Each of these calls has been theologically refined and developed over the years in ways, subtle and not so subtle, that have at times widened the gap between Lutherans and other Christians.

Certain dominating principles are found in Lutheran theology. That theology, in one current presentation, is trinitarian*, Christocentric*, highly sacramental*, church* centered, and thoroughly ecumenical*. Lutherans have participated in virtually all of the great theological debates of the past five centuries: orthodoxy and Pietism* in the post-Reformation Era, the role of human experience in relation to the operations of grace, the use of historical* criticism in biblical studies, and often divisive eucharistic* controversies. Lutheran social* ethics – based largely on views of law* and gospel* and the “two* kingdoms” – have at times, most notably in Germany before and during World War II, been seen as dualistic* and quietistic, separating the gospel from life in the world. Many ethicists since that war have worked to make classic Lutheran ethics more relevant to contemporary struggles for liberation* and social justice*.

It has largely been the modern ecumenical* movement that has caused Lutheran theology and ethics to be increasingly clarified and broadened. Several bilateral dialogues* – e.g. with the Roman Catholic Church, the Anglican Communion, and the Orthodox and Reformed churches – have required Lutherans to reexamine centuries-old positions. A notable result of these conversations has been the 1999 Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, signed by the Roman Catholic Church and the churches of the Lutheran World Federation. Whether the Lutheran tradition now has the generosity and will to move with other traditions toward unity is perhaps the chief question concerning its future.

NORMAN A. HJELM

Lutheran World Federation (LWF), a global “communion of churches,” includes 140 church bodies in 78 countries, with a membership of more than 66 million. It was preceded by the Lutheran World Convention (1927, Eisenach, Germany), which could not reconvene because of World War II. The LWF was founded in 1947 in Lund, Sweden, with 47 churches from 26 countries; it was remarkable for bringing together German, Nordic, and North American Lutherans, whose nations had only recently been at war with each other.

The LWF faced four challenges at its inception: rescue of the needy, common initiatives in mission*, joint efforts in theology, and a common response to the ecumenical* movement. These challenges have continued to exist in various forms and contexts. The influx of refugees after the devastation of World War II led to a worldwide program of relief and development. The urgent support of mission churches that had been “orphaned” during World War II soon expanded to include the support of indigenous churches of the Two-thirds World. The Lutheran theological traditions were enriched by the ecumenical influence of Liberation*, Third World, and other theologies*. Ecumenically, the LWF has engaged in numerous bilateral dialogues. A significant result was the signing in 1999 by the Roman Catholic Church and the churches of the LWF of the Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification* (1999); that central doctrine of Christian faith, so prominent in Reformation controversies and condemnations, is no longer a point of division between the two traditions.

At the intersection of doctrine and social concern, the LWF took an unprecedented stance in 1984 by suspending the membership of three churches in Southern Africa over the issue of apartheid. In keeping with Lutheran tradition, in 1977 the LWF had declared apartheid a status confessio-nis*, meaning that the very nature of Christianity is denied by the separation of races within the churches. After a lengthy pastoral process, this suspension was lifted in 1994.

The LWF, at first “a free association of Lutheran churches,” declared itself “a communion of churches” (1990). In this deeper ecclesiological understanding, small, struggling church bodies from the Two-thirds World are on equal footing with large, wealthy churches from the Reformation heartlands. Women and laity have assumed positions of leadership alongside male clergy. Global social concerns of poverty*, violence*, and discrimination preoccupy the LWF and its Departments for World Service, Mission and Development, and Theology and Studies. Its headquarters are in Geneva, Switzerland.

Lutheran Worship. The distinct forms and styles of Lutheran worship can be traced back to the models provided by Martin Luther* (1484–1546). Lutheran worship remained in continuity with the Mass* of the Roman Catholic Church even though it has been regulated by various church orders in many countries and inculturated* into the folk cultures of many peoples.

Luther did not abolish the forms of worship practiced in the medieval church. His concern was to reform worship so that it might better serve the proclamation of the gospel. Luther revised the canon of the Mass so that Christ’s words of institution of the Lord’s Supper would stand in clear relief. His Form of the Mass (1523) was in Latin. His German Mass (1526) was for congregations that lacked choral resources; the German texts of the Mass were versified and set to tunes that the people could sing. Luther also encouraged the composition of hymns* for the congregation and set an example by providing 36 of his own.

Lutheran worship was regulated by official ordinances in countries that adopted the Reformation. Luther’s models were influential but were not slavishly followed. Some church orders were more conservative than others in retaining traditional practices. The liturgical* year calendar* and lectionary*, altars* with their appointments, and vestments* for ministers remained customary in Lutheran practice. Lutheran worship gave a new emphasis to expository preaching* and frequent reception of Holy Communion* in both kinds. Communicants were expected to announce their intention to receive the sacrament to the pastor and to be examined and absolved (confession* and forgiveness*).

Lutheran worship gives prominence to church music* and congregational singing. The cantatas of Johann Sebastian Bach* (1685–1750) are the high points of church music with multiple voices and/or instruments. The proliferation of hymns and spiritual songs helped to inculcate Lutheran worship into the folk cultures of many countries and regions, from Germany*, Scandinavia*, and Eastern Europe, to North America and to Eastern and Southern Africa, Southeast Asia, and the Far East. The multicultural character of Lutheran worship is reflected in recent worship books, such as Evangelical Lutheran Worship of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (2007) and Lutheran Service Book of the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (2007).

Lutheran worship is most distinctive when it remains Catholic in form, Evangelical* (i.e. gospel-centered) in content, participatory in practice, and multicultural in experience.

2) A Sampling of Lutheranism in Context

Lutheranism in Germany. Institutionally and organizationally, by far the largest number of Lutheran Christians in Germany* are members of the traditional territorial churches (see State Churches) that go back to the 16th c.; the main exceptions are the Independent Evangelical Lutheran Church and Lutheran communities in Baden. Free and independent of political rule since the end of World War I, all of these territorial churches belong to the Lutheran* World Federation, which was founded in 1947. In 1948 the United Evangelical Lutheran Church in Germany (VELKD) was organized as a federal church, now encompassing eight independent member churches (Bavaria, Brunswick, Hannover, Mecklenburg, North Elbe, Saxony, Schaumburg-Lippe, Thuringia; together, 10 million members). Outside the VELKD, the Lutheran churches in Oldenburg, Württemberg, and Pomerania (together, 3 million members) are nevertheless members of the Lutheran World Federation. In addition many communities within the United* Churches have a Lutheran character; their confirmands* are instructed according to Luther's *Small Catechism. Altogether more Lutherans live in Germany than in any other country. The relation of the VELKD to the Evangelical Church in Germany (EKD), to which it is institutionally linked, and to the Union of Evangelical Churches has been debated since 2002. The conclusion was that the VELKD will continue with its own general synod, administration, bishops' conference, presiding bishop, and church offices. The work of the VELKD has put its stamp on Lutheranism through the service book (liturgy) and lectionary, the Doctrinal Ordinances and the Guidelines for Church Life, Service Regulations, and the Seminary for Theological Studies in Pullach, the Pastoral Seminary, and the Institute of Liturgical Studies in Leipzig.

Lutheranism in Germany (and worldwide) is distinguished by the Lutheran confessional documents Book of Concord (1580) and, especially, the Augsburg Confession of 1530 and Luther's Small Catechism. A proper Lutheran Church is defined in the Augsburg Confession VII: "the congregation of saints, in which the gospel is purely preached and the sacraments rightly administered." The charisma of Lutheranism (the gift historically entrusted to it) is clarity of doctrine and worship with a focus on sinful humanity and the justifying God (see Justification, Theological Views and Practices, Cluster). Like every charisma, this charisma is not for self-display but for service. The Lutheran confession is not an end in itself but is to be a service to the oikoumene. Similarly, German Lutheranism is engaged in many ecumenical activities, chiefly through membership in the World* Council of Churches but first in the broader Protestant context.

Following the Arnoldshain Theses on the Lord's Supper (1957), the "Concord of the Reformed Churches in Europe" (Leuenberg Concord), which was concluded in 1973, brought Lutherans and Reformed closer together into a communion of churches, not a union. Lutheran theology and piety remain characteristically distinct from Reformed theology and piety (see Reformed Churches); there are distinct understandings of the Lord's* Supper, the relation between law* and gospel*; God's two* kingdoms or realms, and thereby social ethics, views of the church, ordination, and office. The Roman Catholic Church more readily seeks dialogue with the Lutherans than with the Reformed. The Joint Declaration on the Doctrine of Justification, accepted by the Roman Catholic Church and the churches of the Lutheran World Federation (Augsburg, October 31, 1999), provoked lively controversy among German Lutherans. The decisive points of Lutheranism, such as "by faith* alone" and "simul iustus et peccator" (both righteous* and sinner) and, above all, the significance of the doctrine of justification as a basic criterion of theology and ecclesiology, continue to be contested between Rome and Wittenberg and need further theological attention and development (see Justification, Theological Views and Practices, Cluster: A Central Doctrine for Western Christianity). Discussions are also taking place between Lutheran and Anglican theologians, as documented in Worship and Ethics: Lutherans and Anglicans in Dialogue (1994). Doctrinal discussions with the Methodist Church led, within the framework of the Leuenberg* Agreement (or Concord), to a mutual declaration of church communion. Dialogues with Mennonites* and Old* Catholics have resulted in a mutual declaration of eucharistic hospitality.

Not tied organizationally to the constituted churches, a number of Luther societies carry out their work, advancing knowledge of the person and work of Luther and clarifying his significance for the present. To this end, the Luther Society (Luthergesellschaft) was founded (1918) in Wittenberg. It disseminates the research of the "Luther renaissance," publishes the periodicals Luther and Luther-Jahrbuch, and sponsors lectures and conferences. Since 1932 the Luther-Akademie Sondershausen-Ratzeburg (as it is called today) has brought together German Lutheran theologians, along with others from the Nordic countries, for regular conferences to revive the theological heritage of Luther and introduce students to Luther studies, which also occurs in the universities.

Less visible institutionally but not to be undervalued is the cultural significance of Lutheranism in Germany. The language of Luther's Bible and many insights of Luther's theology, variously transmitted, remain more or less explicit in the present. Lutheranism is influential in Germany, not least through the hymns of Paul Gerhardt and the music of the arch-Lutheran Johann Sebastian Bach*.

OSWALD BAYER

Lutheranism in the Nordic Countries

(Denmark*, Finland*, Iceland, Norway*, Sweden*) has been and remains tied to the governments in a state-church system, although changes are taking place; thus the Church of Sweden* has become more autonomous since 2000. This is so because Lutheranism was introduced (in the 1530s) in Nordic countries partly for political reasons and partly because kings, princes, and/or leading clergy embraced Reformation theology, but not because of a broad public movement. The population abandoned Roman Catholic customs and theology slowly.

The governments used Lutheranism to maintain national identity and common values. Conversely Lutheranism as the dominating confession had a religious quasi-monopoly that gave it a strong confessional character. Thus despite variations among countries, Nordic churches presently have a distinctive attitude toward ecumenism*; they are both more restrictive (maintaining their confessional stance) and more open to it than Lutheran churches in other countries.

Lutheranism is the core of the Nordic civil* religion; more than 80% of the population are baptized members of the national churches who limit their participation in the Lutheran churches to attending worship services for important national events, disasters, and tragedies that affect the population as a whole and for rites of passages (especially baptisms and funerals (see Secularization and Desecularization in Europe and North America)). But Lutheranism has also been shaped (since the early 19th c.) by various revivalist* movements, which were theologically conservative but at times socially and politically radical. Thus these movements gave Lutheranism a clear direction with regard to mission* and diakonia, providing an opportunity for many women to assume leadership roles in church work. There is often tension between Lutheran civil religion and Lutheran revivalism, resulting in the constituting of small, independent Lutheran churches that criticize the alleged conformity of the state church. Conversely, the state church provides a religious alternative for those who find that revivalist religious movements demand too much from their members.

The state-church system with its open form of Lutheranism makes possible the coexistence of groups with significantly different opinions about theological and moral issues, within one common framework. Although not without controversy, Lutheranism has taken moderately liberal stances by accepting recent social developments in church life, e.g. concerning the role of women (the ordination of women* in Sweden from 1958, including several bishops) and issues of global justice (e.g. the World* Council of Churches in Uppsala, 1968). See also FOLK CHURCHES IN NORDIC COUNTRIES; PIETISM IN SCANDANAVIA.

JAN-OLAV HENRIKSEN

Lutheranism in the United States.

American Lutherans trace their roots to the 16th-c. Reformation*. Colonial Lutheranism depended for at least a century on European-trained and temporarily posted clergy, until German and Swedish ministers ordained Justus Falckner (1703).

Henry Melchior Muhlenberg* organized the Pennsylvania ministerium (1748), creating the first US-based structure for recognizing ministers, training teachers, resolving disputes, and starting new churches. After the American Revolution, the needs of the missions on the frontier forced the colonial churches to adapt, and they formed "synods" that brought laity and clergy together to plan for expansion. Throughout the 19th c., the number of Lutherans in the USA, Canada, and the Caribbean increased as new immigrant groups arrived.

Theological disputes among 19th-c. Lutherans dominated the history of Lutheranism. In addition, Lutherans split along sectional lines during the Civil War. Widespread efforts to achieve reconciliation began in the 1930s when English replaced various immigrant languages as the common language in place of the various immigrant languages; these efforts resulted in the formation of the American Lutheran Church (ALC, 1960) and the Lutheran Church in America (LCA, 1962). Together with the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod (LCMS), more than 90% of US Lutherans now belonged to three distinctly US churches. Two of these – the more congregational and Pietist ALC and the ecumenically oriented LCA – merged with a "moderate" offshoot (Evangelical Lutherans in Mission) of the staunchly confessional LCMS, forming in 1988 the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA). Smaller groups, like the Wisconsin Synod and the Evangelical Lutheran Synod, remain independent and conservative, while the ELCA maintains the ecumenical and social ministry commitments of the American Lutheran tradition and represents American Lutheranism in the Lutheran World Federation.

Lutheran colleges, hospitals, social services, and missions carry on the social ministry and educational traditions of the several ethnic Lutheran streams and have expanded the reach of Lutheranism to make it an increasingly multicultural US tradition.

MARIA ERLING

Lutheranism in the United States: Evangelical Lutheran Church in America (ELCA).

Founded by a merger (1988), the ELCA is the largest American Lutheran denomination (5 million members; 10,700 congregations) in the USA and Caribbean. Its purpose is "to participate in God's mission and proclaim God's saving gospel of justification* by grace* for Christ's sake through faith* alone."

Broadly ecumenical, the ELCA has entered formal "full communion" with five other churches. Social* justice* and service are carried out through multiple partnerships, including Lutheran Services in America (the largest US nongovernmental social service network), the Lutheran* World Federation, and Lutheran World Relief. While congregations exhibit broad diversity, adherence to the Lutheran confessions and the widespread use of common liturgies and hymnody (Evangelical Lutheran Worship, 2006) bind them together as one church with 65 geographical synods (each led by an elected bishop). Churchwide offices in Chicago provide resources to congregations and coordinate partnerships with 74 international companion churches. Clergy (more than 17,500 active and retired women and men) are educated at eight seminaries. Persons from all backgrounds are served by 28 affiliated colleges and universities, as well as a vast array of schools and youth camps. MICHAEL L. COOPER-WHITE

Lutheranism in the United States: Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod, originally Die Deutsche Evangelisch-Lutherische Synode von Missouri, Ohio, und Andern Staaten, formed (in Chicago, 1847) by 12 pastors and 16 congregations (c3,000 members). German speaking, the Missouri Synod emphasized biblical doctrine and the Book of Concord* as a faithful exposition of God's inspired word. Centered in the Midwest, the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod numbered more than 600,000 baptized members (early 20th c.). German immigration to the USA subsided, and two world wars forced it to anglicize. Questions about polity*, fellowship with other Lutherans, the nature and character of Scripture*, election* and conversion*, justification*, and inculturation* led to serious controversies (some ongoing). The Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod had nearly 3 million members in 1971, but only 2.5 million members and c6,000 congregations and c8,000 pastors in the early 21st c. With seminaries in Fort Wayne, Indiana, and St. Louis, Missouri, and colleges and universities in Ann Arbor, Michigan, Austin, Texas, Bronxville, New York, Irvine, California, Mequon, Wisconsin, Portland, Oregon, River Forest, Illinois, St. Paul, Minnesota, Selma, Alabama, and Seward, Nebraska, the Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod has the nation's largest Protestant school system, with more than 1,700 preschools, elementary schools, and high schools and 10,000 teachers. The Lutheran Church–Missouri Synod also has deaconesses*, directors of Christian education and of Christian outreach, a department of archives and history at Concordia Historical Institute, and headquarters in St. Louis, Missouri.

Luxembourg. The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg encountered Christianity through traders and soldiers during the Roman occupation (3rd and 4th c., although historical evidence is lacking). Systematic attempts to Christianize the territory began in the 6th c. with Irish itinerant missionaries who wandered among the Germanic peoples of Northwest Europe. The first institutional Christian presence came with the foundation of Benedictine* monasteries (7th c.). The monastery of Echternach, founded by Willibrord (697), served as a missionary and spiritual center for the whole of Northwest Europe throughout the Middle Ages. During the Austrian Hapsburg occupation, Roman Catholicism became the state* church. In 1815 Luxembourg became a grand duchy ruled by the first Dutch king, William I, who recognized Protestantism.

Although the influence of the official church has been decreasing over the past decades, Roman Catholicism remains the dominant religion. Popular devotions to the Blessed Virgin Mary* and other saints are flourishing. The Christian presence in public media and politics remains strong. Thirty percent of the Luxembourg people are Roman Catholic immigrants (especially Portuguese, French, and Italian). Religious groups other than Christian are very small. Islam is not recognized as an official religion by the Luxembourg state, although freedom of religion is guaranteed.

Maccabees, Books of

1 and 2 Maccabees are deuterocanonical* books found in the Septuagint* (in Greek) and the Catholic and Orthodox Bibles, but not in the HB and Protestant Bibles (see Bible, Canon of).

1 Maccabees (written in the late 2nd c. BCE), a unified composition in the style of the biblical historical books (e.g. Judges, Samuel, 1–2 Kings), has a conservative theological outlook similar to that of 1–2 Chronicles (possibly written by a Sadducee*). It presents Judea's struggle under the leadership of Mattathias and his sons, especially Judas Maccabeus, for liberation from the Hellenistic Seleucid kings, and especially from Antiochus Epiphanes, who sought to suppress Jewish worship and institutions.

2 Maccabees, a composite work, apparently redacted at different times, has a more Hellenistic theology; its final redaction, apparently addressed to a different audience (perhaps the Jewish Diaspora* in Egypt), seems to have intended to introduce Hanukkah, the Jewish holiday commemorating the rededication of the Temple during the Maccabean revolt. In 1 and 2 Maccabees, Judas Maccabaeus, portrayed as a heroic figure doing "God's will," became a well-known symbol through his re-presentation by Dante* (in Paradiso) and Handel* (in the oratorio Judas Maccabaeus).

3 and 4 Maccabees are deuterocanonical books (part of the Bible) only for Eastern Orthodox churches.

3 Maccabees (written in the 2nd or 1st c. BCE) refers not to the Maccabees' revolt, but to similar situations in which God's miraculous deliverance of the Jews from threatened destruction by foreign oppressors occurred.

4 Maccabees (possibly written in the 1st c. CE) emphasizes martyrdom* (of Eleazar and the mother and her seven sons) and is most significant for its presentation of martyrdom as a vicarious sacrifice* redeeming God's people Israel – a notion that made this book important for Christians (although there is no evidence of direct influence on the NT), especially for the development of martyrology. Thus this book was significant for, e.g., Gregory* Nazianzus, John* Chrysostom, Ambrose*, and Augustine*.

Macedonia is a region in the Balkans covering Northern Greece* and the southwest corner of Bulgaria*, where Paul* established Christian communities in Philippi and Thessaloniki, with the latter dominating Southern Macedonia to the present. The bishop of Thessaloniki held the title of vicar of the Church of Rome (from 412), and the city housed the relics of the 4th-c. martyr Demetrios, whose basilica attracted pilgrims from the 5th c. to the present. The Balkan Wars of 1912–13 carved out the current Greek and Bulgarian boundaries of Macedonia. At the end of World War II, Yugoslavia created the autonomous Republic of Macedonia.

JAMES C. SKEDROS

Macedonia, the Republic of, a small Balkan country bordered by Serbia*, Bulgaria*, Greece*, and Albania*.

Christianity was established in Roman cities (e.g. Stobi, Ohrid) as early as the 4th c. under the jurisdiction of the bishop of Thessaloniki, who held the title of the vicar of the Church of Rome (from 412). Non-Christian Slavs moved into Macedonia (from the mid-6th c.). The missionaries Clement and Nahum (disciples of Cyril* and Methodios) established themselves in Ohrid (late 9th c.) and trained numerous native Slavic-speaking clergy. Successive Bulgarian and Serbian expansion dominated the medieval period; Ohrid became the seat of the autocephalous* Bulgarian Patriarchate (11th c.). Ottoman advances (second half of the 14th and 15th c.) resulted in several centuries of Muslim rule, which contributed to the multifariousness of an already diverse population. At the end of World War II, Yugoslavia created the autonomous Republic of Macedonia. In 1991 the Republic gained its independence.

Eastern Orthodoxy* in its Slavic expression has remained the dominant form of Christianity within Macedonia. The Macedonian Orthodox Church plays an important role in national and ethnic identity, and declared its independence from the Serbian Orthodox Church (1967). Yet no other Orthodox church has recognized its autocephaly. Several important monasteries and churches (St. George near Kumanovo; the Monastery of the Archangel Michael near Kratovo) survive from the medieval Serbian kingdom. Nearly one-quarter of Macedonians are Muslim, the vast majority of ethnic Albanian descent.

Statistics: Population (2000): 2 million. Christians, 64% (Orthodox, 59.5%; Roman Catholics, 3.5%; independents, 0.05%; Protestants, 0.04%); Muslims, 28%; nonreligious, 8%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

Machen, J. Gresham (1881–1937), Presbyterian scholar who played an important role in the liberal–fundamentalist controversies (1920s) in the USA as a spokesperson for fundamentalists*. Many fundamentalists (and other conservatives) found Machen’s polemical writings deeply compelling, including his claim in Christianity and Liberalism (1923) that Protestant modernism is not a modern version of the Christian faith, but rather a set of beliefs and practices that are clearly un-biblical and un-Christian. Machen taught at Princeton Theological Seminary (1906–29) and played an important role in the creation of Westminster Theological Seminary (Philadelphia) and the Orthodox Presbyterian Church.

Mackay, John A. (1889–1983). The first Protestant missionary to gain acceptance in intellectual circles in Peru, Mackay exercised great influence over Protestant missionary activity in all Latin America. As president of Princeton Theological Seminary (1936–59), he fostered ecumenical studies and called for tolerance in the face of Senator McCarthy’s anti-Communist campaign. He arrived in Peru in 1916 and transformed the Anglo-Peruvian (today San Andrés) school into one of the most prestigious preparatory schools. Among his close friends were Luis Alberto Sánchez, a leading man of letters, and Víctor Raúl Haya de la Torre, founder of the Aprista Party. See also PERU.

Macrina (c327–c380), one of the Cappadocians*. The first child of Basil and Emmelia, Macrina was named for her grandmother, Macrina the Elder, a martyr. Her secret name, revealed to her mother three times, was Thecla*, after the 2nd-c. saint widely honored as an example of a celibate. After the death of the spouse chosen by her parents, Macrina claimed for herself, at the age of 12, the rights of a widow* and adopted the monastic* life (c339 or 340). After the death of her father (probably sometime between 341 and 345), Macrina and her mother gradually transformed their home in Annisa into a monastic* community, where they engaged in activities reserved for slaves* (baking bread and weaving garments); this suggests the influence of Eustathius* of Sebaste, who was rebuked by the Synod of Gangra* for minimizing the differences between slaves and free persons. Macrina persuaded her brother Basil* to return from his studies in Athens and adopt the ascetic* life (probably 355/56); their younger brother Naucratius had already adopted the solitary life (probably 352). It was most likely Basil (357/58) who organized a double* monastery with areas for men and women, sharing a church. After Macrina’s death, her brother Gregory of Nyssa wrote the Life of Macrina and a discourse On the Soul and Resurrection that was placed in her mouth.

Madagascar, “the Big Island,” off Africa in the Indian Ocean. The population is composed of descendants of immigrants from the South Pacific (who arrived mainly between the 3rd and 5th c. CE). These people, the Merina (comprising many ethnic groups, who speak Malagasy), are the dominant people of the island and live in the central highlands. Christians among them are mostly Protestants. There are also “coastal people” from Africa (Bantu), who settled shortly after the Merina in the coastal areas, where Muslim Arabs established trading posts (from the 7th c.). Christians among them are mostly Catholics. About half of the population is Christian, almost equally divided between Protestantism and Roman Catholicism.

Christianity arrived on the island with the Portuguese (1500), who brought the first missionary, the Dominican João de San Tomas (1585). They were followed by Jesuits, including Luis Mariano (1613); Fr. Nacquat produced a catechism in Malagasy (1657). These sporadic missionary efforts were unsuccessful until the 19th c., when David Jones, a missionary of the London Missionary Society (LMS), was welcomed by King Radama I (1810–28), who sought to open the island to European culture. LMS missionaries (not associated with a colonialist occupation; the British never occupied the island) started a network of schools and brought artisans to found industries, developing a Christian presence in the fabric of society. At the same time, they preached the gospel, using

Fr. Nacquat's catechism, and translated the Bible (completed 1836).

Queen Ranavalona I (1828–61) expelled all the missionaries and persecuted Christians (with hundreds of martyrs). But when missionaries returned (1861), the number of Christians had increased to about 5,000. When Queen Ranavalona II became a Christian (1869) and made Christianity the religion of the island, the number of Christians quickly grew (to 39% of the population by 1900); thereafter, growth was very slow.

Political struggle between the Merina rulers and the French colonists resulted in two wars (1883–86, 1895–96), during which all the Catholic missionaries were expelled. When Madagascar became a French colony (1896), there was a new wave of persecution against Christians (during which many were killed, and churches were burned), and the anticlericalism* of the French administration severely limited church activities.

While Protestantism is firmly rooted in the Merina intellectual, upper social class (on the plateau), the Roman Catholic Church oriented its work toward coastal people, the peasant masses.

The Roman Catholic Church, which in 2000 had about 3.7 million members in more than 300 parishes, progressively gained a Malagasy identity, with the first nine Malagasy priests ordained in 1925, the first Malagasy bishop in 1939, and the first Malagasy archbishop in 1960. The Second Vatican* Council bought about a greater Catholic Malagasy identity (with the National Synod called by the bishops in 1975). Although a great number of priests and religious are of foreign origin, the creation of the Catholic Theological Institute (1980s) seeks to reverse this trend. The network of youth centers compensates for the limits placed on Catholic schools by the laicization* imposed by the French (until 1960), although the teaching of (Catholic or Protestant) catechism in public schools and subsidies for private schools (including Catholic) since 1972 opens new possibilities for the Roman Catholic Church.

Protestantism, based on the work of the LMS, was strongly reinforced by the conversion (to Protestantism) of Queen Ranavalona II (1869), which led to a mass movement (rebik'ondry) into Protestant churches, especially among Merinas. Missionaries from the British Friends* (1869) and from the Paris (Protestant) Mission (1897) cooperated with LMS missionaries, developing local churches (according to comity* agreements), until 1968, when all these churches were united in the Church of Jesus Christ in Madagascar (a Reformed church, l'Église de Jésus Christ à Madagascar, two-thirds of Malagasy Protestants). Following the emphasis of the LMS missionaries, the Church of Jesus Christ has a vast network of primary and secondary schools and is actively integrated into Malagasy daily life through social work institutions. Similarly, the missionaries of the Norwegian Missionary Society (since 1866), joined by other Lutherans, led to the formation of the Malagasy Lutheran Church (south of the island), the second-largest Protestant church (one-quarter of Malagasy Protestants). Most Protestant pastors are Malagasy, now trained in two seminaries: the Faculty of Theology of the Church of Jesus Christ (since 1979) and the Lutheran Faculty of Theology (since 1985).

Christianity in Madagascar faces the issue of the relationship between church* and state, including laicization*, a legacy of the French colonial period. Laicization is resisted by Catholics. Protestants, theoretically in favor of a strict separation of church* and state (e.g. they banned national flags from Protestant sanctuaries), have among their members many Merina political figures and heads of government.

Christianity is also confronted by the fact that about half of the population practices the traditional religion that combines Merina and African* Religion. This religion involves faith in a supreme deity, Zanahary, and primarily the veneration of ancestors*, who are believed to reward or punish the living. For instance, the Merina and Betsileo engage in the reburial practice of "turning over the dead" in order to celebrate spiritual communion with ancestors, the "living dead," and receive blessings; during the ritual, the relatives' remains are removed from the family tomb, rewrapped in new shrouds, and returned to the tomb following festive ceremonies in their honor. Many Christians practice such veneration of ancestors, even though they regularly attend Mass or worship services; Catholic and Protestant attendance is very high.

In addition, spirit possession and medium activity are central to the Malagasy culture. Mediums ("shepherds"), traditionally women, have significant spiritual authority. Early Protestant missionaries brought to Madagascar concepts of a male deity whose worship was led exclusively by males; they strove to repress "emotional" worship, which they claimed was a reflection of "pagan" ritual, and did not associate worship with healing. Thus Christianity was incoherent to many islanders. Hence, Madagascar's Healing Shepherds, a Christian Charismatic* movement affirming the leadership and healing power and authority of women, and offering an effective model for healing the mentally ill, attracted many.

Statistics: Population (2008): 20 million (M). Christians, 50% (Protestants, 25%; Roman Catholics, 23%; Anglicans, 2%); African Religionists, 47%; Muslims, 3%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001, and United Nations: World Population Prospects, 2008.)

Magi, originally a priestly caste among Medes and Persians; among Greeks the term "magus" acquired various connotations: sage, astrologer, magician, or charlatan. Magi are represented as the first Gentiles* to have honored Christ (Matt 2:1–12). Through the centuries, they were interpreted in ways that reflected evolving cultures. The fact that they offered three gifts led to the conviction that the Magi were three in number. Gradually they came to be considered kings (Ps 72:10–11; Isa 60:3); they were named (Gaspar, Balthasar, and Melchior in the West); and they were viewed as representing three age groups (youth, middle age, old age) and three races (yellow, white, black). Today at least one of them is sometimes represented as a woman.

Maimonides, Moses ben Maimon (1138–1204), born in Cordova, the capital of Andalusia (Muslim Spain). A Jewish scholar, he lived amid the intercultural splendor of this largest and most affluent city of Europe until 1148, when an invasion of North African Berbers, ostensibly to assist local Muslims against the Spanish reconquista, forced his family into exile. They fled first to Fez (Morocco) and then, via the Holy Land (in the throes of the Crusades), to Cairo, where he remained until his death. His prodigious intellectual output included scientific treatises on the calendar, the art of logic, a commentary on the Mishnah, and a codification of Jewish religious law from its sources. At 33 he became the supreme religious authority of Jews in Egypt and the medical consultant at the court of the sultan, Saladin. There he composed a set of reflections on faith* and reason*, Torah and philosophy for his pupil, Joseph, which were compiled in the Guide of the Perplexed. This work inspired Thomas Aquinas* (1226–74) to undertake a similar project. Like Thomas's work, Maimonides' Guide of the Perplexed did not always meet with appreciation by his own community, yet it reflects the ability of Jewish scholars to address religious issues in the larger Islamic world. DAVID B. BURRELL, CSC

Malabar Christians. A Christian community known as Thomas Christians, or Malabar Christians, has existed on the southwest coast of India since ancient times, as attested to by 4th-c. sources. The community claims that it was founded by the apostle Thomas*, who evangelized India in the late 1st c. Located in the state of Kerala, these Christians form a distinct religious community fully integrated into Indian society. During the early centuries, they were in full communion with the Assyrian* Church in Persia, which sent bishops to India. Since these bishops did not speak the local language, real jurisdiction was placed in the hands of an Indian priest who was given the title of archdeacon of all India and who served as the civil and religious superior of the community of the Malabar Christians until the arrival of the Portuguese (late 15th c.).

The Persian connection was beneficial to the Malabar Christians in that it opened the small Christian community to the larger Christian world. But for many, this relationship compromised the independence of the community. The core elements of Christian life remained foreign in a country with a rich culture, philosophy, and body of religious thought. However, the Malabar Christians early on developed a lifestyle of their own. In the social and cultural realms, they followed the customs and practices of their Hindu brothers and sisters (see Hinduism and Christianity Cluster). Socially, they became the peers of those in the higher classes. The social and ecclesiastical life of Malabar Christians before the arrival of the Portuguese reflects a unique Christian vision of this community. The oneness with their social and cultural milieu implied an inculturated* approach, an awareness that Christ in becoming human assumed everything human and redeemed all social and cultural values. However, the Portuguese* colonization* was the beginning of a sad history of forced Latinization and Westernization that caused unrest and schisms among Malabar Christians. Thus in the early 21st c., the 8 million Malabar Christians in India are divided among five Oriental churches, including the Syro-Malabar Catholic Church, and their adherents are spread throughout the world. See also ORTHODOX CHURCHES, ORIENTAL, CLUSTER: MALANKARA ORTHODOX SYRIAN CHURCH. JOSEPH PATHRAPANKAL

Malachi, Book of, concludes the collection of the Twelve Prophets, reflects the weaknesses of a disheartened postexilic community (1; 2, 3:6–12), and announces God’s certain coming to fulfill all the people’s hopes (3:1–5, 3:16–4:6). Although Malachi (Hebrew for “my YHWH’s messenger”) may be a personal name, modern scholarship suggests it is a title, an editor’s attempt to identify the author with the promised messenger of 3:1.

The book is dated to the Persian period (470–50 BCE), primarily because the author confronts the same sorts of abuses (lax priesthood, prevalent intermarriage, lack of social justice) that Nehemiah and Ezra* set out to reform.

Composed of six sections in question-and-answer dialogic style (1:2–5, 1:6–2:9, 2:10–16, 2:17–3:5, 3:6–12, 3:13–4:3), Malachi stresses covenant* obedience: the levitical covenant that the priests have corrupted and that YHWH is determined to uphold (2:4); the marriage covenant (2:10, 14) desecrated by individuals desirous of upgrading their status; and the Sinai covenant, the Law of Moses (4:4), which still functions as the unchanging authority for the community.

Malachi addresses issues of religious indifference (3:6–12), social justice* (3:5), and doubts caused by the prosperity of the wicked (2:17–3:16). He anticipates a judgment* when the wicked will be destroyed and the righteous rewarded, when a renewal that begins with the nations (1:11) will culminate in the transformation of God’s own people (3:13–4:3).

Malachi’s identification of Elijah* as foreshadowing “the great and terrible Day of the Lord” (4:5) has influenced both Jewish and Christian eschatology*. In the NT, John* the Baptist is identified as Elijah (Matt 11:14, 17:10–13), and in Judaism at the Passover meal, a place is set for Elijah, the long-awaited guest.

Malawi (Nyasaland when a British protectorate, 1891–1964) had five overlapping phases of Christian development.

1. The arrival of the historical churches. Christianity was brought to Malawi (1861–85) by the Universities’ Mission to Central Africa, which established the Anglican Church. The Livingstonia Mission (1875, the Free Church of Scotland), Blantyre Mission (1876, the Church of Scotland), and Dutch Reformed Church Mission (1889) joined together to form the Church of Central Africa Presbyterian (1924–26). The Roman Catholic Church arrived with the Montfort Fathers (1889–1901) and the White Fathers (1902).
2. Independent African leadership was fostered by the English missionary Joseph Booth in churches as diverse as the Zambezi Evangelical Church (1892), African Evangelical Church (1893), Churches of Christ (1906), Seventh Day Baptists (1898–1910), and Seventh-day Adventists (1902). Subsequently, the Malawians also founded churches, e.g. Providence Industrial Mission (John Chilebwe, 1900) and the Watch Tower Church (Elliot Kamwana, 1908). Thereafter, African* Instituted Churches of various types proliferated.
3. The handing over of leadership to Africans. This occurred in most mission churches

(c1964, when political independence was achieved). New missions also arrived, including the Southern Baptist Mission (1960), Wisconsin Evangelical Lutheran (1962), Christian Brethren (1964), Free Methodist Church (1973), Church of God of Prophecy (1977), and Pentecostal Assembly of Canada (1978), founding churches of their traditions.

4. The interdenominational revival movement (from the 1970s). Through parachurch* organizations, e.g. New Life for All and the Scripture Union, young people brought the gospel to the streets, schools, and churches; these youth became educated Christian leaders in church and society.
5. The Charismatic revival*. Although the Charismatic Movement started with fellowships and ministries mostly for the educated class, it soon came to include self-funded, mostly urban Charismatic churches, such as Agape (Pastor Mgala, 1982), Faith of God (Pastor Matoga, 1984), Living Waters (Pastor Ndovi, 1985), All for Jesus (Pastor Zalimba, 1993), Frames of Victory (Pastor Katchire, 1993), Calvary Family Church (Pastor Mbewe, 1994), and Vineyard (Pastor Gama, 1994).

Women's ordination is controversial. The Assemblies of God and the Church of Central Africa Presbyterian are the only mission churches that ordain women. However, the interdenominational and Charismatic revivals opened a door to churches founded by women, including the Chilobwe Healing Centre (Mayi Nyajere, 1986), Revival Ministries (Mayi Gonhi, 1986), Blessed Hope Church and Ministries (Bishop Yami Mchika, 1992), Namatapa Miracle Centre (Mayi Chiponden, 1992), and Chisomo Worship Centre (Mayi Chapomba, 1998).

ISABEL APAWO PHIRI

Malaysia is a tropical nation, multicultural, multiracial (Bumiputera [mostly Malays], 60.3%; Chinese, 26%; Indians, 7.7%) and multireligious (Islam, Buddhism, Christianity, Hinduism). Malaysia's official religion is Sunni Islam, popularized by Indian and Arab merchants (15th c.). The Malay-predominant government is joined by Chinese, Indians, and major indigenous peoples in East Malaysia (e.g. Sabah and Sarawak). Its constitution specifies that Malays must be Muslims. Evangelism among Muslims is banned by state law. Apostasy from Islam is rarely allowed or publicized. Despite recent and increasing Muslim antagonism toward other religions, non-Muslims are entitled to practice their religious beliefs and rituals. Chinese and Indians can also run their own school systems, using their languages, although students must learn Malay, the official language, especially if they want to attend local universities.

Roman Catholicism was introduced in Malaysia when the Portuguese conquered Melaka (1511, for the spice trade; see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions). Evangelism by missionaries (e.g. Francis* Xavier) bore little fruit, partly because of tensions between the Vatican and Portugal* over the control of Catholic missions. With the Dutch becoming the new colonists (1641), Protestantism arrived and Catholicism was repressed until 1703. The first Malay (1733) and Chinese (1823) Bibles were published. The British, when they occupied Penang (1786), brought with them Anglicanism and Methodism; Christianity started to progress, and freedom for all religions was implemented. In 1813 William Milne, the first Protestant missionary (London Missionary Society), settled in Melaka. With the help of Munshi Abdullah, a local English-speaking Muslim, missionary work and publication developed. Meanwhile, the Anglican Church advanced under Robert Hutchings but remained a white, English-speaking ministry until the early 20th c. By 1874 the British ruled most of Malaysia. Throughout their colonial rule, they remained neutral toward Islam as they courted collaboration from Muslim elites. When West Malaysia became independent (1957), the privileged status of Malays and Islam was guaranteed by the constitution. British colonial policy, however, has led to racial and economic tensions. To secure social stability, laws such as the 1960 Internal Security Act and the 1969 Emergency Act can be invoked to detain suspects without formal charges.

Beginning in the late 19th c., American Methodists and Overseas Missionary Fellowship contributed to the evangelism of many Chinese and Indian communities. Both William F. Oldham (1854–1935) and Sophia Blackmore (1857–1945) greatly promoted education* for men and women. By the 20th c., the Chinese were the largest Christian group; the work of Chinese missionaries (e.g. Sung* Shang-Jie, 1901–44) was not insignificant. Reformed theology propounded by Stephen Tong (b1940), a Chinese Indonesian theologian, has also received a wide audience since the 1990s. In 1984 the Christian Federation of Malaysia began providing a unified front for Catholics and Protestants. Some noted Christian leaders and scholars actively participate in politics. Social service ministries focus on orphanages and rehabilitation for gambling, drug, and alcohol abuse. Many of the 10 major Pentecostal/Charismatic, Catholic, and Protestant seminaries are underfunded.

Statistics: Population (2007): 27.17 million. Christians, 9.1% (Roman Catholics, 3.3%; Protestants, 3%; Anglicans, 0.9%; independents, 0.8%); Muslims, 60.4%; Buddhists, 19.2%; Hindus, 6.3%; Confucians, Daoists, and Chinese folk religionists, 2.6%. Malcolm X, born Malcolm Little (1925), often viewed as the father of black power, emerged soon after his release from prison (1952) as the most important minister in Elijah Muhammad's Nation of Islam (Black Muslim Movement). From 1957 until his assassination (1965), he tried unsuccessfully to develop a dialogue between the Nation of Islam and Martin Luther King's* Southern* Christian Leadership Conference. Differences over the love ethic, retaliatory violence, integration, and the relevance of the Christian faith to the African American freedom struggle prevented the two leaders from cooperating, although they seemed to be moving along converging paths at the time of their deaths.

LEWIS V. BALDWIN

Malines Conversations (1921–25), a series of meetings, following the 1920 Lambeth* Conference, between Anglican and Roman Catholic theologians, held in Malines, Belgium, under the sponsorship of Cardinal Mercier. The participants reached agreement about episcopacy, the pope's primacy, and the Eucharist, making significant inroads into unity or re-union within the church. The conversations were viewed with suspicion by Protestant-leaning factions in the Church of England and by conservative Roman Catholics. The conversations ended with Cardinal Mercier's death, and Pope Pius XI's encyclical* Mortalium Animos (1928) warned Catholics to stay out of ecumenical dialogues.

Malula, John (1917–89), born in Kinshasa (1917), ordained a priest (1946), consecrated a bishop (1959), made a cardinal (1969). Received the degree of Doctor honoris causa from both the Catholic University of Leuven (1978) and Boston College (1980). Upon his episcopal consecration, in the Congo* under Belgian rule, he expressed his pastoral stance in terms of “a Congolese Church in a Congolese state” and of social and political justice. As a result, he was expelled from Kinshasa and, for a time, sought refuge in Rome (1972).

Malula's pastoral legacy includes the composition of liturgical songs; the founding of the Sisters of Saint Theresa of the Child Jesus; the elaboration of the “Zairian/Congolese Rite” of Mass; the erection of four seminaries, an institution for lay leaders of the Small Christian Communities, and centers for disabled people, as well as for the pastoral and intellectual training of Catholic women; and the convocation of the Diocesan Synod (1986–88). His Oeuvres complètes (edited by De Saint Moulin) show that Malula sought to found a Congolese Church and be a prophet of justice*, often repeating that he preferred to be crucified than to crucify the truth.

JEAN-CLAUDE LOBA-MKOLE

Mammon (Heb “wealth,” “property,” “money”), a term used in Matt 6:24 and Luke 16:13 to designate wealth as an idol* that people serve instead of serving God: “No one can serve two masters.... You cannot serve God and Mammon” (see also Luke 16:9).

Manassas (or Manasseh), Prayer of, a deuterocanonical book (although the Council of Trent* put it in an appendix of the Roman Catholic Bible; see Apocrypha Cluster; Bible, Canon of), is a prayer attributed to Manasseh (687–42 BCE; 2 Chr 33). An individual lament of personal sin*, it emphasizes God's infinite mercy and grace*. Throughout history, because of anti*-Jewish prejudice (“hypocrite Jews” could not pray such an introspective penitential prayer), it was viewed as a Christian prayer. But scholars agree that it was composed by a Jew, perhaps near Jerusalem sometime before the destruction of the Temple (70 CE).

Mani, Manichaeism. Mani (216–76) was born near Ctesiphon, Mesopotamia. His father, Pattek, a native of Ecbatana, joined a Mughtasilite community of Elkesaites*, which Mani left at the age of 24 after receiving a second revelation from his divine "twin" about his role as the successor of Buddha, Zoroaster, and Jesus. After traveling extensively in the newly founded Sasanian Empire and in India, he wrote in Aramaic the seven books that formed the canon of his church. He enjoyed the patronage of the Sasanid Shâh, Shapur I (220–73). Under Vahram I, who favored Zoroastrianism, Mani was imprisoned and died.

Manichaeism spread rapidly (3rd and 4th c.) but became one of the most persecuted heresies* under Christian Roman emperors. It reached China (7th c.) and became the state religion of the Uighurs in Central Asia (8th c.). Its prophetology, universal evangelism, and key doctrine of the suffering of the divine in matter motivated extensive accommodation to the various mission fields of the church. This was supported by a firm ecclesiastical organization and an interdependent relationship between clergy and laity, elect and hearers.

The key Manichaean doctrine of radical dualism* of spirit and matter, light and darkness, is based on an elaborate cosmogony that explains the past, present, and future situations of the world. Among the deities, emanations of the Father of Greatness, who fight the forces of Darkness besieging human minds, are Jesus the Light (one of several Jesus figures) and the Light-Nous. Equipped with divine properties, the Manichaean elect worked for the liberation of the divine light in two significant ways: they preached and disseminated the words of truth in order to instill enlightenment in the human mind, and they daily consumed light-containing vegetarian food by which light was released through digestion. This required regular purification through fasting, prayer, hymn singing, and confession.

GUNNER BJERG MIKKELSEN

Manning, Henry Edward (1808–92), Anglican priest, closely associated with the Oxford* Movement. Manning was received into the Roman Catholic Church (1851) and appointed archbishop of Westminster (1865); he rigorously supported poor relief and promoted Catholic education. His commitment to social justice* led to close working relations with other Christians; he had a significant role in negotiating the end of the 1889 London dockers' strike. He was influential at the Vatican, supporting the centrality of the pope* and Ultramontane* causes generally and pressed for the 1870 Vatican I declaration of papal infallibility. PETER C. ERB

Marburg Colloquy, meeting held in October 1529 between Martin Luther* and Ulrich Zwingli* and their supporters to resolve differences concerning the Lord's* Supper, which would in turn make possible a defensive political alliance among Protestant cities and territories against the Catholic emperor Charles* V. The participants adopted a statement of faith in which they agreed on 14 articles but acknowledged in the 15th article their differences on the sacrament. Nevertheless, the colloquy effectively ended polemical exchanges between Lutherans and Zwinglians and ultimately led to the Wittenberg Concord (1536), establishing a consensus on the Lord's Supper between Luther and the cities of South Germany. AMY NELSON BURNETT

Marcel, Gabriel (1889–1973), existential philosopher, playwright, composer, literary critic, book editor; friend of Bergson*, Maritain*, and Ricoeur* and a critic of Jean-Paul Sartre's atheistic existentialism*. A convert to Roman Catholicism (1929), he criticized the modern obsession with technology* that ignored the God-given dignity of each person*, the value of intimate interpersonal relations, and the deep human need for being (God). Using phenomenological* analysis of lived experience, he was among the first to explain the distinction between I-thou* and I-him/her relations, between being and having; the phenomenon of lived body; the situated dependent character of the self; the characteristics of fidelity, hope*, love*, and humility*; and the experiences involving obscure participation in an Absolute Thou, ensuring eternal* fulfillment. THOMAS C. ANDERSON

Marcella, an aristocratic widow and close friend of Jerome*, was the head of a religious community of Christian virgins* and widows* in her home in Rome. According to Jerome (Epistle 127), after her husband's death, she shunned remarriage and became the first nun in Rome, dedicating her life to asceticism* and the rigorous study of Scripture under Jerome's tutelage. After Jerome's exile to Bethlehem (385), in his name she mediated theological disputes in Rome and played a critical role in bringing about the condemnation of Origenism*. Marcella died from injuries sustained during the Gothic invasion of the city (410). ARIEL BYBEE LAUGHTON

Marcion (d c160), originator of Marcionism, a Christian movement that emphasizes Paul's contrast between law* and gospel as antithetical ways of salvation*. Born in Sinope (Black Sea), after some time in Asia Minor he went to Rome (c135), probably learning from Cerdo* the doctrine of the two Gods. Expelled from the church in Rome (144), he founded his own church, keeping the threefold office (bishop, presbyter, and deacon) and the two sacraments (baptism and Eucharist, substituting water for wine). Marcionism was eventually absorbed by the Manichaean* Movement of the 3rd–4th c.

Taking the OT literally, Marcion rejected the "OT God," the Creator, a God of rigid justice, as inferior to Jesus' merciful God, having nothing to do with creation but acting through sheer pity to rescue humanity held captive to the Creator. Jesus suffers the Creator's wrath* on the cross and thereby ransoms those who believe in him. In his major work, Antitheses, Marcion, like some Gnostics*, devalued the heroes of the OT who obeyed the OT God and sympathized with those who had been passed by or hardened in their sins by the vengeful Creator. Marcion called Jesus "Chrestos" (worthy, holy) rather than "Christos"; Jesus is not the Jewish Messiah*.

Marcion accepted only the letters of Paul, the true apostle, plus an edited version of the Gospel of Luke, which he considered "Paul's gospel" (Rom 2:16). The most avid Paulinist in the 2nd c., he brought many of Paul's themes to the fore. Marcion may have gathered together the corpus of Paul's letters (without the Pastorals*); in any case, he made use of it. This helps explain the caution about Paul in the mid-2nd c.: there are warnings against misinterpreting him (2 Pet 3:15–16); Paul is "corrected" by pseudonymous writings (2 Thess, the Pastorals, 3 Cor); Justin* ignores him; and Marcion's Antitheses are attacked along with the Gnostics' "genealogies" (1 Tim 5:20). Nonetheless, Paul was accepted by the church as one of the apostles (see New Testament and Its Canonization; Paul the Apostle).

Irenaeus*, Tertullian*, and Origen* answered Marcion by affirming the connection between the OT and the NT and arguing that the same God can be both just and merciful. The label "Marcionite" continues to be used today for various forms of Christianity that diminish its relation to Israel and the OT (e.g. Schleiermacher* and Harnack*) or deny that God can be known through the created world (e.g. Barth*).

EUGENE TESELLE

Margaret of Scotland (1045–93; canonized 1250), wife, queen, mother. A Saxon princess, she was exiled to Hungary as a child, while Canute*, the Danish invader, took over England. After the Norman Conquest (1066), she was married to Malcolm III, king of Scotland. She brought sophistication to the Scottish court, reformed the church by introducing Roman practices, such as the use of Latin, keeping the Sabbath, and Communion at Easter. Her daughter Mathilda married Henry I of England, thereby reconciling Saxon, Danish, and Norman claims to the English crown. She was renowned for her charity and love of the poor.

LAVINIA BYRNE

Marginalized, term referring to people who are relegated to the margins of a society. In their own countries, they have the status of refugees, those designated in the OT by the term ger (stranger, alien). Thus what applies to refugees applies to marginalized people. See also REFUGEES AS A THEOLOGICAL CONCEPT AND AN ETHICAL ISSUE.

Marguerite of Navarre (and of Angoulême) (1492–1549), French Renaissance humanist, sympathizer with early church reformers ("evangelicals"). Sister of King Francis I of France, Marguerite was spiritually sensitive, with mystical* and Neoplatonist* tendencies. She was influenced (1520s) by Guillaume Briçonnet, bishop of Meaux, and his circle of "evangelicals," including Lefèvre* d'Étaples (who translated the NT into French), and by Luther* and Calvin*. Because of her political importance, her protection of evangelicals placed her in a difficult position when official French persecution began (1534); on occasion she withdrew prudently to her own court. A patron of writers such as Clément Marot, a Protestant, and François Rabelais, a Protestant sympathizer, she is best known for the Heptaméron, her collection of 72 tales. Yet Marguerite's correspondence, plays, and religious poetry are also important. Le Miroir de l'âme pécheresse (1531), censored by the Sorbonne but translated by the future Elizabeth I of England as The Glass of the Sinful Soul (1544), is a poem, printed with marginal scriptural references, emphasizing the redemption* of the sinful* soul in Christ, Pauline theology, and the traits of the soul of the true disciple as mother, bride, and sister of Christ. A collection of Marguerite's spiritual poetry (Marguerites de la Marguerite des Princesses, 1547, a title playing on her own name, "Marguerite," meaning “daisy”) ranged from spiritual songs to a dialogue on perfect love* (see Apophaticism). Her theatrical works include a four-part play, Comedy of the Nativity of Jesus Christ.

Marie d'Oignies (1167–1213), born in Nivelles (near Liege, Belgium) to wealthy parents. Married at 14, she convinced her husband to join her in a life of chastity and service to the poor*. They gave away their wealth and devoted themselves to the care of lepers. Marie retired to a hermitage of the Augustinian priory of St. Nicholas d'Oignies and attracted a number of disciples, including Jacques of Vitry, renowned for his preaching, who attributed both his decision to become a canon regular and his preaching ability to her intervention. Marie is commonly held to have been one of the first Beguines*; in 1215 Jacques of Vitry used her example to obtain papal sanction for the Beguine way of life.

Maritain, Jacques (1882–1973), French Catholic philosopher. Raised as a liberal Protestant, Maritain, with his Russian Jewish wife, Raissa Oumansoff (a poet and intellectual), converted to Catholicism (1906), becoming the leading philosopher of the 20th-c. Catholic intellectual renewal. At the Sorbonne (1901–6), he rejected positivism and initially embraced Bergson's* vitalist philosophy, then abandoned it to articulate a neo-Thomist* position that he brought to bear on epistemology, metaphysics*, politics*, and aesthetics*. Modern thought could be in harmony with Thomistic realism. Logical reason* could engage with spatiotemporal, quantitative, metaphysical reality, but intuitive reason, a nonconceptual way of knowing, characterizes art. Aesthetic* creativity extends divine creativity. Maritain criticized the legacies of Luther*, Descartes*, and Rousseau* as fragmenting reason* from faith*, mind from body, feeling from knowing. From the 1930s, Maritain was identified with Christian social philosophy, criticizing secular culture and defending the rich potential of the individual and the need for a just society. Much of Maritain's thinking was in evidence at Vatican* II, although late in his career, he warned against the extent of Vatican II reforms. The author of more than 50 books, Maritain taught modern philosophy at the Catholic Institute of Paris (1914–33), the University of Toronto (1933–45), and Princeton University (1948–52). He was the ambassador of France to the Vatican (1945–48). After his wife's death, Maritain lived in a Dominican* community in Toulouse, becoming a monk (1969).

Mark, Gospel of, the earliest and shortest of the canonical Gospels, in which suffering* and conflict are prominent. Its hope is mysterious and dark.

Like the other Gospels, Mark was originally anonymous and given its name by later tradition. The only clues we have about the historical context of the Gospel of Mark come from within the Gospel itself. From Mark's presentation of the Temple as doomed and his sense of a coming cosmic conflict, scholars usually set Mark's date as during or just after the Jewish–Roman war (66–70) that ended in Rome's sacking Jerusalem and destroying the Temple. Eusebius* cites Papias* to the effect that Mark was Peter's interpreter, but this could be a nice way of taming Mark's urgency and explaining its unwieldy narrative style. Others relate Mark with Paul* (cf. shared apocalyptic outlooks, and Acts 12, 15; Col 4). Despite some well-accepted guesses, the place of the Gospel's writing is unknown.

The tone of the Gospel's story is grim, tense, and urgent; violent conflict seems ready to erupt at any moment. In the light of Jesus' crucifixion and the Temple's destruction, this Gospel seems in search of some continuity between the present political and social oppressive chaos and the biblical tradition's sense that God cares for and will save the people.

Mark is most well known for what it lacks: it has no birth story, no stories of Jesus appearing after the Resurrection (manuscript evidence shows that it ends at 16:8), and no extended ethical teachings. These absences (it is not known whether Mark's author does not know them or deliberately shuns this part of the early Christian tradition), together with the Gospel's overall brevity and its choppy literary style, have led scholars to the conclusion that this is the earliest of the Gospels. Matthew and Luke, in particular, seem to add to Mark's basic plot framework and, most likely in those authors' own minds, to clarify Mark's murky message (see Synoptic Gospels).

Unconcerned with Jesus' birth or ancestry, the Gospel of Mark presents as central the question of Jesus' suffering, death, and resurrection.

Mark weaves the story of betrayal, humiliation, and pain that we know as the Passion*, maybe for the first time. The Gospel's brief account of the empty tomb* forms a frightening, yet hopeful epilogue to the concluded story of Jesus' death. Mark's exposition of Roman oppression and Jewish brokenness offers, as its best hope*, the mysterious sense that, despite it all, something survives. There is that which even the combination of human frailty (the disciples' betrayal and abandonment) and human depravity (Roman oppression and cooptation of the high priest) cannot kill.

NICOLE WILKINSON DURAN

Mark, Liturgy of St., eucharistic formulary in Greek, proper to the Patriarchate of Alexandria*. Its most ancient witnesses are the Strasbourg (4th–5th c.) and the John Rylands (6th c.) Papyri. The Liturgy of St. Mark remained in use by the Orthodox* churches until the 13th c., when the Byzantine liturgies of St. Basil* and of St. John* Chrysostom replaced it, strongly influencing the Alexandrian liturgy. In this non-Chalcedonian Patriarchate, the Liturgy of St. Mark was restored in the 20th c. by Patriarch Cyril VI (1959–71) and is now also known as the Anaphora of St. Cyril. As usual in the Coptic* Church, it is recited in a loud voice. As with the Liturgy of St. James*, there is a movement in the Eastern Orthodox churches to celebrate the Liturgy of St. Mark. The formulary is characterized by a double *epiclesis (which petitions the Holy Spirit to come upon the elements to make them the Body and Blood of Christ), before and after the eucharistic narrative, and by long intercessions interpolated between the pre-sanctus and the post-sanctus. It contains traces of ancient forms of concelebration*, in which several priests participated with gestures (extending of the hands), but without reciting the texts simultaneously.

STEFANO PARENTI

Mark Eugenikos (c1392–1445), scholar, teacher, monk with a reputation for learning and sanctity, who became metropolitan* of Ephesus (1436). A member of the Greek Orthodox delegation to the Council of Florence* (1438–39), he was an outspoken critic of Rome and its doctrines and practices; he refused to sign the decree of union. The emperor gave him safe passage home, and he spent the rest of his life attacking the union, intensifying opposition to it among the monks and the people. On his deathbed, he persuaded Gennadius* II to assume leadership of the opposition. He was declared a saint in 1734.

Marks of the Church, Notes of the Church (Lat notae ecclesiae), the characteristics of the "true church." Initially, the marks of the church were those designated by the adjectives applied to the church* in the Nicene* Creed: one, holy, catholic, and apostolic. These four marks were claimed by Catholic controversialists to confer authenticity on the Roman Catholic rather than the Protestant churches and by Tractarians* to emphasize Catholic aspects of the Church of England. At the time of the Reformation*, the Augsburg* Confession affirmed two marks: the church is where the gospel is purely preached and where the sacraments* are rightly administered. The Reformed* tradition added a third: discipline, the "binding* and loosing" authorized by Christ (Matt 18:18). In the Anglican* Communion, the Lambeth* Quadrilateral identifies the essentials of the true church and the basis for reunion. Since the 1960s, a more functional view of the church, "the church is mission*," sometimes emphasizes evangelism* and sometimes liberation*.

Maronite Church. The Maronite Church traces its origins to a hermit and a monastery. According to the historian Theodore* of Cyrrhus, the hermit Maron (4th-c. Syria) gained renown for his ascetic* life and for his gift of healing* both bodies and souls. After his death, his disciples established a monastery that became known as the "House of Maron." The monks and the laity to whom they ministered became identified as the followers of Maron, or Maronites.

Because of geography and culture, the Maronite community found itself involved in the christological* debates of the 4th–5th c. It championed the teachings of the Councils of Ephesus* and Chalcedon*, which distinguished it from the followers of Nestorius* in the Church of the East and the Miaphysites* (or Monophysites) of the Syriac* Orthodox Church. The trinitarian* and christological* controversies are reflected in the Maronite liturgy in the prominence given the Holy* Spirit and the emphasis given the divine prerogatives of Christ. Owing to persecutions and the arrival of Islam*, the Maronite community established itself in the mountain recesses of Lebanon*, where it formed itself as a church with its own hierarchy. By the beginning of the 8th c., it had its own patriarch and considered itself an authentic representative of the Church of Antioch*.

With the coming of the Crusades* (from the 12th c.), the Maronites solidified their ties with the Church of Rome and opened themselves to Western culture. From the 15th c., various religious orders of the West established themselves in Lebanon and opened schools throughout the country. This raised the literacy of the Lebanese of all religious backgrounds and further introduced Western culture.

Through the centuries, the Maronite Church has helped to form the nation of Lebanon. It has contributed to making Lebanon a refuge for those suffering religious and ethnic persecution, and thus has carried out a significant ecumenical role with the various Eastern churches in the area. It has sought to achieve coexistence and dialogue with its Muslim neighbors.

From the late 19th c., Maronites and other Lebanese began emigrating for economic reasons. At first they went to countries in the Middle East, but subsequently emigrated to all parts of the world. The largest Maronite communities are in North and South America and Australia. At present, the Maronite Church is the third-largest Eastern* Catholic Church (see also Uniate Churches). More Maronites live in the Western world than in Lebanon and the Middle East.

Having originated and developed in the region straddling Antioch and Edessa*, the Maronite Church was the heir of both of these rich liturgical traditions. The Maronite Anaphora of Third Peter and the Edessan Anaphora of Addai* and Mari are derived from a common source, which is the oldest eucharistic prayer in the Christian Church. Its Divine Liturgy, mystery of baptism, and Divine Office contain many hymns and prayers of Ephrem* the Syrian and his successors. This Edessan heritage preserves some elements of early Judeo-Christianity and witnesses to an expression of faith grounded in the Scriptures and Syriac poetry, with little Greek philosophical and cultural influence. The Maronite liturgy also incorporates the liturgical patrimony of the ancient Church of Antioch, especially in the more than 40 anaphoras* (eucharistic prayers) that it has preserved, particularly the ancient Anaphora of the Twelve Apostles, which was the basis for the Anaphora of St. John Chrysostom of the Byzantine Church (see Chrysostom, Liturgy of St. John).

The principal source of Maronite theology is the liturgy itself. Maronite theology is a witness to the Syriac theology of Ephrem, Aphrahat*, and Jacob* of Serug, or Sarug. It is grounded in the mysteriousness* of God, who out of love creates the world and is revealed in the very act of creating. The Incarnation* is both the ultimate revelatory event and the climax of God's creation. It is part of the divine plan that nature and Scripture prefigure and prepare the way for the coming of creation's fulfillment. The personages, events, and practices of the old covenant are types* foreshadowing the divine realities that will be finally disclosed in Christ. Christ's work as Savior and Redeemer is the expression of divine compassion and benevolence. The cross* represents the new "tree of life," restoring the Edenic tree of life lost through the sin* of Adam and Eve. Just as Eve was born from the side of Adam, so the church, the new Eve, is born from the side of Christ. Baptism and the Eucharist, which are foreshadowed by the blood and water that flowed from the side of Christ, are the elements that constitute the universal church and are the vehicles of divinization* of its members.

CHORBISHOP SEELY BEGGIANI

Marprelate Tracts, satirical diatribes attacking episcopacy* that were authored by the fictional Martin Marprelate and clandestinely published in 1588–89 by radical Puritans* intent on replacing bishops in the Church of England with a Presbyterian government that emphasized preaching. Several bishops responded to them. The Elizabethan regime perceived them as treasonous; in 1593 John Penry was executed for involvement in the circle from which they emanated. Most likely the parliamentarian Job Throckmorton was their chief author. By their outrageous ridicule, the tracts demystified the authority of lordly prelates, but ultimately discredited the Presbyterian cause by their extremism, as moderate Puritans had feared.

Marriage, Theology and Practice of, in Asia.

Marriage in Asia is generally considered a socially and religiously sanctioned union between a man and a woman, as well as their respective families or clans. Christian marriage practices and rituals often follow the Western tradition inherited from mission churches. Marriage as a permanent and monogamous contract ("till death do us part"; Gen 1:27, 2:7–25; Matt 19:4–6; Mark 10:6–9) is, for Asian Catholics, a sacrament* ordained by God for procreation and, for Asians of other church traditions, a public vow and sacred contract. Remarriage is allowed for widows and widowers and for divorcees in countries where divorce is legal (1 Cor 7:8–9); in predominantly Catholic societies like the Philippines*, divorce is not allowed, although legal separation is possible. As elsewhere, gay and lesbian, bisexual, and transgendered groups claim their right to a love-based union. Some people oppose institutionalized marriage, opting to live together and have a family without official marriage.

More and more Asians contextualize their marriage rituals, incorporating Asian cultural motifs and symbols. Many Christian couples hold two marriage ceremonies: a Western one and an ethnic/cultural traditional one. Many Asians enter marriage because of mutual love, but in certain communities marriages are arranged by parents or elders. As a result of interactions with the wider world, Asian marriage is becoming more interracial and interreligious.

Asian Feminist* theologians criticize the inequality between women and men implied by certain symbols in the rituals and the oppressive dowry tradition required of the bride's families (a tradition that was incorporated into Christian marriages in India, despite its link to female feticide and infanticide). Asian Feminist theologians also challenge the justification of hierarchical relations between husband and wife through the uncritical use of Scriptures*. For instance, Feminist theologians reread the household* codes (e.g. Eph 5:22–33) to emphasize the mutual loving submission of husband and wife to each other for the full flowering of each family member. HOPE S. ANTONE Marriage, Theology and Practice of, in Eastern Orthodoxy.

Orthodox believe that marriage is instituted by God with the hope that it will reflect Christ's union of love with his church (Eph 5:20–33, the epistle reading for the marriage service). Thus marriage is a call to witness to Christ (see Martyrdom in Eastern Orthodoxy).

Marriage is one of the great sacraments*, or mysteries*, of the Orthodox Church. It is God who unites a man and woman in a wedding service; as the priest prays, "O holy God, who didst create man out of the dust, and didst fashion his wife and join her unto him as a helper, . . . Do Thou, the same Lord, . . . unite this Thy servant N., and this Thy handmaid N.; for by Thee is the husband united unto the wife." No vows are said, as the marriage is understood to be accomplished by God, in cooperation with the good intentions and efforts of the couple, rather than by their expressed promises to each other.

A major purpose of marriage is to provide a means for spouses to help each other as they walk together on the path of salvation* toward eternal* life. The procreation and nurturance of children is also important and expected. Marriage provides the only God-sanctioned realm for the full expression of human sexuality. Marital relations are understood to be inherently good and have no taint of sin* when engaged in with dignity and mutual respect (in contrast, see Original Sin), Marriage is also considered to be essential for the stability and well-being of society.

Marriage can be only between one man and one woman, and ideally it is to last forever. Yet in pastoral recognition of human weakness and sinfulness, divorce* and remarriage have always been allowed.

The Orthodox Church's lofty view of marriage is reflected in the practice of allowing clergy to be married. It is also reflected in John Chrysostom's* exhortation to every married couple to make their home “a little church.”

DAVID FORD and MARY FORD

Marriage, Theology and Practice of, in Western Churches. Since the time of Jesus, Christian marriage has been distinguished by its strong emphasis on mutual consent, permanence, and sanctity. In medieval Western Europe, the sacramental* status of marriage resulted in an assumption of legal jurisdiction by church courts, triggering many conflicts between canonical formulations based on these values and traditional notions of familial and communal control. In the 16th c., Protestants attempted to resolve such problems by redefining the validity of marriage as well as rejecting the married estate’s long-established spiritual inferiority to virginity. By the modern era, legal jurisdiction over marriage passed to secular authorities in all countries with large Christian populations. Nevertheless, the ancient values of free consent, sexual fidelity, and indissolubility are still proclaimed by all modern Christian denominations.

Since the early church, Christian marriage has shared many characteristics with its Jewish, Roman, and Germanic counterparts, most notably the goals of establishing an exclusive sexual relationship and of producing legitimate heirs. Only Roman law, however, put equal emphasis on the free consent of both parties, although Romans did not recognize the indissolubility of the union in the same way or consider the covenant a spiritual estate as Christians did. Following Jesus’ reported pronouncements (Matt 5: 31–32, 19:3–6, 18; Mark 10: 2–12; Luke 16:18), Christians rejected divorce* – with the possible exceptions of adultery (Matt 19:3–9) and the so-called Pauline privilege for spouses of hostile unbelievers (1 Cor 7:15) – and they permitted any two adults to marry, regardless of differences in social status. At the same time, Christians since the time of Paul have displayed a pronounced preference for celibacy* and virginity* over marriage, allowing the latter only for the legitimate outlet of sinful sexual urges (1 Cor 7) – a text later interpreted in terms of the doctrine of original* sin. Church fathers consistently rejected the Gnostics’ equating of marriage with fornication itself, but with the growth of asceticism* in the 3rd and 4th c., the negative characterization of marriage as a remedium became even more pronounced. Even Augustine* (354–430), who wrote extensively about the “triple goods” of marriage – offspring (proles), fidelity (fides), and permanency (sacramentum) – acknowledged that the estate belonged to the postlapsarian “city of man” rather than the “city of God” and remained decidedly inferior to virginity and chastity. Virtually all Christian writers until the High Middle Ages placed the greatest emphasis on the procreative function of marriage (cf. Gen 1:28).

During the Middle Ages, both the Eastern and Western churches continued to teach the consensual, “sacramental,” and indissoluble nature of marriage, with various degrees of social impact. Both churches expected to approve marriage, but in the Byzantine Church this entailed a formal rite, while in the West the requirement was interpreted as a priest’s subsequent blessing and was rarely enforced. The turning point in Western Europe came during the 12th c., with the writings of canonists Gratian* (d1159?) and Peter* Lombard (c1100–60). Although both agreed on the importance of uncoerced vows of consent between the couple, they differed on the point at which a marriage became valid. As a compromise, the lawyer-pope Alexander III (1159–81) decreed that “words of present consent” (“I take you”) were sufficient to establish a valid marriage but that “words of future consent” or engagement (“I will take you”) required consummation for validity. Later Canon 51 of Lateran* IV (1215) reaffirmed the sacramental nature of matrimony (based especially on the Vulgate’s translation of Eph 5:32) and added a stricter requirement of publicity in the form of three successive weekly banns, and the presence of at least two people and a priest at the wedding as witnesses (the ministers were the couple themselves). About the same time, new diocesan courts, known as officialities, assumed jurisdiction over questions of marriage vows, deciding questions of validity based on canon* law.

Martin Luther* and other Protestant Reformers of the early 16th c. objected to the Roman Catholic Church's marriage theology and law on several grounds. Most fundamentally, following the scholarship of Valla (1407–57) and Erasmus* (1469–1536), they rejected the scriptural basis for declaring marriage a sacrament*, arguing that a better translation of the term in Eph. 5:32 would be “mystery.” Accordingly, the Roman Catholic Church's claims to jurisdiction were considered contrived means of raising money (e.g. manufacturing legal impediments to marriage and charging for dispensations). All of these “abominations,” Luther argued in his Babylonian Captivity of the Church, defiled rather than elevated marriage, as did the “false and impossible” teaching of the celibate ideal. Instead, Luther, Calvin*, and others proposed that marriage was the highest earthly estate, both a symbol and an embodiment of God's covenant* with his people. While holding true to the traditional consensual and indissoluble ideal of marriage, Protestants redefined each attribute in significant ways, also requiring parental approval for the validity of all unions and allowing divorce and remarriage in some instances. During the last session of the Council of Trent*, Catholic leaders responded by making parental consent and church solemnization essential for validity but resisted any major changes in the Church's teachings on impediments and divorce. Virginity and celibacy were likewise reaffirmed as spiritually superior to marriage.

Beginning in the 18th c., marriage jurisdiction became an increasingly secular affair in predominantly Christian countries, and by the beginning of the 20th c., only Eastern Orthodox churches resisted the trend of dual civil and religious ceremonies, though not for long. Today, although commitment to the oldest theological elements of fidelity, sacredness, and permanence remains strong, all Christian denominations have experienced internal tensions and in some cases schisms over changes in their teachings on the importance of procreation (and thus contraception* and sexual* pleasure), divorce*, and annulment*, as well as gay* and lesbian unions. Even the Roman Catholic Church, which is among the most doctrinally conservative body on such issues, at Vatican* II modified the traditional preeminence accorded to procreation in doctrines concerning marriage and the vocation of women. Meanwhile, the World* Council of Churches and other ecumenical assemblies continue to struggle for consensus on the contemporary significance of the theological tradition in urgent discussions regarding human sexuality, biotechnology, and violence* against women. See also FAMILY, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF, CLUSTER.

Marriage, Theology and Practice of, in Western Churches: Ceremony.

Marriage is a rite of passage from the single state to the conjoined state of marriage as a social institution. Christian tradition admits both secular ceremonies (marriage as a consensual contract) and religious ceremonies (marriage as a covenant rooted in faith).

In antiquity the marriage ceremony was primarily a family event in which the bride's father gave his daughter in marriage, the groom carried the bride over the threshold of his house, and cake was eaten or a wedding feast was celebrated. Before c1000 in Western Europe, no Christian wedding ceremony existed; marriage was not an ecclesial matter. However, starting in the 4th c., a clerical blessing might take place (often at the wedding feast); thereafter, clergy progressively had a more active role in marriage ceremonies, until all marriages were effectively under the jurisdiction of the church. By 1100 there was an established Christian wedding ceremony consisting of consent, handing over of the bride and the giving of a dowry, blessing of the bride's ring, and blessing of the marriage (all at the church entrance); the nuptial Mass* was then celebrated, with the bride being veiled and blessed and the priest giving the groom the ritual kiss of peace, who then gave it to the bride; sometimes the priest blessed the wedding chamber.

In Western Europe, two main issues surround the ceremony of marriage. The first is whether marriage is constituted by consent (Roman tradition) or by inter-course (Frankish and Germanic traditions, in which consent was exchanged at the betrothal); the Western Church decreed that consent alone was essential (12th c.). The second issue is whether marriage is a sacrament*. Augustine claimed that marriage is a visible sign of the invisible relation of the union of Christ and his church and is a sacred pledge of fidelity between husband and wife. For Luther and Calvin, since marriage existed from the beginning, it could not be a sacrament instituted by Christ; thus the church has no right to regulate marriage.

Since 1789 in France, civil weddings have become mandatory (as they subsequently have in all of Europe); a religious ceremony follows (mandatory for Catholics, optional for Protestants). When marriage is celebrated with only a religious ceremony (as in the USA), the minister must also have the credentials to file a civil wedding certificate.

Many cultural customs surround the celebration of marriage around the world, but the deliberate consent of the couple is essential. Contemporary societies tend to regard marriage merely as a contract, and thus take a much more liberal stance on divorce. JOYCE ANN ZIMMERMAN, CPPS

Marriage, Theology and Practice of, in Western Churches: John Calvin's Geneva. Before the Reformation, Geneva was an episcopal city run by a prince-bishop, assisted by nearly 1,000 clergymen, all committed by vows to a celibate life. It also permitted prostitution, under government supervision. With the Reformation, both of these lifestyles were abolished, and all sexual impulse had to be channeled into marriage.

Before the Reformation, marriage was a sacrament* and was under the control of a bishop's court. After the Reformation, marriage technically became a civil matter. It was placed under the control of a new semi-judicial body called the Consistory, which John Calvin* created through ecclesiastical ordinances (1541). This committee of the city government included 12 lay elders elected once a year, and all (about 12) of the ordained pastors of Geneva, including Calvin. Calvin, as a professional lawyer, had thus created the body that controlled marriage, created a set of marriage laws it applied (although these laws were not formally endorsed by the city government for several years), and sat upon it as a judge.

Marriage in Geneva was technically a contract created by a formal agreement between a man and a woman to live together for the rest of their lives, witnessed by at least two honorable people, normally approved by the couple's two sets of parents. It was registered with the city government, announced from the pulpit of the parish in which the couple lived on three successive weeks, and then celebrated at a wedding a short time later. It was often accompanied by a notarized contract outlining the property each family involved brought to the new household, but this was not theologically necessary. The wedding at which the marriage was celebrated had to be held in a parish church and presided over by one of the city's ministers, as part of any regular church service, except for the four Sundays during the year in which Geneva celebrated Communion. Marriage could be dissolved with a divorce*, granted by the city government on recommendation of the Consistory, on grounds of either adultery* or desertion. This provision for divorce was new in Christian Europe, but remained rare. Toward the end of his life, Calvin argued that the marriage contract was a form of covenant*, since it also involved an agreement with God. This led to a doctrine of covenantal marriage, as distinct from both sacramental marriage and secular marriage.

ROBERT M. KINGDON

Marriage, Theology and Practice of, in Western Churches: The Roman Catholic Church and Annulment of Marriage. Annulment is a "declaration of matrimonial nullity" in Roman Catholic canon* law, i.e. an official determination that what appeared to be a valid marriage was not one. Given the presumption of validity that canon law accords to marriage (1983 Codex Iuris Canonici* [CIC] 1060), the nullity of an impugned marriage must be carefully proved (1983 CIC 1608). Annulments are not granted upon request or as favors to “deserving” persons. Civil annulments are not recognized by the Roman Catholic Church.

A declaration of nullity is usually sought in order to facilitate one’s desire to enter a subsequent marriage in the Roman Catholic Church. If granted, it declares both former spouses free to enter marriage in the Church without risk of bigamy. All annulment cases are reducible to questions of matrimonial capacity, consent, and form (1983 CIC 1057). On these matters, the jurisprudence of the Roman Rota (which functions as a court of appeal) is considered illuminative but not binding on local tribunals (1983 CIC 16).

Annulment petitions are usually filed by one of the parties to the impugned marriage before an arch-/diocesan tribunal (1983 CIC 1673). Major tribunal officers must have requisite academic degrees and are appointed by the bishop (1983 CIC 1419, 1432). The Defender of the Bond (an independent office, since Pope Benedict XIV, 1740–58) is specifically charged with proposing the reasonable arguments that can be offered against finding nullity. Declarations of nullity require ratification by an appellate tribunal (1983 CIC 1682). At times the tribunal declaring nullity might impose a monitum (suggestion) or a vetitum (prohibition) on either or both parties, rendering a future attempt to marry by same illicit or invalid, respectively, until the matter occasioning the restriction (say, active alcoholism) is addressed to the tribunal’s satisfaction.

The recent dramatic increase in the number of annulments worldwide, especially in the USA, has occasioned sharp criticism from those who fear that the Roman Catholic Church’s commitment to lifelong marriage is being undermined by the annulment process. Others observe that, besides changes in the 1983 Code that facilitated such an increase, annulment figures might reliably indicate a deterioration in the ability or willingness of many to enter marriage as proclaimed by the Church.

EDWARD N. PETERS

Marsilius (or Marsiglio) of Padua (c1275–1342), theologian, political theorist. After studying in Padua, he went to Paris, served as rector of the university (1313), and spent time in Avignon and Italy as well as Paris. He became a partisan of the German emperor Ludwig IV (“the Bavarian”) after his excommunication by John XXII. His major work, The Defender of the Peace (published 1324), depicted the medieval popes, especially Boniface* VIII, as sources of “scandal and strife” because of their claims to supreme authority in both church and state, based on a misinterpretation of the Donation* of Constantine. Peace could be restored if the church limited its authority to spiritual matters, and if bishops (all of whom were equal except by mutual agreement) were chosen by the faithful (as in the early church), not by the pope (who was himself elected), in accordance with regulations established by general councils*. Marsilius pointed out that the ecumenical* councils of the undivided church had all been called and enforced by emperors, the only ones who had “coercive” authority. After his authorship of The Defender of the Peace was discovered, Marsilius fled to the court of Louis, or Ludwig, the Bavarian (later Holy Roman emperor). Propositions from the work were condemned (1327), and the author was excommunicated. Marsilius accompanied the emperor to Rome (1327–29) for his coronation and was made imperial vicar. After Louis’s efforts to gain the pope’s support failed, Marsilius spent the rest of his life at the court in Munich, along with William* of Ockham. His theory of church* and state was utilized by the Conciliar* Movement, by Henry* VIII to assert his claim of supremacy over the church, and by the Long Parliament to call the Westminster* Assembly. His view that political sovereignty comes from the people anticipated modern democracy; his position that it is undivided anticipated both absolutism and totalitarianism.

Marthana, deaconess* renowned for her virtue and as a monastic* superior of women at the sanctuary of Saint Thecla* in Seleucia (modern Silifke on the south-central Turkish coast), where Thecla is thought to have died. The only named local character in Egeria’s* account of her travels in biblical lands, probably in the late 4th c., Marthana was encountered by Egeria on a pilgrimage in Jerusalem, then at the Shrine of Thecla, where Marthana governed a group of apotactitae, or ascetic* virgins*, in monastic cells, i.e. probably in a laura, or lavra, a monastery with solitary cells for the nuns around a church building for communal prayer and discipline. Such a walled-in compound made eremitical life possible for women in an environment that was not as dangerous as the wilderness. The Shrine of Thecla was a large monastic and pilgrimage compound centered on a cave and church with a pilgrim hospice; thus Marthana's influence and authority must have been considerable.

Martha and Mary. In most comparisons of Martha and Mary (Luke 10:38–42), Martha is said to typify the active life, whereas Mary is an exemplar of the superior contemplative life, which is totally directed toward God. Meister Eckhart*, however, suggested that the higher mode of life is represented not by Mary's contemplation, but by Martha's care for many things, which was acceptable so long as she remembered the "one thing necessary" (Luke 10:42), namely God and constant unity with God, which can be accomplished even in the midst of activity. Similarly, feminist scholars have pointed out that the traditional denigration of Martha's "service" (10:40) reflects a marginalization of women's "service" (diakonia, the major characteristic of all ministries) in the church. See also DEACON, DIACONATE; DEACONESS.

Despite the fact that the law severely restricted public worship and prohibited other activities of the Roman Catholic Church, a modus vivendi – a legal fiction according to which the law would be neither modified nor applied – remained in force as Martínez supported the government of Cárdenas (e.g. during the expropriation of oil cartels, 1938). See also MEXICO.

Martinique. The history of Christianity in this "colony," an integral part of France (an overseas "department" and thus part of the European Union), is tied to its colonial history.

Christianity arrived with French Protestants (late 16th c.) who succeeded in settling in France's American colonies. But when Louis XIII (1601–43) intervened in Martinique by giving charters to trading companies, he established Roman Catholicism as the official religion. Carmelites*, Capuchins*, Jesuits*, and Dominicans* were sent to make Protestants and Jews renounce their respective faiths and to evangelize the native Caribs.

In 1635 Cardinal Richelieu established a trading company charged with providing slaves from Africa to work on the sugar plantations. In 1685 the "Black Code" was enacted to regulate slavery* as an institution, proclaiming Roman Catholicism as the only authorized religion, explicitly banning the slaves' African Religion (see Haiti). Nevertheless, numerous slaves escaped to the mountains and organized revolts. Since the clergy and religious owned slaves, they were not inclined to take a stand in favor of the rebelling slaves. The proclamation of general freedom decreed by the French Convention (1794) could not be applied in Martinique because at that time the island was briefly occupied by the British.

In the 1840s, clergy and religious, especially the Brethren for Christian Education of Ploërmel, were devoted to bringing religious instruction to the slaves. They were deeply concerned about the African beliefs ("delusions") that survived among slaves, as well as by the numerous religious devotions to which the slaves participated and which combined Christian and African beliefs. Although determined to bring religious instruction to the slaves, clergy and religious did not bring them freedom. An exception was Fr. Castelli, who propagated abolitionist republican ideas. He did not convince many members of the clergy of the merit of these ideas because of the planters' constant hostility and because, in becoming abolitionists and followers of Victor Schoelcher, the mulattos assumed a republican anticlerical stance. The abolition of slavery (1848) in all French colonies was achieved by the French abolitionist movement led by Schoelcher, who, often in Martinique, also advocated the republican anticlerical ideal of public education, which the clergy strongly resisted. Later the Law of Separation of Church and State (promulgated in 1905 in France) was denounced by the Roman Catholic Church as a threat to the identity of Martinique. Thus Bishop Cormont argued against the administrative authorities in the Catholic newspaper Les Antilles, so much so that the law could not be applied in Martinique before 1911.

Today, many religious movements, including those of Seventh-day Adventists*, Jehovah's* Witnesses, and Pentecostals*/Charismatics*, are attracting numerous Catholics, possibly indicating a shift in cultural identity.

Martin of Tours (c316–97), ascetic* and bishop, subject of an influential biography by Sulpicius Severus. Born in present-day Hungary, he devoted himself to Christ as a child but served in the Roman army (when, reportedly, he cut his cloak in half to share it with a beggar), until he left to lead a solitary ascetic life near Poitiers, France. His followers built cells nearby, forming the first known monastic* community north of the Alps. Elected bishop of Tours (371), he continued to lead an ascetic life while working to eradicate pagan worship, building churches, performing miracles, and providing a model of spiritual focus and rejection of worldly values. A cult spread after his death: Gregory of Tours mentions the occurrence of miracles at Martin's shrine.

Martyrdom (Gk martus, "witness"). Originally applied to the apostles as witnesses of the resurrection (Acts 1:8, 22, 10:21), the term was soon applied to those who made their witness through death (Acts 22:20; Rev 2:13, 17:6), which became the primary meaning of the word. The term "confessor," while it originally had the same meaning, came to be applied to those who confessed the faith without suffering death.

The "acts" of the martyrs' trials were sometimes based on eyewitness accounts, perhaps even transcripts of court records, although they came to be a literary genre with a standardized form. While martyrs were those who died confessing Christ, the Maccabean* martyrs, specifically the seven brothers (2 Macc 7), were also appropriated by Christians during the first few centuries of the common era as martyrs in their own tradition. The limits of what counted as dying for one's faith were tested in specific cases. Dionysius of Alexandria wrote to Novatian* that martyrdom to avoid schism was not less noble than that to avoid idolatry, for in the latter case one died for one's own soul, while in the former one did so for the entire church. The Council of Elvira* (early 4th c.) decreed that a person killed for destroying an idol was not a martyr. Thomas Becket* was killed by the king's knights because he had defended the freedom of the church, not because he defended the faith and not for his own salvation; the question was raised, therefore, whether he was a martyr. Dietrich Bonhoeffer* is often called a martyr, but the appropriateness of the designation has been questioned because he was executed as a traitor and conspirator. The designation "martyr" will always be contested. In recent centuries there have been many "new martyrs" – in mission areas, under governments strongly favoring another religion, and under oppressive or Communist governments. While all are remembered in their immediate communities, some have been more broadly acknowledged and honored as martyrs – e.g. canonized* by the Roman Catholic Church. See also SAINTS.

Martyrdom in Eastern Orthodoxy. In the Orthodox tradition, martyrdom (Gk martyria, "witness") is central to the Christian life. While some are called to be put to death in witness to Christ, all are called to witness to Christ through a life of self-sacrificial love. Thus monasticism*, marriage*, and the Christian life in general are paths of bloodless martyrdom.

Many Christians have been killed for their faith in Christ throughout the history of the church, beginning with Stephen's stoning (Acts 7:54–60); thousands died during the persecutions* of the first three centuries, and many unbelievers came to believe in Christ after beholding the courage of the martyrs as they endured the torture leading up to their death. The Account of the Martyrdom of St. Polycarp (c157) declares, "Blessed, then, and noble are all the martyrdoms. . . . For who would not admire their nobility and patience and love of their Master?" While only a few hundred Orthodox Christians were killed for their faith under the Islamic Ottoman Turks (beginning in the 15th c.; see Islam and Christianity Cluster: In Europe: Southeast Europe), millions of Orthodox died under the Soviets in Russia and Eastern Europe (in the 20th c.).

Another form of dramatic witness to Christ, prominent in Orthodox Christianity, is monasticism* – the surrender of one's life to Christ through a life of poverty* and celibacy*, in solitude or community (eremitic* and cenobitic* monasticism, respectively).

Marriage* is seen in the Orthodox tradition as a call to witness to Christ through living in self-sacrificial love for the other. Hence, marriage is also considered to be a form of martyrdom. Accordingly, two of the three hymns sung in the Orthodox marriage service speak of the Church's holy martyrs. Indeed, the Orthodox tradition underscores that every Christian is called to "crucify the flesh" (Gal 5:24) through ascetic* effort in order to witness to the new life in Christ (cf. Mark 8:34; Rom 6:3–13; Gal 2:20). Such a life transcends egotism and death and radiates divine love for all (see Spirituality Cluster: Denominational View: Eastern Orthodox).

Hence martyrdom, either literally the shedding of one's blood or figuratively an ongoing "bloodless" self-sacrifice, is central to the Orthodox understanding of the Christian life.

DAVID FORD and MARY FORD

Martyrium, a church built over the tomb or relics of a martyr; sometimes a memorial structure.

Marxism and Christianity. According to Marxist theory, Christianity is a form of ideology* that masks the injustices of class-structured societies by legitimating the power of the ruling classes and preventing oppressed peoples from changing the social order by offering them a reward in the afterlife. For much popular Christianity, and for some Christian theology, Marxism is an atheist* ideology, denying the spiritual dimension of human existence and antithetical to all things Christian.

Between these two extremes lie far more interesting and theologically fruitful interpretations, based on the awareness that Marx's interpretation of history* and his expectation of a society without domination and injustice were themselves dependent on certain Christian and Jewish understandings of history and the hope* for a messianic transformation establishing the Kingdom* of God. The mediating figure was Hegel*, who attempted to give a philosophical account of the truth of the Christian religion, an interpretation of history that he understood explicitly as a theodicy*, a justification of historical conflict and human suffering*. For Hegel the whole of human history was the dialectical unfolding of Spirit or Mind (Geist, Hegel's term for God*) through successive stages of human self-understanding. All these stages involved conflict and suffering, but would culminate in the achievement of full self-consciousness: as Infinite Spirit became fully embodied in Finite Spirit (Hegel's philosophical rendering of the doctrine of the Incarnation*), humans would become aware that they were and are makers of their own history. Hegel thought that this full realization of Geist in history was being realized in his time: ideationally in the critical-historical understanding of his own writings; historically and institutionally in the French Revolution, the development of the idea of individual rights (see Human Rights Cluster), including the right to property*, and the development of the modern nation-state based on constitutions chosen by the people.

Marx argued that Hegel's philosophy remained too ideational and overlooked the extent to which the modern nation-state expressed the power and property of one class, the bourgeoisie. The Communist Revolution, led by the proletarians who were without property rights, would usher in a classless society in which bourgeois rights were universalized and no single class could use the right to property to subjugate others. Although Marx intended the self-conscious transformation of existing human economic and political institutions ("The philosophers have only interpreted the world, in various ways; the point, however, is to change it" – his famous 11th "Thesis on Feuerbach"), his conviction that a society without domination and suffering was possible was fully dependent on Hegel's philosophy of history, especially the theodicy. All the suffering of history was justified because it had led to this new historical possibility, dialectically present but unrealized in capitalism; and the new society he envisioned bore a striking resemblance to the Reign (or Kingdom*) of God in which sin* and suffering* are overcome.

Marx is, according to this interpretation, a member of the Christian (and Jewish) family, perhaps a rebellious child but one from whom the parents can learn. Marx's interpretation of the crises of history in which new forms of human social cooperation emerge from the injustices of the old can be understood as a restatement of the biblical prophetic* tradition. His hope for the liberation* of the poor* and oppressed* in a classless society revives the messianic and eschatological hopes of Christian teaching, too often obscured by the institutional and cultural accommodation of the churches. His astute critical analysis of the power relations and injustices of industrial capitalism offer a social interpretation of the doctrine of sin*, with critical potential. These three points are taken up by three of the most important approaches to Marxism by 20th-c. theologians.

1. Neo-orthodox Protestant theologians responding to the crises of the two world wars, general economic collapse, and Fascism and Nazism* took seriously the Marxist critique of religion* as ideology, proposing a prophetic Christian faith that stood over against all forms of political and ecclesial idolatry*, and against social and economic* injustice. While differing in important ways, Barth* (1886–1968), Tillich* (1886–1965), and Reinhold Niebuhr* (1892–1971) put the prophetic tradition at the center of their theology, supporting various forms of social democracy and promoting social justice*.
2. Liberation* theologies (middle to late 20th c.), originating in Latin America with the work of Gustavo Gutiérrez, adopted a more explicit Marxist framework for interpreting the possibility of the emancipation of oppressed peoples from national and international structures of capitalist political and economic forms. Having studied with Rahner* (a German Catholic deeply influenced by Barth), Gutiérrez combined Barth's "crisis theology" with Marxist social analysis for a this-worldly interpretation of Christian eschatology* and the possibility of genuine social transformation.
3. Some recent theology has looked to "critical theory," associated with thinkers of the School of Social Research in Frankfurt, Germany, during the 1930s. These thinkers tried to account for the historical failures of Marxist theory by combining Marx with Weber*, Freud, and other social thinkers. The early generation (including Walter Benjamin, Theodor Adorno, Max Horkheimer, and Herbert Marcuse) tried to find a basis for social criticism without Marx's grand theory and theodicy, influencing theological contemporaries such as Tillich*. The most important thinker of the next generation, Jürgen Habermas, has articulated a critical theory for understanding how human interaction is distorted by the power relations of advanced capitalism. Habermas offers a theory of communicative ethics* which combines, in part, Marx, Kant*, and Christian moral commitments. Although his theory implies the increasing secularization* of society, Habermas's work has been used by both Protestant and Catholic theologians as a resource for social critique.

Mary, Gospel of. The Gospel of Mary, a 2nd-c. Christian text, is preserved in one fragmentary Coptic manuscript, Codex Berolinensis (of the original 19 pages of the Gospel, pages 1–6 and 11–14 are missing), and in two short Greek papyri. The work consists of two parts. The first contains a revelation dialogue between the risen Jesus and his disciples; the second comprises a conversation between Mary* Magdalene and the male disciples after the departure of Jesus. During that conversation, Mary Magdalene discloses a special instruction imparted to her by Jesus in the form of a vision, which troubles her male colleagues, especially Peter and his brother, Andrew. Both the content of the vision and the fact that it was given to a woman provoke anger and jealousy. The controversy ends with a comment by Levi, who sides with Mary Magdalene since "the Savior made her worthy . . . [and] loved her more than [the male disciples]" (18:10–15). Thus Levi implies that Mary was Jesus' favorite disciple and therefore also capable of receiving his special message.

The Gospel of Mary shows very few ties to Judaism. Its theological perspective originates in an early Christian interpretation of Jesus' teachings within a pluralistic context combining popular Platonic and Stoic motifs. The Gospel of Mary belongs to those writings that regard not Jesus' death and resurrection but his teaching as a means of gaining salvation*. Likewise, the work represents a form of early Christianity that presented a strong defense of women who wanted to take part in spiritual leadership and in interpreting Jesus' teachings. This form of Christianity should not be called Gnostic* because the Gospel of Mary does not contain the idea of a creator distinct from the highest God.

Mary, the Virgin. Mary of Nazareth, mother of Jesus in history and proclaimed mother of God in faith, is the most celebrated female religious personality in the Christian tradition. Her figure is extraordinarily complex, portrayed and interpreted in diverse ways throughout history. This diversity begins in the Gospels, which present Mary in relation to Jesus and her husband, Joseph, in a range of theological perspectives. The different Christian traditions amplify this diversity. Following the depiction of her in the Gospel of Mark, Protestants tends to treat statements concerning Mary as meditations that reflect biblical themes and clarify beliefs about Jesus Christ. Drawing on John's portrayal, Orthodox opt for an iconic* and symbolic approach to the mother of Jesus. Catholics are drawn to Luke's presentation of Mary as a woman of faith*, highly favored by God and responsive to God's invitation to bear the Redeemer through the power of the Holy Spirit. Catholicism generally regards theological statements about Mary as historically factual or as affirming Jesus' divine origins. Ecumenical dialogue among these traditions seeks common ground in the Scriptures and in creeds to harmonize their different understandings of Mary. Beyond Christianity, Islam* reveres Mary as the mother of Jesus the prophet and as one of God's chosen in the line of prophets herself.

These interpretations of Mary are expanded by her influence on cultural, social, and political spheres. Centuries of artwork, architecture, literature, music, prayers, and titles from all cultures extol her virtues and highlight the events of her life. The Byzantine Empire credited the Virgin Theotokos* with protecting it during invasions; many North American Catholics drew strength from Our Lady of Fátima* during the time of the cold war; migrant workers enlist aid from Our Lady of Guadalupe* in their struggle for just wages and living conditions; New York's Italian immigrants find solace in the Madonna* of 125th Street. Moreover, the message of God's mercy and reversal of the social order in Mary's biblical song, the Magnificat, proclaims the subversive promise of hope and liberation* for those who are poor* and oppressed* throughout the world.

Theologians offer a range of interpretations of the virgin-mother Mary as well. Some envision Mary as the "maternal face of God." This helps to compensate for overly patriarchal* images of God and affirms that women have the capacity to represent God. However, it hinders the direct use of maternal imagery for the mystery* of God*. Other theologians suggest that Mary represents the "ideal feminine." This casts Mary as a model for all other women and elevates certain virtues as characteristically feminine. However, this model trades on a patriarchal understanding of male and female nature that is dualistic*. It emphasizes Mary's private life of obedience, childbearing, nurturance, and self-sacrifice and suggests that these are ideal feminine virtues women ought to embody. Feminist* critics argue that this hinders women's personal and intellectual flourishing, encourages dependence and submissiveness, and restricts women's public participation and leadership in church and society. A viable alternative approach follows the lead of Vatican* II and places Mary within the people of God and the communion of saints*, that vast company of witnesses, living and deceased, who seek God and who join with one another in hope. It returns to the Gospels to discover the historical woman of faith and situates her within her Jewish traditions, her rural village life, her oppressive political situation, and her faith-filled partnership with God in the work of liberation*. Such a theology of Mary inspires fidelity to the living God, prophetic action toward justice*, and uncompromising discipleship*. Moreover, it reveals women's full and indispensable participation in God's redemptive activity.

Mary, the Virgin, Theotokos, mother of Jesus of Nazareth, proclaimed "Theotokos" (God-bearer) by early Greek-speaking Christian faithful. For the Christian East, the established traditions surrounding the historical mother of Jesus draw, in part, from the meager details of her life presented in the four canonical Gospels, but primarily from the rich apocryphal* texts that circulated widely and in many languages during late antiquity. These texts often emphasize her life before the birth of Jesus; an example is the early-2nd-c. Protoevangelion of James*, which details her conception, birth, youth, and the selection of Joseph as her protector. Alternatively, they describe her actions after the resurrection* of Christ, e.g. her supposed missionary journeys with John the Evangelist and her "dormition" (literally, "falling asleep"). Following these apocryphal traditions, the Byzantine Church assigned dates of commemoration for her birth (September 8) and her dormition (August 15) and included them in the 12 major feasts of the liturgical calendar.

The affirmation that Mary was Theotokos most likely originated in a 3rd-c. liturgical petition calling on her to intercede with her son on behalf of the Christian community. The title was not universally accepted and became one of the key points of dispute in the protracted christological* debate between Cyril*, archbishop of Alexandria, and Nestorius*, archbishop of Constantinople (420s). Nestorius refused to accept the title, arguing that it both undermined God's sovereignty and implied that Mary gave birth to the entire Godhead. Cyril and Proclus* of Constantinople countered that the title was necessary to affirm the hypostatic unity (see Hypostasis) of the God-man Jesus Christ beginning at the moment of his conception: if Mary was not Theotokos, then Christ was not divine. The title was affirmed at the First Council of Ephesus* (431) and was reaffirmed at the reunion council (433). It has remained an essential dogma of the Eastern Orthodox* (Chalcedonian) and Oriental Orthodox* (non-Chalcedonian) since that time.

Because of her role as Theotokos, Byzantine commentaries, sermons, and hymns devoted to the Virgin (e.g. the Akathistos Hymn) ascribed to her a role in salvation* history. The same texts also affirmed her preeminence among the saints*, both in terms of prayer for her intercession and in terms of a diversity of models for pious emulation (as both mother and virgin, servant and queen, Mary provided panegyrists and hymnographers with an endless number of models to inspire faithful imitation).

GEORGE E. DEMACPOULOS

Mary, the Virgin, Theotokos, in Byzantine Iconography. The earliest preserved images of the Virgin Mary date back to the 3rd c. (catacombs of Priscilla, Rome). Such images are mentioned in 4th-c. written sources (e.g. a letter of Gregory* of Nazianzus). The iconography of the Virgin proliferated after the Council of Ephesus (431), which rejected Nestorius*'s doctrine and established the veneration of the Virgin Mary as Theotokos*, the Mother of God. Since the 5th c., the images of Our Lady accentuated important theological concepts: the Incarnation*; Our Lady's intercession for sinful* humankind before her Son and the Supreme Judge*; the Holy Virgin's glorification as the Queen of Heaven; the identification of Our Lady with the church (ecclesia); and the veneration of the Virgin as the Temple of Wisdom*.

In Byzantine iconography, the Virgin was represented as a young woman with ideal features (9th-c. descriptions), hair covered with a headdress and a long, dark blue or purple veil often decorated with stars symbolizing her divine nature. The Virgin's image is regularly inscribed with "MP ΘΥ," the Greek abbreviation for Meter Theou, "Mother of God" (or Hagia Maria, "Holy Mary," before the 9th c.).

There were images of the Virgin Mary by herself or with Christ the Child (early examples can be seen in 6th- to 7th-c. mosaics of the altar apses on Cyprus; icons of the Sinai Monastery; five 6th- to 8th-c. icons from churches in Rome). In the single images, the Virgin's hands are raised in the gesture of prayer; these images are either frontal ("Virgin Orant") or are turned sideways. Both iconographic types embodied the idea of intercession* and supplication before Christ. The Virgin Orant was often represented in conches of altar apses as the major image of a church (e.g. a mosaic of St. Sophia in Kiev, mid-11th c.). In several cases, these images were inscribed Theotokos Blachernitissa, referring to the venerable image in the Blachernae, the major church of the Virgin in Constantinople. The Virgin in prayer (sideways image) was often inscribed Hagiosoritissa (of the holy shrine), indicating its connection with another miraculous icon in the Chalkopratea Church, Constantinople. Some variants of this image, called Paraklesis (Supplication), represent the Virgin with an open scroll in her hand; these images are paired with the image of Christ, to whom the Virgin appeals. The text on the scroll consists of a dialogue between the Virgin and Christ (frescoes of Lagoudera, Cyprus, 1192; icon from the cathedral of Spoleto, 11–12th c.).

Icons of the Virgin Mary with the Child emphasized the paradox* of the fundamental Christian miracle: an earthly woman holds the eternal and heavenly ruler of the universe as an unprotected child. The most symbolic and abstract icons present the Virgin Orant with Christ the Child on her chest in a roundel, sometimes inscribed Nikopoios (victorious) (since the 7th c. in Byzantium) or "Our Lady of the Sign" (since the 12th c. in Old Russia, associated with the miraculous icon of Novgorod).

Images of the enthroned Virgin with the Child (well known from early Christianity) symbolized universal power and Divine Wisdom creating her temple in the body of the Virgin (the 9th-c. sanctuary mosaic of St. Sophia, Constantinople). Among 11th- to 15th-c. icons, the image of the Virgin pointing to the Child with her right hand was most popular and was often inscribed Hodegetria (Gr "pointing the way"), connecting all replicas with the miraculous icon of the Hodegon Monastery, which was perceived as the main defender of Constantinople.

From the 11th c., new "animated" images, often called Eleousa (merciful) or Glykophilousa (sweetly embracing), accentuated intimate relations between Mother and Child (tenderly holding the Virgin's cheek). An early-12th-c. replica of such an image of the Church of Blachernae in Constantinople was brought to Russia and became the major miraculous icon of the country, known as "Our Lady of Vladimir." In Russia during the 15th–17th c., there were about 100 types of the Virgin with Child (usually icons "specialized" in certain kinds of miraculous help). In the 18th and 19th c., the number grew to more than 500. During this period, large icons, combining in a single panel hundreds of small-scale miracle-working icons, created a sort of iconographical dictionary. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES; JESUS, IMAGES OF, CLUSTER: IN BYZANTINE ICONOGRAPHY; SYMBOLISM. ALEXEI LIDOV

2) A Sampling of Contextual Devotions

Mary, the Virgin: The Black Madonna. See BLACK MADONNA.

Mary, the Virgin: Devotion in Latin America.

Devotion to Mary is a common feature of Roman Catholicism in Latin America. It is expressed through different national devotions, such as the Copper Virgin of Charity for Cubans*, the Virgen Purisima for Nicaraguans*, Aparecida for Brazilians*, Chiquinquirá for Colombians*, Luján for Argentines*, and Guadalupe for Mexicans* (see the present cluster: Of Guadalupe). Even for those who profess no religious belief, the different Virgins are a symbol of what it means to be Cuban, Nicaraguan, Brazilian, Colombian, Argentinean, or Mexican. They are strong symbols of national and religious identity that has roots in the colonial period in each country. Devotion to the Virgin Mary is built on the cultures and ethnic interstices that have shaped Latin American history. For instance, the Copper Virgin of Charity started as a local devotion in a slave* community in the 17th c. and, in the 19th c., came to represent the Cuban process of building identity as the Copper Virgin of Charity was venerated as the national patron of Cuba during the war of independence from Spain. This devotion has also been associated with Ochun by the Afro-Cuban community. And it has come to play a central role for the Cuban community, particularly exile community in the USA.

At a different level, the Virgin Mary is a syncretistic* (or inculturated*) figure through whom indigenous peoples relate aspects of their Christian worship to features of the pre-Columbian worship of feminine deities. The Christian female figure of the Virgin Mary also represents the mother earth as the axis of creation. In Latin America, this inculturated devotion to the Virgin Mary acquires stronger meaning, since the absence of the father, who is often unknown, is a recurrent phenomenon that gives a higher place and value to the mother; the Virgin Mary represents the mother* figure par excellence. The female figure dominates the Latin American ethos, and the Virgin Mary plays the symbolic role of female power. On the other hand, devotion to the Virgin Mary is also related to the marianismo, a practice that provided a cultural source for an idealized femininity. Such idealization was based on the spiritual and moral superiority of women over men that legitimated the suffering of women in subordinated domestic roles. The consolidation of all the national devotions in the Virgin of Guadalupe as patron of the Latin American continent was proposed several times in the 20th c. and more recently by John Paul II. This proposal may be rooted in an attempt to strengthen pro-life discourse through the icon of the pregnant virgin (see Pregnancy). Devotion to the Virgin Mary is also seen as a mark of identity for Roman Catholics, particularly in the face of the growing Pentecostal* and Charismatic* movements and the increase in Charismatic practices within the Roman Catholic Church.

Mary, the Virgin of Guadalupe. The first evangelization in Mexico emphasized primarily the gospel of Christ and the church. It is therefore surprising that devotion to the Virgin of Guadalupe became the most significant religious characteristic of Christianity in Mexico. John Paul II declared, in Santo Domingo, that “[i]n the Virgin of Guadalupe we have a perfect example of inculturated* evangelization.” This appropriately reflects the historical development of this devotion, and particularly the “Guadalupe event,” as presented in Nican Mopohua, written in Náhuatl, a highly symbolic-mythological language.

The event occurred at the sacred place where Mesoamericans worshipped Tonán-tzin, Our Mother the Land, a place they perceived to be the active, maternal presence of God. The apparitions restored the dignity of Mesoamericans. They demonstrated that it was possible for their world to change, even though it had been invaded and was in chaos. The Virgin was considered the mother of four of the main Mesoamerican deities. In this apparition, she proposed an evangelization whose purpose would be to show and give love, compassion, aid, and protection, and thus to listen to and remedy all the distress, misery, sorrow, and pain of the inhabitants of the land, and of those who invoked her (in inculturation and mission, see Mission Cluster). This intention of the Virgin was to be symbolized by the construction of a temple in Mesoamerican territory; it demanded that Mesoamericans value and have confidence in themselves and that the (European) bishop trust their ability to evangelize Mesoamericans.

Juan Diego, a poor Indian, was the authorized representative chosen by the Virgin. She required the collaboration of the bishop, the highest ecclesiastic authority. The bishop turned down her request on three occasions. Although Juan Diego pointed out that the Virgin’s message was a valid Christian teaching about evangelization, the bishop still objected to it.

Meanwhile, Juan Bernardino, the uncle of Juan Diego, was sick and dying. Juan Diego cared for him, rather than doing what the Virgin had requested of him, namely to return to the bishop and meet her at the sacred place where she normally appeared to him. So instead, she came to him. The Virgin said that she had taken upon herself the tragedy of Mesoamericans; she promised that she would heal Juan Bernadino and asked Juan Diego to continue his mission to convince the bishop to build the temple. She asked him to cut some flowers, which were miraculously blooming in a place that was intensely cold, and to bring them to the bishop, as a sign that he should agree to build the temple. When Juan Diego gave the flowers to the bishop, the image of the Virgin suddenly appeared on Juan Diego's clothes. The bishop was converted; he invited the people to build the temple, and he saw that Juan Bernardino had indeed been healed. Thus devotion to the Virgin of Guadalupe began.

As time passed, the Virgin of Guadalupe became a well-established devotion; she was officially recognized as the Virgin Mary, named patroness of New Spain (1746); she was crowned as the queen of Mexico (1895) and named patroness of Latin America (1910). The veneration of the Virgin as protector has grown, although some ecclesiastic sectors do not demand that respect for her be expressed as social action.

It is necessary to distinguish among apparitions, devotions, political uses of these, and lost experience and integrity.

Maryknoll Missionaries, the popular name for the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America (Maryknoll Fathers and Brothers) and for independent allied groups: Maryknoll Sisters, founded by Mary Josephine Rogers; Maryknoll Lay Missioners; and Maryknoll Affiliates. The Maryknoll Society was founded (1911) by two diocesan priests, Thomas F. Price and James A. Walsh, with headquarters outside Ossining, New York.

The Society's first assignment (1918) was in the Canton vicariate, China*; later it served in Northern Korea*, Japan*, and Manchuria (1920s) and eventually in more than 30 countries. The Maryknoll priests, brothers, and sisters often work together.

The Maryknoll Society trains people to be lifelong missionaries, educates North Americans about missions*, and solicits prayer for missions. Its magazine, The Field Afar (Maryknoll /Revista Maryknoll), along with printed and audiovisual material, interpreted other cultures and religions for North American Catholics. Maryknoll men and women fostered indigenous leadership through seminary teaching and founding women's religious communities in several countries. Their mission engagement is focused on small Christian community formation, social justice*, direct evangelization, medical and youth work, communications, and parish development. Since 1970 the Society has sponsored Orbis Books, which publishes Catholic and Protestant authors from around the world who write about mission, theology, spirituality, and interreligious dialogue*, thus contributing to an understanding of Christianity globally.

Mary Magdalene, the most important woman "disciple of Jesus," accompanied him from Galilee to Jerusalem (Mark 15:40–41). A native of Magdala*, according to Luke (8:2) she became one of Jesus' followers after he had driven out seven demons from her. It is historically less likely that she was a financial sponsor of Jesus and his male disciples as Luke suggests (8:3). Luke's claim reflects his literary tendency to present Jesus and his followers as a movement surrounded by influential and wealthy supporters (a tendency also apparent in Acts). The view that Mary Magdalene was a prostitute is untenable. It is based on a questionable identification of Mary Magdalene with Mary in John 12:3 and with the anonymous anointer in Luke 7:36–50. Luke mentions Mary Magdalene for the first time in 8:2, immediately after the anointing story, without any indication that 7:36–50 spoke of her.

Both Matthew (28:9–10) and John (20:14–18, apparently reflecting an independent tradition) refer to Mary Magdalene as a person who saw the risen Jesus (see also Mark 16:9–10). The fact that Mary Magdalene was viewed as an eyewitness to Jesus' resurrection suggests her influential position in the early Jesus movement.

Mary Magdalene is a prominent figure in several 2nd- and 3rd-c. Christian texts. For example, the Gospel of Mary* and the Gnostic Gospel of Philip* and Pistis* Sophia depict her as the favorite disciple* of Jesus who best understands his teachings. Mary's spiritual superiority arouses jealousy among her male colleagues, especially Peter, but Jesus defends her (Gospel of Philip, Pistis Sophia, Gospel of Thomas*), as does Levi (Gospel of Mary). Some texts refer to Mary because they regarded her as an important heroine of the past (Gospel of Philip, Pistis Sophia); others appeal to her authority in discussing women's ecclesiastical position at the time (Gospel of Mary). Mary Tudor (Mary I) (1516–58), queen of England. After her father Henry* VIII's estrangement from Catherine of Aragon, Mary was bastardized (1533). During her half-brother Edward VI's reign (1547–53), she faced troubles anew for stubbornly maintaining the traditional Catholic liturgy. The government made Jane Grey the queen (1553), but Mary exploited widespread outrage to stage a coup d'état. As queen (1553–58), she moved swiftly to restore both traditional worship and papal obedience; she also brushed aside objections to marriage with Philip II of Spain. Equally single-minded was her commitment to burning Protestants. She longed for a child and thought she was pregnant, but she had fatal stomach cancer. Her death led to Elizabeth* I's reversal of her religious program. DIARMAID N. J. MACCULLOCH

Mashtots, Mesrop (c361–439/40), served as a translator at the Armenian court and participated in expeditions to convert remote parts of Armenia*. Apparently troubled by the use of military force to impose Christianity, he embraced the monastic* life, searching for other ways to make the Christian Scripture and liturgy "native" for his compatriots. Supported by the catholicos* Isaac and the king Vram-Shapuh, Mashtots visited Syriac and Greek literary centers of Mesopotamia in unsuccessful attempts to adapt an extant script to Armenian. Instead Mashtots invented a phonetic alphabet (c405) and translated the Book of Proverbs from Syriac. Mashtots and his disciples translated into Armenian the entire Bible within two years; they later translated the works of the Syriac* fathers. Mashtots thus allowed the two parts of Armenia, divided since 387 between the Sassanian and Roman Empires, to maintain their Armenian identity and to associate it with Christianity. The peace of 422 enabled him and his disciples to travel to Western Armenia, teaching the alphabet beyond the border and translating the Greek fathers and the Jerusalem Lectionary. Literary activity in Armenian has never ceased henceforth. According to his disciple Koriun and Moses* of Khoren, Mashtots also invented alphabets for Georgia and Ałuania and trained local translators. IGOR DORFMANN-LAZAREV

Masoretes, scholars (scribes*) who through the centuries maintained the strict rules for hand-copying Hebrew biblical texts for liturgical and scholarly use, in scroll and codex forms, respectively. They first added vowels (c6th c. CE), accents, and later some marginal notes (from the Masorah, "tradition") to the biblical text, establishing the Masoretic Text.

Mass, Roman Catholic. "Mass," from the Latin missio, a medieval term for the eucharistic celebration, refers to the dismissal rite "Ite missa est" ("Go, you are sent)," which establishes a relationship between Christian worship and mission within the world. The Mass includes the Liturgy of the Word* (biblical lessons, proclaimed and preached) followed by the Liturgy of the Eucharist* (including the Eucharistic* Prayer and sharing of Communion*). In Rome, the language of the entire liturgy was originally largely koine* Greek. By the middle of the 3rd c., when the spoken language shifted to Latin, so too did the biblical readings for the purpose of intelligibility, but the prayers remained in Greek. Only with the papacy of Damasus I (d384) did the Roman Church completely adopt Latin for the entire eucharistic celebration.

In the late 4th c., the Roman Eucharist took on strong cultural traits that reflected the Roman cultural genius of sobriety and simplicity. The 5th–8th c. marked the classical period of the evolution of the Roman Mass, especially evident in the "Stational Liturgy" (including processions to designated churches, presided over by the pope). Although the entrance rite reflected Roman imperial court ceremonial customs, the rest of that Mass exhibited classical Roman sobriety: there was little use of incense*, there were no genuflections* and no elevation of the bread and cup. Vested clergy remained in their places throughout the Mass and did not approach the altar during the Roman Canon, whose language appealed more to the intellect than to the heart.

In the Franco-Germanic regions, the Mass was much more elaborate, consistent with that cultural genius and appealing more to the heart than to the head. There was greater use of drama and poetry, candles and incense; prayers were lengthier and more evocative. With Franco-Germanic pilgrims*, who began visiting Rome after the baptism of Clovis* (496), Roman liturgical traditions found their way into the “Gallican* Mass.” In the 8th c., Charlemagne* (d814) followed the lead of his father, Pepin the Short (d768), in attempting to Romanize and unify the Franco-Germanic people using the Roman Rite as the primary instrument. A reverse influence occurred in the 10th c. when Gallican liturgical elements made their way into the Roman Rite and its classical form was lost. The Mass increasingly became the clergy’s property with the laity as passive spectators. By the year 1200, the offertory* procession ceased, as did offering the chalice to the laity. Communion was now received on the tongue, and Mass was uniformly celebrated with the priest turned toward the altar (and thus “toward the east,” ad orientem) with his back to the people. Private Mass without a congregation became standard fare and was often celebrated simultaneously at different altars in the same church. The Mass had become a private devotion, and liturgical abuses abounded.

The Council of Trent* (1545–63) attempted to correct some of those abuses, especially regarding the inappropriate proliferation of Masses and Mass stipends, superstition around the number of fixed Masses, and the problem of indulgences*. The Mass was reformed with special attention to liturgical unification for the entire Roman Church, aided both by the promulgation of the Roman Missal of Pius V (1570) and by the establishment of the Congregation of Rites (1588). Such liturgical centralization was accomplished through strict adherence to the new Roman Missal and priests were forbidden to deviate under pain of sin. The Roman Rite would remain untouched for 400 years, until Vatican* II (1962–65).

Vatican II promoted a reform of the Mass that balanced tradition with progress, building on the Tridentine liturgical reforms but open to the pastoral needs of the 20th-c. church. Returning to biblical and patristic sources, the Council’s Liturgy Constitution, Sacrosanctum Concilium (massively approved by 2,147 to 4), spoke of the Eucharist as the “source and summit of the Christian life” and recovered the principle of full and active participation by the liturgical assembly, with baptism* as the common denominator. Like the early church and the 16th-c. Reformation, a renewed emphasis was placed on intelligibility; thus vernacular languages were introduced. Cultural adaptation was encouraged, especially in mission lands, so that the Mass could more aptly reflect the cultural genius of each local church. One of the greatest gifts of Vatican II was increased ecumenical liturgical cooperation. Today the Eucharist celebrated in mainline churches is often quite similar to the Roman Catholic Mass and vice versa; people pray the same liturgical texts and read the same biblical lessons. In large cities, liturgical assemblies are increasingly multicultural and multiracial, making the call to liturgical inculturation* and authentic liturgical renewal more urgent than ever. KEITH F. Matthew, the Gospel of, a carefully crafted story of Jesus, moves skillfully between narrative and discourse (see markers: 7:28; 11:1; 13:53; 19:1; 26:1). It depicts Jesus as a preacher, teacher, and healer (4:23; 9:35) in the context of 1st-c. Palestinian Judaism.

Generally, scholars locate the origins of the Gospel in the last decades of the 1st c., in Syria, most likely Antioch, a cosmopolitan city of the Roman Empire with a long-standing Jewish enclave. Within such a Jewish context, the Matthean community struggles with its parent body concerning issues of authority and authoritative interpretation of their sacred tradition/s (5:21–48; 16:13–20; 18:18–20). Others from a variety of ethnic origins (“Gentiles”) challenge the boundaries of the Matthean community and some of the Gospel’s stories reflect a rethinking of the way Gentiles might be included (2:1–11; 8:5–13; 15:21–28).

The program that shapes this story of Jesus is found in 4:17: the basileia, or empire of the heavens (see Kingdom of God, the Concept of, Cluster), is near at hand. A group of disciples (men and women; 4:18–22; 8:14–15; 9:9) experience this basileia through Jesus' preaching (5–7; 10; 13:1–52; 18; 21:23–25:46) and healing (8–9; 12:9–14; 15:21–28; 17:14–23; 20:29–34; 21:14). They, in turn, are commissioned to go forth and tell people that Jesus has been raised (28:7), reconcile failed disciples (28:10), and teach and make disciples (28:19–20).

Jesus is characterized in continuity with Israel's traditions of holy ones and prophets*. He is named the one born of God or Son* of God (2:15; 3:17; 4:3, 6; 14:33; 16:16; 26:63; 27:40, 43, 54). He gives a new law from the mountain-top as Moses* did (5–7), and he heals as Elijah* and Elisha* did (8–9). He is also, however, a sign of divine discontinuity. He is in the line of Tamar*, Rahab*, Ruth*, and Bathsheba* (1:3, 5, 6) and is child of an endangered woman (1:16, 18–25). His deeds of prophetic healing* draw forth the title "Sophia" (Wisdom*), justified by her deeds (11:19), and he learns to extend his understanding of the basileia vision of God from a Canaanite woman (15:21–28).

Containing tensions within, the Gospel has created tensions without: it has been used, e.g., as a foundation for the structure of the Roman Catholic Church (16:13–20) and as an anti-Jewish weapon (27:25). In addition, tensions in the text concerning authority, membership, women's leadership, and other issues continue to engage contemporary women in their practices and theologies. ELAINE M. WAINWRIGHT

Maximos (Maximus) the Confessor (c580–662), Greek theologian, spiritual writer. Born into the aristocracy, he was secretary to the Byzantine emperor Heraclius before becoming a monk in Chrysopolis (614) and then Cyzicus (c625). During the Persian invasion (626), he fled to the Mediterranean islands and then to Carthage (628), while dealing with questions raised by the spiritual writings of Gregory* Nazianzen and Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite. He gave a mystical* interpretation of the liturgy; several of his works were later translated into Latin by John* Scotus Erigena.

Maximos wrote against Monothelitism* (encouraged in Emperor Heraclius's *Ecthesis [638] and Constans II's *Typos [647–48]) and took part in the condemnations of this doctrine by councils in Africa and Rome (646) and by the Lateran Synod (649). Arrested, tried in Constantinople, exiled (655–56), and brought once again to Constantinople, he was condemned by a synod (662); his tongue and right hand were cut off to keep him from propagating his views. Exiled to the Caucasus, he died later in the same year.

Against the Monothelites, he insisted that each nature of Christ has its own mode of willing and acting; indeed, the human nature is freely self-actuating. This affirmation of a human will* and activity is testimony to the reality of God's creation; freedom of will and difference from God persist even in the Incarnation*, as they also persist in mystical* union. With the neo-Chalcedonians*, however, he denied a human person or agent in Christ, for the only agent is the divine Word*. In the case of Gethsemane (Mark 14:36 par.), the Word in human mode both expresses human temptation and consents to the divine will. There remain two wills and activities, which are united but never "one." EUGENE TESELLE

McPherson, Aimee Semple (1890–1944), Pentecostal* evangelist and founder (1923) of the International Church of the Foursquare Gospel (c2 million members in 83 countries in 2000). Born in Canada, she converted to Pentecostalism (1908) and went as a missionary to China with Robert Semple, her husband, who died there (1910). She married Harold McPherson (1912; divorced 1921) and was an itinerant evangelist from 1914 until 1923, when she founded Angelus Temple in Los Angeles.

McPherson combined Pentecostal and Evangelical* theology to become one of the most popular evangelists of the 20th c. Her "foursquare" message (from the "foursquare" holy city of Rev 21:16) included traditional Evangelical, Holiness*, and Pentecostal emphases – Jesus Christ as savior, baptizer with the Holy Spirit, healer, and soon-coming king – and social commitment to help the poor. Worship at the Angelus Temple downplayed Pentecostal particularities (e.g. glossalia*) and focused on a Protestant salvation* message. McPherson demonstrated the affinity between conservative Evangelicals and popular media. Her sermons blurred the line between worship and entertainment (with costumes and lavish sets). In 1924 she became the first woman granted a radio license by the US Federal Communications Commission. Her station, KFSG (Kall Four-Square Gospel), her periodical, the Bridal Call, and books such as In the Service of the King (1927) further disseminated her message.

Mechtild of Magdeburg (1207–82), born of wealthy and possibly aristocratic parents, moved (1230) to Magdeburg to become a Beguine*, lived there for 40 years before retiring (1270) to the convent at Helfta. Her book, Flowing Light of the Godhead (Fliessende Licht der Gottheit), written mostly while she was a Beguine (with the encouragement of her Dominican confessor, Heinrich of Halle), consists of accounts of visions and descriptions of conversations between Mechtild and God. The ordering of the books is not her own, although it follows the description of Mechtild's life given by God in Book 7:3: "Your childhood was the playmate of my Holy Spirit, your youth the bride of my Humanity, and now your old age is the mistress of the house of my Divinity" (not "housewife" as some translations have it). Mechtild uses Minne, "Love," as her name for the Divinity, and her most profound understanding of God is the paradox* that his withdrawal is the highest manifestation of his awful presence. It is in the depths of despair, when the soul feels the farthest from God, that Mechtild, like other Beguines, experiences the comfort and presence of Minne. See also APOPHATICISM.

Media and Christianity. The church views media (film, television, radio, the Internet) with both hope and despair. Conservative traditions see media as powerful instruments for evangelism*, whereas liberals look optimistically to them as means for powerless people to gain a public voice. Traditionalists decry secular media's immorality, while liberal groups criticize the commercialization and conservative politicization of media. Both groups agree that media can help build religious community.

The worldwide growth of Christian broadcast and film media has been fueled primarily by Evangelicals'* belief that these technologies have the power to convert persons and even whole societies to faith. Some historians identify the origins of this perspective in Europe's Protestant Reformation, which entailed the first religious use of mass printing and distribution. For modern North American Evangelicals, the invention of the radio (late 19th c.) elicited a similar hope in mass-mediated evangelism. North American Premillennialists, who believe that Jesus Christ's second coming and eternal judgment are immanent, turned to electronic media to proclaim the gospel around the globe.

Mainline Protestant and Roman Catholic groups focus on freedom of speech and the need for decentralized, localized media decision making throughout the developed and developing world. They hope to prevent modern nation-states and corporations from selfishly controlling media to the exclusion of indigenous cultures and minority faiths.

The global church agrees that excessive media secularization* ought to be resisted because it would weaken religious communities. But conservatives focus on secular media's immorality – especially the sex, violence, and profanity it disseminates – whereas mainline and other more liberal Christians emphasize the commercialization and politicization of media and their role in creating consumer-oriented, materialistic culture, as do conservative or "right-wing" Christian movements. North American-produced religious media had this effect particularly in Latin America.

Christians of all traditions see mass media as powerful means of organizing and strengthening religious communities. They generally believe that so long as the media are free of antireligious legislation and regulation, religious groups can use television, radio, film, and the Internet to maintain their distinct local cultures and international identities. To the worldwide church, the media are both symbols and technologies, with much promise and yet fraught with danger. See also TELEVANGELISM AND WESTERN CULTURE.

Media and Christian Worship. The church has always defined itself primarily in and through the medium of worship*, as believers have "gathered together" for praise, prayer, teaching, and especially sacrament. The intrinsically localized, sacred, and exclusive aspects of worship gatherings led to tensions over the appropriateness of transmitting worship to heterogeneous, unregulated audiences.

For many traditions, worship is a local practice meant to be undertaken in person, just as Jesus Christ was God's incarnate Son and is present (see Presence of Christ) in the worship service. This presence of Christ is understood in different ways by different traditions. Thus the Roman Catholic Church and (in a slightly different way) the Eastern Orthodox Church, which affirm a "real presence" of Christ in the Eucharist*, have resisted mediating the Mass* or the Divine* Liturgy through broadcast technologies. Catholics made exceptions based on the fact that even within the local parish some shut-ins are unable to participate in Mass. Except on high holidays, Catholics tend to broadcast the Mass only locally.

With the Reformation, many Protestant traditions deemphasized the sacredness of a particular space (see Hierotopy, the Creation of Sacred Christian Spaces) or time, including those set aside for worship. As a result, Protestants began mediating worship through radio, television, and eventually online internet technologies. A few even claim to have established "virtual" churches online. Roman Catholic, Orthodox, and mainline Protestant groups have criticized Evangelicals (and others) for creating semi-religious versions of worship services that imitate "secular" broadcast programs, such as musical variety shows.

Worshipping via mass media has also been controversial because of differing perspectives on whether worship should be open to the public or restricted to members of the believing community. Mainline Protestants and Roman Catholics wanted to make sure that worship did not become a public spectacle for audiences unfamiliar with Christian practices. Since broadcast media attract comparatively wide audiences, such critics tend to advocate "narrowcasting" services, via closed-circuit, subscription-only, or even online media that are not likely to be accessed by unaffiliated people.

Worship through mass media elicits within the church the same kinds of discussions and practices that Christians have had from the early days, when believers met secretly in homes and at times in underground caves. Concerns about the appropriateness of mediated worship help the various church communities to articulate who they are as local communities of faith, how they should worship a holy God, and how they can define their distinct identies in contrast to the wider culture. See also GOSPEL MUSIC; LITURGIES, HISTORY OF; MEGACHURCHES REMAKING RELIGIOUS TRADITION IN NORTH AMERICA; MEGACHURCH MOVEMENT; PRAISE AND WORSHIP; WORSHIP CLUSTER.

Mediating Theology, the movement in German theology, inaugurated by followers of Schleiermacher*, to achieve a "true mediation" between Christianity and contemporary thought, thus between supernaturalism and rationalism*. Its vehicle was the periodical Theologische Studien und Kritiken, founded in 1828. Most of the participants, including Schleiermacher, supported the Prussian Union of Lutheran and Reformed churches (see Germany). Some of them built on Hegel's* revival of the themes of Trinity* and Incarnation*; others followed Schleiermacher in starting with religious experience and developing a new conceptuality. The movement (especially as articulated by Isaak August Dörner and Richard Rothe) offered an alternative to biblicism and confessionalism by seeking connections among theology, philosophy, and critical study of the Bible.

Mediator, one who intervenes between two parties for the purpose of communication or reconciliation*. Paul applies the term to angels* (Gal 3:19–20) to suggest their inferiority as communicators of God's will. Yet Christ is called "the mediator of a new covenant" (Heb 8:6, 9:15, 12:24) or "the one mediator between God and humans" (1 Tim 2:5). In christological* doctrine, the term becomes more frequent, and more precise. Christ's role as mediator implies no distance or inferiority, for there is immediate union of the divine and the human.

Mediatrice (Lat feminine form of "mediator"), term applied to Mary* in her capacity of mediating the grace* that comes from her son Jesus Christ.

Medical Ethics. Although the term "medical ethics" became prominent only after the 1803 publication in England of Thomas Percival's influential book, Medical Ethics, it had been around for a long time as a concept, field of learning, and practice. There are, in fact, multiple traditions worldwide in which concerns for ethics and medicine appear: ancient and modern traditions, religious and secular, from both the East and the West, as well as the global South. Central to human experience in every culture and society are experiences of birth and death, and of disease, injury, and disability*. Peoples everywhere have therefore sought meaning in these experiences, as well as remedies and support. Since major values and vulnerabilities are at stake, ethical frameworks have governed ways of thinking about the practice of “medicine.”

Christian medical ethical frameworks are distinctive but not wholly unique; they overlap with other traditions, both secular and religious. For example, all traditions have had to address the moral character of healers or physicians, and medical choices such as whether to treat or not to treat. Many traditions, including Jewish, Christian, Muslim, and contemporary secular traditions, have been commonly influenced by, e.g., the Greek Hippocratic collection of writings from the 5th c. BCE (particularly the Oath of Hippocrates).

Religious traditions of medical ethics have always been shaped by beliefs about the causes of disease, the meaning of suffering*, the worth of the human individual and the common good, the value of life, and the place of death* in life. Christianity, Judaism*, and Islam* share beliefs in a God* who cares about all creation* and who makes human beings in God’s own image*, calling them to have compassion* for one another. These traditions, therefore, also share a belief in the intrinsic worth of persons and a concern for human flourishing in community.

A Christian medical ethical framework is further shaped by belief in Jesus Christ as the incarnation* and revelation* of God, and as the model of healing* as well as companioning in suffering and death. In this framework, human physical life in this world is a fundamental good, a gift from God to be stewarded and lived with reverence and respect. Yet physical life is not an absolute good; it need not be preserved at the price of other goods such as faith* or freedom*. Moreover, Jesus’ twofold love commandment emphasizes an ethic whose center is love* of God and neighbor*.

Shaped by fundamental beliefs, Christian medical ethical discernment relies on four primary sources and employs a variety of methods of analysis and argument. Scripture*, tradition* (theological and ecclesiastical), secular disciplines, and contemporary experience are the standard sources (in the past, Protestants emphasized Scripture, and Roman Catholics emphasized tradition, ecclesiastical authority, natural* law, and case studies). Patterns of reasoning in Christian medical ethics are “teleological*” (taking account of consequences and/or more ultimate ends; see Consequentialist Ethics) or “deontological*” (considering what is right, regardless of consequences). Narratives are also important in gaining insight into ethical issues, as in the overall Christian “story” or the story of a patient’s own life. Moreover, Christian medical ethics encompasses “virtue*” or “character” ethics, discerning what ought to characterize givers and receivers of care as well as the relationship between them.

The long history of Christian medical ethics was marked by clarity and continuity (for Protestants, in terms of general attitudes and guidelines; for Roman Catholics, in terms of explicit principles formulated in the 16th c. and specified in new contexts thereafter). In the mid-20th c., however, massive developments in science and technology called for the critical retrieval and reconstruction of past work in medical ethics. Urgent choices loomed regarding the limitation of treatment, assisted suicide, technologically assisted reproduction (see Pregnancy), research on human subjects at all stages of development, cloning, organ transplantation, and genetic manipulation. New insights arose regarding patient rights, physician–patient relationships, and justice* in the delivery of health care.

Christian thinkers (Protestants such as Joseph Fletcher and Paul Ramsey; Roman Catholics such as Richard McCormick and Charles Curran) worked with others to formulate principles that would be intelligible in religious and secular discourse – principles demanding informed patients’ choice, prohibiting unjust harm and requiring positive consequences for individual and communal well-being, and obligating distributive justice in the allocation of scarce medical resources. New debates (within and between forms of Christianity) emerged regarding contraception and birth* control, euthanasia*, abortion*, and embryonic stem cell research. Traditions are no longer monolithic with respect to most contested issues, and there is strong agreement on central principles of respect for persons and responses of care. Even Roman Catholicism, which continues to hold some clear official positions, has sustained conversations and debates on diverse views among its moral theologians. See also HEALTH, HEALING, AND CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER.

Megachurches. A megachurch is a Protestant congregation with 2,000 or more in attendance (adults and children) at services on an average weekend. However, these congregations and the larger global Megachurch Movement are far more complex and nuanced than an arbitrary size marker. The Megachurch Movement can be characterized as a unique collective response to cultural* shifts and changes in societal patterns throughout the industrialized, urban, and suburban areas of the world.

Very large churches have existed throughout the history of Christendom. But in recent decades, the number of megachurches has dramatically increased, growing in the USA from a handful in 1900 to 50 in 1970 to nearly 1,300 in 2008; similar increases, though somewhat smaller, have occurred worldwide. Individual megachurches are diverse in style and visionary approach; there is no single megachurch model. Overall, however, these churches are quite uniform in structure, owing in part to their size and organizational complexity.

The average megachurch has c4,000 weekly participants and an annual budget of 6.5 million US dollars, although the international megachurches are generally much larger. Globally, they are found predominantly in densely populated urban centers of Korea*, Brazil*, Australia*, South* Africa, and Nigeria*. In the USA, the majority are located in the southern Sunbelt, clustered around suburbs and exurbs of the largest sprawling metropolitan areas, such as Houston, Phoenix, Orlando, Los Angeles, and Atlanta. This pattern shifted as the phenomenon developed, beginning in urban areas (with "tall-steeple" megachurches), then dramatically expanding in the suburban Sunbelt, and now increasingly being established in Northwest, Northeast and Midwest suburban areas.

Half of these congregations were founded after 1971, and in 2008 fully 80% were still led by the senior pastor under whose tenure the dramatic growth took place. These senior pastors are predominantly male, well educated, and on average 50 years of age, and are strong visionary, entrepreneurial leaders. They are primarily responsible for the distinctive vision, clear mission, and well-defined sense of purpose common to nearly all megachurches. These central leaders are assisted by a large number of additional clergy, staff, and volunteers. Almost all megachurches hold conservative theological beliefs and describe themselves as Evangelical*.

Worship at these congregations often takes place in a theater-style auditorium, adorned with few traditional religious symbols. The professional, elaborately produced service is characterized by expressive contemporary music and singing accompanied by electric guitars, keyboard, and drums, with music and words projected onto huge screens and enhanced with sophisticated technology. The fast-paced worship culminates in a polished, entertaining sermon that is practical and culturally relevant as well as biblical and inspirational (see Gospel Music; Media and Christianity; Media and Christian Worship; Praise and Worship).

These churches provide countless services, ministries, and activities throughout the week. Their programs meet both the spiritual and physical needs of participants and local community members. These programs also offer a place for participants to live out their religious commitments in service to others. Nearly every megachurch employs small groups and provides intimate fellowship opportunities that structure intentional community building and enhance commitment on a large scale.

When compared with national profiles of church members, participants in megachurches are found to be similar in gender makeup (60% female, 40% male) but on average younger and less likely to be married; there are twice as many single persons among megachurch participants. Megachurch attendees are both more highly educated and have higher incomes than either participants in smaller churches or the US adult population in general. Overall, megachurches have much greater ethnic and racial diversity than any other grouping of congregations. Many participants in these churches (70%) have come from other congregations locally or joined after having moved from other geographic locations, but 25% were previously not affiliated with a church or had not attended church for years. Most attend megachurches because they are attracted by the church's size, its vision and mission, the pastor's charisma, the contemporary worship forms, and the many activities and programs. The participant turnover rate in these churches is considerable, with two-thirds having attended for five or fewer years. Yet the level of commitment and the spiritual activities of megachurch participants on average are at least equal to those of participants in smaller churches.

Megachurches offer participants new ways of being religious in community. These churches allow attendees to participate by choice, at levels and in ways that suit their individual desires. The many programs and options allow them to choose and customize their experience of the church so that it meets the needs of each family member. For participants who have moved from other localities, megachurches offer ready-made social networks and intimate groups that allow them to integrate into a new community quickly, with others of similar values and demographics.

Megachurches have vast resources of money and people. They are also surprisingly daring and inventive in terms of programs and organizational structures. In addition, their senior clergy are popular speakers, authors, and religious leaders. This combination has resulted in megachurches generating many innovative shifts in religious expression, music, and organizational forms. While these largest churches represent less than half of 1% of all US churches, they garner considerable attention and influence within the religious world and secular society.

The growth of the megachurch phenomenon is, in part, the result of an economy of scale and efficiency that smaller churches seldom match. However, the growth of megachurches also parallels the movement of other institutions toward larger structures, technological innovation, and pop cultural expressiveness. This church form fits the contemporary suburban social milieu. It offers choice, flexibility, and even customization of spiritual expression to its participants and declares to an increasingly secular society that religion is alive and flourishing. See also WORD-FAITH MOVEMENT AND ITS WORSHIP.

SCOTT THUMMA

Megachurches in El Salvador. Almost one-third of El Salvador's Christians now profess to be Evangelicals/Protestants, 75% of whom are Charismatic* or Pentecostal. Most of them attend the thousands of very small churches that proliferate in poor barrios and rural villages; yet at least 10 urban churches have attendance figures above 5,000. Two notable examples illustrate fundamental differences among these megachurches.

The Tabernaculo Biblico Bautista "Amigos de Israel Central" was founded by US-educated Edgar Lopez Bertrand. The Baptist Tabernacle boasts a membership of more than 80,000 and has spawned at least 40 smaller churches, some of them in North American Salvadorian communities. The mother church in a middle-class sector of San Salvador occupies a square block, with two schools, a theological training center, and a plush 8,000-seat sanctuary hosting six consecutive, highly choreographed Sunday services. Bertrand's politically passive and theologically conservative message is spread throughout Latin America by means of radio and television broadcasts.

The Mision Elim Internacional is located in the slums of Ilabasco. Elim is a church of the very poor with an active membership of more than 150,000 (usually considered the second-largest church in the world). Along with continuous Sunday celebrations held in its massive open-air auditorium, the church broadcasts over radio and television and offers numerous midweek services, as well as a weekly all-night prayer vigil attended by more than 3,000. Unlike the Baptist Tabernacle, which is under Bertrand's autocratic leadership, Elim is not pastor driven. Modeled after the world's largest church – Yoido Full Gospel (Seoul, South Korea) – the Elim community is organized according to districts, sectors, zones, and small neighborhood cells. Each cell and sector has an appointed leader, and each district has a pastor. Also unlike the Tabernacle, Elim is Charismatic*/Pentecostal. Its worship is animated by fiery preaching, open weeping, speaking in tongues*, and healing*. Women are active as cell group leaders, yet in worship they wear veils, sit separately from men, and do not serve as pastors or teachers.

These two churches represent a widening theological gulf that separates Central American Evangelicals. While the Baptist Tabernacle emphasizes the Prosperity* Gospel common in many North American megachurches, Elim is becoming socially and politically prophetic, increasingly speaking out against political injustice and the economic structures that foster poverty*, violence*, and emigration to the USA. Despite these differences, however, both churches function as alternative societies for their members. They are constructed islands of common faith and support that shelter Salvadorian believers from the turbulent seas of political unrest, violence, and crushing poverty.

TIMOTHY WADKINS

Megachurches Remaking Religious Tradition in North America. The emergence and rapid growth of megachurches represented one of the most significant changes in North American Christianity at the end of the 20th and the early 21st c. The majority of megachurches, customarily defined as Protestant churches with 2,000 or more weekly attendees, identify themselves as conservative, often combining orthodox Evangelical* theology with practical, therapeutic (see Health, Healing, and Christianity Cluster: In North American and European Pentecostal/Charismatic Movements) religious messages. Many employ the latest in audiovisual technology in their worship services (see Media and Christianity; Media and Christian Worship) and offer attendees a wide range of services and religious events (from fitness classes to Bible studies). While small in number (there are only c1,300 megachurches among the 335,000 congregations in the USA), megachurches wield extraordinary influence over denominations through their ministry activities and worship styles and over millions of Christians around the world through the Internet (Thumma and Travis). Many megachurches draw heavily on the marketing strategies and entrepreneurialism of the contemporary marketplace to effectively sell their brand of Christianity and their products to other churches, often through new, quasi-denominational bodies like the Willow Creek Association (Twitchell, Sargeant, Thumma and Travis). Scholars have begun to identify three ways in which megachurches are affecting the traditions and practices of congregations.

The primary and most profound way megachurches influence historical Protestant denominations is through the process of “mimetic isomorphism.” Many congregations of Lutheran*, Methodist*, Presbyterian*, and other historical denominations see megachurches as offering a model for worship*, Christian education, and decision making that works stunningly well in a religious market where interest in preserving or following historic traditions is very low. Thus some congregations abandon the hymns, rituals, and theological orientations grounded in older, often Reformation-based traditions and adopt the pop rock-inspired praise music (see Praise and Worship), Evangelical or conversion*-oriented liturgy, and conservative theology of megachurches in a bid to survive and compete (Sargeant).

A second way that megachurches influence historical Protestant traditions is through “selective isomorphism,” in which congregations borrow elements from megachurches that they can easily incorporate into the life of the congregation and that dovetail with their own understanding of what is essential and what is nonessential within their historic tradition. Thus in early 21st c., several Lutheran churches blended the worship approach from Willow Creek or Saddleback Community Church with Lutheran liturgical elements. For example, two Lutheran congregations made rock-and-roll music a central part of their worship services, justifying it on the basis of Luther’s own use of the music of his day, but they kept the sacrament of Holy Communion as a regular part of worship (Ellingson). Under pressure from the religious market to conform, they adopted the rituals, forms of worship, or theology of the successful newcomers but did so in incremental ways that did not so radically change the tradition held by longtime or “cradle” members (Chaves).

A third way that megachurches influence religious traditions is by pressuring congregations in local religious markets to return to their historic roots and to define themselves as “niche” congregations that specialize in offering an authentic denominational church experience. Rather than directly competing with megachurches, some congregations intentionally remake themselves as exemplars of Lutheranism, Methodism, or Presbyterianism, e.g. in order to offer local churchgoers a clear alternative to the relatively standardized experience offered by megachurches (Eiseland, Ammerman). Thus megachurches lead some congregations of historical denominations to rediscover their tradition.

While it is clear that megachurches are here to stay and that they will continue to wield an enormous influence in both local and national religious ecologies, mainline Protestant congregations will also continue to respond creatively, sometimes rediscovering their tradition and sometimes blending old and new traditions into what may become new forms of Protestantism. See also MEDIA AND CHRISTIANITY; MEDIA AND CHRISTIAN WORSHIP; PRAISE AND WORSHIP; TELEVANGELISM AND WESTERN CULTURE; WORD-FAITH MOVEMENT AND ITS WORSHIP.

Megilloth (Heb “scrolls”), the five scrolls recited on Jewish festivals and in Jewish liturgies: Ruth* (Shavuot, celebration of the giving of Torah), Song* of Songs (Passover), Ecclesiastes* (Sukkot, Tabernacles), Lamentations* (ninth of Av, commemoration of the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem), and Esther* (Purim).

Meinvielle, Julio (1905–73), Roman Catholic priest who for several decades was the spokesperson for important sectors of Argentine Catholicism. A prolific intellectual who contributed to such magazines as Criterion and Sol y luna, he is viewed as the mentor of the fundamentalist (integrist*) and authoritarian Catholic Argentine nationalists, and later of anti-Semitic youth movements such as the Tacuara (in the 1950s–1960s). These youth movements and Meinvielle promoted in diverse publications and conferences their conception of the social order as a corporate society organized and framed by the spiritual (the Roman Catholic Church); Meinvielle strongly condemned Jacques Maritain*, accusing him of selling out the Church to Rousseau-type liberalism* and Marxist* communism. See also ARGENTINA.

LUIS MIGUEL DONATELLO

Melanchthon, Philipp (1497–1560), Reformer and humanist, Luther's* colleague at the University of Wittenberg (1518–60), where he taught theology and humanities. Besides writing popular books on Greek and Latin grammar, rhetoric, logic, and world history, he published commentaries on Psalms, Proverbs, Matthew, John, Romans (five on Romans), 1 and 2 Corinthians, Colossians, and 1 Timothy, the first Protestant systematic theology (Loci Communes Theologici [Theological topics]), and several Lutheran confessional documents (the Augsburg* Confession, the Apology [in defense of the Confession], and the Treatise on the Power and Primacy of the Pope).

Melanchthon was the first Pauline interpreter to apply systematically the rules of rhetoric for analyzing the letters' structure and figures of speech and to employ the rules of dialectic for identifying their topics and logic. The first edition of his Loci Communes (1521/22) follows the basic topics of Romans (sin*, law* and gospel*, grace*, faith*). Like Luther, he understood that God justifies* (declares righteous) Christians by grace through faith because of Christ alone. His definition of the capacity of law and gospel to terrify and comfort Christians remains fundamental to Lutheran hermeneutics. Controversies after Luther's death called into question his teachings on free will* and the Lord's* Supper. With Bucer* he drafted the 1535 Wittenberg Concord, which held that Christ is present with the bread and wine. TIMOTHY WENGERT

Melanesia. See HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY CLUSTER: IN THE SOUTH PACIFIC AND AUSTRALIA.

Melania the Elder (342–410). Born in Spain, she founded and directed monasteries in Jerusalem (377–400). The granddaughter of a wealthy consul in Rome, Melania devoted her life to asceticism* after losing a husband and two children. After visiting desert fathers in Egypt (372/4), she settled in Jerusalem and founded a monastery on the Mount of Olives, which became a double* monastery when the monk, historian, and translator Rufinus* soon joined her. Jerome* referred to Melania as a "second Thecla*" because of her commitment to asceticism. Jerome later expunged her name from his Chronicle owing to her friendships with Rufinus, Evagrius* Ponticus, and Palladius* and her implication in the Origenist* controversy.

SUSANNA DRAKE

Melania the Younger (c385–439). Born in Rome, married to Pinian (399), she founded a monastery on the Mount of Olives (431/2). The granddaughter of Melania* the Elder, the wealthy Melania the Younger took a vow of celibacy* with her husband, Pinian, after their two children died. With her mother, Albina, and Pinian, she lived in Thagaste, North Africa, and later in Jerusalem, where she founded a double monastery after her husband died. She practiced a rigorous asceticism* and renounced much wealth. By selling many of her properties, she funded monasteries in Egypt, North Africa, Antioch, and Palestine. SUSANNA DRAKE

Melchizedek (Heb "king of righteousness"), king of Salem (= Jerusalem*) and priest of the highest God (Gen 14:18) who blesses Abraham*. An enthronement psalm* calls the king "a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek" (Ps 110:4). This description is also applied to Christ* in Heb 5–7.

Melkites, Arabic- and Greek-speaking Christians who accept the Christology of Chalcedon*, all of the first seven ecumenical councils (those recognized by the Eastern Orthodox* churches, although the Miaphysite* Oriental Orthodox* churches in Syria* recognize only three; see Ecumenical Councils), and the primacy of the pope of Rome. Their name, from the Syriac malkâ, "king," originated among Miaphysites* as a pejorative designation of "the king's people," who sided with the Byzantine emperor in endorsing the Chalcedonian christological formula. Overtures from Rome (14th–18th c.) led to formal recognition of papal claims by some, who kept the name Melkites (1724). Others, who rejected the Roman claims, are now known simply as Greek Orthodox of the Diocese of Antioch, or Antiochian Orthodox. The Melkite patriarchs of Antioch, Jerusalem, and Alexandria have counterparts in the Greek Orthodox*, Syriac* Orthodox, and Coptic* Orthodox churches.

Mendicant Orders, the “begging” orders, with no personal ownership of property; principally the Franciscans*, Dominicans*, Augustinian* hermits or friars, and Carmelites*.

Mennonites. Mennonites trace their origins to Anabaptism*, a renewal movement in Europe (first half of the 16th c.). The Anabaptists, the so-called “radical wing” of the Reformation, shared with the Protestant Reformers a high regard for Scripture and a rejection of papal authority; early Anabaptist leaders frequently referred to the Apostles’ Creed as the foundation of their theology. But Anabaptists and their descendants – Mennonites, Amish*, and Hutterites* – differed with both Roman Catholics and Protestants* in their practice of believer’s baptism*. This conviction, combined with a strong affirmation of Christ’s teachings against violence*, resulted in a view of the church as a voluntary gathering of believers whose way of life would inevitably be in tension with the unredeemed world.

Mennonite theology has been, as a rule, oriented more toward ethical practice (orthopraxis*) than systematic doctrinal formulations (orthodoxy*). This is in part a consequence of the 16th-c. persecution, which deprived the movement of its university-trained leaders. More fundamentally, however, the Anabaptist/Mennonite understanding of faith is inherently “incarnational*.” Thus Hans Denck, an early Anabaptist leader, underscored, “No one can truly know Christ unless one follows him in life.”

This incarnational and Christocentric approach to faith has several important consequences for Mennonite theology. Because Christ* is the fullest revelation of God to humanity, all Scripture must be read through the lens of his precepts and practices. Mennonite theology generally regards the exemplary character of Christ’s life and teachings as inseparable from the salvation offered by his death and resurrection: Christians today, like the disciples of the 1st c., are called to follow Christ in their daily life. Likewise, the voluntary church is understood to be a visible embodiment of the resurrected Christ. Its distinctive practices – including the sharing of economic possessions, the practice of mutual accountability or discipline, egalitarian forms of leadership, and believer’s baptism – offer a corporate witness to the world of a redeemed, transformed life in Christ.

Perhaps the most distinctive aspect of Mennonite theology today is its commitment to an ethic* of love* in all human relationships. Mennonites have understood biblical pacifism* (sometimes called nonresistance) to be a natural concomitant to God’s free gift of grace*: just as God has graciously offered forgiveness to unworthy sinners, so too are Christians – as recipients of that love – called to extend God’s grace to others, including enemies. Mennonites do not always agree about the political consequences of biblical nonresistance. But they are united in their conviction that the body of Christ transcends national boundaries and that Christians are called to be peacemakers by exemplifying Christ’s love in word and deed.

The Mennonite emphasis on believer’s baptism and ethical accountability was sometimes accused of Pelagianism*; Mennonites, however, clearly regard salvation* as a free gift of God's grace, a gift that human beings have the freedom to accept or reject.

Despite their skepticism about systematic approaches to theology, Mennonites have produced numerous confessions of faith. These have tended to be somewhat fluid documents, periodically revised to reflect shifting emphases and concerns.

The influences of Pietism* (especially in the 19th c.) and fundamentalism* (first half of the 20th c.) on Mennonites in North America have attenuated some of the distinctive features of Mennonite theology; more recently, the strong emphasis on peacemaking and social concerns have led some toward theological liberalism. Thus Mennonites debate the question: Should Mennonite theology be rooted in Christian orthodoxy? Or be grounded in distinctive premises, such as a nonviolent understanding of atonement*?

JOHN D. ROTH

Mennonite Worship. The 16th-c. Anabaptist groups, forerunners of the Mennonites, met secretly for worship in homes, forest clearings, or caves to avoid persecution. This practice of worshipping in homes – or, later, in simple meetinghouses – continued in North America well into the 19th c. Today, Mennonite churches vary widely in design, but tend to be simple, strongly emphasizing function over form.

Mennonite worship has no fixed regiment. Generally, it is nonliturgical, with an emphasis on exegetical and practical sermons. Its communal dimension is reflected in four-part congregational singing and in a structured time set aside for congregational sharing or public responses to the sermon. Announcements of upcoming activities during the week are a reminder that the life of the body extends beyond Sunday morning worship. Mennonite worship often includes a “children’s time” (during which a story related to the sermon topic is told) and is often followed by a period of informal fellowship and a Sunday school hour.

Mennonite worship styles have become more fluid. Some congregations have more contemporary worship styles – with amplified instruments, choruses, and clapping – while others reflect “high church” liturgical influences that include responsive readings, the use of the lectionary, and a more intentional focus on the seasons of the church year.

Mennonites generally celebrate Communion* (the Lord’s Supper) two to four times a year. The elements, bread and grape juice, are understood to be a commemoration of Christ’s sacrifice, a celebration of the unity of the gathered community, and a reminder of the suffering* that a Christian might be called to endure. Although the age at which people are baptized varies, baptism follows a confession* of faith and a period of instruction, and is associated with congregational membership. The mode of baptism can be that of sprinkling, pouring, or immersion.

Mercersburg Theology developed from the collaboration of John W. Nevin (1803–86) and Philip Schaff (1819–93) at the seminary of the German Reformed Church (Mercersburg, Pennsylvania). From the Presbyterian “Old School” tradition, Nevin opposed the “new measures” revivalism* associated with Finney*, and was influenced by Coleridge* and German theology. In The Mystical Presence (1846), Nevin interpreted Christ’s presence in the Eucharist* as a “spiritual [rather than corporeal] real presence” of the whole person of Christ through the Holy Spirit, received by faith. Schaff, a Swiss who had studied in Germany and became a major historian of doctrine, emphasized Protestantism’s “Catholic substance”; Protestantism maintained the classic doctrines of the early centuries but purged non-Scriptural accretions. In The Principle of Protestantism (1845), Schaff envisaged a future reunion of “subjective” Protestantism and “objective” Catholicism. Resisting the informality that pervaded US Protestantism, Nevin and then Schaff developed a new liturgy for the Reformed Church, retrieving the perspectives of Calvin* and Knox*, the Reformed* churches in Germany, and the Puritans* at the Savoy* Conference (1661). Although accused of being too sympathetic to Roman Catholicism, like members of the Oxford* Movement they were influenced primarily by German idealism and the Romantic* movement, as well as the Prussian* Union grounded in the Reformed* churches in Germany. They are among the founders of both the ecumenical* movement and the Liturgical* Movement in Protestantism.

EUGENE TESELLE

Mercy, compassionate behavior by those in power toward those who are powerless, do not deserve to be treated with compassion, and are not expected to offer compensation. In the Christian tradition, it is first an attribute of God, then a human action in response to God's mercy.

Mercy as an Attribute of God (e.g. 2 Cor 1:3; Rom 9:15–18, 15:9; Heb 4:16) overlaps with God's compassion* and grace*, and with the expressions of these in atonement*, redemption*, and salvation*. The understanding of God's mercy varies along with the understanding of these key theological concepts. "Lord have mercy!" (the gospel phrase used in the liturgy of both Eastern and Western churches) has, therefore, at least three diverging meanings: (1) God's mercy may refer to the healing of a disease (whether this disease is sin* or an illness) or to the deliverance of persons who are in bondage to some evil power (whether this is a demonic power or an enslaving and oppressive power, as in Egypt; see Atonement #1), an interpretation found in the earliest church, Orthodox* churches, Liberation* theologies, and the Charismatic* Movement. (2) God's mercy may refer to the mercy of the divine judge bestowed on persons who should be condemned but are forgiven (see Atonement #2), an interpretation found in Western* church traditions. (3) God's mercy may refer to God calling people out of their rebellion against God or to God's transforming appeal to lead a life of love, compassion, and mercy, comparable to God's love, compassion, and mercy (see Atonement #3; Sanctification).

Mercy as Human Action in Response to God's Mercy and Made Possible by It. "Be merciful, just as your Father is merciful" (Luke 6: 36; see also, e.g., Hos 6:6; Matt 5:7). The liturgical prayer "Lord have mercy!" implies the willingness to "be conformed" to God's mercy and to act not out of moral independence but with the awareness of one's dependence on others (and God as Other), as in Rom 12:1: "I appeal to you . . . by the mercies of God, to present your bodies as a living sacrifice" (see Almsgiving). The understanding of what this merciful self-sacrifice entails varies according to one's view of God's mercy.

Hermeneutics* of suspicion since Nietzsche* emphasize the pathological effect of such merciful attitudes, especially when this call to be merciful is understood as forgiving and is addressed to people who are oppressed*; the call to forgive one's oppressors is commonly used to justify oppression, as Liberation and Feminist* theologians have underscored (see Forgiveness, Christian Discourses of). But referring to different views of the mercy of God, other theologians point out that a merciful attitude and a moral life are demands grounded not in an ethical, juridical principle (resulting in forgiving the guilty), but in the true encounter with others and the perception of their needs that one mercifully strives to address.

Merici, Angela (c1474–1540), founder of a religious order, the Ursulines; canonized (1807). Born in Venice (where she remained until 1516) and orphaned at a young age, Angela Merici had a vision (1506) in which she was told that she would found a society of pious and charitable virgins in Brescia. She led a prayerful and charitable life and eventually moved to Brescia (1516), where she organized (starting in 1531) a small group of 12 young women to help her with the catechetical work. She founded (1535) the first religious order devoted to the teaching of young girls, with Ursula as patron saint. The goal was to re-Christianize family life and society through the Christian education of future wives and mothers. Each member of the Company of St. Ursula was to continue living in her own home, exercising her apostolate among the members of her family, her social acquaintances, and the children of her neighborhood. The order was approved by Pope Paul III (1544). However, Archbishop Charles Borromeo, a leader of the Catholic* Renewal, changed the administrative organization of the Company to bring it into harmony with the Council of Trent*. Since then, the nuns have been cloistered.

Merit, the quality of deserving reward from God for a work done for God. The scholastics* distinguished "condign" merit (meritum de condigno), based on a strict accounting, from "congruous" merit (meritum de congruo), based on a relationship established by grace*, such that Christ and the Holy Spirit make up for the limitations of finite and sinful human beings. This doctrine was repudiated by Luther*, who underscored the sinfulness of all human works and acknowledged merit only in Christ.

Merton, Thomas (1915–68), US monk, spiritual writer, contemplative*, poet, essayist, social critic, agent of interfaith dialogue. His 1948 autobiography, The Seven Storey Mountain, became a post–World War II religious classic. He died by accidental electrocution in Bangkok.

On December 10, 1941, three days after the bombing of Pearl Harbor, he entered the Cistercian* Abbey of Gethsemani, Kentucky. His early writings focused on solitude and silence as prerequisites for the contemplative* life. The Second Vatican* Council (1962–65) engaged him in redefining the roles of contemplation and action in the modern world.

Merton cultivated the apophatic* mystical* tradition, simultaneously articulating God's mediations (cataphatic tradition) in poetry and prose. His theology was Augustinian, emphasizing the action of grace* on the (unaided) will* and the primacy of love* of God and neighbor.

Merton was an ardent advocate of peace-making* in a world of violence and war. He appropriated Gandhi's nonviolent* theory and practice to address contemporary social problems. He forthrightly opposed the US war in Vietnam as unjust, condemned white liberals' superficial role in addressing US racism*, and challenged society's ephemeral ethics evidenced in "mass man," "post-Christian" identity, and consumerism. Important correspondents included Boris Pasternak, Jean Leclercq, Dorothy Day*, Daniel Berrigan, Czeslaw Milosz, and Ernesto Cardenal. GEORGE KILCOURSE

Messalians. Derived from the Syriac word msallyane, "people who pray," the term "Messalian" was used from the late 4th c. to designate Christian ascetics* who devoted themselves to constant prayer, refused to practice physical labor, and claimed to attain spiritual perfection thereby. First identified as a heretical "movement" by Epiphanius* of Salamis (in Panarion, c377), such "people who pray" became associated with specific doctrines after some were questioned in the 380s and 390s: at issue were beliefs that a demon* dwelled in the soul* from birth and could be expelled only through constant prayer (not simply by baptism*) and that a soul thus purified would receive the Holy* Spirit and be liberated from passions. Messalianism and its practitioners (also identified as Euchites, i.e. "Prayers," and Enthusiasts*) were universally condemned at the Council of Ephesus*, but the Messalian profile continued to evolve and to be condemned throughout the Byzantine period.

The problematic evidence for the "Messalian controversy" has prompted different reconstructions of its origin, nature, extent, and significance. Most historians agree that the term "Messalianism" quickly became used (mainly in the East) to conceptualize an array of early monastic views, practices, and tendencies that originally had no definite connection.

Messiah (Heb Mashiah, "anointed one"; transliterated in Gk as Messias; translated in Gk as Christos). Despite traditional Christian readings of the OT, in the HB the term Mashiah is never used for an individual who would be a future savior* or redeemer*. Kings (see 1–2 Samuel), but also priests (beginning with Moses anointing Aaron, Exod 29:7; Lev 8:12) and even prophets (Elijah is told to anoint Elisha, 1 Kgs 19:16) are anointed as a sign of being chosen for a task. The term is found in Isa 45:1 (Cyrus, the Persian king, is "anointed") and Hab 3:13 (which refers to the anointed who need to be saved by God). But beyond these two instances, the term "anointed" is not found in Isaiah*, Jeremiah*, Ezekiel*, or the Twelve Prophets, despite the repeated mention that future Davidic rulers ("branch of David") are expected to inaugurate a new era of peace and justice that will not end, a view also expressed in the Royal Psalms* (Psalms 2, 18, 20, 21, 45, 72, 89, 101, 110, 132, 144). In sum, in the Prophets and the Psalms "the emphasis is not on the person of the future king but on the fact that, at last, the Davidic ideal... will be realized" (Jonge).

That Jesus was "the Messiah expected by Israel" is a basic Christian conviction expressed in the proclamation of Jesus as the Christ*. Yet one should not conclude from this claim that Jews in the time of Jesus eagerly expected the coming of the Messiah. This generalization, long presupposed in biblical studies, is contradicted by critical analyses of the Palestinian Jewish literature of this period: Wisdom* of Ben Sira; 1–2 Maccabees*, Jubilees*; Testaments* of the Twelve Patriarchs; Dead* Sea Scrolls (which refer to three messianic figures: a Davidic one, a priestly one, and a prophet-like figure); Psalms of Solomon*; Josephus*; 1 Enoch*; and 4 Ezra*. This literature shows that the expectation of the Messiah was relatively unimportant; expectations of future salvation are extremely diverse. The salvific action is often performed directly by God. When other agents of salvation are mentioned, they might be angels, suffering righteous ones, prophetic figures, a figure called the “Son* of man,” or, relatively infrequently, a messiah (an anointed one). While expectation of a messiah is found in Pharisaism* (to the extent that its views are reflected in later sources, such as the Eighteen* Benedictions) and among apocalyptically* minded Jews, by explicitly claiming that Jesus was the Messiah expected by Israel, the followers of Jesus located themselves on the margins of mainline Judaism of the time.

Messianism, as a waiting for the Messiah, remains an important feature of Christianity, with the expectation of the Second* Coming and of the Parousia*. See also APOCALYPTICISM CLUSTER; CHRISTOLOGIES CLUSTER; ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER; JESUS, QUEST FOR THE HISTORICAL.

Metaphor. Metaphoric language refers to an extraordinary affirmation that two unlike “things” – two known concepts firmly established in different fields of meanings – are actually the same despite their strong incongruity (see Paradox).

Metaphoric language has religious significance when, e.g., it arises as a response to both negative limit-experiences (fear of one's own death* or that of a loved one, suffering*, catastrophic loss, guilt) and positive limit-experiences (birth of a child, gratitude, unexpected joy, or forgiveness). Because denotative language is typically inadequate in limit-situations, people are constrained to invoke figurative expressions (metaphoric, symbolic*, analogical*, paradoxical*). Metaphoric statements twist the ordinary meaning of words, concepts, and actions to refer to a way of being in the world beyond that of the everyday. A “live-metaphor” preserves the tension in the claim that something “is” and “is not” at the same time.

Metaphoric language abounds in the Christian Scriptures*. Metaphoric process is evident in the central image of Jesus* Christ*, both human and divine: “I am the vine,” and the “first” is “slave of all” (Mark 10:44, par.). At its best, theology elaborates on and illuminates the meaning and adequacy of particular metaphoric language. Some theorists see theology itself as metaphorical.

Metaphysics and Christian Theology. The general definition of metaphysics in the Cambridge Dictionary of Philosophy, “the philosophical investigation of the nature, construction, and structure of reality,” reflects the general confusion over the concept. Andronicus of Rhodes penned the tantalizing label ta meta ta physika (located “after The Physics”) for Aristotle's (384–22 BCE) shorter works about “first philosophy,” guided by the question “What is the being of beings?” – the ontological question that became central to Christian theology for centuries, before it was questioned from several directions.

“What is real,” “What is a thing,” or “What is the difference between what is real and what appears” are metaphysical questions. Metaphysical options include realism*, dualism*, idealism, materialism, naturalism, and epiphenomenology, and subtle variations of each. Christian theology has long assumed some form of metaphysical realism, at least since Thomas Aquinas*, even if such realism is not empirically verifiable; this lack of verifiability was problematized by many philosophers in recent centuries.

Stoic* philosophical theology assumed that the universal status of a reasoned theological (or cosmological) explanation (grounded in Logos*) was superior to common religious convictions* – “so-called” knowledge about God, assertions without proof. About the knowledge of God, Paul (1 Cor 8:1, 5) discussed and questioned the “real/so-called” distinction used to differentiate God and the gods of the cosmos (1 Cor 8:1, 5).

Augustine’s* metaphysical proposal that God created the universe out of nothing (creatio ex nihilo) posited that God alone was responsible for the creation* of both form and matter. Thereby Augustine rejected the long-standing assumption held by Plato*, Aristotle, and Stoics that the material of the world was uncreated and that divine creation imposed order upon matter. Aquinas (c1226–74) employed Aristotle’s query regarding being qua being in an interpretative flourish on the name of God* (Exod 3:14, read as “I Am Being”), concluding that “Being” is the name of God. Thereby Aquinas united Aristotle’s impersonal deity with the personal deity of Jewish scripture in a Christian “ontotheism” (God as Supreme Being). Duns* Scotus, Henry of Ghent, and William* of Ockham among others offered critiques of Aquinas’s metaphysical theology.

Descartes* (1596–1650) sought to counter the skeptical critics of classical Christian theology by establishing, in Meditations on First Philosophy, the self-certainty of “I am thinking” (cogito, sum) as the unquestionable foundation of knowledge, including knowledge of the existence of God and the external world. The influence of Cartesian thought persists in the privilege given to private or personal experience in modern Christian thought and practice and in individualistic piety (e.g. praying with closed eyes). Rationalist philosophers and theologians concerned with such metaphysical issues include Spinoza* (1632–77), Leibniz (1646–1716), and Hegel* (1770–1831). The privileging of epistemological concerns (how do we know?) became widespread in Anglo-Saxon philosophy, where empiricism flourished in the thinking of Hobbes (1588–1679), Locke* (1632–1704), and Hume* (1711–76). Hume distinguished “natural religion” (metaphysical theology) from “revealed religion,” criticizing the former as philosophically indefensible. Other philosophical critics of metaphysics include Feuerbach* (1804–72), Comte (1798–1857), Nietzsche* (1844–1900), Carnap (1892–1970), and Russell (1872–1970).

Kant* (1724–1804), seeking to determine the limits of reason in knowing, questioned the possibilities of knowing the principles of cosmology or metaphysics (Critique of Pure Reason). Protestant theologians influenced by Kant – Ritschl* (1822–99), Barth (1886–1968), Reinhold Niebuhr* (1892–1971), and Richard Niebuhr* (1894–1962) – shifted the emphasis of their theology from metaphysics to ethics.

Heidegger* (1889–1976) argued against Thomism* that an inquiry into the being of beings is not a query into a supreme or first being, but rather a query into the meaning of “to be,” the verb (in the infinitive) that makes possible thinking about “what is.” But because thinking is dominated by “what is,” by “beings” (metaphysics), and thus is unable to construe properly what it means “to be” (ontologically), we often render the (verb) “to be” of beings as another “being” (a noun). Tillich* (1886–1965), following Heidegger, argued that God is not a being, not even the highest being – a blasphemous confusion of category. For Tillich, God is “being-itself” or the ground-of-being or power-of-being. Process* philosophers and theologians – Hartshorne (1897–2000), Wieman (1884–1975), Williams (1910–73), and Cobb (1925–) – influenced by Whitehead* (1861–1947), questioned the appropriateness of what they call the “substance” ontological assumptions of classical metaphysics (Plato, Aristotle, Aquinas) and propose as an alternative “process,” “relational” metaphysics for Christian theology.

The plurality of metaphysical (ontological and cosmological) assumptions posited by Judeo-Christian traditions, authors, texts, rituals, and institutions undermines the conflation of a specific ontology or cosmology (metaphysics) and faith. For instance, the presence of several distinct creation* stories in the Bible should dissuade Christians from inferring that any one canonized story defines a particular “Christian cosmology.” Bultmann’s* demythologization* project (following Heidegger) interpreted biblical texts existentially rather than cosmologically. Similarly, the controversies and conflicts over issues such as the origin of the universe or the human species between science*, philosophy, and Christian theology result in part from a lack of agreement as to what counts as reason and/or evidence. See also PHILOSOPHY AND CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY. DAVID W. Methodism: Methodist Churches and Their Theology.

The Methodist Movement (now c75 million members worldwide) that John Wesley* (1703–91) initiated within the Church of England (see Anglican Cluster: Anglican Communion and Its Theology) developed from several theological strands: (1) the “holy living” tradition of Thomas* à Kempis, Jeremy Taylor, William Law, and the Puritans*; (2) the Anglican “religious societies” epitomized by the Society* for the Propagation of Christian Knowledge (SPCK); (3) Lutheran piety mediated by the Moravians*; (4) late medieval and English mysticism*; (5) the early church fathers (see Patristic Thought); (6) Calvinism*; and (7) Arminianism*. Wesleyan theology was shaped by the way John Wesley appropriated and rejected aspects of each of these traditions under the exigencies of the Wesleyan revival*. The extraordinarily wide range of Christian thought inherited by Wesley partly explains the many different theological expressions of Methodism/Wesleyanism today, from liberal* and Evangelical* churches to Pentecostal* revivalism. Both North American and British Methodism drifted away from Wesley in the 19th c., but there has been a significant renaissance of Wesleyan theology since the mid-20th c.

John and his brother Charles Wesley* (1707–88), the poet and hymn writer of Methodism, were raised in a large family of strict Puritan/Anglican piety, disciplined learning, and high-church devotion. Diminutive in stature, abundant in spiritual energy, John Wesley traveled about a quarter million miles and preached more than 40,000 times. He outlived the prejudice against him for his religious enthusiasm and died in great esteem.

“The First Rise of Methodism” (as Wesley’s Journal refers to it) occurred during the years 1725–34. With his 1725 decision to become ordained, Wesley began a highly regimented life of self-examination and diary keeping. As students at Christ Church, Oxford, John and Charles were instrumental in forming small groups of university students, including George Whitfield*, for praying, studying Scripture and the church fathers, visiting prisoners, and educating poor children. They appeared to be so methodical in these endeavors that they were derisively called “Methodists.” From this period came three convictions of Methodist belief and practice: (1) that the Christian life is to be disciplined in the pursuit of perfection* (maturity) in obedience to God’s law, (2) that this discipline should manifest itself in ministry to the poor*, and (3) that Christian life should develop in small covenanted groups.

The “Second Rise of Methodism” (1735–38) began when Wesley accepted an invitation of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (see SPCK, Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge) to be a missionary in the new US colony of Georgia founded by James Oglethorpe. Although Wesley was industrious, publishing a hymnbook and equipping himself to convert Native Americans, this period was largely one of failure. He proved too overbearing in pressing the church’s rubrics and moral standards on rough-hewn colonists. This failure, together with his disappointment in not sensing assurance* of salvation through holy living (see Holiness), led to a severe crisis that was the background for his conversion* experience. On the way to Georgia, he had met Moravians* who pressed on him salvation* by faith and the necessity of assurance that one is saved. Upon his return to London, he became active in religious societies, in particular the Fetter Lane Society. Having failed to be perfect in obedience, Wesley was ready to accept the Lutheran emphasis on salvation* by grace* as interpreted by the Moravians and was “converted” at Aldersgate on May 24, 1738. After holy living, grace* in its multifarious senses became the second theme of Methodist theology. Although he experienced doubts shortly after his Aldersgate experience, Wesley preached grace and the possibility of the assurance of salvation in such a forceful way that he was banned from some Anglican parishes.

Following Aldersgate three factors contributed to the development of Wesley’s theology: (1) his visit to the Moravian community in Herrnhut and his observation of Francke's* pietistic social work in Halle, a highly organized form of diaconic spirituality that had a positive impact on social conditions; (2) his reading of Jonathan Edward's* account of the revival* in New England; and (3) his reading of the Church of England Book of Homilies (see Cranmer, Thomas), in which he found the key to his open theological questions and the form of his own theology.

The "Third Rise of Methodism": Revivals and Methodist Societies. In response to Whitfield's plea, Wesley made himself more "vile" by preaching to thousands of the working poor in the open spaces around Bristol (1738–39). It is arguable that the Wesleyan revival materialized as Wesley saw the surprising response to his preaching of grace from the miners and other persons suffering from a loss of place and community in the move from the land to the cities and into the first stages of a brutal labor-intensive economy.

Wesley's theology developed on the ground, as it were, out of the exigencies and new experiences of the revival. The hallmarks of Wesley's theology emerged in constant tension with the Moravian emphasis on faith* alone and the Calvinist* emphasis on election* leading to the doctrine of predestination*. The simple assumption that faith* was the only prerequisite for salvation led, in Wesley's view, to Quietism*. And predestination cut off the lifeblood of Christian discipleship*. Thus took shape the distinctive Wesleyan claim that both faith and good works are constitutive of salvation*.

In the revival, Wesley saw God raising up the Methodists "to reform the nation, especially the church, and to spread scriptural holiness throughout the land." Wesley served as the theologian, teacher, and organizer of the revival, which in the beginning was led primarily by laypersons: mostly uneducated, unordained preachers, class leaders, stewards, and trustees. In addition to visiting sites of new Methodist societies and preaching houses, Wesley furnished an educational and devotional literature for lay leaders (at least 400 books and tracts for the movement; Collected Works [1772–74, first ed.] numbered 32 volumes). Organization of the revival and the maintenance of the Methodist "Con-nexion" required commonly held doctrine and disciplined living. The preachers were to preach no doctrine other than what was contained in the collection of Wesley's published sermons and his Notes upon the New Testament. Wesley's published sermons (eight volumes, 1787–88 ed.) were basically short treatises on Christian doctrine and practice rather than the more engaging sermons he actually preached. The Journal is not so much an autobiography as a propagandistic defense of Methodism against its detractors. It shows how Wesley's theology developed in relation to the organization and mission of the movement and relates vivid portrayals of persons who shaped the movement, their piety, their temptations, and their deaths. His 50-volume Christian Library includes what Wesley judged to be the crucial works of the Christian tradition.

The Methodist societies, classes, bands, and quarterly and annual conferences were considered means of grace by which the objectives of the revival were to be realized. Published minutes of conference meetings became the record of the theology and practice of Methodists. Rules and methods were developed for lay leaders and members of groups. The "General Rules" stood at the center of the common life: "Do no harm, by avoiding evil in every kind. Do good of every possible sort and, as far as possible to all men. Attend upon the ordinances of God." Quarterly examination of members gave force to these rules. Wesley's revival turned out to be more resilient in the end than Whitfield's because he spent as much time organizing his societies, classes, bands, and the "Con-nexion," as he did preaching and writing theology.

Methodism in North America. Wesley began sending preachers to the small number of Methodists in North America in 1769. Having become convinced that a presbyter can also serve as a bishop, Wesley ordained several persons to provide sacraments and episcopal leadership to the fledgling church in the USA, thus sealing the split with the Church of England. With the American Revolution, all persons Wesley had sent to the USA returned to England, save Francis Asbury*, who became the “new Wesley” in the rise of the North American church. After the Peace of Paris, Wesley provided a plan for a separate structure of the North American church, which officially began as the Methodist Episcopal Church at the “Christmas Conference” of 1784. North American Methodism assumed an ambiguous relation to Wesley and took on a shape of its own in the context of US republicanism and expansiveness. During the Second Great* Awakening, with its camp* meetings and close identification with people affected by the vast economic and social changes of the period, Methodism proved to be a major democratizing influence in the nation. The Methodist Protestant Church (1830) assumed a more republican form of polity*. In 1939 the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, merged to form the Methodist Church, which in 1968 united with the Evangelical United Brethren Church and the Methodist Protestant Church to form the United Methodist Church.

The Methodist Episcopal Church gradually became an “established” church, taking on the organization of the US federal government, with executive, legislative, and judicial branches, and becoming the largest Protestant denomination in the nation by the mid-19th c. In agreement with Wesley, who in a letter to Wilberforce* called US slavery* “that execrable villainy,” the “vilest” known to history, the earliest Methodist legislation provided that slave owners could not be Methodists. Within a short time, this was overturned in practice. Succumbing to the economy of slavery and regionalism, the Methodist Episcopal Church split in 1844 into Northern and Southern churches, a harbinger of the bitter division of the country and the horrendous Civil War. African American churches – the African* Methodist Episcopal Church (1816), African Methodist Episcopal Church Zion (1821), and Christian (initially called “Colored”) Methodist Episcopal Church (1870) – separated from the Methodist Episcopal Church on racial grounds (see African American Cluster: African American Churches).

Methodist Theology. The three basic doctrines of the Methodist tradition, original* sin*, justification* by faith, and holiness*, were styled by Wesley thus: repentance* (“the porch of religion”), justification by grace through faith (“the door of religion”), and sanctification* (“religion itself”). The main tenets of Methodism today – the centrality of grace (prevenient, justifying, and sanctifying), holy living, salvation as open to all, and social holiness – generally follow suit.

Although his theology was Evangelical in flavor, Wesley always maintained that Methodists were in harmony with the doctrinal standards of the Church of England (the Thirty*-nine Articles, the Book of Homilies, and the Book of Common Prayer) and only a “hair’s breadth” different from the Calvinists. Wesley’s Evangelical theology is quite different from many forms of 21st-c. Evangelicalism*. He was critical of preachers who reduced the gospel to the grace that led to an oversimplified view of conversion without emphasizing fulfilling the “law of grace.” Wesley’s Evangelical theology is also opposed to the individualism of much current Evangelical theology. The fullness of salvation can take place only in the beloved community of disciples; the only true holiness is “social holiness.” Methodist theology can be summed up by the phrase “faith that works through love.” Justification that does not lead to sanctification withers in the struggles of discipleship. Love* of God must be expressed in love of neighbor* and finds its realistic, practicable forms in the directives and judgments of Matt 25.

The most distinctive and contentious of Wesley’s doctrines was the possibility of experiencing entire sanctification* or Christian perfection*. It prevented Lutheran, Calvinist, and Church of England clergy from joining his movement and led to endless clarifications (1760s–1770s) that did not persuade his critics. Sanctification is a gift of God’s grace. He did not mean thereby works-righteousness or perfectionism and never claimed perfection for himself. The Wesleyan doctrine of assurance of salvation also led to much controversy; Wesley was faced with exaggerated perversions of these doctrines among his own preachers. The second most prominent theologian of the Methodist revival, John Fletcher, sought to clarify the doctrine of sanctification in his Checks Against Antinomianism. Several denominations have split off from mainstream Methodism as a way of maintaining a true doctrine and practice of perfection/holiness, e.g. the Wesleyan Methodist Connection (Church) (1843–1947, 1947–68), Free Methodist Church (1860), and Primitive Methodist Connection (Church) (1811; 1889, USA; 1902, UK).

Methodist Social Principles. Mainstream Methodism has sought to hold together works of piety (prayer*) and works of mercy*, personal holiness and social holiness. Methodists have often followed Wesley's example in collecting clothes, food, and money to distribute to those in need; organizing medical clinics for the poor; microlending for small business undertakings; and subsidizing houses for widows and children. At various times, such as before and after the Civil War in the US South, Methodists have tended to stress "personal holiness" in order to make the church apolitical. But other strands of Methodism, e.g. those heavily involved in the Social* Gospel Movement and those who sympathized with the New Deal, have been engaged not only in personal acts of compassion, but also in "social holiness" that seeks to serve justice in society. Following Wesley's impulse, Methodists have embodied their theology in prison reform, education* for the masses (numerous colleges, universities, and seminaries have been founded by Methodists), the labor movement, women's rights movements, antiwar engagement, temperance actions, child labor elimination, economic* equity, and environmental witness. These commitments were codified in the Methodist "Social Principles," which are still effective in the United Methodist Church (1968). The United Methodist Church, however, continues to be subject to Wesleyan tensions as it seeks to deal with bitter differences over homosexuality*, racism*, economic* justice*, and war* and peace*.

Methodism: Methodist Episcopal Church. See ASBURY, FRANCIS; THE PRESENT CLUSTER: METHODIST CHURCHES AND THEIR THEOLOGY.

Methodism: Methodist Worship. Originally a reform movement within the Church of England (see Anglicanism Cluster), Methodism is an amalgam of Roman Catholic and Evangelical* elements. The distinctive tension in Methodist worship reflects John Wesley's* insistence in the 1740s that Methodists attend Anglican parish worship as well as utilize the new forms of worship and devotion in the Methodist societies and preaching houses emerging from the revivals*. Wesley revered the Anglican liturgy and Cranmer's* 1549 Book of Common* Prayer, but under the influence of the Pietists*, Latitudinarians*, and Nonjurors, he understood the authority of Scripture* to be interrelated with that of the tradition* (especially during the Patristic* period), reason*, and experience as the standards of true worship. Methodist worship has subsequently been known for combining freedom and flexibility with established form.

Scripturally based preaching forms the core of Methodist worship. Wesley's emphasis on the social character of faith is usually reflected in participative worship – especially hymn singing and extempore prayer – but also in revival forms of worship, e.g. Love* Feasts, personal testimonies, watch night services, covenant renewal, weekly prayer meetings, and occasional congregational fasts.

North American Methodist worship was originally shaped by Wesley's "Sunday Service of the Methodists in North America," which was adopted as the "prayer book" of the new Methodist Episcopal Church (1784 Christmas Conference). Post-Revolutionary War developments took North American Methodist worship away from its roots. The Second Great* Awakening phenomenon of camp* meetings (c1800) developed out of quarterly meetings and shaped Methodist worship sensibilities. People camped for several days in tents and wagons, hearing revival preaching and participating in highly emotional worship. Some fainted, “got the shakes*,” or “melted.” Many experienced conversion. Camp meetings both reflected and counteracted the explosive character of life on an expanding frontier and around urban centers.

Though Wesley encouraged Communion* every Lord’s Day, Methodists generally practiced Communion quarterly because of the scarcity of clergy. The use of wine gave way to the use of grape juice, because of the Temperance* Movement. When camp meetings declined, Sunday* school, revivals in churches, and camping experiences emerged as centers of Methodist worship.

Post-Civil War worship grew more formal, especially in the 20th-c. ecumenical movement and Liturgical* Movement, to which the Methodist churches contributed significantly. Preaching remained at the center but was now set in the solemnity and beauty of structured liturgy, reflective of Anglican and Lutheran roots (see Anglicanism Cluster: Anglican Worship and Liturgies; Lutheranism Cluster: Worship). The Wesleyan simplicity of functional worship edifices gave way to more elaborate symbolic buildings in the Federal and later the Romanesque or Gothic revival architectural style. The Akron*-style semicircular sanctuary brought corporate worship and Sunday school into symbiosis as education* rivaled worship in importance. Sophisticated organs, robed choirs, cushioned pews, stained-glass windows, processions, and ornate clergy vestments increasingly became the norm. Successive 20th-c. Methodist hymnals recovered the Christian liturgical* year, the lectionary*, the Psalter in the form of responsive readings, and more traditional rituals for baptism and Communion. Newer hymnals emphasize songs from the global church and a broader spectrum of North American ethnic and social groups.

Methodism in the United Kingdom arose out of an international awakening of Evangelical religion (see Great Awakening) and a sense of dissatisfaction with the prevailing condition of the Church of England (see Anglicanism Cluster). Its origins can be traced to the meetings of a small religious society at Oxford University beginning in 1729. Among the participants were John Wesley* (1703–91) and his brother Charles Wesley* (1707–88), who emerged from the turbulent decade of the 1730s as the leaders of the Methodist Movement, with John supplying much of Methodism’s theological and organizational content and Charles its poetic hymnody. The early stages of the movement were characterized by rancorous theological conflicts as the Wesley brothers began to distance themselves from Moravians*, Calvinists*, and mystics. The Methodism that emerged from these conflicts embraced a connectional system of church government in which societies and classes were serviced by itinerant and local preachers. The annual conference, at which John Wesley met with his itinerant preachers, emerged as the ruling body of the church. In its theology, Methodism reflected mainly the orthodox creedal statements of historic Christianity, but it had distinctive emphases on Arminianism* (the universal offer of salvation*; see Universalism), Christian perfection* or entire sanctification* (the idea that perfect love* is achievable on earth as in heaven), and assurance* of faith based on an experiential sense of sins* forgiven (see Atonement #2).

Methodism remained a self-governing society within the Church of England, at least until 1795, when the Plan of Pacification effectively resulted in sacramental independence. In 1797 Methodism experienced the first of many splits that characterized the movement throughout the 19th c. These divisions, often based on social class, religious style, and competing ideas about church government, were largely repaired in the 20th c., but by then the percentage of Methodists in the English population had begun a decline that shows no sign of reversal.

Methodism recruited many members among women, artisans, miners, and small farmers. Its greatest gains in both town and country were in those areas least susceptible to Anglican paternal control. Its growth was particularly strong in some of the new industrial areas of the north of England, Wales, and parts of Ireland, and less so in Scotland. Methodism also spread to the USA, where it became the largest Protestant denomination in the country. By the late 19th c., its mobile laity and dynamic missionary movement exported Methodism to most countries in the world.

Throughout their history, Methodists' self-declared mission to "spread scriptural holiness throughout the land" has been reflected in their various commitments to education*, temperance*, and trade unionism, and in their opposition to slavery* and blood sports. Although no longer the potent force it was in the 18th and 19th c., Methodism continues to have a voice in ecumenism*, international justice*, and world mission*. Some of its "daughter" churches in the Holiness* and Pentecostal* traditions continue to thrive.

Methodius. See CYRIL AND METHODIUS.

Methodius of Olympus in Lycia, Asia Minor (?–c311), philosopher, bishop, martyr. Acquainted with the Stoic and Platonist traditions, he opposed dualism* – both the notion that matter, coeternal with God, is the source of evil and the notion that soul* must be freed from body*. He followed Irenaeus* in seeing human life as indeterminate and in considering evil* the result of human freedom*. The image* of God, compromised through disobedience, is restored by the Incarnation*, conveyed to others through baptism* and the Holy* Spirit, and fulfilled in the resurrection* of the body and eternal* life. While Methodius learned much from Origen*, he later opposed Origen's highly spiritualized view of resurrection. Methodius's Symposium, modeled on Plato's, praises virginity*. While it is often seen as an early expression of monasticism* (leading some scholars to think he was a charismatic teacher rather than a bishop), virginity is treated as a metaphor for striving after perfection*, applicable to all (L. G. Patterson). This work, like the parable of the ten virgins (Matt 25:1–13) on which it is based, remains partly parable.

Mexico. Christianity in Mexico is complex, because it incorporates two major cultures – Western and Mesoamerican – and many sub-cultures, interwoven in some places with Afro-American elements.

15th-Century Incorporation of Christianity into Mesoamerican Cultures

Spanish Christianity and its mix of cultures.

Christianity in Mexico originated from Spain*, arriving during the Conquest. Iberian Christianity had distinctive characteristics reflecting the diverse beliefs and practices of a population with Iberian, Roman, Celtic*, and Visigoth* cultural roots. Furthermore, Spanish Christianity was forged by seven centuries of interaction with and resistance to Islam*.

Inculturation* in Mesoamerican cultures. In Mesoamerica, Spanish Christianity was further shaped by political transformations linked with colonization and by inculturation* in a territory with a variety of cultures and religions. Four types of Christianity emerged:

1. A Roman Catholicism interwoven with indigenous cultures resulted from the Spanish military conquest of more than 60 sedentary peoples (including the Maya, Mexicas, Purépechas, Mixtecos, and Zapotecos), which had previously been a part of the Mexica, or Mexica-Aztec, Empire. These cultures left pictorial representations of their knowledge and skills, codices conveying their sense of history, religious and civil calendars, pyramids, and ceremonial centers. The reactions of local populations to the Spanish Conquest ranged from armed defense to legal fights and cultural resistance; similarly, their reactions to the arrival of Christianity and European culture ranged from adaptation, to acceptance or to rejection. Thus the Spanish Conquest was more than a military event that came to an end in 1521; it became a long-term process.
2. A Roman Catholicism of mission was developed in regions inhabited by nomadic and seminomadic peoples, whose sense of the universe followed another rhythm. In such cases, mission work initially took the form of itinerant, intermittent evangelization. The missions were associated with the expansion of the Spanish Empire in America (the viceroyalty of New Spain) and reinforced the politics of “reductions*” and “congregations.” The aim of these settlements of Mesoamerican people was to inculcate within them a “better” (Western) religious life and civilization.

3. A Roman Catholicism of transfer was found in regions with few inhabitants, where the Spanish settled, worshipped, and established religious organizations similar to those on the Iberian Peninsula.
4. A Christianity of immigration was practiced by the populations originating in Africa, who, as in other aspects of their lives, sought to hold onto their traditions; they expressed their devotions and religious feasts with iconography, songs, and dances with both African and Christian characteristics.

The 16th-Century Implantation of Roman Catholicism was initiated by Cortés and the priests who accompanied him (1519). Christianity took new forms according to the specific populations that received it and responded in quite different ways to the religious orders’ strategies of evangelization. Different peoples processed the Christian message in accordance with their particular regional, cultural, political, and ethnic perspectives and configurations.

The God of the sedentary groups mentioned earlier, Ometéotl, was dual, both male and female (Ometecuhtli–Omecihuatl), and there were many other deities, including Quetzalcóatl, Kukulcan, Tláloc, Huitzilopochtli, Xilonen, Tlalzolteotl, and Ipalnemohuani (the one who gives us life). There were three interconnected levels of reality – terrestrial, heavenly, and underworld – which provided a sense of interrelation with the environment and allowed for pain and death in life. Their social organization around the altepetl (city-state) and the smaller calpullis (collective living units providing space for work, interactions with others, worship, and the shaping of a sense of identity) reflected their vision of the organization of the universe along four axes, each related to a deity, a color, a symbol, and a tree.

Friars used diverse pedagogical approaches to evangelize these different populations. Some sought to impose Christian doctrines by making their acceptance and the formal rejection of traditional religions a requirement for having a function in the new society. By contrast, some friars used a more inculturated* approach; for them, evangelism involved affirming the presence of the Holy* Spirit in the experience of the indigenous populations.

Religious orders. The mendicant* religious orders (principally the Franciscans*, Dominicans*, and Augustinians*), who arrived in 1524–26 and 1539, developed their missions as autonomous provinces* of their orders; by virtue of papal exemption, the missions were independent, i.e. free of episcopal control. Subsequently the Jesuits* arrived, as did the Conceptionists (a branch of the order of St. Clare*, related to the Franciscans) and other female congregations; thus the diversity of religious orders progressively increased. The orders built convents, schools (with specific educational systems), and social institutions (retreat centers, orphanages, asylums, hospitals) that addressed social and medical needs. Friar Pedro de Gante (c1480–1572) created the School of San José de los Naturales in Tenochtitlán (the first Franciscan school in Mexico). Other Franciscans created the School of Santa Cruz Tlaltelolco (1536–76), which was directed for two decades by its own Nahuatl students, who were instrumental in writing the important Historia general de las cosas de la Nueva España (History of the New Spain) coordinated by Bernardino de Sahagún* (written in the 16th c.; published in the 19th c.). Antonio Valeriano (a student of this school) is said to have written Nican Mopohua, the controversial document about the apparitions of the Virgin of Guadalupe (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Of Guadalupe); even if one contests the historicity that Valeriano attributes to this religious experience, the Nican Mopohua is a valuable example of inculturation. Purépecha students actively participated in the San Nicolas School, founded by Vasco de Quiroga* in Pátzcuaro, Michoacán, electing the school's authorities and teaching their instructors the Purépecha language. One of the objectives of these schools was the education of Nahuatl and Purépecha priests. This unique and effective intercultural experience acknowledged the value of true interchange between the two worldviews that had been brought into contact. Yet these intercultural experiments were quickly replaced by a project of Hispanization, which involved the destruction of non-Hispanic cultures. The education of Mesoamerican priests was prohibited by the first Mexican Provincial Council (1555).

Ecclesiastical organization. Following the old Mesoamerican organization, which was based on the altepetl (city-state) and calpullis (collective living space), the Roman Catholic Church was organized into dioceses, and divided into parishes and smaller “chapels.” This promoted stability in the central region of Mexico. The first Mexican apostolic assemblies (1527–38) made decisions regarding ecclesiastical organization and the sacraments. After the Council of Trent* limited the autonomy of religious orders, the entire ecclesiastical organization was placed under the authority of the bishops. Three Mexican provincial councils (1555, especially 1565, and 1585) defined the approved forms of evangelization that still frame ecclesiastic and liturgical life. Tlaxcala was the see of the first bishop, the Dominican Julián Garcés, who in a letter to Pope Paul III described the Tlaxcala population and their values, influencing Paul III's bull, Sublimus Deus (1537), which recognized the dignity of the “Indians” as rational beings who had souls and were thus entitled to enjoy liberty and receive the sacraments.

The resolutions of the 1585 Mexican Provincial Council included a law aimed at protecting indigenous populations but prohibiting the use of zoomorphic symbols that perpetuated the worship of Mesoamerican deities. Yet the Council also sought to carry forward aspects of the first friars' utopian projects by promoting the popular Mesoamerican devotions to Mary* (under various names) and the saints*.

The Court of the Holy Office (Inquisition*), created in Mexico in 1571, punished deviations in matters of faith, blasphemy, bigamy, and witchcraft*. Nevertheless, after the condemnation and death (at the stake) of Carlos Ometochtzin, the cacique (chief) of Texcoco, the Inquisition was forbidden to intervene among indigenous peoples, because they were new to Roman Catholicism.

Reception and rejection. For the conquerors and missionaries, the destruction of idolatry* was essential. They put an end to ceremonial centers, their priests, and all public ceremonies of the old religion, especially human sacrifice. As a result, popular religion retreated to the sphere of private life.

The substitution of church worship services for traditional religious ceremonies, and of Catholic saints for old gods, allowed traditional beliefs, rituals, and mythic expressions to survive by being rooted in Christian soil, even as they remained framed by Mesoamerican traditions. Especially in the baroque* period (from the late 16th c.), diverse elements of Christian medieval traditions were appropriated and adapted by indigenous peoples.

Yet conflicts were also common. In reaction to a caste system that condemned indigenous populations to the lower caste, there were many forms of resistance: armed, legal, and cultural.

In the late 16th c., the Spanish expansion to the north, motivated by a search for silver, brought a great number of missions, Spanish villages, and military prisons into territories inhabited by battle-hardened nomadic and seminomadic (chichimecas) peoples, causing constant rebellion, which continued into the 17th c.

17th-Century Strengthening and Expansion of Christendom. After the collapse of the Mesoamerican populations (16th c.) owing to wars and epidemics, New Spain in the 17th c. saw a continual growth in population, with a proliferation of mixed cultures, beliefs, and traditions. Meanwhile, in the parishes, another source of conflict was the replacement of the friars of various religious orders by secular clergy. One of the architects of this “secularization” of the parishes, Archbishop Juan de Palafox* y Mendoza, opened the way for a baroque church that sought to replace the worship of “pagan idols*” by popular but appropriate devotions to Mary and the saints, which found expression in the arts and letters. This was a time of Creole pride expressed in the writings of scholars such as Sr. Juana* Inés de la Cruz and Carlos de Sigüenza y Góngora, who claimed the Mesoamerican past as their own and celebrated the natural and cultural wealth of the land, as well as its wonders and miracles (e.g. among many others, the apparitions of the Virgin of Guadalupe).

Formal religious organization was buttressed by the “brotherhoods,” which grouped the faithful by caste and position and performed important religious and social functions. Brotherhoods organized the feasts of patron saints and attended to the moral, spiritual, and economic needs of their members, e.g. during times of bereavement. Brotherhoods also facilitated the control, maintenance, and production of common goods, e.g. providing financially for parishes and convents.

18th-Century Liberal–Monarchical Tensions. At that time, the clergy of New Spain were primarily Creole priests, who strove to differentiate themselves from the Spanish Church and who, because of their strong social presence and the institutional autonomy they enjoyed under Bourbon–Austrian rule, managed to accumulate enormous political and economic power. When the Bourbon monarchs ascended to the Spanish throne (1700), the state strengthened its position, promoting secularization (distancing church from state) and limiting the influence of the religious civil corporations (which performed the civil functions commonly held by city hall in modern states), the brotherhoods, and the Church. The inspector José of Gálvez (sent by Charles III, king of Spain) promoted these changes.

The Bourbon reforms promoted economic development through the exploitation of silver, commerce, and intervention in “Indian” communities. The culmination of the Bourbon measures was the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767), which clearly demonstrated that the objective was to put an end to the autonomy of groups that criticized and thus hindered the governmental practices that benefited the Spanish crown. The populations associated with the Jesuits reacted violently, but were repressed. In cultural terms, the departure of the Jesuits meant a decline of educational opportunities and an increased dependence on a rigid monarchical state, severely weakening communal structures. In Italy several of the expelled Jesuits, including Francisco Javier Clavijero, Francisco Javier Alegre, and Juan Benito Díez de Gamarra, wrote important works on Mexico.

The Fourth Mexican Provincial Council (1771) reflected the tensions resulting from the Bourbon reforms and the pressure that the crown exercised on the clergy. Prelates and parish priests, king and pope were divided. These tensions contributed to the Mexican independence movement. Similarly the blunt preaching of the Dominican friar Servando Teresa de Mier prefigured modernity, the environment in which leaders of the independence matured.

By the end of the 18th c., an increase in Mesoamerican consciousness was apparent in the large number of people involved in projects that would primarily help Mesoamericans (rather than the Spaniards). This indigenous resistance clearly shows the appropriation of Christianity by Mesoamerican groups, also exemplified by the iconography and literary works about the veneration of Guadalupe that clearly incorporated Mesoamerican views. Benedict XIV expressed this in 1754 when he approved the patronage of the Virgin of Guadalupe over New Spain – “She did not do anything similar in any other nation” – making her one of the most important components of Mexican nationalism.

19th Century: Rome's Renewed Control of Catholicism before the Republican-Liberal Triumph

Struggle for control. The period from the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767) to the beginning of the Mexican Revolution (1910) is perceived as a long “Mexican 19th century” – a period marked by a protracted conflict among religious authorities, civil authorities, and society.

Political emancipation from Spain (1821) – a movement that was initiated in 1810 by the priests Hidalgo* and Morelos* but that evolved in ways they had not expected – and the beginning of the Republic gave rise to the conflict over the Patronato* system. The relevant questions were: Who would inherit the rights of the crown? What should be under the control of the state? What should be under the control of the Roman Catholic Church?

Because the pope did not acknowledge Mexican independence (until 1836), no bishops were appointed; the 10 Mexican dioceses remained vacant. Consequently, state representatives were the main protagonists at the important meetings of 1822, where decisions were made regarding ecclesiastical organization. It was not until 1831 that Gregory XVI, taking into account the changes in Mexico, appointed some bishops. The opposing groups – “the realists” associated with the Virgin of los Remedios and “the supporters of independence” associated with the Virgin of Guadalupe – were all Catholics but separated by their views regarding the form, type, and significance of the relation between civil authorities and religious authorities, and their views about the best type of government.

Throughout most of the century, sociopolitical leaders had to contend with two Masonic rites – the Scottish (Escoceses) and York (Yorkino) lodges (see Freemasonry and Christianity) – which conceived in a different way the respective functions and missions of the state and the Roman Catholic Church. There was an ongoing struggle, with frequent shifts of power, between “centralists” (seeking greater political centralization and supporting Roman Catholicism as the state religion) and “federalists” (liberals and anticlericals favoring a political federation with greater autonomy for the states). Thus centralists supported a Patronato concordat* in the 1824 Federal Constitution, which included laws recognizing Roman Catholicism as the exclusive religion. But federalists promoted a liberal type of secularization*, through the reforms proposed by Gómez Farías (1833), the Constitution of 1857, and especially the “organic laws” of “the reform” (1855–60). Wherever these laws were implemented, they involved the suspension of special ecclesiastical status, the nationalization of the properties of the clergy, religious liberty, the separation of church and state, and the institution of civil marriage and secularization of cemeteries. These laws were further reinforced by the 1874 Constitution. Federalists and centralists alternatively promoted other changes, including the successive closing and reopening of the Pontifical University and the other Catholic universities and colleges; formal welcoming of other Christian denominations or official support of Roman Catholicism; nationalization of the properties of the clergy or their restitution; the expulsion of bishops and religious (e.g. the expulsion in 1861 of Luigi Clementi, the apostolic nuncio, and other bishops) or the return of bishops (e.g. in 1864 under Maximilian); and the establishment of new religious congregations and the reinstatement of previously established ones.

Defending the dignity of indigenous peoples.

The restitution of properties to the community by centralists made people aware that the lands that belonged to indigenous peoples had been plundered; this issue and other matters regarding the dignity of indigenous people fueled tensions between the centralists in power and the liberal federalists and their respective political agendas. Unexpectedly, the government most in favor of indigenous peoples was that of Maximilian, who, with the support of the bishops, pursued bilingual politics (issuing documents in Nahuatl) and used his political power to help indigenous peoples with land problems. The Maya retained an extensive autonomous zone, and their military force provided them with important political leverage throughout the century. The Yaquis in the north had been harshly oppressed and deported to Oaxaca and Yucatan; they demonstrated great endurance and dignity in their struggle for liberty, however, confronting the injustice and repression they suffered by walking more than 13,000 kilometers to return to their lands.

The arrival of new denominations. With religious liberty and political support for foreign economic investment, the 19th c. saw the official recognition of other Christian denominations in Mexico. Chaplains and missionaries belonging to other churches arrived to minister to diplomats and business people. In addition, invasion by the US resulted in the appropriation of half of the country (1847; Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 1848, formally ending the Mexican–US War, with the USA appropriating the territory that became Utah, Nevada, California, most of New Mexico and Arizona, and parts of Oklahoma, Colorado, and Wyoming), and the French intervention (1863) resulted in the installation of Maximilian as emperor (1864–67). Diverse missionaries societies were given authorization to enter Mexico (1871); according to the liberal ideal, along with political participation that was less corporate and more individual, anyone was free to cultivate new forms of religious experience and of education.

Strengthening the diocesan structure. The establishment of new dioceses began again during Maximilian's rule, although he did not actively support the reform laws. A total of 24 new dioceses were established during the 19th c., including the period of Porfirio Díaz's regime (the "Porfiriato," 1876–1910). Eight of these dioceses soon became ecclesiastical provinces.

The provincial councils were reinstated, including those of Oaxaca (1892), Durango, Guadalajara, and Michoacán (1895) and that of the archdiocese of Mexico (1896). In addition the First Plenary Council of the Latin American Bishops was convened in Rome (1899), with the purpose of implementing the decrees of the First Vatican* Council (1869–70). Vatican I, which directly contributed to the centralization of the Roman Catholic Church, was attended by seven bishops and three archbishops from Mexico – the largest delegation from Latin America.

With respect to popular devotions, ecclesiastical authorities continued to support the growing veneration of the Virgin Mary. Pope Leo XIII authorized the coronation of the Virgin of Guadalupe (1895), and Pius X proclaimed her patroness of Latin America (1910) (see Mary, the Virgin, Cluster: Of Guadalupe).

This period culminated in the first decade of the 20th c. with the Social Catholic Congresses, the "social weeks," and other initiatives that followed the social* encyclical of Leo XIII, Rerum Novarum (1891). These social Christian activities in the midst of difficult economic conditions and the impoverishment of the majority of the population laid the groundwork for the participation of Christians in the Mexican Revolution, despite its anticlericalism.

20th Century. In 1910 the Mexican Revolution was initiated by the convergence of various political and cultural trends around a single issue: anticlericalism*. In reaction, the National Catholic Party (1911) supported the Roman Catholics in the exercise of their political rights.

Legal restrictions and modernization. The triumph of the Constitutionalist Party during the Revolution led to the establishment of a new constitution (1917). The Jacobin members of the constituent congress built into the constitution a series of anticlerical restrictions: Article 3 prohibited the Roman Catholic Church's involvement in primary and secondary education (education was nationalized and made available to the Mexican masses) and prohibited the Church's organization of workers' and peasants' movements (see Catholic Action); Article 5 prohibited monastic orders as an irrevocable sacrifice of liberty; Article 24 restricted public worship and other religious activities to places of worship; Article 27 strictly limited the possession of real estate by religious groups; and Article 130 denied the legal status of religious groups and the political rights of priests and other religious leaders. In reaction to these measures, there were public demonstrations and a pastoral letter from the bishops protesting the constitution with support from Pope Benedict* XV. But the legislators refused to amend the constitution.

During the government of Plutarco E. Calles (1924–28), "regulation laws" (including anticlerical measures, such as the Law on Worship, 1926) required the implementation of the articles of the constitution by municipal authorities. Political, social, and cultural reactions followed. The Catholic associations, unified in the League for the Defense of Religious Liberty, promoted economic boycotts, legal interventions, and political debates. Their resistance culminated in 1926 in an armed uprising (by the Cristeros, "followers of Christ"). Other movements also resisted the "regulations laws" from the perspective of their diverse religious, political, and economic concerns. In 1929 the Church hierarchy negotiated with the government, reaching agreements that were perceived as treasonous by grassroots Christians (Cristeros, who were excluded from these negotiations). These agreements initiated a modus vivendi – a legal fiction according to which the law would be neither modified nor applied – which was still in force in 1938 when the bishops supported the government of Cárdenas during the expropriation of the oil cartels. The modus vivendi allowed the Church to function with its own buildings, hospitals, schools, and orphanages, although these were legally nonexistent. In 1970 Sergio Méndez* Arceo, bishop of Cuernavaca, in his letter of Anenecuilco to the presidential candidate (later the president), Luis Echeverría, expressed the need for constitutional changes in ecclesiastical matters.

During the two following decades, the Church's involvement in political and social issues increased, so much so that in 1987, once again, the government tried to limit the clergy's political involvement by promulgating an electoral federal code that restricted their participation. The promulgation of this code triggered renewed efforts to make official the modus vivendi by procuring the recognition of the legal status of religious groups, of priests and pastors (with civil rights comparable to those of other citizens), as well as of the churches' educational activities, properties, and public worship, including those outside of church buildings. The weakness of President Carlos Salinas de Gortari (1988–94; whose legitimacy was marred by suspicion of electoral fraud) led him to modernize church-state relations and to modify the inviolable anticlerical laws (1992). As a result, diplomatic relations between Mexico and the Vatican were strengthened. Pope John* Paul II played a significant role in the development of these constitutional amendments, which facilitated the pope's five visits to Mexico.

Changes in lay organizations. During the first decades of the 20th c., lay organizations were initiated primarily by the pope or by the bishops and priests; they were conceptualized and shaped by "the long arm of the hierarchy." At the initiative of Pope Pius* XI (1922–39), the bishops called lay Catholics to found Catholic Action in Mexico by directing their social involvement exclusively toward Catholic social programs; conversely lay Catholics were to limit their involvement in the social and military actions of the anticlerical society.

From 1952, and more clearly after Vatican* II, the social actions of lay Catholics were further justified by the formal recognition that it was their own baptism* (and not the bishops) that called laypersons to assume Christian responsibilities (see Vocation). José and Luz María Álvarez Icaza, a Mexican couple, were invited to the Second Vatican* Council as lay participants. New lay associations were created with objectives directly related to the laity's spiritual life and needs, e.g. the Christian Family Movement, the Courses on Christian Doctrine, and Family Education in the Faith. Vatican II and the Latin American Episcopal Conference (CELAM*) in Medellín* (1968) called Catholics to seek gospel-congruent solutions for the social consequences of impoverishment and structural violence. New lay movements (and the priests, religious, and some bishops who supported them) tried to address these issues as a response to what they viewed as the historical Jesus'* call to his disciples*.

These developments polarized lay Catholic movements and secular, anticlerical movements involved in social actions. As a result, the Catholic movements were banned by the government. Before the student movement of 1968 (which occurred in Mexico as well as in North America and Western Europe), the official position of the hierarchy toward these post-Vatican II lay Catholic movements, their action, and their repression by the state was silence. Nevertheless, a bishop, Méndez Arceo, and several groups of priests and religious publicly denounced the repression of the lay movements and stood with the victims.

It was in this period that Base* Ecclesial Communities (CEBs, Comunidades Eclesiales de Base) were established. Their relatively horizontal spirituality resulted from a collective community-building process by men and women – lay, religious, and clergy – who brought to the gatherings their poverty and their life struggles so that they might be seen in the light of the Word of God of the Bible; from this new perspective, the community envisioned concrete actions as expression of its social commitments. Emanating from the CEBs, a series of civil associations of men and women became involved in education efforts and social awareness raising (concientización); they functioned as nongovernmental organizations for human* rights viewed from a Christian perspective. Since the ecumenical meeting at Oaxtepec (1979), other Christian denominations have actively participated in the ecumenical construction of an alternative world, with greater justice* for all.

Christian involvement beyond church borders. Some dioceses and episcopal regions adopted a radical pastoral orientation in their interaction with the rest of society. Bishop Sergio Méndez Arceo struggled to bring about structural changes that would open the diocese in Cuernavaca to experiments such as the Centro Intercultural de Documentación (CIDOC; 1961–76) of Ivan Ilich. Following the intercultural orientation of the CIDOC, missionary activity was envisioned as an "Alliance for Progress" (as initiated by J. F. Kennedy) requiring that the missionaries identify themselves as guests of the host countries (see Ilich's book, Deschooling Society, a critique of education as practiced in “modern” economies). The involvement with the CIDOC, as well as the “Christians for Socialism” orientation of Bishop Sergio Méndez Arceo, and the use of psychoanalysis by the monk Gregorio Lemerrier in the Monastery of the Resurrection in Cuernavaca, led to a break with the Mexican Bishops’ Conference and the Vatican. Nevertheless, Bishop Sergio Méndez Arceo received many expressions of clear support: Christians and nonbelievers throughout the world, convinced of the necessity of change, named him their bishop “of a cathedral without walls and without borders.”

Toward an autochthonous church. After the Indigenous Congress (1974), D. Samuel Ruiz García, bishop of San Cristóbal, Chiapas, promoted an “autochthonous church,” an initiative welcomed by many bishops in Latin America and elsewhere. Despite suspicion on the part of the Mexican Roman Catholic hierarchy and the Vatican, the autochthonous church initiative gained the support of other bishops of the region, including D. José Llaguno, bishop of the Tarahumara. The commemoration of the fifth centennial of Columbus’ arrival on the continent (1992) became the occasion for promoting a more inclusive sense of collective identity that truly accounts for the presence of Mesoamerican peoples and for making people increasingly aware of the injustices suffered, of the ongoing resistance against the European cultural, political, and economic hegemony, and of the indigenous cultural wealth that can contribute to bringing about urgently needed changes. Thus it was in Chiapas that the Mexican government began to recognize the demands of the Zapatistas and the Zapista Army of National Liberation (1994). For his role as a peacemaker in these negotiations, Bishop Samuel Ruiz García received the 1996 Pacem in Terris award and was nominated for the Nobel Peace Prize.

In the early 21st c., Christianity in Mexico had become less monolithic. While the number of active lay Roman Catholics had significantly decreased, members of other Christian denominations had increased, especially in the southern part of the country. In addition, other religions had progressively settled in Mexico. This religious plurality affects the Christian churches and groups in different ways. For many churches, it has occasioned greater ecumenical openness, dialogue, and cooperation. But for numerous other churches and groups, this plurality is perceived as a threat demanding intra-institutional consolidation and closed Christian communities.

Miaphysite (Gk “one nature”), the christological tradition that grew from Cyril* of Alexandria’s emphasis on the Johannine tradition encapsulated in the phrase “the Word became flesh and dwelled among us.” To represent fully the unity of divine and human in Christ, Cyril (c375–444) originated the term “hypostatic union” from the Greek hypostasis, meaning “underlying reality,” but taken at the Council of Chalcedon* (451) to be the equivalent of “person” (Gk prosopon) and contrasted with “nature” (Gk physis). For Cyril, the Incarnation* brought a real and permanent union between human and divine, i.e. “one incarnate nature of the divine Word” (the Greek phrase begins with Mia physis). Although this union is “out of two natures,” the two natures can be perceived only by an act of pure intellection (mystical contemplation), not by any sensory evidence; neither in his consciousness nor in his activities did Jesus alternate between human and divine; his mother may be called Theotokos* (God-bearer or Mother of God) without hesitation. The dynamic force of the Incarnation* made it possible to understand redemption* as the time when all natural life would be caught up into a graced deification* (theosis*). The formulas of the Council of Chalcedon – “one person (hypostasis) in two natures,” Mary as “Theotokos” – adopted and adapted Cyril’s language, invoking his authority. But would Cyril have accepted the council’s decrees? This is an open question, since he died seven years before. Following Severus* of Antioch, most Christians in Egypt*, Armenia*, Ethiopia*, and much of Syro-Mesopotamia rejected the Chalcedonian definition and affirmed Cyril’s heritage as their own – hence their self-identification as “Orthodox”; they are properly known as “non-Chalcedonian” or “Miaphysite” to distinguish them from those who accept Chalcedon. Yet they vehemently reject Eutyches*, deeming him worthy of the epithet “Monophysite*” (emphasizing “only one nature”). KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Micah, Book of, attributed to a rural Judean prophet, a younger contemporary of Isaiah* of Jerusalem, represents a stinging social critique of the conditions of Israel and Judah in the 8th c. BCE. The book deftly juxtaposes prophecies of judgment (1:2–2:11, 3:1–12, 6:1–7:6) with prophecies of restoration (2:12–13, 4:1–5:15, 7:7–20).

Micah reflects the decades following the height of power and prosperity of Israel and Judah and the context of the fall of the Northern Kingdom. The ancient traditions of the march of the divine warrior, Zion, and messianic hope are all invoked but with a twist. YHWH comes to destroy (1:2–7). Zion shall be plowed because of its iniquities (3:9–12). In its place, the new Zion will signal peace*, justice*, and security (4:1–4). The new shepherd-king will reunite the people and bring peace (2:12–13). The classic exhortation in 6:8 (to do justice, love kindness, and walk humbly with God) brings together some key emphases of 8th-c. prophetic preaching: justice (Amos), steadfast loyalty (Hosea), and humility as contrasted with pride (Isaiah). Each of these issues is seen not only in relation to God–human relationship but also in terms of human–human interaction in all aspects of life.

By placing the call to demilitarize back to back with the agrarian dream of secure, self-sufficient living, Micah makes a critical point of timeless import that there can be no peace without justice.

Middle Knowledge (scientia media) is a kind of knowledge that God has which is “between” the knowledge of pure possibles and the knowledge of actual events, according to Molina*, Bellarmine*, and Suarez*. For these Jesuit theologians, God knows what persons “would do,” quite freely, if offered grace* under certain circumstances and plans accordingly. God offers grace to the elect, yet leaves the decision in their hands: God offers the inducements to which God knows the elect would respond, infallibly but without directly determining the human response. The notion of “middle knowledge” develops Augustine’s* observation (similar to Origen’s* earlier comment) that Luke 10:13–15 (= Matt 11:20–24) speaks of what the people of Tyre and Sidon “would have done.” For Augustine the call and the inclinations toward a positive response come from God, but consent is the person’s own; grace operates through moral* influence rather than through physical determination (see Predestination).

Midrash (Heb), rabbinic form of interpretation of the Bible or commentary, in the mode of halakhah* (legal aspects) or haggadah* (narrative).

Migne, Jacques-Paul (1800–75), editor and publisher of historic texts. Originally a parish priest, he founded a publishing house in Paris that produced the Patrologia Latina (1844–64, 221 volumes) and the Patrologia Graeca (1857–66, 162 volumes), using many previous editions of early and medieval texts. “Migne” has come to stand for the PL and PG canons.

Miguel, Brother (1854–1910), “the Azuayan Lily” of Ecuador*; member of the Roman Catholic Institute of the Brothers of the Christian Schools, catechist*, educator, academic, member of the Ecuadorian Academy of Language (1892). Born in Cuenca, Ecuador, he was known for his long and dedicated labor in the school “El Cebollar.” He was sent to Europe to translate into Spanish texts to be used by Christian Brothers and to teach in a novitiate in Spain, where he died. Beatified in 1977, he was canonized a saint (1984), patron of catechists for First Communion children.

Milan, Edict of (313), a letter from Licinius to the governors in the East, reporting that he and Constantine* had agreed in Milan to tolerate Christianity and all other religions, and to restore the properties that had been confiscated. It was the third edict of toleration (Maxentius in 306, Galerius in 311). It did not “establish” Christianity but gave it official toleration.

Militarism is a pejorative term referring to undue trust in military might, not only as a means of defense against a direct attack, but as means of solving problems. Militarism is especially problematic for Christian theologians because it uses religion* to identify God with a nationalistic and military cause, demonizes* opponents as aggressors, and marginalizes Jesus. For example, the pamphlet of the Fifth Monarchy Men in 17th-c. England called people to a hopeless revolution, citing the OT 18 times, Revelation 14 times, two other NT texts, and never Jesus. Other examples are the many German pastors who, at the beginning of World War I, preached from Rom 8:31: "If God is for us, who can be against us?"

Jeremiah 2:13, 2:37; Isa 30:1–5, 31:1–3; and Hos 5:5 7:10–12 say that placing trust in horses, chariots, and military alliances is like placing idolatrous* trust in broken cisterns that hold no water. Militarism exaggerates what military strength can do, creates false pride and foolhardiness, and leads to the destruction and exile that result from war.

Military spending builds interest groups that push for the appropriation of money that could be used for other causes. In 2007 a full 42% of US income taxes went to past and current military expenses; 22% to health care; 9% to antipoverty programs; 4% to education, training, and social science; and 1% to international relations. See also PACIFISM AND CHRISTIANITY; WAR, CHRISTIAN ATTITUDES TOWARD.

Military Orders are religious orders initially established during the 12th c. to defend Christian pilgrims* and to assist in the defense and expansion of Christian-held territory in Palestine and later in the Iberian Peninsula and elsewhere. Several developed from older Hospitaller orders. In the medieval period, the leading military orders were the Templars, the Hospitallers*, and the Teutonic* Knights. Members of such orders followed a papally approved religious rule and, when not involved in military activity, followed a religious lifestyle similar to that of other orders; several survive to the present day as charitable and Hospitaller organizations.

The military orders' emphasis on the active religious life was typical of 11th- and 12th-c. reform movements in the Latin Church. Their belief in serving God by fighting derived from the OT concept of holy war*, the cults of the warrior-saints of the early church, and the newly developing concept of crusading*. Against the objection that those who live an active life and shed blood cannot be the spiritual equals of traditional cloistered contemplatives, Abbot Bernard* of Clairvaux (1090–1153) argued that they were an example of Christian charity since they defended their fellow Christians. Members of the military orders included knights, other warriors and servants, priests and sisters, and male and female associates. Only the warriors fought; the rest served God through prayer. Typically the early orders attracted the lower nobility and non-nobles, but in time the orders became more aristocratic.

The military orders played an important military role in the Crusades: as standing armies they brought discipline to medieval military forces. In the medieval period, they also made the religious life available to many from the military and lower social classes who were excluded from traditional monastic* orders. Their military involvement ceased (19th c.), but the surviving orders are still involved in charitable work worldwide. See also RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER.

Millenarianism, the belief in a coming major transformation of corrupt, unjust, or otherwise errant society under the sway of evil spiritual powers found in various religious traditions; in Christianity it takes the more specific form of Millennialism. See also APOCALYPTICISM CLUSTER; ESCHATOLOGY CLUSTER; MILLENNIALISM CLUSTER.

1) Introductory Entry

Millennialism (from Lat mille anni, "a thousand years"; also called Chiliasm, from Gk chilias, "a thousand"), the belief that Christ will reign on earth for a thousand years at the end of time, has played an important role in Christian history. The belief derives from Rev 20:2–7, which prophesies that after a series of apocalyptic events, Satan will be bound for a thousand years, during which time Christ and the holy martyrs will reign on earth. Since Revelation next describes the New Jerusalem, Millennialist tradition has assumed that Christ will reign in a rebuilt Temple in Jerusalem. Christian Millennialism, in turn, drew on Jewish apocalyptic writings and even older Mesopotamian religions, notably Zoroastrianism.

Millennialism pervaded early Christianity. About 172 or earlier, Montanus, a convert in Phrygia (in modern-day Turkey), proclaimed that the millennium would soon begin in Phrygia. Montanists' teachings influenced many, including the patristic writers Irenaeus* and Tertullian*.

Pope Zephyrinus condemned Montanism (early 3rd c.), and Millennialism gradually faded as Christianity gained a secure position in the Roman world. The theologian Origen* (c185–c254) vigorously rejected belief in a literal millennium. The thousand-year reign, he argued, allegorically represented Christ's sovereignty in believers' lives. Augustine's* masterpiece, The City of God (413–26), saw a divine plan unfolding in history, but made no reference to a literal thousand-year reign of Christ.

By the 4th c., Catholic dogma, as summarized in the Nicene* Creed (325 and later revisions), foresaw Christ's return and a final Judgment* but otherwise ignored Revelation's more elaborate end-time scenario. Millennialism survived, however, among reformers and wandering prophets and in cathedral sculpture, stained glass, and the visionary music of Hildegard* of Bingen. A central goal of the Crusades* (1097–1270) was to expel Jerusalem's Muslim rulers so the city could fulfill its millennial destiny. The visionary monk and prophecy interpreter Joachim* of Fiore (c1135–1202) saw history unfolding in three great ages, culminating in the Age of the Spirit, when Christ will indeed reign on earth, along with a church radically reformed along monastic lines (see Dispensationalism). The Franciscan* order, founded by Francis* of Assisi soon after Joachim's death, proved receptive to his version of Millennialism. The Hussites, followers of the proto-Protestant Reformer Jan Hus* of Prague, burned at the stake in 1415, were influenced by millennial anticipations.

In the East, meanwhile, the Council of Constantinople* (381) declared Millennialism a heresy*, and the various Eastern Orthodox churches have historically discouraged millennial speculation. As in Catholic Europe, however, it survived at the popular level.

As the Protestant Reformation* unfolded (early 16th c.), its leaders generally rejected Millennialism, and most Lutheran and Reformed churches remain amillennial today. But the Reformation's impact stimulated popular millennial zeal. German peasants who revolted against their rulers (1524–25) and suffered terrible retribution were influenced by Thomas Müntzer*, a Protestant preacher who interpreted their uprising as a harbinger of the millennium. Among the Anabaptists*, who rejected all state authority in religious matters, Melchior Hoffmann and other firebrands espoused Millennialism. When Anabaptists took over the Westphalian city of Münster (1534), a young Dutch tailor, Jan Bockelson, proclaimed the millennium's arrival, with himself as Christ's regent on earth, entitled to take multiple wives. While Bockelson and his entourage lived in luxury, the populace starved. The authorities besieged Münster (1535), and as the desperate residents fled, they were slaughtered. In more benign forms, Millennialism influenced the Pietist* Movement in 17th-c. Germany and the Moravian* Brethren in the 18th c.

Millennial anticipations also inspired the 17th-c. English Puritans* and other Dissenters* who viewed not only the pope but also the Anglican bishopric as agents of the Antichrist* whose overthrow would usher in the millennium. The Puritan poet John Milton* saw the English civil war (1642–48) and its aftermath as the prelude to Christ's earthly reign. Puritan settlers brought Millennialism to North America (from the 1630s), where it would enjoy a long and vigorous afterlife (see the present cluster: In North America).

As interest in prophecy revived in 19th-c. England, such figures as Edward Irving, Henry Drummond, and John Darby* of the Plymouth* Brethren delved into Revelation, Daniel, and other apocalyptic texts to determine the precise sequence of end-time events that will culminate in Christ's millennial reign.

With its apocalyptic* scenario of good and evil in mortal combat, and its seductive vision of a coming age of justice* and peace*, Millennialism has attracted Christians in every era. While the poor* and oppressed* have been especially drawn to it, Millennialism's appeal is by no means limited to the downtrodden. Thomas More's* Utopia (1516), the radicalism of the French Revolution, the world-historical philosophy of Georg Friedrich Hegel*, Karl Marx's* vision of a communist utopia, and even Adolf Hitler's "thousand-year Reich" have all been interpreted as secularized but still recognizable forms of Millennialism. See also DISPENSATIONALISM.

Millennialism in Africa. "Millennialism" refers to the Christian orientation toward the future – the expectation of the return of Jesus Christ, the Parousia*, or the rapture* of the faithful for a thousand-year reign, an escape from the suffering* that the rest will undergo. The churches in Africa believe in such a vision, but they differ in their emphasis.

Most mainline missionary churches in Africa adopt a cautious attitude of wait and see. Other missionary churches, like the Seventh*-day Adventist Church and Jehovah's* Witnesses, make Millennialism one of their distinctive beliefs, and live and work in the light of it. The Watch Tower Movement of Jehovah's Witnesses has spread like wild fire riding on this expectation.

Independent African churches (both Charismatic* and African* Instituted Churches) with their "African view of the future as potentially present" (Mugambi) see their acts of healing (within their prophetic movements) as millennial signs that they will indeed be part of the millennial realization. The Mwana Lesa Movement in 1925 Zambia (described by Ranger) is a good example. At times these millennial expectations have taken on political overtones in situations of oppression, suffering, and discrimination or have been driven by the ideology of some leader, e.g. the head of the Lord's Resistance Army in Uganda.

AUGUSTINE MUSOPOLE

Millennialism in China. Before China encountered the Western millennial tradition, the most powerful millennial idea in China was found in Buddhism*, in the Pure Land traditions and the expectation of the coming of Maitreya Buddha, a kind of messianic incarnation of the Buddha. Millennial strains of Buddhism have given birth to secret societies (White Lotus) and some powerful popular movements; one toppled the Mongol dynasty (14th c.). After Christianity was introduced in China, Christian Millennialism, along with native Buddhist tradition, played an important part in mass movements. The Taiping rebellion under Hong Xiuquan, a messianic leader influenced by Christian Millennialism, almost overthrew the Qing dynasty (mid-19th c.). The Boxer Rebellion (late 19th c.) again demonstrated the power of millennial beliefs, including the magical belief, shared with North American Ghost Dancers and African Kartelite cults, that certain incantations could render believers invulnerable to bullets. Premillennialism, the mainstream theological thinking of the revivalist* movement in Britain and North America (late 19th c.), which was introduced into China by missionaries, widely influenced the conservative wing of the Chinese churches; it was perceived as the only correct interpretation of Scripture*. Premillennialism dominated the churches in China until c1980, but gradually lost its singular importance with the development of popular* Christian practices.

TAO FEIYA

Millennialism in North America. The belief in Christ's thousand-year reign on earth, foretold in Revelation (see the present cluster: Millennialism), looms large in North American Christianity. In the early 17th c., leading New England Puritans* concluded that Christ's millennial kingdom would arise in North America once the French Catholics and the Indians, whom they identified with the Antichrist*, had been vanquished. In the mid-18th c., Jonathan Edwards* speculated that revivalism* and prayer could bring on the millennium. Charles Finney* and other antebellum revivalists similarly viewed their efforts as hastening the millennium.

In the early 1840s, William Miller, after studying the prophecies, foretold Christ's imminent return. In an age of utopian hopes, Miller attracted many followers. Widespread disillusionment resulted when his calculations failed to come to fruition, but from the ashes arose the Seventh*-day Adventist* Church.

In its hopeful guise, known as Post-millennialism*, this belief inspired reform-minded North American Christians to work for justice* and peace* in order to prepare for Christ's millennial reign. In the 20th c., Social* Gospel ministers and Martin Luther King* all invoked millennial themes.

In its pessimistic and apocalyptic* form, Premillennialism, this belief encouraged the view that wickedness and war will increase as the end approaches and that only a remnant of believers will survive the end-time cataclysms to share in Christ's thousand-year reign. In the late 19th c., many North American Evangelicals embraced premillennial Dispensationalism*, formulated by John Darby* of the Plymouth* Brethren. Citing Bible passages, Darby taught that the millennium will be preceded by the rapture*, when true believers join Christ "in the air" (1 Thess 4:17); the seven-year tribulation dominated by the Antichrist; and the Battle of Armageddon, when Christ vanquishes the Antichrist.

Popularized by paperback writers (Left Behind series), televangelists, and fundamentalist* churches, Dispensationalist Millennialism won millions of adherents. According to some surveys, by the early 21st c., some 40% of Christians in the USA embraced some aspects of Darby's system. Dispensationalism had real-world implications, as believers found the United Nations, the global economy, and Israel's divinely ordained boundaries all foretold in Scripture*. See also JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

Millet (Persian, "nation"; Arabic, millah, "people"), the Qur'an's* term for religions of the peoples of the Book (Jews and Christians). Milton, John (1608–74), poet, religious controversialist, shaper of English religious and political history in the turbulent years of the English civil war and protectorate, author of Paradise Lost and other influential Christian poetry; born in London, educated at St. Paul's School and Christ's College, Cambridge. But for his Puritan* sympathies, he would most likely have entered the priesthood in the established Church of England. Instead, he turned to poetry. Milton's struggle over his vocation colors his early poem Lycidas (1638), a pastoral elegy that also satirizes contemporary clerical abuses.

Milton came into his own as a writer in the 1630s and 1640s, when conflicts among divergent church factions roiled England and eventually led to the overthrow of the monarchy. He wrote many treatises urging ecclesiastical reform, including Of Reformation (1641) and The Reason of Church Government (1641). Milton's skill as a polemicist led Cromwell* to commission him to write Eikonoklastes (1649), a defense of the republican government and the execution of King Charles I. In this period, Milton also published Areopagitica (1644), a spirited attack on press censorship that articulates his Protestant commitment to the individual search for truth.

During the protectorate, Milton served as the "secretary for foreign tongues." After the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, he was briefly imprisoned but later lived quietly in London and turned his energies to biblical poetry. Blind from 1651, he relied on his daughters as readers. Paradise Lost (1667, 1674), an epic poem in 12 books, tells the story of Adam* and Eve's fall* and explores the nature of evil* and its place in God's providential plan. Milton consciously evokes Virgil, Dante*, Ariosto, Tasso, and Spenser, even as his subject leads him to "Things unattempted yet in Prose or Rhyme." Paradise Regained (1671) treats Christ's temptation in the desert. Samson Agonistes (1671), a verse drama, retells Samson's fall into blindness and weakness.

Milton's theology is difficult to categorize. Although a staunch opponent of the Roman Catholic Church, he also eschewed rigid Protestant orthodoxies and flirted with “heretical” positions. Unlike the Puritans, he believed in free will* and, in Of Christian Doctrine, he even questioned the Trinity*. William Blake* thought Milton was a Gnostic* (“of the Devil’s party without knowing it”) and praised him as a theological maverick. Milton’s works pulse with the energy of an age when Bible reading led the citizenry to overthrow the monarchy and attempt, if only briefly, a new Christian commonwealth. See also ENGLISH LITERATURE AND CHRISTIANITY. ROGER E. MOORE

Mind, the human intellect, has been understood quite differently throughout Western intellectual history. “Mind” has been used to refer to the human mind and to the divine mind (cf. the Word*). Within this framework, one can distinguish (1) mind as the thinking aspect of the human person, (b) mind as a share of the Divine, and (c) mind as a pragmatic tool (rather than animal instinct) for self-preservation.

For Plato*, mind and intelligibility were the measure of all being. To be is to be intelligible. Mind is one of two fundamental options of the human soul*: either the “senses” (focused on the changeable, sensible realm; turning away from the light of the Good) or the mind (the intelligible), through which one is known by, and knows, the Good itself, an ethical perspective (following Socrates) that equates knowledge with virtue*.

For Augustine*, adapting the Platonic teaching, the Christian God* is the Good itself, the source of being, and also the guarantor of our ability to know with certitude. Jesus Christ, the Logos*, the Truth, illuminates the human mind, rescuing it from the deceptive world distorted by sin*. Furthermore, the human mind (now part of the soul) mirrors through its three aspects – memory, understanding, and will* – the divine Trinity*.

With the rediscovery of Aristotle* (12th c.), a more naturalistic notion of mind (or intellect) emerged. Thus for Aquinas* special divine illumination was not needed for the mind to know truths with certitude and to possess science*.

Nominalists* (e.g. Ockham*, 14th c.) raised concerns about the extent to which the mind yields an accurate picture of the external world, and whether the universals* of the human mind correspond to real natures in things or are creatures of human reason*. Perspectivism and the provisional nature of mind’s ideas were emphasized by, e.g., Nicholas* of Cusa (15th c.), Montaigne (16th c.), and Pascal* (17th c.). Mind is no longer merely the locus of truth where being is reflected; mind is a zone of constructive creativity where the world can be modeled and re-presented, provided that one observes critical norms, owing to the limitations of the human mind (see Hume, David; Kant, Immanuel). Theological truths like God’s existence and the immortality of the soul become mere postulates of the practical mind or reason.

The romantic movement (including Hegel*) resisted this critical trend through a more vigorous notion of Spirit or Mind (der Geist), seeing in history the workings of divine Providence or Spirit itself (i.e. Mind).

In opposition, existentialists or humanists such as Kierkegaard*, Nietzsche*, Heidegger*, and Sartre shared the intuition of the absence or “death*” of God. The mind needs to account for the human condition without recourse to traditional Christian or Neoplatonic notions of a God who is Truth or a supreme Creator Mind structuring the world. Mind becomes more personalistic, dialogical, a pragmatic tool integrated into the whole person.

Thus for Levinas*, Buber*, von* Balthasar, and Wojtyla (John* Paul II), the mind integrated theoretical and practical concerns, privileging pragmatic concerns in the service of the human person. Mind is thus (re)united with ethical considerations. DANIEL O’CONNELL Ministry, Ministries. The NT Greek word diaconia (service or ministry) had mundane origins (e.g. serving table; Luke 10:40), but gained theological meaning in relation to the church’s mission, not without controversy. Against the disciples’ concern to be the greatest among his followers, Jesus taught them, “Whoever wants to be first must be last of all and servant of all” (Mark 9:35, 10:43).

This tension between humble service and pride of position and power (cf. Paul’s self-presentation as both “slave/servant” and “apostle”; Rom 1:1) is found throughout history as a matrix of the church and its mission, whether it led to the rejection or adoption of cultural patterns. Paul emphasized the diversity and unity of ministries through the one Spirit and the one body of Christ (1 Cor 12), as he confronted competition among ministers of the gospel (1 Cor 3). The various ministries (as apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors, teachers) are gifts of Christ “to equip the saints for the work of ministry, for building up the body of Christ”

(Eph 4: 12). Yet by the late 1st c., the churches (mostly house* churches) developed various hierarchical forms of leadership to ensure the integrity of their ministries, often patterned on the patron–client relationship and hierarchical household* codes of the Greco-Roman world. Furthermore, the Western Church progressively assumed the cultural patterns and structures of the Roman Empire (4th c.). Eventually this led to a tripartite, hierarchical structure: bishops*, presbyters* (priests*), and deacons*, with a radical distinction between ordained* ministries and the laity's* largely passive ministry. Parallel to the “secular*” clergy emerged the religious* or “regular*” priestly orders and various lay movements. The 16th-c. Protestant Reformation affirmed “the priesthood* of all believers” but did not completely overcome elitism in its ecclesiastical structures and among its highly trained clergy.

The 18th- to 20th-c. missionary movement spread Christianity throughout Africa, Asia, and other regions, with considerable complications. There the model of highly trained, ordained, and paid clergy was not feasible, but it was possible to find indigenous leaders for all the ministries (as R. Allen pointed out). Furthermore, emerging indigenous churches, especially African* Instituted Churches and Pentecostal*/Charismatic* churches in Latin American and elsewhere, have not required professional pastors with formal training. Decentralized theological* education programs begin to offer widespread training for indigenous leaders, whatever their geographical, cultural, economic, gender, or educational location, preparing for both social and ecclesial ministries.

Similarly, the emergence of Base* Ecclesial Communities brought renewed spiritual life, prophetic relevance, and a new model of ministry to the Roman Catholic Church in Latin America and elsewhere, to some degree in direct confrontation with the hierarchy (as exemplified by the silencing of Liberation* theologians by the Vatican).

Minjung Theology. The Korean term Minjung means “oppressed* people.” In the 1970s, the Minjung suffered under a military dictatorship, a “development dictatorship” that assumed the role of “political messiah” ostensibly to save the people from the evils of poverty and communism. One response to this situation was the publication of the “Theological Declaration of Korean Christians (1973)” and its clandestine circulation within the ecumenical movement in Korea and overseas, which acted as a spark for the new theological movement.

An oppressed worker discovered the biblical message, noting that “Jesus was a worker, too,” which invited the Minjung theological statement “Jesus is Minjung.” This led to reading the Bible through Minjung eyes, a development in biblical hermeneutics started by Ahn Byung-Mu.

Minjung theologians also began to reread Korean history as a history of the Minjung. One clear historical reference is the Tonghak Peasant Movement (1894), similar to the T'aiping Movement for the Heavenly Kingdom (1850–60) in China*. A second is the historic March First Independence Movement (1919) against the Japanese colonial empire.

Minjung theology uncovers the religious dynamics in the life of the Minjung. Tonghak, a Minjung religion, is a convergent religious movement incorporating Minjung expressions of Confucianism*, Buddhism*, Daoism*, and Shamanism*. Minjung theology also catalyzes a Minjung religious hermeneutics to integrate the respective religious texts and histories in its understanding of religion. Thus Minjung theology has opened a new religious horizon in Korea.

Minjung culture, such as Korean mask dance (talchum), is a key resource for Minjung theology. Hyun Young-Hak, one of the original Minjung theologians, discovered a religious dynamic of critical transcendence in talchum. Additional such resources are Minjung painting (represented by artists Hong Sung-Dam and Lee Chul-Soo) and Minjung music and literary writings that express the han (deep feeling of resistance against injustice done) of the Minjung – their suffering under oppressive power. The late Suh Nam-Dong developed a theology of han, taking the theme from various Korean poems and novels.

The social biography of the Minjung posits that the political sovereignty of the Minjung is derived from the sovereignty of God. Jesus is affirmed as the Messiah of the Minjung, and the Minjung are the people of Jesus. “Minjung as sovereign subject” is the theological foundation for Minjung struggle.

Minster (from Lat monasterium), cathedral or large church in Anglo-Saxon England where the clergy lived under a rule*. Münster is a German adaptation of the term introduced by English missionaries.

Miracle, event that evokes wonder or astonishment and thereby promotes reverence or fear. Miracles are generally viewed as exceptions to the usual workings of nature and thus as evidence of supernatural power that validates the authority of a miracle worker when one is involved. Miracles entail a certain amount of ambiguity. They may be divine or angelic, demonic, or the result of human deception, or simply unusual events.

The biblical expression "signs and wonders" suggests that the emphasis may be not simply on unusual power but on the "sign" character of the miraculous events. In the OT, certain impressive events are produced "so that you may know that I am the Lord" (e.g. Exod 11:7, 14:18, 16:6, 16:12–13). Specific signs may validate God's promises (Judg 6:36–40), but seeking or expecting signs or miracles may be "tempting God" or "putting God to the test" (Isa 7:12; Exod 17:7; Deut 6:16; Luke 4:12, par. 1 Cor 1:22). Furthermore, miracles could also be produced by magicians calling on false gods or demons; thus all miracles must be "tested" (Deut 13:1–3; 1 Thess 5:21; 2 Thess 2:9; Rev 16:14).

Most OT miracles are associated with the Exodus (specifically with Moses* and Aaron*) and with Elijah* and Elisha*. Jesus' miracles, including exorcisms*, healings*, the raising of the dead, and "nature miracles," are presented as the fulfillment of prophecy (e.g. Luke 7:22), a sign of the "last times" (e.g. Luke 11:20), and the overcoming of evil powers that keep people in bondage (see Redemption). Some are linked with the forgiveness of sins (Mark 2:1–12). Some are based on the faith of those healed (Mark 10:52) and may not happen because of a lack of faith (Mark 6:5–6). The beneficiary sometimes spreads the news about Jesus (e.g. Mark 5:20), but there may be a lack of response (Luke 10:13).

Similar miracles are attributed to the disciples and apostles in the Gospels, Acts, and the apocryphal* Acts of various apostles, being interpreted as evidence of Jesus' continuing activity through the Holy Spirit. Visions, prophecies, and speaking in tongues were also considered manifestations of divine power.

Throughout the history of Christianity, miracles, especially healings, are often associated with successful missionaries, with saints and their relics, and later with the reserved host* or with especially powerful images or icons* of Christ or the saints. Miracles were often used to validate the authority of one party or another. In the canonization* of saints, miracles (produced by God through the intercession of the saint) came to be expected as a confirmation of the person's sainthood. Miracles of healing are associated with special sites, such as Lourdes* and Fátima*.

During the Enlightenment*, miracles came under criticism as either the delusions of credulous people or fraudulent. The documents that recorded miracles were examined with the conviction* that miracles cannot be viewed as historical (because, being beyond natural laws, they cannot be verified). This notion had been promulgated earlier by Spinoza*, who emphasized that God acts only through natural laws, and by Hume*, for whom miracles were out of keeping with the general expectations developed in the course of one's experience. Protestants often viewed the continuing miracles claimed by Catholics as either fraudulent or diabolical.

Thus following Lessing* and others, a new emphasis was placed on "moral miracles" through the "demonstration of Spirit and power" (1 Cor 2:4), such as Jesus' sinlessness, conversions such as Paul's, life transformations ("fruits of the spirit"; Gal. 5:22–23), the preaching of the gospel by uneducated people, and the rise of an egalitarian community of men and women. While not contravening the laws of nature, "moral miracles" go beyond normal expectations, given human weakness. The view of moral miracles played an important role in revival* and Holiness* movements, but was expanded in subsequent Pentecostal*/Charismatic* movements to include once again healings and other powerful manifestations of the Holy* Spirit against evil powers.

A broader view of miracles, adopted by many theologians and found throughout Christian history, underscores that God's creation of the world is the greatest miracle. The entire cosmos is a miracle; "miracles" in a narrower sense are only the most astonishing manifestations of God's power. In this connection, Schleiermacher* said that "miracle is merely the religious name for 'event.'" EUGENE TESELLE

Mission, Theologies of, and Western and Asian Churches. It is customary today to distinguish between “mission” and “missions.” By mission is meant God the Father’s own “mission” or activities in history through Jesus and in the power of the Holy Spirit. This mission actualizes in time and space the eternal relations among the divine persons of the Trinity*. It is the mission of the church only insofar as the church is empowered to participate in it. By missions is meant the various forms and activities by which the church carries out God’s mission at a particular place and time. Today there is a keen awareness that missions are not restricted to certain individuals, i.e. missionaries, but are incumbent on all Christians. The church is missionary by its very nature.

Like other church activities, Christian missions are undergirded by theologies that both shape the understanding of the church’s mission and dictate the strategies and methods for missions themselves. Different theologies of mission dominated during certain periods of church history, and these paradigms (though they never disappeared) waxed and waned, depending on changes not only in religious but also in sociopolitical, economic, and cultural conditions.

Mission as Proclamation and Witness to Save Souls. This model of mission is inspired primarily by Matt 28:19–20. Jesus’ command to go and make disciples of all nations, baptize them in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and teach them to observe all that he has commanded is taken to mean proclaiming, through words and deeds, the good news of God's salvation to all people and converting them to the Christian religion. Salvation* is exclusively that of the soul*, for which conversion* and baptism* are absolute requirements. Missions are made urgent by the doctrine of original* sin according to which all humans are born as enemies of God and by the belief that very few indeed will be saved. All non-Christian religions are condemned as idolatry* and superstition* or at least as powerless human attempts at self-salvation. A modern version of this theology of mission is found in D. A. McGavran's "church growth movement" and in many Evangelical* and Pentecostal* missionary circles.

Mission as Planting the Church. This model is inspired by Luke 14:23. In this parable, the master orders his servants to go to the roads and country lanes and bring everybody to the banquet so that his house may be full. Conversion and baptism are the first steps toward the final goal of mission, i.e. establishing the church, with all its institutional and sacramental structures. This model is operative in most mainline churches, especially the Roman Catholic Church.

Mission as Serving God's Kingdom of Truth, Love, and Justice. This model is rooted in Luke 4:18–19, which speaks of Jesus' mission of preaching the good news to the poor*, releasing captives, giving sight to the blind, setting the oppressed* free, and proclaiming the favorable year of the Lord. Salvation is understood not in spiritualistic and individualistic terms (as the salvation of souls) or in ecclesiastical terms (as the planting of the church), but as comprising the social, political, economic, and cosmic dimensions of human existence. Paradoxically, this model of mission was facilitated by the Enlightenment* with its ideals of autonomous reason*, individual freedom*, and technological* progress. Today, it is favored by Liberation* theologies of all types, which see the church as servant of the Kingdom* of God, committed to the preferential* option for the poor.

Mission as Dialogue. While not denying the necessity of witness, proclamation, baptism, church planting, and serving, this model of mission focuses on finding the most effective way to carry out God's mission amid cultural diversity, religious pluralism, and massive poverty*. This modality is dialogue*, based on the mystery* of God's incarnation*. The dialogue is fourfold: dialogue of life, which entails living with people of non-Christian faiths; of action, which entails collaborating with them in projects of peace* and justice*; of theological exchange, which entails learning from their different beliefs and practices; and of religious experience, which entails praying with them. The three areas of this fourfold dialogue are liberation, inculturation*, and interreligious dialogue. This model of mission as dialogue has been strongly espoused by the Federation of Asian Bishops' Conferences.

Mission and Eastern Orthodoxy. The Eastern Orthodox* Church's distinctive missionary goal is and has always been to create indigenous eucharistic communities while respecting the indigenous culture, using the local language, offering translations of Holy Scripture and the Divine* Liturgy, creating an alphabet and writing system when necessary, and training indigenous leaders to serve as soon as possible.

The missionary legacy of the apostolic church continued in the 4th c. through missionaries such as Gregory* the Illuminator of Armenia*, Nino* (or Nina) of Georgia*, and Frumentius* of Ethiopia*. During the 4th–6th centuries, the Byzantine Church evangelized the vast regions of the Byzantine Empire, while simultaneously sending missionaries to Syria*, Mesopotamia, Persia, Armenia, Phoenicia, Arabia, Nubia, Ethiopia, and India*. The most famous Byzantine missionaries were the brothers Cyril* and Methodius, who evangelized the Slavic peoples of Moravia (9th c.), creating a Slavic alphabet for their translation work; their 20-year labor resulted in more than 200 indigenous clergy, who in turn evangelized the Slavic lands of Serbia*, Bulgaria*, Moldavia*, and eventually Russia*.

With the fall of Constantinople (1453) to the Ottoman Empire, the Orthodox Church in Russia carried the mantle of missions through such pillars as Stephen of Perm, the evangelizer of the Zyrian people (Northwestern Siberia); the 18th-c. philologist Makarius Glukarev, who spent 14 years in the rugged northern Siberian Altai mountains; Innocent Veniaminov, who ministered for 45 years in Alaska and Eastern Siberia and established the Russian Orthodox Mission Society, along with Nicholas Kasatkin, who entered Japan* in 1862 when the country was one of the most xenophobic in the world, and concluded a 50-year mission with more than 33,000 Christians in 266 communities. The Russian Orthodox Mission Society helped send hundreds of missionaries throughout the vast lands of the eastern end of the Russian Empire, as well as to Alaska, Japan, China*, and Korea*, and published more than 2 million copies of hundreds of translations of the Bible and spiritual writings into 20 languages for various missions.

The best example of a leader of the contemporary Orthodox missionary movement is Anastasios Yannoulatos, archbishop of Albania*, who has led a missionary renewal in Greece* (from 1950s) and influenced many of the Orthodox churches worldwide in their missionary outreach. His academic work in missiology and world religions as a professor at the University of Athens for 25 years, combined with his missionary efforts in East Africa and Albania (from 1981), have set the model for modern Orthodox missions. See also CULTURE AND CHRISTIANITY IN EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

2) A Sampling of Contextual Views and Practices

Mission: Thematic Issues: Anti-slavery. Christian missions had an ambiguous relationship with slavery*. Before the Enlightenment*, few Christians questioned its legitimacy, although some Spanish priests in the Americas urged that slaves be treated with humanity. The first Anglican missionary society, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel (1701), inherited a slave plantation in Barbados, and its first missionary to Africa, Thomas Thompson, published a book in defense of the slave trade (1756). Even some pioneers of the 18th-c. Evangelical missionary awakening (e.g. Thomas Haweis of the London Missionary Society, 1795) were implicated in slave owning.

The Evangelical missionary movement, influenced by Enlightenment thought, nevertheless presumed the equality of all humans and their potential to be raised by grace to the heights of civilization. This ideology of Christian improvement was not a “political theology.” The missionary societies instructed their Caribbean* missionaries to avoid politics and teach slaves to be obedient to their masters. But dissenting chapels created an alternative society in which Bible reading, lay preaching, and open prayer dissolved distinctions between slaves and free persons. Alarmed slave owners placed restrictions on missionary operations, but such repression (which was intensified after the slave rebellions in Demerara, 1823, and Jamaica*, 1831) turned cautious Evangelicals into champions of emancipation. The abolition of slavery was now regarded as essential to ensure freedom for the gospel and elevate degraded and enslaved Africans to full human dignity. Missions contributed directly to slave emancipation in the British Empire (1833–34).

From the 1840s, Christian hopes for the regeneration of Africans shifted from the Caribbean to West Africa, where the colonies of Sierra* Leone (1807) and Liberia* (1820) had been founded as bases from which Christian freed slaves (both African and African American) could evangelize other Africans. T. F. Buxton’s African Civilization Society (1839) and the resulting Niger expedition (1841) aimed to counter the African slave trade by “legitimate commerce” and the gospel. Although the expedition ended in disaster, its goals lived on in the principles of Henry Venn (Church Missionary Society) and David Livingstone*. Venn encouraged cotton cultivation in West Africa to stifle the slave trade and nurture a middle class that would support an indigenous church. Livingstone expected Zambesi cotton to drive out the slave trade from East Africa and remove from Lancashire consciences the burden of dependence on cotton grown by US slaves. In the later 19th c., anti-slavery was a preoccupation of the Catholic missionary strategist Cardinal Lavignerie, founder of the White* Fathers.

BRIAN STANLEY

Mission: Thematic Issues: Emigration or Colonization. When mass emigration from Europe to North America began (18th c.), its volume and direction expanded as technology and communications improved; in the 19th c., 50 million emigrants left Europe. Some followed a specific missionary vocation, and the writings of these pioneers may have stimulated secondary, secular emigration to countries where mission stations were becoming centers of a spreading Western culture* and commerce. Others, conversely, sought the mission field in response to the “heathenism” encountered and publicized by explorers and colonial administrators; other emigrants had socioeconomic betterment as a primary motivation. Few churches, except that of the Mormons*, promulgated a theology of emigration or colonization, and the link between missions and overseas settlement was generally pragmatic and indirect.

Minority emigrants, such as Scandinavian and German Pietists, and Russian Mennonites or Doukhobors, fled religious persecution. Clergy – like the rusticated Scottish Presbyterian Norman McLeod in Nova Scotia in 1817 and the Anglican Isaac Barr in Saskatchewan in 1903 – occasionally orchestrated colonization schemes, while in the 1840s Christian colonies were promoted in New Zealand’s South Island, at Christchurch by English Anglicans and in Otago by Scottish Presbyterians. More commonly, home churches offered financial and practical assistance to emigrants, raising money from congregations to build and staff colonial churches and schools with ministers, catechists, and teachers.

Religious and ethnic issues were sometimes indistinguishable, as colonial mission committees responded to pleas from clergy and laity to reinforce transplanted identities, as well as meet spiritual needs. For example, across Canada, Gaelic-speaking priests and Presbyterian ministers alike complained that inadequate clerical provision was damaging the linguistic as well as the spiritual health of adherents.

From the late 19th c., Christian charities, particularly in Britain, advocated and aided the emigration of unemployed and surplus citizens. The Salvation* Army, advertising itself as the world’s largest emigration agency, used its international network to supervise recruitment and relocation. While attempts to establish Salvationist colonies foundered, thousands of emigrants were transported and found work through the Salvation* Army well into the 20th c. After 1922 unprecedented state funding bolstered collaborative colonization schemes operated by the Salvation Army, the YMCA*, and other Christian charities throughout the British Empire.

The evangelistic dimension of emigration waned during the 20th c, but this does not detract from the lasting religious and cultural impact made by missionaries and emigrants alike in a complex, worldwide network of overlapping relationships whose full implications are not yet fully understood.

MARJORY HARPER

Mission: Thematic Issues: Imperialism.

Christian missions have been associated throughout history with both a divine command and the assumption that they bring a religion “superior” to preexisting local or indigenous religious beliefs and practices. Thus missions were commonly linked with imperialism, the control or subordination of peoples by more powerful and superior ones. Secular authorities since Constantine* and the Roman Empire saw the advantages to imperial rulers of linking Christian expansion to their preoccupations with power, wealth, and security. Conversely, missions – e.g. Spanish and Portuguese (16th c.), and British (19th c.) – often valued the protection and political and material support provided by an imperial power for secure evangelism and the prospect of successful conversions (see Portuguese Explorations, Conquests, and Missions; Spanish Explorations, Conquests, and Missions).

Such relationships were often purely functional or opportunistic, rather than based on principle, whether in missions' relationships with European powers or with indigenous non-European state and empire building – e.g. through dependence on strong local rulers like the kabaka of Buganda, Tswana rulers, or the “king” of Fiji.

Missions generally become enthusiastic agents of imperialism in those regions where indigenous peoples were overtly hostile or deeply resistant to the promulgation of Christianity, as they maintained their own ancient religion and culture. For example, in Muslim regions, China*, and Japan*, and, among the Ndebele in Central Africa, vigorous rejection of Christianity was the norm, with missions increasingly approving of the use of imperial force to break down local resistance. In India*, British missions deplored the government of India's reluctance to support Christian proselytism*. Elsewhere the bitter competition of Catholics and Protestants prompted demands for government backing and expulsion of religious rivals. By contrast missions were the most critical of imperialism in white settler societies, whose treatment of indigenous peoples was usually harsh.

Missions had only limited success either as supporters or as critics of imperialism. Both at home and abroad, mission relations with peoples, governments, and elites remained ambiguous and shifting. Missions' attempts to undermine local cultures were resented, although missions' offerings – literacy, education, medicine, diplomatic mediation, and economic opportunity – were warmly received. Local peoples often selectively plundered missions and the imperialism they frequently peddled, appropriating what seemed useful and discarding the irrelevant. This process gradually broke apart the 19th-c. Enlightenment's* linkage of Christianity, commerce, and civilization. Since then missions' imperialism has become an increasingly local phenomenon at odds with the claims of empires. African and Asian indigenous Christians assisted the process of decolonization as they acquired the means to challenge imperial hierarchies and controls. Simultaneously, the implications of local beliefs for Christianity taking root became better understood.

ANDREW PORTER

Mission: Thematic Issues: Race. Race* became a problem for missions with the expansion of missionary work from Western Europe after 1492. This expansion was closely associated with the creation of the Spanish* and Portuguese* empires and a massive movement of Europeans into the New World, where they occupied the lands of the indigenous people whom they enslaved. This was justified by the assertion that the humanity of the “Indians” and later that of imported Africans was inferior to that of the invaders. The missionary orders, particularly the Franciscans* and Dominicans*, and later the Jesuits*, converted a large number of the indigenous peoples, while asserting their full humanity and attempting to protect them by creating autonomous Christian “Indian” enclaves or reductions*.

The Roman Catholic Church clearly taught that “Indians” and Africans were fully human, but the power of the settlers in the Americas was such that racial discrimination became so entrenched that the episcopate gave in to it and denied “Indians” ordination as priests. In contrast, in Japan* and China*, free from settlers in the 17th c., indigenous men were ordained and even raised to the episcopate.

With the expansion of Protestant Europeans, overwhelmingly British, to North America, the local people were dispossessed of their lands and a large number of Africans were brought to the continent as slave* laborers. This occurred with little or no discussion of the treatment of either “race” in the various Protestant churches.

The Evangelical revival* changed the situation. Slavery was challenged on the basis of the oneness of humanity, and the new Protestant missionary movement became inextricably involved with abolitionism. In the US South in the early 19th c., most Protestant denominations divided (schisms healed only in the mid-20th c.), with the Southern churches developing a biblical defense of slavery and of white racial supremacy. A similar theological development took place in South Africa in the Dutch Reformed churches. These churches produced missions, but they were missions that planted racially defined churches.

The racial egalitarianism of the Catholic and Protestant missions was subtly distorted from c1860 to c1950 by the pervasive impact in the West of "scientific racism" and Anglo-Saxonism, which produced in the missions not crude racism but a pernicious paternalism. For example, until the 1950s, despite the existence of local synodical or episcopal structures, real power in Protestant churches was held by all-white mission councils.

ANDREW C. ROSS

Mission in Africa. Throughout the history* of Christianity in Africa, the understanding of mission and its practice has evolved. Africans were initially on the receiving end of Christian mission before becoming missionaries themselves.

Mission as Conversion and Church Planting. For the early (since the 15th c.) Catholic and Protestant missionary enterprises in Africa, "conversion*" was the primary goal. The missionaries' commitment to education, health and social care, and agricultural projects was a means to achieve this goal.

The Roman Catholic Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith underscored that "mission is that element of ecclesiastical ministry which accomplishes the establishment of the Catholic faith among non-Catholics." Consequently, "conversion" meant the profession of Christian teaching and baptism* in the name of the Trinity*. Conversion implied "the expansion of the Reign of God" and "the founding of new churches" (as Thomas Ohm, OSB, wrote); missionary adaptation was viewed as a threefold process: that of accommodation, assimilation, and transformation.

For Protestants in general, and Evangelicals in particular, mission required a special vocation* through the Holy* Spirit and sending by a church. It aimed at the baptism of non-Christians and at church planting and church growth. As for present-day Charismatic* and Pentecostal* churches, the first evangelistic goal is to bring people to an explicit commitment to Jesus Christ, because the core of the Christian message is the person of Jesus Christ, who must be proclaimed in his fullness in believers' lifestyle and in their words.

Mission as a Quest for Authenticity. In the 1940s, "voices from the margins" (like the Senegalese politicians Léopold Sédar Senghor and Alioune Diop) warned the church in Africa that its survival would depend on its ability to become more authentic in its mission. This was reminiscent of Blyden and Ajayi Johnson's 1870s pioneering works calling missionaries to interpret the gospel as a meeting place with African culture – an approach that Bediako calls a quest for the "hermeneutic of Christian identity." The issue was how the old and the new in African religious consciousness could become integrated into a unified vision of what it meant to be authentically African and Christian. Across most denominations, this view gave impetus to the use of vernacular prayers and songs, in both public and private, formal and informal settings; the spirituality* that grew from such experience became the vehicle for an authentic African Christianity.

Mission Adaptation, Inculturation, and Liberation (Late 1950s to Late 1960s). The formulation of genuinely African theological concepts and practice of mission amounts to the conviction that conversion to Christianity must be coupled with cultural continuity and political freedom. Inculturation* and adaptation were the concerns of church leaders in tropical Africa, while Black Liberation* theology, together with "confessing" and "kairos*" theologies, were the main options chosen in South* Africa. A crisis emerged: the concept of "adaptation" used by North Atlantic missionaries in response to the quest for an African approach to mission was branded inadequate, because the adaptation model aimed at translating a Christianity developed elsewhere into the so-called mission lands. Meanwhile Liberation theology emerged as a “mission call” to the church to liberate the entire personhood of the African threatened by a severe “anthropological poverty*” – not just a poverty of not having, but one of not being. Jean-Marc Ela directed the attention of African churches to their prophetic role as defenders of the oppressed*. These same issues were raised in South Africa by Gabriel Setiloane, Itumeleng Mosala, Desmond Tutu, Allan Boesak, and others in their struggle against the apartheid system.

Mission as Incarnation and as Fostering African Ecclesial Structures. The Fourth Episcopal Synod of the Catholic Bishops of Africa and Malagasy (1974) urged the church to embrace the concept of mission as “incarnation*.” The emphasis was now on the Africanization of the church’s structures and personnel. The same year (1974), Protestant churches gathered at the All* Africa Conference of Churches in Lusaka and adopted the “moratorium issue,” a call for the self-assertion, self-reliance, and self-government of the church in Africa. The Pan-African Conference of the Ecumenical* Association of Third World Theologians (EATWOT II; Accra, 1977) radically stimulated a new momentum in African theological thinking. For the first time, African theologians, including Roman Catholics and Protestants, Francophones and Anglophones, convened.

Mission as Liturgy prolongs the “logic of incarnation” by letting Christian faith “become flesh and blood in African cultures”; the rhythmic melodies that identify the African personality enlivened church services throughout tropical Africa. This movement was observed in Protestant congregations, and especially in the Charismatic* Movement and African* Instituted Churches.

In the Roman Catholic Church, the prescribed Latin language was a handicap. Consequently, the first African renderings of the Holy Mass* (late 1950s) tried to combine African melodies with the Latin text, as in the Missa Luba from Zaire and the Messe des Piroguiers (Canoeists) from Cameroon. In East Africa, Stephen Mbunga excelled by composing the Misa Baba Yetu as the first original text and melody in Swahili, followed by the Misa Kwango in Lingala (Western Congo’s lingua franca). In 1967 the Cameroonian priest Fr. Pie-Claude Ngumu initiated an African celebration of the Mass in Ndzon-Melen (near Yaoundé), which was highly praised at the Eucharistic Congress in Lourdes (1982). Similarly, Cardinal Malula, archbishop of Kinshasa, inspired and supervised the three-year elaboration of the Zairean Rite at the local faculty of theology, which was finally approved under the title “Roman Missal for the Dioceses of Zaire” (see Congo, Democratic Republic of; Inculturation Cluster; Liturgies, History of).

Mission as Healing. The practice of healing* is one of the strongest elements of African churches, both mainstream and independent. As the Ghanaian theologian Appiah-Kubi said, “Priest-healers and prophet-healers in AICs [African Instituted Churches], blending elements of African culture into their services and beliefs, have achieved some remarkable successes in the areas of chronic psychiatric problems.” Andrew Walls has commented, “Healing is addressed to the person as the centre of a complex of influences.” For Archbishop Milingo, what is at stake is to bring “the liberating power of Jesus Christ as the source of healing to people.”

Mission as the Empowerment of Women. “Today it is impossible for African theology...to emerge and to bloom unless both African churches and African theology start out from and develop around the situation of women in Africa,” as Louise Tappa and Mercy Oduyoye, founding members of the Circle* of Concerned African Women Theologians, say. In general, African women theologians reject the doctrinal approach to Christology that prevails in the male-dominated church. Instead, they accept the “Christ of history,” who “defines his mission as a mission of liberation” (see Theology as Human Undertaking Cluster: African Women Theologians Doing Theology: Making Connections). What is at stake here is the wholehearted acceptance of Jesus as the one who brings total liberation, embracing every aspect of life. See also RECONSTRUCTION, AFRICAN THEOLOGIES OF. VALENTIN DEDJI

Mission in Asia. Asia, where Jesus was born and where Christianity began, was never without a significant Christian presence. According to the Malankara Orthodox* Syrian Church (Mar Thoma), in 52 CE the apostle Thomas converted some upper-class Hindu families in Cranagore, went to China, returned to India, organized Christian communities in Malabar, then moved to Coromandel on the east coast, where he suffered martyrdom, and was buried in Mylapore (south of Madras).

In the 3rd and 4th c., the monastic communities of the Syriac Orthodox* Church moved farther east, into Armenia*, Persia, and India*. In China* the mission of a group of monks (led by Aluoben or Alopen) prospered from 635 to 936 under the Tang dynasty (618–907) but disappeared with the Mongol Conquest. Later during the Yuan (Mongol) dynasty (1271–1368), Syriac Orthodox and (for the first time) Catholic missionaries entered China. But Christianity again disappeared when the Yuan fell to the Ming in 1368. In the 17th c., waves of Catholic missionaries, at first Jesuits*, then Dominicans*, Franciscans*, Augustinians*, and members of the Missions Étrangères de Paris, came to China and other Asian countries under the patronage (Padroado*) of Portugal* – except the Philippines*, which was under Spanish jurisdiction. Thus in tandem with Western military conquest and commerce, Christian missions were carried out in India*, Japan*, the Philippines*, Taiwan*, Vietnam*, Cambodia, Laos, Malaysia*, and Indonesia*. An exception was Korea*, in which missions were initiated by the Koreans themselves in 1784. Later Iberian imperialism was joined by Dutch, English, French, and US imperialism.

Roman Catholics were followed by Protestant denominations, especially starting in the 19th c., with their mission “societies” (e.g. the Baptist Missionary, the London Missionary Society, the Netherlands Missionary Society, the Deutsche Christentumsgesellschaft, the Danish-Halle Mission, the Moravian Mission, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Mission, the American Baptist Missionary Board, the Basel* Mission, and the Berlin Society). Today, the presence of Pentecostals* and Charismatics* is significant in many Asian countries.

A recent important development in Asian missions is the emergence of a number of Asian-born missionary societies of apostolic life aimed at mission to non-Christians (ad gentes), in foreign countries (ad exteros), and for life (ad vitam). Notable among these are the Mission Society of the Philippines, the Missionary Society of St. Thomas the Apostle (India), the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of Korea, the Missionary Society of Heralds of Good News (India), the Missionary Society of Thailand, and the Lorenzo Ruiz Mission Society (the Philippines).

In Asia there are many kinds of mission* theologies and practices: proclamation and witness to save souls (especially among Evangelicals, Pentecostals, and Charismatics); planting the church (among main-line churches); serving God’s Kingdom* of truth, love, and justice (related to Liberation theologies); and mission as dialogue*, strongly espoused by the Federation of Asian Bishops’ Conferences.

Mission in Asia: Catholic Mission in China, 16th–18th Centuries. Modern Roman Catholic Missions were opened in China* by Jesuits* (1583–1630s; for earlier periods, see History of Christianity Cluster: In Asia). The pioneer, Matteo Ricci* (1552–1610), adapted the gospel to Chinese culture. According to Ricci, Christianity, the “teachings of heaven,” was the only true universal religion; its monotheism, moral rigor, and intellectual foundations agreed with the pristine teachings of the ancient Chinese sages, which were subsequently “corrupted” by

Buddhism* and Song scholars. By mastering Confucian* culture, Ricci and his companions attracted Chinese elites by the novelty and brilliance of their intellectual and social actions, including the presentation of Western scientific knowledge. When Ricci died (1610), there were 2,500 converts, and in 1636 there were 40,000 (served by 20 Jesuits), despite rebellion, warfare, and dynastic change (1630s–1660s). The arrival of Dominicans* and Franciscans* (1630s) initiated a long dispute over the methods of conversion. Opposed to Ricci's accommodation of Confucianism, his successor, Niccolo Longobardi (1565–1655), and other Spanish friars accused the Jesuits of preaching an adulterated Christianity. The first major persecution (1664–71) was unleashed by a Beijing mandarin: most European missionaries were deported to Guangzhou, although a Jesuit astronomer, Ferdinand Verbiest, won imperial favor. Between 1664 and 1692, with the promulgation of an imperial edict favoring Christianity, the number of converts doubled, from 100,000 to 200,000. But the number of Christians dwindled in the 18th c. to about 120,000, for two reasons. (1) Opposition to Ricci's accommodation resulted in the “Chinese rites* controversy” over the “term question” that led to the condemnation of Chinese “superstitions*” – rites in honor of Confucius and ancestors* – and the condemnation of Christianity by the Qing emperors. The papal decree of 1742 banned the Chinese rites and the use of Shangdi and other terms, except that of Tianzhu, for naming* God. During major persecutions between 1745–48 and 1784–85, European missionaries, Chinese priests, and Christians were martyred. (2) Intense rivalries among religious orders from different European countries developed among Spanish Jesuits, Dominicans, and Franciscans, and newly arrived missionary orders and secular priests from France and Italy. To facilitate missionary work under persecution, more Chinese were recruited and trained for the priesthood, both in China proper and in Italy, France, and Siam. While there were only 4 Chinese priests vs. 86 Europeans in 1724, their number rose to 26 out of a total of 109 in 1739 and 44 out of 101 in 1765. By the end of the 18th c., native clergy constituted the core of the Chinese Catholic Church.

RONNIE PO-CHIA HSIA

Mission in the Caribbean Islands.

Iberian Roman Catholicism came to the Caribbean islands through explorers, conquistadors, and friars (late 15th to early 16th c.). Pope Alexander VI's bulls giving the territories “discovered” by Columbus to Spain made Christian mission a synonym of conquest and domination. The *encomienda system organizing both Christian evangelization and exploitation of native groups resulted in the almost total annihilation of Amerindians. Under the banner of Christian evangelization, converted Caribbean Amerindians were enslaved, exploited, and killed.

Nevertheless, some Roman Catholic friars lifted their prophetic voices against the exploitation of the natives. Antonio de Montesinos's sermons powerfully raised the issue of justice*, inspired Bartolomé de las* Casas, “defender of the Indians,” and anticipated the Valladolid* debate concerning whether Amerindians had souls* (if not, they could be enslaved).

With the genocide of natives, Africans were violently brought as slaves* to sugar and cotton plantations. The dominant mission theology and practice continued: “saving souls while keeping bodies in shackles.” Nevertheless, the Jesuit Alonso de Sandoval resisted the treatment of slaves, promoted the use of African languages by Christianized African slaves, and developed a new missiology toward them, De Instauranda Aethiopum Salute.

Until Vatican* II, the Roman Catholic mission theologies and practices generally remained the same: serving the interest of the powerful and rich, with tenuous critical voices reminding the Church of its sinful interests. With Vatican II and the development of ecumenical emancipation theologies, mission theologies became more concerned with social justice and the Afro-Caribbean character of Christianity in the region. Since the late 20th c., the Caribbean Roman Catholic Church has actively participated in the ecumenical Caribbean Conference of Churches, which developed theologies of religion, cultures*, and emancipation.

In the early 17th c., Protestantism arrived in the Southern Caribbean, where the British and the Dutch, first through pirates and later through missionaries, brought a similar gospel of “saving souls and keeping bodies in shackles.” In the late 19th and early 20th c. in the Latin Caribbean, missionaries from the USA preached a gospel emphasizing education*, social services, and the promotion of US-style democracy* and capitalism.

By contrast the African* Methodist Episcopal Church’s missionary work in the Dominican* Republic and Haiti* and Puerto* Rican missionaries in the Dominican* Republic encouraged, respectively, a Protestant Afro-Caribbean identity and the development of a national Protestant church, La Iglesia Evangélica Dominicana.

Starting in the early 20th c., Pentecostal* and Charismatic* mission theologies and practices varied as Caribbean Pentecostals/Charismatics created a collage of conservative, “saving souls” mission practices and social justice concerns that breaks down traditional theological structures.

In tension with the inherited Iberian Catholic and European/North American Protestant and Pentecostal/Charismatic theologies and practices, current Christian mission in the Caribbean is discovering its own agency and vitality based on its Amerindian–African–European/North American cultural and religious heritage. Mission focuses on both preaching the gospel for the unsaved and engaging in social justice and the emancipation, liberation, and reconciliation of the Caribbean people. It struggles with Afro-Caribbean religions, once identified as demonic*, while developing strong ecumenical* and interfaith programs and searching for an Afro-Caribbean Christian identity.

This “reversal” of mission theology, which involves cross-cultural, cross-religious perspectives, also brings about a “reversal” of mission practice as Caribbean missionaries go to other parts of the world.

CARLOS F. CARDOZA-ORLANDI

Mission in Europe: Germany. From the time of the Crusades*, the task of spreading the gospel was viewed in Germany* as primarily incumbent on the mendicant* orders, later the Jesuits*, and frequently in cooperation with colonial expansion. Important missionary instructions emanated from the Congregatio de Propaganda* Fide in Rome (from the 17th c.).

For the Protestant Reformers, mission was not initially an urgent concern, because Christ’s return was expected in the near future. But in the 18th c., Francke* and Zinzendorf* took up the idea of mission. Protestant missions fully developed in the 19th c. under the influence of the German Awakening through missionary associations and societies. For example, Louis Harms trained at the Hermannsburg Missionary Institute the first “messengers of faith” sent to Africa (1853). They planted Lutheran theology, piety, and church organization in the native African cultures following the program of accommodation and indigenization typical of colonial times (organized at the Berlin* Conference, 1884–85).

Meanwhile, to combat more effectively the social misery caused by 19th-c. industrialization, Wichern* in a historic speech at the Wittenberg Kirchentag* (1848) called the Protestant churches to address the “social question” through the Inner* Mission,” which would complement “foreign mission” and coordinate private and church initiatives. For Wichern lack of faith and moral decline were the major causes of the social crisis; he thus combined mission and social assistance, and a network of social relief institutions was established all over Germany.

With the end of colonialism and the formation of autochthonous churches (1960s) throughout the world, the methods and goals of mission fundamentally changed. Contextualization* and inculturation* are now the guiding concepts for the German churches’ support of Two-thirds World churches, a support offered in the spirit of partnership that ought to characterize the propagation of Christianity in other religious, sociocultural, and political contexts. In this process, preaching and instruction are just as important as medical, diaconal, and social involvement advocated by missionaries such as Albert Schweitzer*. Since World War II, Protestant mission has focused primarily on supporting the development of existing churches (rather than opening new missionary fields). Following Vatican II, German Catholic missionary practice similarly emphasizes dialogue and partnership. German missions participated in the ecumenical movement, which arose from national and international unions and conferences that sought to unify mission efforts and, in the process, led to the founding of the World* Council of Churches in 1948. See also GERMANY.

INGE MAGER

Mission in Europe: Post-Communist Eastern Europe. The most crucial and controversial issue of missions in post-Communist Eastern Europe concerns the level and nature of the involvement of Western churches in the lands traditionally dominated by Orthodox or Roman Catholic state* churches. Although the degree of religious practice differs from country to country across the region, except in the mostly secularized Czech* Republic and former East Germany*, most people in other nations claim allegiance to the dominant religious confession, considering it constitutive of their national and cultural identity. The demise of totalitarian states and discrediting of the imposed Communist ideologies and their atheistic worldviews has thus in most nations been accompanied by a resurgence of the old national but suppressed legacy of religious pride, now emphasized in the new nation-building processes. Ethnoreligious homogenization has been encouraged by the new rulers, who have deliberately empowered the old national churches at the expense of religious minorities and placed restrictions on foreign missionary work.

Many of the Western Evangelical* and Charismatic* mission agencies saw the demise of Communism as a providential opening of long-closed mission fields and took advantage of the immediate post-Communist era of anarchy and spiritual confusion. Lacking proper cultural and ecumenical sensitivities and disregarding the long presence of the Christian faith in these nations, they aggressively promoted Western individualistic concepts of conversion* and church planting. Their claims of doing Evangelism in areas long dominated by godless Communism have been perceived in most cases, however, as threats to national and cultural identity and as needless proselytizing in territories Christianized for centuries. Rare cooperative partnerships between Western mission agencies and national Orthodox and/or Roman Catholic churches, initially conceived as ecumenical support aimed at their internal renewal, did not bear much lasting fruit and were in most cases dissolved under the suspicion that the underlying intention of all Western missionary efforts in Eastern Europe was to win converts away from their ethnoreligious roots (see Proselytism). Some of the Western, mostly North American missionaries and a surprising number of Korean* missionaries continue to operate from the conviction that traditional confessions are moribund, compromised, and spiritually deficient because they do not take personal faith* and Christian morality seriously.

The growth of mutual distrust, confusion, and antagonism is due mostly to differences in ecclesiology and divergences between Orthodox, Roman Catholic, and Evangelical concepts and models of ministry* and missionary activity. On the Protestant Evangelical side, the problems are compounded by disturbed relationships, missionary competitiveness, and a plethora of new denominations and independent churches. PETER KUZMIC

Mission in Latin America: Catholic Mission in Brazil

Indigenous Peoples and Missionaries during the Colonial Period in Brazil. Beginning in 1549, Jesuit* priests Nobrega and Anchieta worked together with the Portuguese* authorities to colonize their territory in Latin America. They first settled in the central Bahia province of Brazil among the Tupi-Guarani, then (18th c.) moved farther north (Belém) and south (São Paulo). Mastering the different native languages served both the efforts to keep the indigenous peoples under control as laborers and to convert them, laying the foundations for mission stations and “reductions*.” The Jesuits’ defense of the “Indians’ freedom” and their position against slavery* resulted in their expulsion from São Paulo, Belém, and other regions and in attacks against the mission stations and reductions in the south. In 1654 Fr. Viera succeeded in obtaining laws protecting the mission stations and reductions, which granted autonomy to the missionaries and controlled the enslavement of indigenous peoples. When the Jesuits lost their influence before Portuguese courts, their opponents, the Bandeirantes (members of an armed militia of early settlers) and proslavery partisans increased. Having reached an agreement with the colonial authorities, the Jesuits shared the missionary work with Carmelite*, Franciscan*, Mercedarian, and other religious orders. Nonetheless, the Jesuits lost favor in Lisbon (1759) and were expelled from Brazil.

Mission and Indigenous Peoples’ Cultures, 19th and 20th Centuries. During this period, indigenous peoples of the northern and western regions of Brazil had an experience similar to that of the populations of the coastal areas during the preceding centuries: they encountered colonization* and its enormous potential for destruction. Colonization was justified as a means of facilitating progress and of exploiting natural resources that were deemed necessary for development. For many indigenous peoples, contact with whites meant extinction or marginal survival. As in earlier centuries and until the 1960s, the Catholic missions of the Salesians*, Capuchins*, and Dominicans* continued to impose a Christianity that demanded acculturation and disregard for the religious practices of indigenous people. Influenced by Vatican* II, the 1968 Latin American Episcopal Conference (CELAM*) fought to protect indigenous populations with the support of defenders of indigenous peoples and many missionaries who denounced massacres. Ultimately CELAM founded the Indigenous Missionary Council (1972). Catechetical instruction was revised to protect the life and culture of the indigenous populations, thus setting a new standard for evangelization.

FERNANDO TORRES-LONDOÑO

Mission in Latin America: Catholic Mission in Mexico. When Tenochtitlan, the Nahuatl city-state, was defeated and colonized, three Franciscans asked permission from Pope Leo X to evangelize the populations. The pope promulgated the bull Alias Felicis Recordationis (1521), which granted to the missionaries full ecclesiastical authority over their mission territories, and even over priests. For the Franciscans, this opened the door to the pursuit of their “Franciscan utopia” (see Mexico). With the next pope, Adrian VI (1521–23), the missionary friars were organized under the authority of Franciscan provincials, and the first 12 missionaries came to Mexico (1524) charged with “catechizing” and “indoctrinating” indigenous peoples.

The 12 missionaries constructed church buildings, learned the languages, and translated catechisms and creeds, pursuing their Franciscan inculturation* projects. Other religious orders—Dominicans (1526), Augustinians (1533), and Jesuits (1572)—soon arrived to help with this complex task, settling in different parts of the territory. After these missionary inroads were made, parishes and convents were established from Central America to California in order to deepen the evangelization and education of indigenous, Spanish, and mestizo* people. The growth of the missions was due in part to their economic importance, resulting from the prosperity of their landholdings, which provided surpluses to support new missions.

In the 17th c., Rome again took control of missionary activities by creating the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. The Franciscans founded colleges for the Propagation of the Faith—first that of Santa Cruz de Querétaro (1682), then those of the Sierra Gorda led by Friar Antonio Margil de Jesús—to prepare new missionaries and to revitalize evangelism, especially in the northern part of Mexico. This missionary effort coincided with the Jesuits' missions of Sonora, Sinaloa, and California, led by Eusebio Kino, SJ. After the Mexican independence, missions were run in vastly different ways; some were abandoned or destroyed, while others became church buildings.

At present several dioceses have developed a special pastoral activity toward indigenous people following the directives of Vatican* II. In Mexico religious orders and congregations now promote the missio ad intra (internal mission) in many regions with an indigenous population. This is a pastoral activity that presupposes a faith already preached and accepted, and that aims at bringing to maturation the faith of believers, including their sanctification (through the sacraments). Yet these religious groups also pursue the missio ad gentes or ad extra, bringing the gospel to diverse parts of the world, even to regions (and indigenous churches) that have already been evangelized. CLODOMIRO SILLER

Mission in North America: Mission as Conquest. The conversion of "Indian" peoples to Christianity began almost from the beginning of the European invasion of the Americas. Such conversions were invariably coerced, always involving the intense political, economic, and social pressure of colonial governments and most often persistently supported by or under the constant threat of colonial military intervention. The first missionary to enter any native community immediately divided that community against itself, to the advantage of the colonial political establishment, forcing an individualist choice between self and the ceremonial and spiritual unity of the community.

Roman Catholic missions in North America followed the paradigm of mission work already developed in Latin America. While Dominicans (eventually including Bartolomé de las* Casas) arrived early in the Caribbean* and worked to bring some sense of justice* to native peoples there, the strategy of Hernán Cortés defined centuries of European colonialism*. Upon dislodging the Aztec government in a murderous war, Cortés imported Franciscan* missionaries explicitly to assist in the pacification of Mexico. This model – rather than the Dominican and las Casian model – became the rule.

In North America, Catholic missionaries worked consistently as agents of the conquering colonial administration in French and British Canada. In territories claimed by the USA, Jesuit missionary Pierre-Jean DeSmet pursued missionary expansion under a non-Catholic colonial government, and yet made himself very useful to the US military in convincing Indian peoples to sign treaties that greatly favored the colonial invaders. Catholic schools became persuasive in implanting a Euro-value system in young Indian children in the 19th and 20th c. (according to the European calendar) and equally so in their attempts to destroy Indian cultural systems – from Indian family* systems to structures of self-governance that had functioned in Indian communities for multiple generations.

The early Protestant paradigm followed the Catholic model; e.g. the "praying towns" in New England were very similar to the mission compounds and "reductions*" (reducciones) in Latin America. In the 1640s, John Eliot worked in the direct hire of the Massachusetts General Council. The model shifted when colonial governments began to move toward disestablishment and a separation of church* and state (18th–19th c.). Missionary endeavors became more directly related to their colonial governments in the USA, as elsewhere. It was more than a coincidence that Episcopal missionary Bishop Henry Benjamin Whipple became a key US government functionary on an important commission dedicated to negotiating the total submission of Lakota Sioux peoples to US hegemony (1870s). The commitment of these missionaries to a cultural* conversion of Indian peoples to a Euro-Western worldview and value system (and not merely a religious conversion to Jesus) can be clearly traced even in the more heroic story of missionary resistance to the US federal government removal plan (1830s) when Samuel Worcester and Elizur Butler spent time in a Georgia state prison to voice their objections to the removal of the Cherokees.

GEORGE E. "TINK" TINKER

Mission in the South Pacific. Missions began in 1797 in the Society Islands, through the London Missionary Society, which believed that its goal was to rescue the heathen from damnation* and civilize them through conversion* and repudiation of their religious and cultural heritage. Wesleyans* held similar views, as did the French Picpus and Marist* Fathers, who were also anxious to establish the true church.

London Missionary workers believed that their converts should develop their own churches and skillfully used local Christians as missionaries. The resulting converts incorporated Christianity into Polynesian political patterns, built large churches, and enthusiastically adopted literacy and European technology. Protestant–Catholic rivalries led to some religious wars. Leading chiefs were fascinated by Hebrew models of kingship. Missionaries advised chiefs on Christian laws and communities as alternatives to historical religious bases and ethical boundaries.

Progressively Catholic missionaries took a more gradualist approach. Bishops Pompallier and Navarre issued important guidelines dealing with cultural differences. Protestants' theology of the Word led them to emphasize translation into local languages, the education of indigenous pastors, and strict discipline.

Work in Melanesia was much more difficult. Apart from some success in New Caledonia, the Solomons, and New Hebrides, it was not until the 1880s that sustained attempts were made to evangelize newly colonized Papua* New Guinea. Experience in Polynesia enabled missionaries to avoid earlier mistakes. French Sacred Heart and German Divine Word fathers sought contact points with tribal cultures as a basis for Christian proclamation. The periodical Anthropos (1906–) published articles about this, based on the fledgling discipline of anthropology. In New Caledonia, the notable French Protestant missiologist M. Leenhardt explored Kanak culture at great depth from 1902 to 1926. German Lutherans like C. Keysser rejected individual conversions*, arguing for baptism* only when the tribe as a whole was ready. These theological and practical changes were important for planting churches in the New Guinea highlands. All missions agreed on the need for indigenous churches, apart from sectarian Protestant groups that were still operating with early 19th-c. evangelistic paradigms and rejecting traditional cultures. The emergence of movements combining Melanesian and Christian motifs made vital the wise assessment of remaining tribal culture. The ecumenical Melanesian Institute (established in 1968), played a vital missiological role, although it did not reach many pastors, whose traditional theology of mission was shaped by tribal rivalries. Liberation from wars and from fear of witchcraft* or demon* possession has been important for Pacific Christians, but conservative interpretations of village unity have often been authoritarian, restrictive, and unhelpful in urban contexts despite the value of communal mission.

IAN BREWARD

Mit Brennender Sorge (German, “with burning concern”), encyclical of Pius* XI, smuggled across the Alps and read from all Roman Catholic pulpits in Germany on Palm* Sunday (March 21, 1937), denouncing violations of the 1933 Concordat* between Germany and the Vatican, the abolition of the OT from the schools, and other features of the Nazi regime and the German* Christian Movement.

Miter, headdress worn by a bishop on solemn occasions, removed during prayers; used since the 11th c. in the West and since the fall of Constantinople (1453) in the East.

Mithraism and Christianity. Mithraism was one of the Greco-Roman mystery* religions that existed during the Roman Empire. One of the several stages of initiation into the mysteries of Mithras apparently involved a sacred meal of bread and water (or water and wine). According to Tertullian*, initiates may also have joined in lustrations. Justin* Martyr, conceding that the Mithraic sacred meal resembled the Christian Eucharist*, viewed the former as a diabolical imitation of the Christian meal. The Mithraic view of salvation* (shedding eternal blood, being piously reborn and created) recalls Christian formulations; the central image of the Mithraic sanctuary, Mithras slaying the bull, is reminiscent of the central place of the crucifixion* and sacrifice* of Christ within Christianity. Avoiding simplistic notions of dependence of one tradition on the other, scholars usually view the development of religions in late antiquity as interdependent. MARVIN MEYER

Mixed Cup, water mixed with eucharistic wine; an ancient practice, disapproved of by the Armenian* Church, Puritans*, and Evangelicals of the Church of England; championed by Anglo-Catholics.

Mixed Marriage, marriage between a Christian and an unbaptized person or between Christians of different churches or denominations.

Modalism, belief that the Trinity* merely represents three modes of operation by a single being (see Monarchians; Patripassianism*; Sabellianism*). The language of baptism formulas that attempt to avoid gendered terms (Father, Son) by using "Creator," "Redeemer," "Sustainer" is deemed modalist.

Modernism, Roman Catholic (1890–1907) was a late-19th- and early-20th-c. movement of English and Continental Roman Catholic scholars who wrestled with questions posed by modernity. Modernism, an originally pejorative name, designated an intellectual orientation of Christians who attempted to incorporate the results of historical criticism and the sciences into contemporary theology. Exchange among Catholic and Protestant biblical scholars, theologians, and philosophers was facilitated by Friedrich von* Hügel, who played a role in bringing together work by scholars in England, France, Italy, and Germany. The movement was condemned in 1907 by Pope Pius X as "a synthesis of errors" and a serious threat to the unity, orthodoxy, and stability of the church. Two documents, a list of errors (Lamentabili) and an encyclical (Pascendi) culled ideas from the writings of Loisy*, Tyrrell*, von* Hügel, Petre*, Ernesto Buonaiuti, and others to systemize the movement under the name "Modernism." The remedies prescribed to overcome Modernism were severely restrictive of biblical interpretation and theology. Viewed in its historical context, Modernism can be interpreted as a movement for renewal within Catholicism that offered an alternative to the liberal Protestant outlook and in some ways anticipated the Second Vatican* Council.

ELLEN M. LEONARD, CSJ

Mogila, Peter. See MOHILA, PETER.

Mohila, Peter (1596–1647) ("Mogila" in Russian; "Movila" in Moldavian-Romanian; "Mohila" in Ukrainian), Moldavian Orthodox monk, theologian, metropolitan of Kiev, author of the Orthodox Confession of Faith; son of the Moldavian prince Simeon and the Hungarian princess Marguerita. Peter was educated in what was then the Polish Ukraine, probably at, among other places, the Brotherhood School in Lviv, Ukraine; the site of his more advanced education is disputed (perhaps the University of Paris or the Jesuit school in Kraków, Poland).

The young Peter Mogila had a military career (from 1616) under the patronage of the Polish crown (battling the Russians with the Hetman [military commander] and Chancellor Stanislaw Zholkiwski, then battling the Turks with the Hetman Jan Carl Chodkiewych). Turning to spiritual warfare, Peter entered the Monastery of the Caves (Pechersky Lavra) in Kiev, Ukraine (August 1627), becoming its archimandrite* (superior; Christmas 1627). In 1631 he founded the Monastery Academy, the first such institution of higher learning in Eastern Europe.

Elected, appointed, and consecrated as the metropolitan of Kiev (1632), he ruled with a fierce independence until his death. He led the struggle to reclaim for the Monastery Academy former monastic properties around Kiev that landowners had appropriated during prior regimes. Yet his 15-year tenure was devoted primarily to a threefold mission: education of both clergy and laity, uniformity of liturgical books and services, and the unification of all Christians. This noble undertaking can be vividly seen in his masterwork, "The Orthodox Confession of Faith" (1640), intended to present the main tenets of Orthodox theology over against Roman Catholic and Protestant claims.

Composed in Kiev, most likely in Polish, the "Confession" was translated into Latin and presented in 1642 to a church council in Jassy, Moldavia, for approval by the Greek Church. Theologian Meletios Syrigos translated the text into Greek with some minor emendations and sent the "Confession" to Constantinople for the patriarchal seal of approval. It was sealed and signed (1643) as a canonical work of the Eastern Church by Patriarch Parthenios of Constantinople, Patriarch Joannikios of Alexandria, Patriarch Paisios of Jerusalem, and Patriarch Makarios of Antioch.

The tripartite "Confession" has a question-and-answer format. Part One concerns the faith and is based on the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed. Part Two concerns hope and is based on the Lord's Prayer, the beatitudes, and works of mercy. Part Three focuses on charity and is based on the Christian virtues and the Ten Commandments.

RONALD POPIVCHAK

Möhler, Johann Adam (1796–1838), Roman Catholic priest, historian, theologian, preeminent figure of the Catholic Tübingen school of theology in Germany. He was influenced by German romanticism and its sense of history's evolving organic wholeness, as reflected in Hegel's* and Schelling's* idealism. In The Unity of the Church or the Principles of Catholicism (1825), Möhler begins not with defined doctrine but historically with the inner, living, evolving church, guided by the presence of the Holy Spirit*. The church "forms itself from inward out" through the spiritual convictions and needs of the Christian community. The church's consciousness is collective and communal, the test of faith being its identity with this consciousness. In Symbolics or Presentation of the Dogmatic Differences of Catholics and Protestants (1832), Möhler speaks of the Catholic bishops and hierarchy as emerging "from below" out of the life of the faithful and of the pope's primacy as symbolizing this unity of the Roman Catholic Church. Möhler contrasts a genuine Catholic theology with both Protestant individualism and its sola scriptura doctrine and the Council of Trent's* (1545–63) dependence on external tradition and authority. Möhler's theology, revived after World War II, influenced the theology of the Second Vatican* Council (1962–65).

JAMES C. LIVINGSTON

Mokone, Mangena (1851–1936), father of the African* Instituted Church movement known as Ethiopianism (1892). He was a Methodist minister, as well as the founder and a staff member of the Kilnerton Training Institution in Pretoria. As a lecturer, he experienced racial discrimination and differential treatment, which led to his leaving the Institution and founding his own church. See also HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN AFRICA; SOUTH AFRICA.

MOKGETHI MOTLHABI

Moldova Republic (or Basarabia), largely Orthodox*, is closely related to Romania*, with which it shares parts of its history.

Christianity has been in the region since the 3rd c. and developed as a part of the Romanian Church. When Moldova was under the Kievan Rus (10th–12th c.), the Orthodox Church was further implanted. The Hungarians, victorious in a battle against the Tatars, brought Roman Catholicism into Moldova (14th c.). But after 1382, with the Musat House reigning over the principality, Eastern Orthodoxy became once again the main church, although the independent-minded Moldavians were soon in tension with the Constantinople Patriarchate. Stephen III the Great (c1457–1504) long resisted the Ottomans and was hailed as "true champion of Christian faith," although he finally submitted to them; he is honored as a saint and supported monasticism* (including Mount Athos*). Other religions were tolerated (with sizable German and Hungarian Roman Catholic communities, as well as Armenians* and, after 1460, Hussite* refugees).

In 1812 Moldova was incorporated into the Russian political sphere, while the Eastern Orthodox Church remained under the jurisdiction of the Patriarchate of Romania until 1940, when it was placed under the jurisdiction of the Patriarchate of Moscow; since the 1990s, there have been attempts to bring the Church back under Romanian jurisdiction. The Eastern Orthodox Church among the Gagauz (people in Southern Moldova, whose Turkic language was adopted during the Ottoman rule) has closer links with the Greek Orthodox Church.

The Moldavian Orthodox Church follows the revised Julian calendar* (since 1923, also adopted by the Romanian Church but rejected by the Russian Church). Accordingly, all the holidays, including Christmas, coincide with Western holidays. Yet the major holiday, the Orthodox Pascha, or Easter*, is celebrated according to the Julian calendar.

Moldavian Orthodox Christians are tolerant of other Christians and other religions, including Islam*. They follow the tradition inherited from Romanian and Russian Orthodoxy. Thus as a sign of appreciation and respect, the young kiss the hands of older men and women. They read the OT following the Septuagint* version and are deeply immersed in patristic and mystic literature (emphasizing Russian mystic literature since 1940). These are emphasized in the theological education offered at the Theological Academy from Chisinau, where men can prepare for the priesthood, and women for the license in theology leading to teaching positions. Laypeople are active in church choral music, usually polyphony in local dialect and Russian.

ILIE MELNICIUC-PUICA

Molina, Luis de (1535–1600), Spanish Jesuit* theologian. His Concordia Liberi Arbitrii cum Gratiae Donis (1588) argued that grace* is efficacious not “intrinsically” but through God’s middle* knowledge, i.e. God’s foreknowledge of what human beings “would do” and the preparation of appropriate inducements to which they freely but infallibly respond. See also COMPATIBILISM; JANSENISM; MORAL INFLUENCE.

Molinos, Miguel de (c1628–c1696). Born in Teruel (Valencia), he entered the priesthood and went to Rome (1663), where he counted among his friends Cardinal Odescalchi, who became (1676) Pope Innocent XI. Molinos is remembered chiefly for his popular book on prayer, La guía espiritual (The Spiritual Guide, English ed.), a guide to the interior life of prayer and the “progress to perfection.” Enormously popular, the book was condemned (1687) for a number of errors later collected in the papal bull Coelestis Pastor (1688) under the general term “Quietism*.” Condemned to life imprisonment, Molinos died in the prison of the Holy Office. The book, prohibited and placed on the List of Prohibited Books (Index Librorum Prohibitorum*), is a readable enough guide to the spiritual life. But its emphasis on the division between “inner” and “outer” and its deemphasis on the role of Jesus in the spiritual life explains why it would not find favor in the Roman Catholic Church. A chapter entitled “Excessive Love and Fervor for Others Can Destroy Inner Peace” (2.3) and advice on how we need detachment from “God himself” (3.18) are reminiscent of the problems faced by the interpreters of Meister Eckhart* three centuries earlier.

PETER TYLER

Monarchians, those who deny that God is a trinity*. In the 2nd and 3rd c., this position grew out of fear that the Logos* doctrine was polytheistic. Modalistic* Monarchianism, or Sabellianism*, claimed that the Trinity is simply three different modes of God’s acting toward the world (creation*, redemption*, sanctification*). Adoptionism* was another form, asserting that Jesus was merely the recipient of divine energies. A third position, anticipating Arianism*, stated that only the Father is truly God, the Son* and Spirit* being creatures.

Monasticism a form of Christian life characterized by ascetic practices, including frequent prayer, renunciation of material goods, celibacy, and some degree of separation from society. As a recognizable movement, monasticism emerged from the various traditions of Christian asceticism* (early 4th c.), most notably in Egypt*, where the terrain lent itself to sharp distinctions between settled areas and the desert regions that came to be associated with the new form of asceticism. Egypt produced two models of monastic life, communal (cenobitic*) and solitary (eremitic*), although the practices were similar, and solitaries formed loose communities around a spiritual guide. The exemplar of eremitic monasticism was Antony the Great (c254–356), whose biography (written in Greek, soon translated into Latin) circulated throughout the Mediterranean world. The key early figure in cenobitic monasticism was Pachomius* (c292–346), whose biography and writings were translated from Coptic into Greek and partially into Latin.

Similar patterns of life were soon evident in Palestine and elsewhere, often overlying more ancient forms of Christian asceticism such as consecrated virginity*. The Egyptian model, disseminated through hagiography, spiritual writings, and traveling monks, found favor among bishops for its emphasis on discipline and loyalty to the episcopate. In regions with strong native ascetic* traditions (e.g. Syria/Mesopotamia), the Egyptian model had a less immediate impact, although it influenced later development and eventually entirely replaced the native ascetic model. Monastically inclined bishops, e.g. the Cappadocian* Basil* of Caesara (c330–79), fostered the development and regulation of monasticism in their regions, creating their own syntheses of the ascetic and monastic traditions.

In the West, translations of Egyptian and other monastic texts into Latin and the creation of Western monastic rules (with content strongly influenced by the Egyptian tradition) led to the replacement of less organized forms of ascetic/monastic life (e.g. that of Martin* of Tours, 317–97, in Gaul) by the more structured models favored by John Cassian* (c365–c435) and his episcopal patrons. In Latin Africa, with a strong native tradition of ascetic practice, Augustine* (354–430) embraced communal monastic life (influenced by, but not directly patterned on, the Egyptian model) and provided an ordered, recognizably monastic form of asceticism.

In the 5th c., monasticism in its various forms, communal and individual, became the dominant ascetic paradigm for both men and women throughout the Christian world. This dominance was encouraged by bishops who had been monks or who saw monasticism as a means of easing tensions between ascetic movements with their nonhierarchical structure and the institutional church. As a clearly defined way of life subject to episcopal regulation, monasticism provided an approved outlet for ascetic inclinations and came to play a vital ecclesiastical and social function in both eastern and western Mediterranean regions. With the requirement (from the 4th–5th c.) that bishops be unmarried, monasteries provided the leadership for the church, further strengthening monastic and episcopal ties.

The communal (cenobitic) form of life, by far the most prevalent form of monasticism, drew inspiration from the lives of renowned hermits while providing a more stable and secure environment. In the West, monasticism has been traditionally associated with Benedict* of Nursia (c480–c540), whose “Rule for Monks” drew from several previous rules and other spiritual texts. Benedict’s interpretation of the monastic tradition slowly became predominant over 300 years, greatly aided by its adoption (early 9th c.) as a tool for monastic reform in the Frankish kingdom (see Louis I, “the Pious”). Benedictine monasticism experienced several waves of renewal and reform, most notably with the 12th-c. rise of the Cistercian Movement with its appeal to a more primitive observance of the Rule. The Islamic conquest of the Middle East and, eventually, of the rest of the Byzantine Empire was a great blow to Eastern monasticism. Even so, great centers of Greek monastic life, such as Mar Saba (Palestine), Mount Athos* (Macedonia), and the Studion (Constantinople), codified monastic practices and established liturgical customs that became universal throughout the Orthodox* churches (both Greek and Slavic).

Among Eastern Christians, monasticism has remained the dominant paradigm for nonmarried vowed life. In the Western Church, new forms of vowed life appeared with the Franciscans* and Dominicans* (12th c.), and later (16th c.) the Jesuits*. But these should not be confused with actual monasticism. In the modern era, Western monasticism was severely affected by the French Revolution and its aftereffects in Germany and Austria, although it revived (mid-19th c.) and spread to North America, Africa, and Asia. After a great flowering (19th c.), monasticism in the Slavic world was devastated by the 1917 Russian Revolution and the spread of Communism after World War II, but revived after the collapse of the Soviet Union. There was a monastic revival in Egypt and on Mount Athos* (late 20th c.). Among Armenians* the genocide* in Turkish Armenia (early 20th c.), combined with Soviet rule in Eastern Armenia, effectively destroyed monastic life for men, while it continues in a greatly diminished form for women. Syriac monasticism in the Middle East suffered similarly, with early indications of a revival, especially in India and among Syriac Christian emigrant communities in Europe.

The basic pattern of monastic life has been universal throughout Christian history and across geographic and cultural divides. Daily communal prayer at regular intervals, normally including a nocturnal vigil, is the fundamental obligation and marker of the monastic life. Traditionally, monastic prayer has consisted largely of sung or recited psalms, accompanied by readings from other parts of the Bible, and hymns. Dietary restrictions such as fasting and abstinence from meat or other animal products are typical, especially on certain days and during liturgical seasons of penance*. Monks and nuns have been distinguished from nonmonastic Christians by their dress – a difference evident even in the early period of monastic life when the form of monastic dress more closely resembled conventional clothing. In the West, monks tended to have shorn hair, normally with a distinctive cut (tonsure), while in the East hair and beard were typically left untrimmed. In both East and West, following prevailing cultural norms, monastic women were veiled, although some now dispense with the veil.

Monasticism exists as an expression of baptismal* commitment, with an additional formal commitment to the monastic life through vows. The form and understanding of monastic* vows have varied greatly, but the fundamental obligations to monastic practices, including celibacy*, renunciation of private property*, and obedience to a spiritual father or mother, are universal, as is the concept of permanent commitment. In the medieval West, monasticism came to be divided into different groups according to the foundational figure or rule followed by certain communities. The concept of “order” remains ambiguous among Benedictines with their decentralized structure and has never been characteristic of the Christian East, where monasticism is understood to be a way of life that follows various patterns but is not subdivided into canonically distinct groups.

Monks and nuns have been regarded as intermediaries and intercessors, providing counsel and spiritual assistance. Monasteries became providers of social services, receiving abandoned infants and orphans, caring for the sick, offering material provisions to those in need, and providing hospitality to pilgrims and travelers. Monks and nuns are typically literate and have served as educators both within and outside of their monasteries. With their traditional orientation, monasteries have normally been conservative forces in the church and have sometimes viewed themselves as defenders of doctrines or customs in times threatened by change. The emphasis on education characteristic of monastic life meant that monks and nuns have often played vital roles in spiritual and liturgical renewal. The biblical and liturgical basis of monastic life has provided inspiration to many who are not formally monastic and served as a bridge across ecclesiastical divides: monasticism predates the division between the Latin West and most of the Eastern churches and the 16th-c. breakup of Western Christianity into Protestant and Catholic forms. See also RELIGIOUS ORDERS, ROMAN CATHOLIC, CLUSTER.

COLUMBA STEWART, OSB

Monasticism: Monastery. Place of residence of a community of monks* or nuns*, who are secluded from the world and live under monastic vows. Double* monasteries include both men and women, living separately but with a common superior. In addition, triple monasteries include a house for tertiaries* associated with the mendicant* orders. See also HIEROTOPY, THE CREATION OF CHRISTIAN SACRED SPACES.

Monasticism: Monastic Rules (Lat regula, “rule”; hence “regular* life” and “regular clergy”), documents setting out the regulations for leading a monastic life.

The earliest Christian monks did not live by specific written codifications: the fathers of the Egyptian desert passed on their wisdom to their disciples by example and their teaching, which was eventually set down in the Apophthegmata Patrum*.

With the rise of communal monasticism, more detailed and specific regulations were produced by the communities of Pachomius* and in Cappadocia by Basil* of Caesarea, who was always influential in the East and seems to have been widely followed in the 5th-c. West. Augustine* produced a short rule capable of being used by both monks and nuns (390s). Bishop Caesarius composed a lengthy rule for the women of his nunnery in Arles (c512–534). The most sophisticated and integrated Western monastic rule was created by Benedict* of Nursia c550; half a century later, Columbanus's* Monastic Rule attempted a brief encapsulation of Irish tradition, apparently influenced primarily by Cassian* and Basil; the surviving monastic rules from Ireland are later creations. The period of the “mixed rules” in the West (7th c.) saw the combination of sections from the rules of Benedict, Columbanus, Caesarius, and others to meet the needs of aristocratic family monasteries. The Iberian Peninsula produced distinctive texts to meet its own sociopolitical circumstances.

By the early 9th c., the Carolingian Empire had decreed that monasteries were to follow the Rule of Benedict*; however, the increasing complexity of liturgy and the multiplication of monasteries led to its being accompanied by the “customs” and “uses” of individual monasteries and sets of accompanying regulations. This was paralleled by the formation of the Studite Constitutions in the Byzantine Empire, where, however, rules and orders did not conform to the Western pattern. The 11th and 12th c. saw an attempt in Western Europe to return to the ideas and rules of the desert fathers and early monasticism.

Monastic rules represent a move toward structure and organization and underpin the formation of Western monastic orders. The tension between spontaneity and organization is demonstrated by the difficulties experienced by the charismatic monastic leader Francis* of Assisi when asked by the Roman Catholic Church to set down a monastic rule for his growing order (1220s).

2) A Sampling of Monastic Traditions

Monasticism in the Byzantine Empire.

Monasticism may have begun in the Byzantine* Empire (330–1453) as a movement of withdrawal among the laity*, a secession from the cities of late antiquity in order to live a simplified life in the hinterland; but almost simultaneously many of these ostensible solitaries occupied the highest positions in the church, claiming the roles of bishops and priests that, by their very nature, were urban and political offices (Sterk). Within a few hundred years, this movement of withdrawal had been so successful that it transformed the nature of Christian leadership into a predominantly ascetic* endeavor. Although the rhetoric of monastic sources stresses the role of monasticism apart from society, monasticism played important political functions within the Byzantine experience, not least after the 10th c., when monasteries were significant landowners. In the middle Byzantine Era perhaps half the literate class of the Empire consisted of monks. This accounts for the wholesale glorification of the ascetic imperative in Eastern Christianity. The Byzantines (who were so adept at, and who delighted in, paradoxes) soon perfected the idea of the “city monk,” the “cosmopolitan hermit.” The image of emperors seeking advice on intimate matters of state policy from the leading ascetics of the day is not merely a rhetorical trope.

Monasteries made their appearance relatively early in Constantinople. The first was the community of Dalmatou built by the senator Saturninos for the Syrian monk Isaac (382). At first the ascetic houses were a ring of suburban “retreats,” but as the capital expanded, these came to be embedded in almost every part of town; thus Constantinople became a veritable "city of monasteries" (Janin, Dagron, Charanis, Talbot). In 430, when Archbishop Nestorius* tried to restrict the social interactions of Constantinopolitan monks, the furious resistance played no small part in his downfall (McGuckin). When Eutyches* was condemned (448), his deposition was signed by no fewer than 23 resident higumens (abbots). The official notice ending the Acacian* schism listed 53 major city higumens, and the Synod of 536 listed 63. Special monasteries existed in the capital for different ethnic groups, especially the Syrians, Latins, and Egyptians (Janin). Very little is known about the number of female convents, although there were several in Constantinople. Almost a third of all known monasteries existed within the capital's walls (Bryer). With regular imperial and aristocratic endowments, monasticism flourished throughout the lifetime of the Empire. Even times of apparent setback (e.g. under Iconoclastic* emperors or when Nikephoros Phokas limited the landholdings of monasteries) were merely temporary or reformatory measures. The Byzantine palace always supported (and regulated) monasticism. When destruction came, it was inevitably from outside, at the hands of Latin or Islamic enemies.

Monasticism was socially active in Byzantium. By the mid-5th c., many hospitals (nosokomeia), poor houses (ptocheia), hostels for strangers (xenones), orphanages (orphanotroheion), and old-age homes (gerokomeia) had been pioneered in Constantinople (Constantelos). Most monastic complexes, whether they had a social ministry or not (and several existed primarily to celebrate the life of prayer among hesychasts*), were governed by a triumvirate: the higumen, the oikonomos (steward), and the ekklesiarches (sacristan). The higumen had the obligation of teaching and ordering the entire household, and frequently was expected to hear the "confession of thoughts" of each monastic, although it was common for a higumen, at least in larger houses, to appoint an especially revered elder to be the "soul-friend" and confessor of the monks (pneumatikos). The relation between the monk and the spiritual elder was an important one, and the theme of spiritual fatherhood (especially in later Byzantine monastic writing) is considerable (Turner).

Throughout the Byzantine world, the typikon (rule) of Basil* of Caesarea (see Basil, Rule of) and the administrative order of the Studium Monastery (drawn up by Theodore* the Studite) dictated the standard pattern of monastic life. Byzantine monks were fluid and mobile, unlike their Western counterparts with their vows of stability. Each house, in theory, was founded with its own local typikon, a charter determined by the aristocratic founder who endowed the house originally.

The progressive loss of the Byzantine hinterland in the last imperial ages proved no less disastrous for monastic life than it did for the Empire as a whole. After the Latin occupation of Constantinople (13th c.), most monasteries were desperately impoverished; yet after the fall of Constantinople (1453), no fewer than 18 monasteries were still functioning. The outlying monastic centers, such as those on Crete, Cyprus*, and the Slavic lands, clung on tenaciously through a succession of oppressive overlords, and their painted churches remain an eloquent testimony to the dissemination of Byzantine culture through monastic foundations. Some of the fortress monasteries, e.g. St. Catherine's at Sinai or St. Sabas' Great Lavra* in Palestine, also survived, as did (most spectacularly) the great monastic colonies on Mount Athos*. See also SKETIC MONASTICISM.

JOHN A. MCGUCKIN

Monasticism in the Russian and Ukrainian Tradition. The earliest Russian and Ukrainian monasteries were urban foundations on the Byzantine model and may date to the 10th c. Literary tradition traces its roots to the Pechersky (from pechera, "cave") complex of monasteries near Kiev, founded in the 11th c. by Antonii, a native of the region, who had spent several years at Mount Athos*. His younger associate and successor, Theodosii, introduced the Rule of Studios* (or Studite Rule). This suggests a lavra monastic type with cenobitic elements.

During the Mongol invasions and subsequent domination (13–14th c.), monasteries farther from population centers and farther to the north and west were eventually linked to the rising power of Muscovy. Emblematic of this development was Sergius* of Radonezh (d1392), founder of the Trinity Monastery, 70 kilometers northeast of Moscow. A towering figure, Sergius renewed the anchoritic* and cenobite* models of monastic life. The vita tradition depicted him and later his followers as seekers of solitude, joined by admirers seeking guidance. The gradual expansion of the settlement to a large cenobitic complex ensued, and the pattern then repeated itself. The result was the diffusion of monastic life (especially to remote lands of the north) (Stella Rock). Monasteries became large fortified cultural centers where chronicles, illuminated manuscripts, icons, and frescoes were produced. For instance, Andrei Rublev (d1430) painted unsurpassed icons* at Andronikov Monastery (southeast of Moscow). Miraculous icons located in monasteries served as palladia (divine guarantees of protection). For example, the famous Vladimir Mother of God, a gift of the Constantinopolitan patriarch to one of the Kievan princes (c1131), was placed in a monastery, but then moved as a palladium first to Vladimir and later to Sretenskii Monastery, which had been founded as a place of meeting (sretenie) for the people of Moscow.

Women embraced monastic life, although they were fewer in number and less well known than men. Women of imperial households (like some of their male counterparts) were sometimes forced into monastic life; some wealthy women were founders or patrons of convents (Thyret).

The anchoritic and cenobite strands of Russian monasticism came into conflict over the question of monastic property* in the 15th c. with Nil* Sorsky (1433–1508), who represented the hesychast*, mystical* emphasis of the “Non-Possessors,” and Joseph of Volokolamsk (1439–1515), who represented the cenobitic, socially activist type, the “Possessors.” Loss of the prophetic charism of monastic life has typically been traced to the victory of the cenobites, but recent studies suggest the contrast has been overdrawn (Rock, Dykstra).

A more radically prophetic type of monk, the “holy* fool” (Russian, yurodivyi) had already appeared in the 11th c. in the form of Isaac of the Pechersky Monastery of Kiev. The “holy fool” tradition was reinforced by the translation into Slavonic of Byzantine “lives” of those who made themselves “fools for the sake of Christ.” As Muscovite autocracy grew under Ivan IV (“the Terrible,” 1530–84), the distinctive Russian type of “holy fool” reached its apogee; stories circulated of “fools” who taunted the czar with impunity, while the czar himself imitated their behavior. Eventually the famous cathedral of Moscow was named for one named Vasilii. Others continued in this role into the early 20th c. (Ivanov).

Peter the Great’s hostility toward the spiritual ethos of monasticism and the seizure of monastic lands and revenues by Catherine II (“the Great”) resulted in a radical reduction in the number of both monasteries and their inhabitants. Catherine also granted women’s monasteries autonomy from male direction, with the result that their numbers increased dramatically; some female monastic leaders managed their economic affairs well, while others did not.

At the end of the 18th c., Paissii Velichkovskii’s publication of an abridged Slavonic version of the Philokalia sparked a monastic renewal centered on the “prayer of the heart” and spiritual guidance for all – monks and laity alike – from elders (startsi) whose holiness was marked by compassion and insight. Optina Pustin, the preeminent center of this piety, attracted many pilgrims*, among them Turgenev, Gogol, Dostoevsky*, and (the more skeptical) Tolstoy*.

Suppressed and persecuted under Communist rule, monastics found new strategies of resistance. Under the New Economic Plan and its collectivization of farms, some monasteries redefined themselves as collective farms. Faced with mass arrests, confiscation of properties, imprisonment, and execution, beginning on February 18, 1932, some persevered by becoming “secret monks,” covertly embracing a life of prayer and Christian asceticism (Wynot). Some large monastic complexes were transformed into prison camps. Perestroika and the fall of Communism resulted in a revival of monastic life and restoration of monasteries. See also SKETIC MONASTICISM.

KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Monasticism in the Syriac Tradition.

The earliest Syriac Christianity was characterized by asceticism* rooted in biblical notions of covenant*, holiness, and eschatology. Sons and daughters of the covenant (bnai and bnat qeïama), sworn to celibacy*, lived in towns and cities alongside married Christians, who might also choose abstinence from sexual intercourse, thus embracing qaddishuta (chastity, holiness). The term ihidaya (solitary one) simultaneously implied resemblance to Christ the Only Begotten, singleness (celibacy), and single-minded devotion to the Kingdom* of God.

An influx of Egyptian and Greek monastic literature (Antony*, Shenoute*, Basil* of Caesarea, Palladius*, Evagrius*) introduced new cenobitic* and eremitic* ideals and Origenist* currents for both men and women. Unusual forms of ascetic behavior marked by radical rejection of human culture* in the name of the “angelic life” – that of itinerants (wandering ascetics), stylites* (e.g. Simeon*), and “holy* fools” – are attested to by Theodoret* and John* of Ephesus. The tale of the “man of God,” a wealthy young man who embraced poverty and anonymity, spread from Edessa* to the West, where its ideal was echoed by medieval mendicants*. Cenobitic monasteries became the norm in both Miaphysite* and Assyrian* traditions and served variously as centers of scholarship, translation, and scientific and philosophical study, and as patriarchal residences, hospices, and strongholds under persecution.

KATHLEEN E. MCVEY

Monepiscopate, Monarchical Episcopate, single bishop. In the NT, bishops are often mentioned in the plural, suggesting either that each house church had its own bishop or that presbyters exercised authority in a collegial way. The monepiscopate is first mentioned in the letters of Ignatius* (106–13), as an emerging pattern of governance. Some see the negative side of the monepiscopate in Diotrephes’s “love of pre-eminence” (3 John 9–10). In Rome, however, there may not have been a single bishop until Pius (c140). In Alexandria a body of presbyters, with a rotating chair, was replaced (c190) by the monepiscopate of Demetrius.

Monica (331–87), mother of Augustine*. Because of her, Augustine always thought of himself as a Christian (he even viewed Manichaeism* as a more enlightened form of Christianity). She is a major figure in his Confessions, manifesting constant concern for him and urging him toward Catholic (rather than heretical*) belief and commitment; while he was trying to assert his independence, she followed him from Carthage to Rome and then to Milan. The narrative portion of the Confessions ends with her death, shortly after their conversation in Ostia, which is described in mystical terms. In the dialogues from the time immediately after his conversion, Monica is represented as the simple believer who repeatedly comes to insights that are later confirmed by rational investigation.

Monk, a man living under a vow of singleness and simplicity, in isolation from the world; a term not properly used for canons* regular or mendicant* friars*.

Monogenes, Greek term used to describe Jesus Christ in the NT (John 3:16, 18; 1 John 4:9) and in most early creeds. While usually translated “only begotten,” it is rendered “unique” (unicus) in some Latin creeds. It was interpreted to mean that only Christ is God’s offspring by nature, while others are adopted (Gal 4:5).

Monophysite (“only one nature”), term given by its opponents to the christological tradition that developed from Cyril* of Alexandria and his emphasis on the “one incarnate nature of the Word.” See also MIAPHYSITE.

Monotheism (Gk for “one God”), belief that there is one sole God*; worship and service of one God. Monotheism is contrasted with polytheism*, belief in a number of deities; with henotheism, service of one god while assuming the existence of other deities; and with pantheism*, belief that God and the cosmos are basically identical. In actuality monotheism often uses a more flexible vocabulary (at times close to that of henotheism), e.g. “you are gods”

(Ps 82:6, John 10:34) and “the god of this world” (2 Cor 4:4). Because the word “god” can take a plural form, a differentiation is made between the “one true God” and the “false gods” (see God, Christian Views of, Cluster).

Judaism* and Christianity have regarded the most basic threats to monotheism to be (1) the supposition that another independent and conflicting principle exists alongside God (cf. Zoroastrianism and Manichaeism*) and (2) the introduction of literal plurality into God. The doctrine of the Trinity* has often been thought to be polytheistic (a view that led to Monarchianism*); in Nicene churches, this problem was resolved by speaking of God as one essence* in three persons*. In actual life, believers may be polytheistic in their loyalties while professing monotheism – hence the emphasis of H. Richard Niebuhr* on “radical monotheism,” setting all values in relation to the one God.

Monotheism, the doctrine that Christ, being “divine-human” (“theandric”), has only “one will” and activity. Dionysius* the Pseudo-Areopagite had spoken of “one divine-human energy/activity” of Christ (Ep. 4). Severus* of Antioch and Miaphysites* used this designation, which seemed congruent with Cyril’s* view of “one incarnate nature of the divine Word.” With this dynamic force of the Incarnation*, redemption* can be understood as theosis*, the graced deification of all natural life.

Emperor Heraclius (624) thought that the Chalcedonians and Cyrillians could be reconciled by avoiding the Miaphysite language while emphasizing “one divine-human energy/activity” (“monenergism”), and thus “one divine-human will” (“monotheism”). Patriarch Sergius supported this twofold doctrine. But Pope Honorius* merely affirmed monotheism (encouraged in Heraclius’s *Ecthesis, 638, and approved by Constantinople councils, 638, 639).

From a neo-Chalcedonian* perspective, Maximus* the Confessor objected that will and activity belong to the natures, not to the hypostasis*; each nature acts in its own way and even has its own will, though without conflict or separation. This affirmation of a human will* and activity is testimony to the reality of God’s creation; freedom of will and difference from God persist even in the Incarnation, as they also persist in mystical* union. Yet any action by Christ involves the joint and coordinated activity of both natures, without confusion, since his human will is always responsive to the divine will of the Word.

Maximus persuaded several councils in Africa and Rome (646) and the Lateran synod (649) to condemn monothelitism as heretical and to reaffirm “two natural wills.” Emperor Constans, forbidding talk about either one or two wills in his Typos, deposed Pope Martin I, exiling him along with Maximus for refusing this compromise (653).

After Syria and Egypt came under Islamic control, with less political need to seek conciliation with the Miaphysites, councils in Rome (680) and Constantinople II (680–81) affirmed Christ’s two natural wills and operations. The Maronites* (Lebanon) rejected this doctrine until 1182, when they entered into communion with Rome (1182). EUGENE TESELLE

Montanism, prophetic movement named after a founder, Montanus, who with two women Prisc[ill]a and Maximilla, was a prophet-leader in Phrygia, Asia Minor, from the late 150s (for Epiphanius*; Eusebius* improbably suggests the late 170s). In its early phases, it was called “the New Prophecy”; its members were also known as Cataphrygians or Pepouzians (from Pepouza, their geographic headquarters); later subgroups included Quintillianists, Priscillianists, Artotyrites, and Taskodrougites. It was a movement of prophecy and spiritual (charismatic*) renewal within Christianity, spreading very rapidly until its followers seceded from, or were driven from, emerging Catholic congregations that viewed them as “heretics*.” By 200 they were established in Rome and North Africa, where the martyrology of Perpetua* and Felicity showed contact with Montanism. Tertullian* of Carthage embraced Montanism, but was perhaps not typical of it.

Initially orthodox in doctrine, Montanism was rigorous in discipline (e.g. fasting*) and stressed spiritual gifts*. The prophets sought to interpret “suffering, covenant and promise” (Epiphanius, Panarion 48.13.1). Montanism showed affinities with Jewish*-Christian thought and some sources suggest a much-heightened eschatological* expectation. Commentators (exaggeratedly) assume its particular zeal for martyrdom*. Fragmentation into subgroups over centuries brought doctrinal and liturgical deviations. Critics debate as to whether and to what extent it was indebted to the religion and concerns of rural pagan Phrygia and mantic prophecy (see Inculturation Cluster). It showed clear links to existing Asian Christian theology, including Revelation's* interest in the New Jerusalem (Rev 21) and the Johannine Paraclete* (John 14:16, 16:7). Its lively early gatherings were characterized by enthusiasm* and possibly some unintelligible speech (glossolalia*). Prophecy remained characteristic of it. The prophets' shrine in Pepouza, the site where Montanism's "Jerusalem" headquarters may have been located, was destroyed in the 6th c.

The surviving oracles of the prophets Montanus, Prisc[ill]a, and Maximilla are intelligible snippets of longer utterances, chosen by critics to present Montanism in the most negative light. Women's prominence in prophesying and teaching sharpened opposition to it. Other sources (almost all from its opponents) vary in quantity and quality of information: from Origen* to the Code of Justinian*; from Epiphanius of Salamis to Hippolytus* of Rome; from Eusebius's 2nd- to 3rd-c. informants to Praedestinatus*. Epigraphy, from Asia Minor, Africa, and Rome, mentions (Montanist) officials, supporting some of their opponents' claims about aberrant doctrine.

Montanism's popular success prompted the emergent Christian tradition to develop greater self-definition and to make more decisions about what was to be authoritative for Christians. Gnosticism* had the same effect on the church. CHRISTINE TREVETT

Moral Agency, accountability for one's actions, which one has undertaken freely, with awareness of norms and consequences. See also ORIGINAL SIN; WILL.

Moral Influence, a type of causality, suggested by many theologians to be an explanation of conversion* by the grace* of God and subsequent moral acts. During the 16th-c. debates over grace and free will*, some argued that grace acts "physically," as one thing acts on another. Others argued that grace acts "morally" by appealing to the affections, without overpowering free will. Ambrose* and Augustine* evoke the depths of divine love manifested in the Incarnation*, Christ's words, deeds, and willing crucifixion*, as motivating a believer's responding love for God. Abelard* spoke of such a response as the chief meaning of atonement* ("moral influence" theory of atonement). A "moral suasion" (or influence) of grace is associated with the Wesleyan* Movement, Edwards* and his followers, and the "new measures" revivalism* of Charles Finney*. This perspective entails a strong theory of the bondage of the will: although we are "physically" capable of willing the good, we are "morally" unable to do so until freed from our disordered inclinations (affections). See also PREDESTINATION.

Moral Re-armament, the name by which the Oxford* Movement became known after founder Frank Buchman's* call (1938) for "moral and spiritual rearmament."

Moravian Church. Under the official name of Unitas Fratrum, the Moravian Church originated as the Bohemian* Brethren (1457) organized by followers of Jan Hus*. Severely persecuted and almost exterminated during the 17th-c. religious wars, they were renewed in 1722 by Nicholas Ludwig von Zinzendorf*, who articulated the Church's threefold mission: communal pietism, promotion of experiential religion in the European state churches, and cross-cultural evangelization.

With headquarters in Herrnhut, Germany, it was first organized as a transconfessional mission society (until the mid-19th c.), then emerged as a Protestant denomination. Moravians began work in England in 1728 and were recognized as an "ancient Protestant Episcopal church" by the British Parliament (1749). Missions were begun in the Caribbean* (1732), Surinam (1735), Georgia (1735), Pennsylvania (1740), South Africa (1748), and Labrador (1771). In the 19th c., missions included work in Central and South America, North India and Tibet, Palestine, and German and British colonies in East Africa. The immigration of Scandinavians and Germans to North America led to significant growth of the Moravian Church in the USA and Canada. World Wars I and II disrupted Moravian missions and led to a decentralization of the Moravian Church in 19 provinces; this involved, worldwide, about 1 million members, with the largest single concentration in Tanzania*.

Moravian theology begins with a strong Christocentrism. The Bohemian Brethren distinguished among things essential to salvation* (relationship to God in Jesus Christ), ministrative to salvation (church, Scriptures, sacraments), and incidental to salvation (doctrines, rituals, ecclesiastical structures). Moravian theology in the Zinzendorffian period was shaped by the contending themes of Pietism*, Lutheran* orthodoxy, and Enlightenment* thought. Although the Moravian Church adopted a statement of theological principles entitled "The Ground of the Unity" (1957), Moravian theology remains more devotional and relational than dogmatic or confessional. The best expressions of the Moravian Church's theology can be found in its hymnody and liturgy.

OTTO DREYDOPPEL, JR.

Moravian Worship. Inspired by the reforming principles of Jan Hus*, worship among the earliest Bohemian* Brethren was starkly simple. The reading and expounding of Scripture* were the focus of their gatherings. Their liturgy was based on free prayer and the singing of spiritual songs in the common language. Communion* in both kinds, in which both the bread and cup were offered to the laity, was their central concern. In later generations, Moravian worship took on a more churchly character. Luke of Prague (d1528) published an agenda for worship (1501), and the Brethren's priests began to wear vestments. The Church Litany of 1571 has been carried over into the liturgical practice of the Renewed Moravian Church. Under Nicholas Ludwig von Zinzendorf*, Moravian worship was highly influenced by the Lutheran* liturgy. At the same time, Moravians developed the Singstunde, which became paradigmatic for their later worship practices. In it, verses from different hymns followed one after another in such a way as to develop a spiritual theme. The Love* Feast, based on the *agape meal of the early church, the Christmas Eve candle service, and the Moravian celebration of Holy Communion all follow the form of the Singstunde. Zinzendorf was the author of many hymns, and he began the Moravian practice of writing "liturgies" for various seasons and occasions. These are prayers and responsive readings, most often using the language of Scripture, interspersed with hymns. Elements of the Zinzendorffian liturgies survive in the 1995 Moravian Book of Worship.

Moravian worship in North America has been highly influenced by frontier revivalism*, with its preaching for conversion, and by the free church worship that emerged from it. Contemporary Moravian worship most often begins with hymn singing and the praying of one of the liturgies, continues with the reading of Scripture and the presentation of tithes and offering, and ends with a sermon, hymn, and benediction. Holy Communion is celebrated seven times a year in most Moravian congregations, on the major festival days of the Church, although many Moravians, influenced by the World Council of Churches' document, "Baptism, Eucharist, and Ministry" (1982), advocate a more frequent observance. Recent growth of the Moravian Church in Great Britain and in North America has come as the result of immigration of Moravians from the Caribbean and Central and South America who have brought with them their own hymns and worship practices. These have made Moravian worship as a whole increasingly multicultural.

More, Hannah (1745–1833), writer, educator, associate of the Evangelical Anglican Clapham sect. Born in Western England, she had a brief career as a playwright in London. After an Evangelical conversion*, she joined the campaign for the abolition of the slave* trade and began a lifelong friendship with William Wilberforce*. At his suggestion, she founded (1789) her first Sunday* school in Cheddar. The author of Village Politics (1793), the Cheap Repository Tracts (1795–98), and Coelebs in Search of a Wife (1808), she exerted the greatest influence of all the Evangelical woman of her generation through her literary and philanthropic activities.

More, Thomas (1478–1535), English humanist, statesman, Roman Catholic. More was a contemporary of Erasmus, and his humanistic endeavors extended beyond his classic Utopia (1516; a perfect version of Plato's Republic that includes tolerance of all religions) and other Latin works to encourage fresh engagement with ancient sources. Alongside his political roles – including speaker of the House of Commons (1523) and lord chancellor (1529–32) – he was committed to the Roman Catholic Church during some of its most turbulent decades. In the interest of religious reform, More shared with his contemporaries a desire to return to the texts and piety of the early church as norms for spiritual renewal. Meditative treatises on suffering* (The Last Things, c1522; A Dialogue of Comfort, 1534; De Tristitia Christi, unfinished, 1535) offer Christian commentaries on the vicissitudes of worldly affairs in which More was fully embroiled. A defender, alongside Henry* VIII, of the sacramental system when Luther* first attacked it, More later was Henry's opponent in supporting papal sovereignty over the entire church – a confrontation with the king that ultimately cost him his life. An indefatigable and erudite polemicist in both Latin and English, More defended traditional doctrines such as those of purgatory* and the Eucharist* against critiques originating on the Continent. As a religious writer and a humanist, More took the risk of addressing European issues in an English context.

Called "servant of the nation," after brilliant political-military campaigns, he was declared a heretic and defrocked; he was captured and executed as a traitor. Mormon, Book of. In 1830 Joseph Smith* published a book he claimed to have translated "by the gift and power of God" from ancient gold plates buried in a hillside in upstate New York. The book records the details of three ancient peoples who had inhabited the North American continent. The bulk of the record was purportedly made by "Nephite" prophets of Jewish extraction, who presided over their people from 600 BC until their extinction in the 5th c. AD. Throughout this period, Nephite prophets maintained records of wars, missionary labors, prophetic writings by Isaiah and other Old World figures, predictions of a coming Christ, and teachings about atonement*, faith* and baptism*, charity*, and other doctrines consistent with modern Christianity. Abridged by a Nephite warrior-prophet named Mormon, then buried in the ground by his son Moroni, the record was delivered to 21-year-old Smith in 1827 by that same Moroni (in the form of a resurrected being, or angel).

The Book of Mormon contains little in the way of innovative doctrines, but it does recount a visit of Christ to the New World after his Jerusalem resurrection. Its major theological contribution and readerly appeal have been its modeling of a kind of "dialogic revelation" as literal as OT versions, but more individualized and egalitarian. Although Mormons believe it is an authentic historical record of ancient peoples, its language and topics are in some cases germane to 19th-c. theological concerns, including those of the Restoration* Movement. It is esteemed by Mormons as "the Word of God," a companion to the Bible, and the principal evidence of Joseph Smith's status as a prophet of God and restorer of the true church of Jesus Christ. See also LATTER-DAY SAINTS, CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF; MORMON WORSHIP; SMITH, JOSEPH; YOUNG, BRIGHAM.

Mormon Worship. Mormons, members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter*-day Saints (LDS), worship God, the eternal Father, and Jesus Christ.

Sacred Spaces. LDS doctrine designates temples as the most sacred sites of worship, the believers' homes as the second most privileged spaces for devotional acts, and the chapels, or meetinghouses, as the third most important. A temple (more than 100 worldwide in 2000) is a holy place, a "house of the Lord."

Sacraments. Only members in good standing may enter the temple to perform sacraments or "saving ordinances" for themselves and vicariously for the dead, such as the following: proxy baptism*, priesthood* ordination, washing and anointing, clothing in sacred garments worn throughout life, "endowment" (the making of a covenant, including obedience and sexual purity), marriage, and sealing (a ceremony that promises that family bonds will endure eternally). Mormons are reluctant to discuss the particulars of temple worship publicly, for it is the most sacred aspect of their faith.

The home is the most sacred locale outside the temple. LDS families are encouraged to practice personal and family prayer, daily Scripture readings, and Monday night "family home evenings," which include song, prayer, a lesson based on a theme from the Gospels, and/or a family activity.

The majority of a Mormon's public devotional life unfolds in a congregational meetinghouse known as the ward house or chapel.

The principal weekly worship service is the “sacrament meeting,” attended by all members. LDS prophet Joseph Smith taught that everything in the gospel is an appendage to the doctrine of Christ’s atonement*. Accordingly, the purpose of the Sunday meeting is to partake of the Eucharist, “the sacrament,” in commemoration of the Lord’s suffering in Gethsemane and death on Calvary. Broken bread and cups of water are passed to members of the congregation with solemnity; two rote prayers are spoken by priests (usually young men of 16–18 years), who consecrate the emblems. Congregational singing opens and closes the meeting and precedes the passing of the sacrament, and devotional talks given by lay members follow it (there is no professional clergy). No formal liturgy exists. The only variation in format occurs on the first Sunday of the month, when members spontaneously approach the pulpit and “bear testimony,” or publicly profess their faith in Christ and cardinal LDS tenets. Services are always conducted in the local language, but are otherwise essentially identical in all countries and cultures.

Like many Christians, Mormons believe that true religion and worship require a life of service. With no paid ministers, the largest missionary force in the world, and a comprehensive welfare program, committed Mormons attempt to enact the LDS Scripture passage that “when ye are in the service of your fellow beings, ye are only in the service of your God.” See also LATTER-DAY SAINTS, CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF; MORMON, BOOK OF; SMITH, JOSEPH; YOUNG, BRIGHAM.

Mortal Sin, a sin “unto death” (1 John 5:16), i.e. death of the soul*, loss of grace*, and damnation*, unless there is repentance*; a deliberate decision that goes against God’s will, in contrast to venial* sin.

Mortification, metaphorically “killing” the flesh and its desires (cf. Rom 8:13; Col 3:5) through self-denial and the willing of higher values.

Mortmain (French, “dead hand”), legal status of properties held inalienably by a monastery or other ecclesiastical body, which led governments to limit or prohibit further transfers of property.

Mosaic (from the Gk for “muse”), pictures or patterns produced by cementing together small pieces of colored stone or glass (tesserae); used in early church buildings.

Moses, a Hebrew with an Egyptian name, called by YHWH to lead his people out of bondage in Egypt, to preside over the giving of the covenant* and Law* to the Hebrews on Mount Sinai, which established them as the people* of God, and to lead them to the Promised* Land, is portrayed in different ways by historians, various HB traditions, early Judaism, and the NT.

Historians debate the historicity of many aspects of Moses’ story (is it the conflation of an exodus*-settlement story and a Sinai tradition?) but conclude that the broad outline of Moses’ story could be historical.

In the Pentateuch*, three portrayals of Moses can be distinguished:

1. In the Yahwist-Elohist traditions, the oldest strata (especially Exod 1:15–2:22; 3:1–12, 5:1–15:21; 19–24; 32–34; Num 10–36), Moses is portrayed as YHWH’s commissioned agent, to whom God’s name, YHWH, is revealed; who confronts Pharaoh in YHWH’s name; through whom YHWH acts; and who appeals for Israel’s covenant obedience on the basis of God’s gracious act of freeing the people from Egypt (Exod 19:4, 20:2). As a mediator of the Law, or lawgiver, Moses receives from God the Ten* Commandments and other laws (20:1–20) for the people. It is with Moses as a mediator of the covenant that YHWH makes a covenant on the people’s behalf (Exod 34:27). Yet Moses remains humble (Num 12:3), functioning as a nursing mother for the people (Num 11:12) and interceding for them.
2. In Deuteronomy, Moses continues to be the mediator between God and the people (5:5, 27), but now as the Law’s interpreter; thus in a series of homilies, Moses explains the commandments to a rebellious people for whom he intercedes with God (Deut 9:25–29); Moses is also portrayed as vicariously bearing YHWH’s wrath against his people; he is punished for their sake by being forbidden to enter the Promised Land, dying in Moab (Deut 1:37; 3:25–26; 34).
3. The Priestly Tradition claims that YHWH revealed to Moses all the laws of Exodus and Numbers, and in particular the instructions for making the tabernacle where YHWH will reside (instead of on Mount Sinai), written and rewritten on tablets

“with the finger of God” (Exod 24:16–18, 31:18, 35:1–40:33). In the Priestly tradition, Moses is a sinner (not trusting in God; Num 20:12); not entering the Promised Land is his punishment.

In Hellenistic Judaism, as propounded by Philo* of Alexandria, Moses is a superhuman “divine man” (familiar in Greek culture), a perfect ruler and legislator, a high priest, and a prophet who reveals what cannot be understood by reason (Vita Mosis presents Philo’s allegorical* interpretation of Moses). Josephus* adds that Moses is both a Greek “divine man” and an Israelite “man of God,” the founder of a theocracy.

In Palestinian Judaism, all of the Pentateuch (Torah) has been revealed to Moses (including the narrative of his own death and burial). The whole Torah is interpreted by a growing tradition of midrash*.

In the NT, Moses and the Law (Torah) are generally portrayed positively, but are presented as having been superseded (see Supersessionism) or fulfilled by Christ (see Typology). Paul associates Moses with the period of the Law (Rom 5:14; 9:15; 10:5, 19) when revelation (including the Law) is veiled (2 Cor 3:7–18), contrasting him with the period ushered in by Christ, when the glory of God revealed to Moses is now unveiled. In the Synoptic Gospels* and Acts*, despite disputes with the Pharisees and their Judaism* based on Moses’ authority (e.g. Acts 6:11–14, 21:21), Moses appears during the Transfiguration as one of the precursors (with Elijah) of Christ, and Jesus is figuratively presented in Matthew* as a “new Moses” (a typological fulfillment of Moses). In John, Jesus is said to surpass Moses (Jesus fulfills the Law given through Moses, John 1:17; cf. 3:14, 6:32), but those who truly believe Moses would believe in Jesus (5:46; 9:28 is ambivalent). In Hebrews, Moses is portrayed as being similar to Jesus but inferior to him. DANIEL PATTE

Moses of Khoren (c8th c.), author of the History of the Armenians. Combining his vast antiquarian and geographical erudition with the imagination of a brilliant novelist, Moses integrates legends and traditions, narrating the past of his people, as well as the writings of the 5th-c. Armenian historians Koriun, Agathangelos, Faustus, and Lazarus into the world history known to him from the Bible, Josephus, Eusebius*, and Socrates of Constantinople, and from Anania of Shirak’s Geography (7th c.). Some of what he records has been confirmed by archaeological findings. He presents himself as a mid-5th-c. author and contemporary of the first Armenian writers and the last Armenian kings, but he is not mentioned by Mashtots* or his disciples before the 9th c.

Moses seeks to provide the Armenians with a summary of their history that describes their genealogical, ecclesiastical, and cultural characteristics, in order to help them overcome the disruptions of their political history. He apparently writes at the request of a Bagratid patron, giving to this princely family a prominent role in the consolidation of national identity after the fall of the Arsacid kings – probably in the period when the Bagratids were gaining the upper hand over their Mamikonean rivals, between the establishment of the Abbasid Caliphate (750) and the Armenian uprising of 771–2.

IGOR DORFMANN-LAZAREV

Motet, musical composition for several voices, with words generally taken from Scripture. Motets are most often sung during the offertory* and the elevation* of the Mass*.

Mother of God. See MARY*, THE VIRGIN, CLUSTER: THEOTOKOS.

Motherhood is ambivalent in Christian thought. It is associated positively with creativity and life and negatively with salvation and eternal life. Together Eve, the first mother and the first sinner, and Mary, a virgin and the mother of Jesus, represent this ambivalence. Actual motherhood and its symbolic interpretations are related in complex ways, often obscuring the fact that motherhood differs throughout history and in various cultural contexts.

Motherhood as the Fulfillment of Womanhood. Because the vast majority of women give birth, motherhood is connected with what it means to be a woman. Thus Adam and Eve were originally given specific tasks, respectively cultivating the soil and giving birth (with pain). The most common images of women in the Bible are those of daughter, mother, and wife. Motherhood is even seen as a means to salvation* (1 Tim 2:11–15). Still, this ideal has been relativized by, and often subordinated to, celibacy* in spiritual life.

Feminists have pointed out the important distinction between the biologically necessary, and thus gender-specific, aspects of motherhood and care for children, which is not gender specific. Women’s movements are concerned with the negative consequences of motherhood; they affirm the importance of reproductive health and social care and underscore the tension between motherhood and women's full participation and authorization in society. Control of women's reproductive capacity has been crucial for maintaining male power. One aspect of patriarchy* is the control of women's sexuality*, defining motherhood as its proper expression while imagining motherhood to be an essentially asexual position, opposed to that of "virgin" or "whore."

Motherhood as an Aspect of Personhood.

Motherhood is related to the ideal of self-sacrificing love*, giving life even to the extent of self-extinction. The Madonna* is the primary image of this ideal. Mary*, the "servant of the Lord," unconditionally accepts giving birth to the Son of God. Women throughout history and in many cultures have assumed the task of giving birth as God given, while never being able to live up to the ideal of Mary's purity. The ethos of the biblical household* codes has put mothers in the service of their husbands, as well as public and ecclesial authorities. Male consent to fatherhood* has been a prerequisite for a child to be considered legitimate.

Feminist philosophers have shown that motherhood is in conflict with personhood, whereas fatherhood is not. Mothers are not expected to be agents who are in a position to deal with moral and emotional complexity. The self-sacrificing ideal hinders mothers from expressing their autonomy* and thus from developing relationships (relationality*). However, motherhood has positive aspects: children and others have to be cared for and love must be given. The crucial issue is that caring and love giving should neither be restricted to motherhood nor subordinated to patriarchal power, as is too often the case in theology and church practice.

Motherhood as a Metaphor. Motherhood is used metaphorically as an ideal that is projected in various ways on women in different situations and in theological analogies. Ideal self-sacrificing and subordinate motherhood has set the standards for the proper conduct of mothers. Motherliness has been expected of women in situations where they are not literally acting as mothers, e.g. in congregations, monastic life, schools, and hospitals. In theology motherhood has been marginalized in relation to the dominating metaphor of the heavenly Father.

The motherhood metaphor raises theological and ethical concerns, because it emphasizes the traditional subordinate aspects of motherhood. Instead, women and men should use this metaphor to make sense of their experience of the challenges of and resources of motherhood. Different forms of motherhood should be analyzed (single mothers, collective mothering, adoptive mothers), and the idea of compulsory motherhood should be questioned. A critical reinterpretation of the motherhood metaphor can be a means of confronting patriarchal* theology and bringing more progressive images of God into play in the service of life in congregations and society.

Becoming a mother means becoming connected to another person without being able to control that person (see Heteronomy). As she gives birth, the mother has to face not only the possible death of her child, but also her own human finitude. Thus reflection on motherhood leads to the insight that we are not in control of life, neither our own nor that of others. Motherhood embodies the ambiguity of vulnerability and exposure. Instead of being affirmed as human, this ambiguity has been unduly gendered and constructed as female. While oppression* is a problem to be solved, vulnerability is a life condition with which we need to cope and with which we can cope through love*. The traditional monolithic view of motherhood exposes mothers to different kinds of sexual oppression in family life and in society. A critical reinterpretation should emphasize that in motherhood we can envision a clear distinction between exposure and vulnerability, between oppressive relationships and love in personal, social, and spiritual life.

Mother's Day, initiated by Julia Ward Howe* after the 1870–71 Prussian War as an annual "Mother's Day of Peace," which eventually became commercialized.

Mott, John Raleigh (1865–1955), North American Methodist layperson, evangelist, promoter of ecumenism; often called "Protestants' leading statesman" of his era and "father of the ecumenical movement"; Nobel Peace Prize laureate (1946), honorary chair of the first World* Council of Churches conference (1948).

After making a commitment to Christian service (1886), he became the college secretary of the YMCA*, organizing its Student* Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions (1888). He then founded the World* Student Christian Federation (1895), which he chaired from 1920 to 1928 (see Rouse, C. [Clara] Ruth). He chaired the Edinburgh* Missionary Conference (1910), which launched the modern ecumenical* movement.

Mott came of age in an era of Protestant optimism about the Social* Gospel, world evangelization, and ecumenism and during the industrial revolution, when global transportation was facilitated. He traveled some 2 million miles for the World Student Christian Federation to evangelize university students especially, to “unite in spirit as never before the students of the world,” and to hasten Jesus’ prayer “that all may be one.”

During the fundamentalist*–Modernist* controversy, when liberals and conservatives debated mission* priorities, Mott taught, “Evangelism without social work is deficient; social work without evangelism is impotent.” His Evangelization of the World in This Generation (1900) became a missionary slogan in the early 20th c.

LUIS MIGUEL DONATELLO

Mozambique. In this war-devastated country, Christianity is multid denominational and coexists with African* Religion and Islam*; there is a notable degree of religious tolerance among Mozambicans.

Long before the Portuguese Vasco da Gama reached the Mozambican coast (1498), Arab settlers had trading posts there. In fact, the name “Moçambique” is derived from “Musa bin Ba’ik,” the name of the Arab sheikh who was ruling the area when da Gama landed. The arrival of da Gama signaled the arrival of both Portuguese rule and Christianity; the navigator’s purpose was both the development of commerce and the propagation of the Christian faith. Implanted through missionary work – Dominican* (since 1506), Jesuit* (since 1560), and Augustinian* (since the 17th c.) – the Roman Catholic Church was closely tied to the colonialist regime; it was a tool for Europeanizing the natives (assimilados), or civilizing and transforming them into “Portuguese-like” people. This was carried out for the purpose of commerce, including slave* trafficking. Missionary work was consequently seriously compromised (Butselaar). Only the Roman Catholic Church was allowed to operate throughout the country.

Mozambican Christianity is unique in that many of the Protestant and African* Instituted Churches (together with a membership similar in size to that of the Roman Catholic churches), which during the Portuguese regime were under strict scrutiny and restricted to certain zones, were not founded by foreign missionaries but by Mozambicans themselves who had emigrated to South Africa, converted, and brought the gospel back home. Thus there “grew in Mozambique, a Church with an African Spirituality, independent or almost independent from a European Mission” (Butselaar).

For a long time, Protestant and African Instituted Churches were confined primarily to the southern region, so that the colonialist regime could exercise control over them; the government suspected that the activities of these churches were related to revolutionary and liberation movements. Muslims lived in the central and northern regions.

Protestant missionary efforts began in the 1880s, with the arrival of (North American, then Swiss) Presbyterian missionaries and North American Methodists (leading to the creation of Congregationalist and United Methodist churches among the Matswas in Inhambane Province), then of Wesleyan Methodists from South* Africa (leading to the creation of Wesleyan Methodist Churches among the va-Ronga and the Changanas, in Maputo and Gaza Provinces). The Anglican Church flourished among the Txopis, the Changanas (Gaza and Southern Inhambane provinces), and the Nyanjas. Since Mozambique gained its independence (1975), Protestant churches have spread throughout the country and there is freedom of religion, although during the first five or six years of the civil war (1975–1992), there was much tension between FRELIMO (Frente de Libertação de Moçambique, the Liberation Front of Mozambique) and all organized religions (including Islam), because they were viewed as having collaborated with the Portuguese and as being ruled from outside (by Roman Catholics from Rome, Presbyterians from Geneva, and Methodists from the USA).

Since 1982 Christianity in Mozambique has grown rapidly. In contrast to their European counterparts, most churches – Roman Catholic, missionary Protestant, and independent churches, as well as African Instituted Churches – are full to capacity every day, and a good number of Christians worship outdoors rather than in a building. Besides reflecting a lack of financial resources, the “under tree” or “open space” worship practice is an interesting inculturation* phenomenon; it parallels practices of African* Religion in its Mozambican form (more specifically, ancestor* veneration), while manifesting the fact that the church provides an open space for everybody.

The Christian community played an important role in bringing about peace in Mozambique. Through the initiative of the Christian Council of Mozambique, the Mozambican churches came together to work for peace with other stakeholders, a process that led to the signing of the Rome General Peace Accords (1992, brokered by the Sant’Egídio community in Italy*). The process of preserving and developing a “culture of peace,” which requires the involvement of all Mozambicans, is ongoing, and the church still plays a role. Initiatives like the “Swords into Plowshares” project (of the Christian Council of Mozambique) were still active in the early 21st c.

The growing understanding that global issues require global intervention led to an increasing interdenominational and interfaith collaboration that stimulated mutual understanding and acceptance, opening space for dialogue and cooperation. Today Christians in Mozambique have joined hands with other religions in peace-building efforts and conflict transformation initiatives such as monitoring elections, governance, and development, and contributing to HIV/AIDS programs.

Served at the court of the prince-archbishop of Salzburg (1769–81); freelance composer in Vienna (1781–91). A Freemason* from 1784, he composed numerous cantatas, songs, and occasional works for lodge meetings (e.g. Maurerische Trauermusik). In his operas, he expresses ideas of the Enlightenment* (Le nozze di Figaro) and Freemasonry (Die Zauberflöte). His sacred works include 17 Masses*, Mass movements, Requiem (incomplete), 2 vespers, 4 litanies*, 3 cantatas*, 2 sacred dramas, 21 minor sacred vocal works, and 17 church sonatas.

Muhlenberg, Henry Melchior (1711–87), Lutheran pastor, organizer of churches, recorder of Pennsylvania colonial life. Muhlenberg trained at Göttingen University, then tutored at the Franke Institute in Halle with its missionary, spiritual, and educational program. Muhlenberg accepted the Institute’s appointment as minister to colonists in the USA (1743). During his travels across the religiously and politically charged territory of the mid-Atlantic and during revolutionary upheavals, Muhlenberg dispensed medicines and Halle publications, sent reports to his superiors, organized churches, regularized ministerial practice, and kept a rich record of colonial life. He is known as the patriarch of North American Lutheranism*. MARIA ERLING

He became affiliated

Müntzer (Münzer), Thomas (c1488–1525), Radical Reformer, mystical theologian, and leader in the Peasants' War of 1524–25. Native of the Harz region (East Germany), after completing biblical studies (Leipzig) and earning a bachelor's degree (Frankfurt/Oder), he was ordained a priest (c1514). A chantry priest in Braunschweig and a confessor for nuns in a convent nearby, he repeatedly visited Luther at Wittenberg (1517–19), became a pastor in Zwickau (1520) and Allstedt (1523–24), married, and had a son. He journeyed to Prague (1521) to support followers of John Hus*. Influenced by the Millennialist* Joachim* of Flora (c1132–1202) and the mystic* John Tauler* (1300–61), he advocated a restitution of 1st-c. spirited apostolic faith; the reformation he espoused, unlike that of Luther*, rejected the exclusive authority of the Bible and temporal power and called for an egalitarian society as a spearhead of the imminent eternal rule of Christ. In 1524 Müntzer organized several hundred followers in a "covenant of the elect" and joined the peasants in their rebellion against their landlords. The rebellion failed. Caught, tortured, and beheaded, Müntzer was branded by Luther as an incarnation of the devil. He was considered by 19th- and 20th-c. revolutionaries, linked to Karl Marx (1818–83) and Friedrich Engels 1820–1895), to be a forerunner of socialist and communist thinkers.

Muratorian Canon, a list of NT writings discovered in 1740 by Lodovico Antonio Muratori (1672–1750) in an 8th-c. manuscript. It is usually dated to the late 2nd c., but others claim that it was a 4th-c work; its poor Latin suggests that the original was in Greek. It mentions all the NT books, except Hebrews*, James*, and 1 and 2 Peter*, and includes the Apocalypse* of Peter and the Wisdom* of Solomon as canonical; it rejects the Shepherd of Hermas*, the Marcionite* epistles of Paul to the Laodiceans and Alexandrians, and several Gnostic* and Montanist* writings.

Music in/as Worship. Although music is not an essential part of worship, it is a vital element of it. Worship, during which people honor and serve one another and God, depends on engagement. To relate to God*, a reality, mysterious* and human, that can never be fully grasped, yet tangibly present in many varied experiences, is challenging. Sounds, body movements, space, objects, and words are principal means by which communities make the connection with God real for themselves. Since the 4th-c., when Christian communities adopted patterns of public court rituals as their structures for worship, music has accompanied processions, called attention to important ritual moments, and communicated formality, seriousness, and power. Most of all, music makes it possible to know from within ourselves what it feels like to believe in God through a wide spectrum of emotions, unbounded love*, paralyzing fear*, anger*, or doubt*.

By way of melodies, rhythms, harmonies, and texts, music reaches beyond rational knowing to open our hearts, stretch our vision, and give us personal and collective energy to make commitments in light of what we grasp through sounds. The purpose of music is not to express proof or argument. Music works within each person through whispers and hunches. Music carries the heart of our different stories, cultures, and traditions. Through music we understand what life and death require. When we make music, we add personal and collective layers to these resonating elements of faith*.

Because music anchors the present moment at the same time that it expresses what is beyond it through a complex weaving of remembering and imagining, choices of music pose both possibilities and difficulties. Whereas for many years, worshipping communities depended on European precedents as the primary resources of sacred sounds, we know now the limits of that dependence. Whereas most worshipping communities were made up of people from the same tradition, now they comprise people of multiple denominations, multiple ethnicities and cultures, and varied needs in the same church community. These situations require meticulous and respectful attention to questions about music. What words and sounds awaken and energize faith in emerging contexts?

With Bach* and rock, complex rhythms and timeless chants, worshipping communities experience their faith as both familiar and unfamiliar. Music makes it possible to discover again and again what it is to be Christian in a world that changes quickly and is instantly interconnected. JANET WALTON Myanmar (Burma). Despite government-imposed restrictions on missionary activities (since 1962), Christianity in Myanmar is a vibrant, rapidly growing faith, as Christians witness to their faith and Burmese church leadership is developed through theological education and the increasing role of women.

The earliest Christian work in Myanmar was that of the Franciscan Pierre Bonfer (1554), but the Catholic mission was actually established by the Italian Barnabite Fathers (1721), followed by the Congregation of Propaganda (1829) and the Oblates of Turin (1840). The Catholic missionaries established schools, seminaries, and other social institutions. They are noted for their work in publishing primers, catechisms, and histories of Myanmar and the Catholic mission.

Protestant mission work began in 1807 with English Baptists and was carried on by North American Baptist missionaries, Adoniram and Ann Judson, who arrived in 1813. They were joined by other Baptist missionaries and missionaries from the Paris Foreign Mission Society (1856).

At the time of the three Anglo-Burmese wars (between 1826 and 1885), Anglican chaplains accompanied the British troops. The first diocese was established by Jonathan Holt Titcomb (1877). Dr. Jonathan Ebenezer Marks, a missionary educator, founded schools and was invited by King Mindon to establish one in Mandalay. The US Methodists began their mission in 1878 and the British Methodists in 1880. All denominations reported substantial growth among the Karens, Kachins, Chins, and other ethnic minorities under British colonial rule and after Myanmar achieved independence (1948); but there has been little growth among Burmans, the majority ethnic group.

A coup by General Ne Win in 1962 (who ruled until 1988) led to a socialist rule. All missionaries were expelled (1966). Mission and private schools, as well as social work institutions (e.g. orphanages, hospitals), were nationalized. Despite pro-democracy demonstrations (1988) and the victory of the National League for Democracy (led by Aung San Suu Kyi, who received the Nobel Prize) in the 1990 national elections, the army continues to control the country. Christians face difficulties in building churches and doing mission work. However, the churches continue to grow. Seminaries report record enrollment, churches are full, and Christians continue to witness to their faith.

As a result of the expulsion of missionaries (1966), the churches urgently needed to develop local leadership. Theological schools from mainline denominations were instituted; the Association for Theological Education in Myanmar included 30 theological schools (2006) representing nine major Protestant denominations (among them, the Myanmar Institute of Theology for higher theological education) and made connections with the Roman Catholic major seminaries and the Evangelical/Pentecostal schools. The reason for the large enrollment in seminaries could be that theological education provides an alternative to the state secular education or that revival* and mission programs prepare believers for the ministry. The forms of theological education vary, but they all aim to be contextual (see Contextualization).

Burmese culture does not encourage leadership by women, even though women bear half the economic and social burden of the home. Traditional views of women's roles continue to dominate even the churches, so that women are rarely found in decision-making bodies and few women are ordained. Yet a large number of women now teach in the theological schools, and some are heads of these schools.

Christianity, despite its deliberate contextual character, is still regarded as a "potted plant" in Buddhist Myanmar, and Christians are regarded as pro-Western and non-nationalist. Christian missionaries' triumphalist approach has not helped matters. What is needed is genuine dialogue* with the large Buddhist* majority.

Christians were instrumental in initiating development work in health*, education*, community welfare, agriculture, and work with marginalized people like orphans, the blind, the elderly, migrants, refugees, exploited women, and the poor. New ideas about development are needed to meet the growing food crises, especially among the rural and urban poor.

Statistics: Population (2000): 45.6 million. Christians, 8% (Protestants, especially Baptists, 6%; Roman Catholics, 1%; independents, 1%); Buddhists, 85%; native religionists, 1%; Muslims, 4% (in the south); others, 2%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

ANNA MAY SAY PA

Mystagogy, a Greek term referring to initiation into a particular mystery*. The Hellenistic mystery* religions used this term to refer to their secret rites of initiation. In Eastern churches, mystagogy is initiation into the sacraments* (mysteries), into fundamental doctrines (especially the mysteries of the Trinity*, Christ*, the Incarnation*, the Holy* Spirit), as well as into the mystical relationship with God, Jesus Christ, and the Holy Spirit, whether in individual religious experience, in communal worship, or in secular life. In the Roman Catholic Church, mystagogy is the post-baptismal initiation and instruction of believers. More generally, mystagogy refers to the principles and practice of the interpretation of mysteries.

Mystery (Gk mysterion), that about which one should not speak (a secret) or cannot speak (since it is beyond words). The Hellenistic mystery* religions illustrate the first perspective; their emphasis is on “secret”: initiates had “experiences of mystery” (e.g. rebirth or mystical experiences in ceremonies), about which they were not to speak. The Dead* Sea Scrolls illustrate the second perspective; in them “mystery” (Heb raz) refers to the mysterious ways in which God acts in history and to the divine plan to bring about the end of time. This active presence of God was “revealed” to the prophets – they recognized it, pointed to it – but it remained a mystery, i.e. something that cannot be known directly and spoken about because it is beyond human understanding. This mystery was in turn revealed to those who diligently studied the prophets’ oracles (i.e. to the apocalyptically minded members of the Qumran community).

Given these two perspectives, Paul’s references to his proclamation of Jesus Christ as based on “the revelation of the mystery kept secret [silent] for long ages” (Rom 16:25) and to other “mysteries” (Rom 11:25, referring to the “mystery” of the hardening of Israel; various mysteries in 1 Cor) are understood in two ways. They are understood in the Greek sense as referring to “secrets” that have been explained and/or can now be told openly (in which case, no mystery remains) – a line of interpretation that is prolonged in dogmatic theologies that emphasize the role of reason*. Or they are understood in the prophetic and apocalyptic sense as referring to experiences of mystery, to divine interventions that have been revealed but are and remain beyond human understanding and beyond words (the proclamation points to the presence of a mystery, which remains a mystery). In the latter case, Orthodox* churches perceive the sacraments* to be mysteries. A theological approach to mystery, prized in Alexandria by Clement* and Origen*, emphasizes that a mystery can be known and revealed, but it is and remains paradoxical*; such an apophatic* theology (or “negative theology”) is associated with mysticism*. To encounter a mystery is to encounter the holy or sacred, which overwhelms the believer – an experience of heteronomy* (in the positive sense of this term, although it remains fraught with danger).

Mystery Religions and Christianity. The mysteries, or mystery religions, were secret religious organizations that flourished during the Greco-Roman period, frequently alongside early Christianity. Typically rooted in ancient tribal and fertility worship, the mysteries proclaimed the salvation* of individuals who chose to be initiated into the inner secrets of life in this world and beyond.

Among the most prominent of the mystery religions were the Eleusinian mysteries of Demeter and Kore and the mysteries of Dionysos, of the Great Mother and Attis, of Isis and Osiris, and of Mithras*. Initiation apparently involved secret ceremonies, but little is known about the actual rituals. The ceremonies of a number of the mystery religions probably included a sacred meal shared by those initiated. The experience of initiates may be described as a passage through death to new life, so that some texts on the mysteries refer to one who is renatus (reborn or born again), and divine figures may be depicted, in one way or another, as dying and rising.

Like the mystery religions, early Christianity was a religion of salvation and personal decision, and Christian worship was also expressed in ceremonial rituals, forms of initiation (see Baptism Cluster), and sacred meals (see Communion; Eucharist Cluster). Christianity often understood salvation in the context of death* and resurrection*, and of rebirth (the Gospel of John*), and in relation to Jesus as a dying and rising figure (e.g., in Paul’s letters and the Gospels). Clement* of Alexandria (in Exhortation to the Greeks) concludes that Christianity may be considered a mystery religion, although it is the only true manifestation of the mysteries. Today most scholars avoid simplistic conclusions about the connection between the mystery religions and early Christianity; instead, they recognize the parallel development of religions deeply concerned with salvation in a Mediterranean environment that employed syncretistic* (inculturated*) means of announcing ways of salvation. See also MITHRAISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

MARVIN MEYER

Mysticism, Mystics. No fewer than 26 definitions or descriptions of “mysticism” and “mystical theology” are listed by the 20th-c. English prelate and theologian William Ralph Inge in his book Christian Mysticism. There is no simple, universally accepted definition of this element of the Christian tradition. Prominent authors have advocated radically incompatible understandings of mysticism.

The interrelated terms “mysticism,” “mystery*,” and “mystical” are etymologically related to the Greek adjective mystikos, which means “hidden” or “secret.” In a preliminary way, we can say that mysticism is the whole set of beliefs and practices arising from a conviction about, and a more or less intense awareness of, realities that are otherwise hidden. Above all, this hidden reality is God’s presence, experienced by Christians either in and through Scripture*, the sacraments*, and the world of nature, or in a more immediate and direct way without the apparent need for such intermediaries.

Scripture. The best place to begin the study of Christian mysticism is the Bible. Although the adjective “mystical” does not appear in the NT, the cognate noun “mystery” (mysterion) is found in a number of important passages. The NT concept of mystery should be interpreted not in light of the ancient Greek mystery religions, as some earlier scholars believed, but in light of the OT, especially the prophets, as most contemporary scholars recognize. Whereas most of the ancient Israelites did not consider themselves privy to God’s plans and decisions, which God was believed to make in consultation with those heavenly advisers called either “the council of the holy ones” (Ps 89:8, NAB) or “the divine assembly” (Ps 82:1), the prophets did have access to this otherwise hidden (i.e. “mystical”) realm. According to Jeremiah, the distinction between a true and false prophet depended on whether or not one “has stood in the council of the Lord, to see him and to hear his word” (Jer 23:18). For this reason, and contrary to the position of an older author like Friedrich Heiler (d1967), who made a sharp distinction between prophetic and mystical prayer, one could say that the earliest mystics in the Judeo-Christian tradition were the Hebrew prophets*.

In the NT, Jesus himself is portrayed as very much in the line of these prophets. He too has knowledge of his Father’s plan of salvation* and is able to reveal it to his disciples*, as when he tells them, “To you is granted the mystery of the kingdom of heaven” (Mark 4:11; cf. Matt 13:11; Luke 8:10), or when he breaks forth in the exultant cry, “I give praise to you, Father, Lord of heaven and earth, for although you have hidden these things from the wise and the learned, you have revealed them to the child-like” (Matt 11:25). Paul is also to be numbered among the early Christian mystics by virtue of his claim that he and his fellow apostles are to be regarded as “servants of Christ and stewards of the mysteries of God” (1 Cor 4:1), for they “speak God’s wisdom, mysterious, hidden [en mysterio], which God predetermined before the ages for our glory” (1 Cor 2:7). Joseph Fitzmyer has in fact concluded that mysterion is so central to Paul’s thought that “it conveys for him the content of his gospel.”

Patristic Era. Mysterion was an equally fundamental term for Origen* (c185–c254), who has been called the church’s first great theologian. In his voluminous commentaries on individual books of the Bible, Origen regularly sought the “mystical” or “spiritual” sense of the text, i.e. its deeper meaning, hidden from those who remained only at the narrative level but open to anyone who, gifted by God, could grasp “the inner meaning, the Lord’s meaning.” Origen was convinced that this was possible precisely because the Bible was not just another book but was one pervaded by God’s presence, even though that presence was hidden to those who did not read the text with the eyes of faith*. Other patristic writers, convinced of a similarly real but hidden presence of the Lord in the sacraments, likewise called them mystical, as when Nilus of Ancyra (d c430) spoke of the Eucharist “not as simple bread but as mystical bread” or when Eusebius* of Caesarea wrote of baptism as “mystical regeneration in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.”

This awareness of God’s presence in the Bible and sacraments* was, understandably, sometimes characterized by what we today would call profound religious experience. Although these early writers did not often speak of their experiences in an autobiographical way, from time to time they did break through. In Origen's first homily on the Song of Songs, which he interpreted "mystically" as referring to the loving union between Christ as bridegroom and the individual soul as bride, he wrote, "Often, God is my witness, I have felt that the Bridegroom was approaching, and that he was as near as possible to me; then he has suddenly gone away, and I have not been able to find what I was seeking. . . . He does that often, until I hold him truly and rise leaning on my well-beloved."

A patristic writer of a somewhat later generation, Gregory* of Nyssa (c335–c395), sometimes called the father of Christian mysticism, emphasized much more insistently than Origen the ultimate incomprehensibility of God, but this insistence was accompanied by an equally strong assertion that one can still have "some sense of [God's] presence," as Gregory writes in his commentary on the Song of Songs. In the West, and at approximately the same time, the most influential of the Latin fathers, Augustine* of Hippo, wrote about an experience of the Divine Presence that he and his mother, Monica*, underwent simultaneously. Using the language of ascent, he writes in his Confessions (Book 9) that the two of them "rose beyond ourselves and in a flash of thought touched the Eternal Wisdom which remains over all. If this could be sustained and other quite different visions disappear, leaving only this one to ravish and absorb and envelop its beholder in inward joys so that life might forever be such as that one moment of understanding for which we had been sighing, would not this be: 'Enter into the joy of your Lord' [Matt 25:21]?"

Medieval and Early Modern Era. Augustine's depiction of that mystical experience as a vision, together with his attempt in The Literal Meaning of Genesis (Book 12) to distinguish among different kinds of visions, provided a theoretical basis for the "visionary literature" that came to form a large part of the corpus of medieval mystical texts, as in the works of Hildegard* of Bingen (1098–1179), Henry Suso (1300–66), and Julian* of Norwich (1343–c1416). The ongoing popularity of their works, distinguished not only by detailed descriptions of visions but also by acute theological reflections on them, has contributed to the widespread assumption that mystics regularly experience visions or other extraordinary phenomena, such as locutions (divine words heard inwardly) or ecstasy (a sense of "standing outside" oneself in a trance-like state of felt timelessness). Near the dawn of the modern era, Teresa* of Ávila (1515–82) analyzed such phenomena in great detail, especially in her masterpiece, The Interior Castle (Part 6). Teresa's analyses are penetrating, but the very brilliance of her work has almost inevitably reinforced for many the impression that Christian mysticism is something extraordinary, reserved for a chosen few, while most followers of Christ are consigned to a more ordinary way of discipleship. This was certainly the understanding of mysticism in what was, according to the Oxford English Dictionary, the first recorded use of the word in English, when Henry Coventry wrote in Philemon to Hydaspes (1736), "How much nobler a Field of Exercise . . . are the seraphic Entertainments of Mysticism and Extasy than the mean and ordinary Practice of a mere earthly and common Virtue!"

Some More Recent Understandings. Coventry's once widely accepted depiction of mysticism as something extraordinary has more recently been subjected to criticism by various scholars. The two opposing viewpoints can be illustrated by the work of two theologians of the 20th c., both of them referring to the life of Thérèse* of Lisieux (1873–97), revered by millions as a great saint. In his study of Thérèse, Hans Urs von* Balthasar stated categorically that she never "crossed the threshold into what is known as mysticism." He justified his position by noting that her life was free of the presence of or even the longing for extraordinary "mystical phenomena" such as visions, ecstasies, and locutions. Yet Louis Bouyer, also fully aware that such phenomena were absent from Thérèse's life, drew a very different conclusion, namely that she offers us "the most convincing testimony of the fact that genuine mysticism does not consist so much in the experience of ecstasies or 'visions', . . . but quite simply in total self-abandonment in naked faith, through an efficacious love of the Cross that is one with the very love of the crucified God." The main thing, according to Bouyer, is to be fully convinced of the Divine Presence within oneself and others, "and especially to act accordingly, not to experience more or less directly the feeling that this is indeed so."

It would be pointless to argue that one of those understandings of mysticism is correct and the other simply wrong, for in fact the term has long been used in both these senses. However, it is worth noting that Bouyer's understanding is more in accord with the way the mystical was understood in the early Christian centuries, when a conviction of God's presence in the Bible, the sacraments, other human beings, or the world of nature was not necessarily associated with the kinds of unusual phenomena that von Balthasar had in mind. In this earlier understanding, the mystical is viewed as something that, to one degree or another, is part of any devout Christian's life journey. The Trappist monk Thomas Merton* (1915–1968) expressed this continuity of the mystical with other stages of spiritual growth in a particularly felicitous way in one of his essays: "To reach a true awareness of [God] as well as ourselves, we have to renounce our selfish and limited self and enter into a whole new kind of existence, discovering an inner center of motivation and love which makes us see ourselves and everything else in an entirely new light. Call it faith*, call it (at a more advanced stage) contemplative* illumination, call it the sense of God or even mystical union: all these are different aspects and levels of the same kind of realization: the awakening to a new awareness of ourselves in Christ, created in Him, redeemed by Him, to be transformed and glorified in and with Him." One of Merton's contemporaries, the monk David Steindl-Rast, has expressed this understanding even more succinctly by writing that "a mystic is not a special kind of human being; rather, every human being is a special kind of mystic" (see Heteronomy).

Mysticism and Interreligious Dialogue. Christians in all parts of the world would do well to reflect on the fact that the theologian Friedrich von* Hügel (1852–1925) convincingly argued that the mystical element of religion is just as indispensable as what he called the other two basic elements: the institutional and the speculative. It is only when one of the three becomes top-heavy or undervalued that problems arise. It is equally important to realize that the same three elements are to be found, to some degree, in all the great world religions. Just as Christians sense God's presence in the Bible, so too do Jewish mystics find that presence above all in the Torah, Muslims in the Qur'an, and Hindus in the Vedas, Upanishads, and Bhagavad Gita, while Buddhists experience the ongoing presence of the Buddha in their sutras and other scriptures. In our time, when encounters with members of other religious traditions are becoming more and more common, this element of the mystical may well offer a more common ground for dialogue* than the institutional and speculative elements, if only because religious institutions are often associated with memories of hostile actions in the past and theological speculations have frequently been characterized by charges and countercharges of heresy.

Myth and the Study of Christianity. In its early Greek usage, the term mythos was largely synonymous with *logos. Thinkers such as Plato made a distinction between the two, qualifying myth as something implausible or fabulous, viewing logos as a more positive term. From this early period up to the present, the various presentations and interpretations of myths, and the debates over their function in culture, society, and religion, have constituted the field of mythology.

Despite its secondary status as "implausible," myth is found in every culture and during every epoch; it is as widespread as it is diverse. A primary characteristic of myth is the language it uses. It tends to speak of the very nature of creation* in a declarative and constative way, in a tone beyond simple proposition or description. Thus mythical language speaks directly to the order and meaning of human existence, typically through an account of the beginnings of things. Often in archaic language, these narratives provide us with cosmogonies, creation stories at a point in time somehow removed from our own. Mythical language also typically supplies the meaning behind various ritual acts or sacred objects. Thus the significance and connotations of the rite of Communion*, or Eucharist*, may be approached through the lens of mythology.

Beyond its contribution to the development of literature, myth is central to our attempts to understand religion*. Since all religions appear to rely on it, myth may be seen as an expression of something essential to both human religiosity and culture*. Yet how are we to translate those insights from mythical language into scholarly discourse? Some of the most significant answers to this problem are the following.

One approach, which originated with the Greeks, is to read myths as allegories* that speak to the human condition or as questions of ultimate significance. For example, stories of the battling gods are to be understood simply as providing insight into the conflicting impulses found within all human beings. This type of allegorical reduction remains a common practice even today.

When 18th-c. North Atlantic empires arose and expanded across much of the known world, the comparative models of modern science came to be applied to myth. In their encounters with a bewildering variety of societies, religions, and languages, North Atlantic travelers and later ethnographers sought to compare myths gathered from all cultures. In the face of such variety, a notable project was the search for the origins of religion*; comparative mythology was seen as a uniquely useful method for such a vast scientific exercise.

For mainstream Christian theology, the question of myth came to center stage only in the 19th c. As a part of his contribution to modern theology, and most likely inspired by 18th-c. ethnographers, Schleiermacher* embraced certain elements of myth in order to explain the variation of forms God* had taken over time. God is to be known mythically; the hidden truth is eternal and unchanging, but divinity moves across the ages assuming various forms. Schleiermacher also contributed to the debates arising over the principles of hermeneutics*, or scriptural* interpretation. The concept of myth was important in these discussions, but Bultmann* and his followers objected and in fact attempted to free their biblical readings of myth, seeking to “demythologize*” Scripture.

With the advent of modern psychology, efforts began anew to translate the language of myth. In an effort to access the shared unconscious of the human mind, Carl Jung turned to the common patterns and symbols* recurring in myth. Another modern figure to systematically research commonalities among the myths of various cultures was the historian and comparative religionist Mircea Eliade.

RICHARD J. MCGREGOR

Nag Hammadi Codices, collection of 12 papyrus codices (probably 4th c. CE) and pages from a 13th, found in 1945 by villagers near the town of Nag Hammadi, Upper Egypt, and containing Coptic translations of more than four dozen tractates. Several of these bear some relation to Valentinian*, Sethian, or similar traditions described by earlier Christian heresiologists and often labeled “Gnostic*.” Before 1945 knowledge about such groups came primarily from these polemical accounts, since the original works were not yet known (except for a few, found primarily in three early Coptic manuscripts discovered in the 18th–19th c.).

Most of the tractates were originally composed in Greek, probably between the 2nd and 4th c. CE, and some possibly earlier (a fragment of Plato’s Republic). They vary in genre: collections of sayings (e.g. the well-known Gospel of Thomas*, the Gospel of Philip*, the Gospel* of Truth), apocalypses (e.g. Apocalypse of Peter*), treatises in epistolary form, homilies, and others. Several (e.g. Apocryphon of John*) contain myths* of origin, describing the emergence of the divine realm and the creation of the cosmos and human beings, with the creation of the material world typically ascribed to lower creators rather than the highest God.

MICHAEL A. WILLIAMS

Nahum, Book of, one of the Twelve Prophets and containing some of the HB’s most vivid poetry, offers no criticism of its own people (unlike other prophetic books), but describes the “devastation, desolation, and destruction” (2:10) of Nineveh, the capital city of the Assyrian Empire. Thus the prophet’s name, which means “comfort” or “comforter” (or is a shortened form of “YHWH comforts”), is quite appropriate for a Judahite audience that suffered deeply at Nineveh’s hands (1:15, 2:2) but is ironic from the perspective of the Ninevites, whose “name shall be perpetuated no longer” (1:14).

Scholars agree that Nahum’s prophecy is to be dated to around 612 BCE, the year Nineveh fell to a coalition of Mede and Babylonian forces. That event was either imminent or had recently occurred.

The execution of justice* against Nineveh, clearly warranted because of its endless cruelties (3:19), is a demonstration of the belief that YHWH, the universal sovereign, “takes vengeance on his adversaries and rages against his enemies” (1:2) with punishments that are appropriate to the crimes committed. Indeed, given the prophet’s description of Nineveh as a prostitute (other cities like Jerusalem [Ezek 16:1–43] and Rome [Rev 17:1–6] were similarly portrayed in other prophetic literature) and its treachery as sexual seduction (3:4), YHWH’s punishment of sexual violence and humiliation (3:4–7) is metaphorically apt. Nevertheless, the idea that God’s anger* may express itself in sexual violence* against women is disconcerting (see Abuse as Pastoral Care Issue) and suggests why these verses rarely find an audience in Christian and Jewish teaching and preaching.

BETH GLAZIER-MCDONALD

Nakedness, Nudity, had a number of meanings in the Christian tradition. Adam* and Eve’s* discovery that they were naked (Gen 3:10) is interpreted in two ways: (1) Earlier they were not ashamed of nakedness; thus for some (Adamites, Doukhobors), nakedness without shame* or guilt is regarded as a fruit of salvation*. (2) Earlier they were clothed in wisdom and glory but became naked and vulnerable through sin* (Wis 2:23–24; Rom 8:19–22; 2 Cor 5:4), whose power is overcome through Christ’s death (Rom 6:6–11). Literal nakedness connotes poverty and vulnerability (Job 1:21; Matt 25:36). For Jerome* the ascetic* life consisted of “nakedly following the naked Christ”; Francis* of Assisi left his previous life by literally becoming naked. In the early church, a person being baptized* was naked, signifying transition, rejection of the old, and putting on of the new.

Name of Jesus, Feast of the, medieval celebration held in January; on the Roman calendar until 1969; for Anglicans, an alternative to the Feast of the Circumcision (January 1).

Namibia, a large, sparsely populated country, has large diamond, copper, zinc, uranium, and salt deposits, vast tracts of cattle grazing land, and a sea laden with fish. It was colonized by Germany (1884–1919) and was then under South African rule until it achieved independence (1990). A policy of “divide and rule” (apartheid*) left the settlers rich and the Namibians poor.

Christianity arrived in Namibia shortly after 1652, when the Nama (Hottentot) people and “Coloureds” from present-day South Africa crossed the Orange River, bringing what they had learned from Dutch settlers. The first European missionaries arrived in 1812 from the London Missionary Society. An indigenous Christian woman, Zara Schmelen (c1793–1831), translated the Bible into Khoekhoegowab (the Nama language). German Lutherans from the Rhenish mission (1842) followed by Finnish Lutherans (1870) established Lutheran churches that formed the United Evangelical Church of South West Africa, the largest church in Namibia.

For their worship services, Namibians have adapted Christian rituals and icons to include indigenous music, songs, artwork, drumming, singing, and dance. Christians regard the cross of Jesus Christ and the Bible as the most sacred Christian symbols and have them in their homes. The churches promote programs dealing with HIV/AIDS by maintaining that AIDS is a disease, not a sin.

Since the peace accords (1988) and independence (1990), the constitution guarantees freedom of religion. Through interreligious and joint social activities, African* Religion is accepted as being on a par with Christianity (and the small Muslim and Jewish communities). Some Christians retain indigenous beliefs and practices; e.g. African Religion speaks more intimately to their spiritual needs during the difficult moments of death* and mourning.

Statistics: Population (2000): 1.7 million (M). Christians, 1.6 M, 92.3% (Protestants, 0.8 M; Roman Catholics, 0.3 M; members of African Instituted Churches and other independents, 0.2 M); African Religionists, 0.1 M, 6%. (Based on World Christian Encyclopedia, 2001.)

PAUL JOHN ISAAC

Nantes, Edict of, and Its Revocation. The Edict of Nantes was a decree issued in 1598 by Henry* IV of France to end the wars between Catholics and Huguenots*; it embodied many features of earlier peace agreements (1564, 1570, 1576).

The Edict gave Protestants liberty of conscience and private worship and of public worship in many localities and on the estates of Protestant nobles (though not in Paris); royal funds for Protestant schools, including several universities; special courts, with both Catholic and Protestant judges, for cases involving Protestants; and control of about 200 cities and 5 garrisoned cities.

This last provision conflicted with the absolutist policies of Richelieu (in power 1624–42), and later Mazarin and Louis XIV. The fall of La Rochelle (1628) led to the disarming of other military forces. It became increasingly difficult for the Reformed Church to hold national gatherings. After 1665 Protestant children were required to be educated as Roman Catholics; the special courts were abolished in 1679; and the Edict was revoked in 1685 at the request of the Assembly of the Clergy, on the pretense that the majority of Protestants had been converted to Catholicism.

Though forbidden to emigrate, at least 400,000 fled to other countries, enriching their economies at France’s expense. The revocation was one of the justifications for England’s removal of the Roman Catholic king James II and the installation of William in 1688, with the provision that no Catholic was to occupy the British throne. The demand for external conformity fostered duplicity and guarded attitudes as ongoing marks of French culture; the contrast with England’s religious tolerance gave weight to criticism by Voltaire and other Enlightenment figures.

EUGENE TESSELLE

Narcisa de Jesús (1832–69), “the Violet of Nobol.” Born in Nobol, Ecuador, she consecrated her life to the service of God as a humble dressmaker. She moved to Lima (1868), where she lived a life dedicated to spirituality and service to others. She was beatified in 1992.

National Association of Evangelicals, a coordinating agency facilitating Christian unity, public witness, and cooperative ministry among some 60 Evangelical denominations, congregations, educational institutions, and service agencies (e.g. the Salvation* Army) in the USA; it started in St. Louis, Missouri (1942), and expanded in the 1950s (as Billy Graham, associated with the agency, gained visibility). It sponsored the New International Version of the Bible (1978). It is usually contrasted with the liberal National* Council of Churches and the conservative American* Council of Christian Churches.

National Baptist Convention, USA, founded in 1895 with headquarters in Nashville, Tennessee. Claiming more than 8 million members, it is the largest body of African American Baptists. A dispute over the National Baptist Publishing Board led to the organization of the rival National Baptist Convention of America (1915). Differences over the tenure of the presidency and the Convention's role in civil* rights resulted in a second split in 1961, as Gardner C. Taylor, Martin Luther King*, Jr., and other Evangelical liberals rejected the "gradualism" and "progressive accommodationism" of its president, Joseph H. Jackson, in favor of the politics of confrontation and organized campaigns of nonviolent direct action. King and others on the "Taylor team" supported the decision to organize the Progressive National Baptist Convention, USA, a second rival body. The programs and priorities of the National Baptist Convention, USA, have over time included foreign missions, cooperation with white Baptists, and racial uplift and empowerment. The election of Theodore J. Jemison, an adviser to King, to the presidency of the Convention in 1982 inaugurated a gradual shift away from the sociopolitical conservatism of Jackson toward a more liberal philosophy, a trend that continues in the early 21st c.

National Council of Churches (NCC), leading ecumenical* organization in the USA, founded (1950) by the merger of the Federal* Council of Churches and seven other interchurch agencies. It includes 36 Protestant, Anglican, Orthodox*, African*American, and peace* churches. Affiliated with the World* Council of Churches, it seeks interchurch and interfaith cooperation and advocates social justice. It sponsored two new translations* of the Bible*: the Revised Standard (1946, 1952) and the New Revised Standard (1989). Churches that disagree with the NCC are affiliated with the National* Association of Evangelicals and the American* Council of Christian Churches.

Nationalism and Christianity. Nationalism is an ideological* formulation of a society's culture*. It can be based on language, kinship, history, or religion, or a combination of these elements. To be useful as one of these foundational elements, religion (whether Christianity or another religion) has to be nationalized. In societies where religions are pitted against each other, they have to be cleansed of their divisive potential by being encapsulated in nationalism – being made part and parcel of national identity, and having histories of religious conflict tailored to fit a tale of national unity. Religious worship comes to be connected with moments of national glory and national remembrance. This process of homogenization is never entirely successful, because nationalism not only unifies but also diversifies by giving rise to alternative forms of nationalism or regional identities. Since in modern nation-states a politics of numbers, producing majorities and minorities, is important, religion can be used as the foundation of majority nationalism as well as of minority identities.

Nationalism can be secular or religious. In the modern period, the relation of secular nationalism to religion is particularly significant. Secular nationalism as an ideology helps create the space in which religions are allowed to operate. This does not mean that the role of religion is necessarily limited. Religious traditions as interpreted in a nationalist way are crucial to the formation of state–society and society–individual relations in the modern nation. Religious traditions become fields of disciplinary practice in which modern civil subjects are formed and contribute to the creation of the modern public. Religious institutions make possible notions of individual conscience and civilized conduct; religious movements produce notions of what is "public" and shape public opinion.

At a theoretical level, secular nationalism can be seen as replacing religion (becoming the religion of the nation-state), and modern statecraft as a secularized political theology. However, religious communities are never entirely absorbed by nationalism and continue to be the object of secular regulation, such as in the separation of state and church (see Church and State Relations Cluster).

Nationalism can also be religious in nature. Religious nationalism may amount to not more than a civil* religion in the sense that national leaders express their belief that the nation is "a nation under God." Themes of death, sacrifice, rebirth, and a mission in the world are celebrated in religious fashion during national holidays and in the form of national monuments. In certain cases, when war and death are involved, the nation has to acquire a metaphysical existence beyond individual life.

Important theological concepts have been adopted by modern nationalism, such as that of the chosen people* of God, formulated from the OT – a notion that can justify an almost racial sense of superiority and fuel nationalist projects abroad and at home; that of rebirth or revival* of the nation, connected to the Protestant metaphor of awakening*; that of the coming of a messiah*, a leader who will take his people to a promised land. A religious symbolic repertoire of divine election*, of ordeals to test one's convictions*, conversion* to higher truth, and martyrdom* is routinely applied to the biographies of great nationalist leaders and their nations.

World religions like Christianity can never be entirely captured by particular forms of nationalism, because they have a global mission*. From the 19th c., this global mission has been transformed by the emergence of a world system of nation-states in which a Christian is at the same time a member of a worldwide community and a citizen of a nation-state. Members of Christian minorities all over the world are constantly questioned about their national loyalty. This is clearest in the case of Roman Catholics, especially those with an Ultramontanist* position, who affirm their allegiance to the pope and are consequently accused of national disloyalty. The nationalist question of loyalty concerned Roman Catholics in 19th-c. Britain as much as it concerns Coptic* Christians in Egypt today. Particularly, conversion to Christianity in nations that consider themselves to be non-Christian is often considered to be antinational. One strategy for coping with this is to show the deep, historical roots of Christianity in periods of national history that are important to the nationalist imagination.

The global character of Christianity makes it transnational, despite its being aligned with nationalism in many places. While Protestant state* churches are directly connected to nation-states, the religious cause is always seen as expanding beyond the boundaries of the nation-state, especially in missionary activities and theologies of dialogue. While the Christian mission* is as old as Christianity itself, missionary activities receive new salience and new challenges owing to the emergence of nationalism. In the contemporary phase of globalization, transnational Christian movements, such as Evangelicalism* and Charismatic* Catholicism, align themselves with nationalism in different parts of the world, while simultaneously remaining outside the control of national states.

Native American Traditions and Christianity. A lingering question in the minds of many Euro-Christians and even in the minds of some Indian people has to do with the possible connections between Christianity and the cultures* and religious traditions of Native peoples in North America. Are not the spirits that Native peoples call on similar to the angels of the Christian holy text? Do not all Indian people have a name for that Sacred Other identified by Euro-Christians as "God"?

Before these concerns are addressed, the radical cultural differences between American Indians and all those cultures associated with European modernity – a complex issue – must be noted. We limit ourselves here to two principal differences between these two cultural sets and try to demonstrate their ultimate incommensurability.

Two cultural values won the day in Europe with the emergence of European modernity: individualism and temporality. With the concurrent emergence of European colonialism*, these values were then imposed on all the lands and peoples dominated by the European military, economic, and political machinery. These values were internalized by European peoples to such an extent that they are presumed to be universal values, when they are recognized at all (so dominant is the cultural conditioning). Yet most of the world's indigenous peoples, and particularly American Indians, live according to a very different and contrasting set of deeply rooted cultural values, marked by spatiality and communitarianism.

Because the basic notion of salvation* in the Euro-Western schema is heavily individualized (individual or personal salvation in Jesus Christ), the colonial missionary imposition of this model of salvation immediately worked for the destruction of Indian communitarian values. A well-known story involves a missionary who finally achieved the conversion of the chief of a tribe. When the chief capitulated, received catechetical instruction, and agreed to baptism, he discovered that the missionary refused to baptize the whole tribe because the members had not been likewise instructed. The chief therefore deferred his own baptism until the missionary was able to instruct the whole tribe. To this day, Indian cultures are strongly characterized by communitarianism, in spite of the concurrent greed of individualism that is taught by the missionaries, schools (stressing personal achievement over community good), and US government officials and the dysfunctionality that such individualism creates. One of the characteristic behaviors in Indian communities that continues today is called the "give-away," whereby an Indian family would honor the community by generously giving gifts that they had been collecting for a long time. The missionaries condemned these give-aways as demonic. Their reasoning seems to have been that it hindered the development of the newly imposed regime of individualism, not merely that it detracted from the Sunday morning offering.

The difference between spatiality and European temporality is perhaps even more foundational for both cultures, yet is much less readily acknowledged by Euro-Americans. While the sacred is measured in terms of time in the West (e.g. seventh day, Sunday mass, the Julian and Gregorian calendars*, liturgical time, the time clock, production schedules, the value of labor, annual reports to stockholders), space and place are much more significant to Indian peoples. Where we live, the territories where we are sovereign, the orientation of our homes (with doors facing east in most tribes), the direction of our heads when we sleep, how we bury our dead: these are key issues in our cultures. Ceremonies always have a spatial orientation: Sun dances and green corn dances are oriented toward the rising of the sun. A sweat lodge may face east or west, depending on the tribe and/or the particularity of the ceremony. The lingering sense of spatiality in Euro-Christianity is reduced to speaking of the altar in a church as "liturgical east," even when the orientation is north by northwest, an architectural decision predicated largely on economic and temporal concerns.
